673 regard such transgressions indulgently. During my journeying to the north of Sakhalin, I had the opportunity to observe this characteristic of the Gilyak. They took without permission, or asked me for, dried crusts, sugar, or tobacco, but never once did they 673 try to take objects of much greater value. Theft is a sin among 762 the Gilyak, and he who commits it covers himself with disgrace. And disgrace and shame are a great punishment to the Gilyak. The Gilyak who is convicted of doing something shameful goes out into the taiga and lays hands on himself (hangs himself). Never does a Gilyak commit suicide out of fear of poverty, which, in view of the custom of mutual assistance, is a cause of fear to no one. Nor will any physical sufferings impel him to such an act, but he will yield to the feeling of shame or strong personal grief and take his life.

674 Murders among the Gilyak are very rare and never have 190 a mercenary motivation. Murders are committed principally in ● 526 the heat of passion and frequently under the most inconsequential 158 circumstances. For example, the Gilyak have a habit of wrestling, 273 and sometimes during the fighting the opponents grow so heated that they take to their knives. In general the Gilyak reaches for his knife at the first feeling of irritation, but he is by far not as prone to resort to weapons as the southerner. Fear of Russian justice has had a beneficent influence on him in this respect. The Gilyak youths, fearing being borne away by passion, have begun to throw down their knives before beginning to wrestle. But Russian vodka has caused frequent slayings among Amur Gilyak in an intoxicated condition. I shall not discuss the murders committed deliberately to satisfy the demands of clan vengeance or conjugal honor. Such murders are regarded by the Gilyak as lawful, although with the settlement of the Russians they have begun to disappear.

683 Insults by word or deed are also an infrequent phenomenon among the Gilyak and end in either a reconciliation or a duel. In the first case, the offending party, recognizing his guilt, atone for it, voluntarily presenting the injured party with dogs, a robe,

CONTINUED ON NEXT FICHE

/340 cont./

524 gives the right to one move, No. 2 -- to two, etc., side No. 6 gives the right to six moves.

If the chong comes up, the king from the middle line changes place with the nearest of his soldiers; if still another chong, he changes with the next one on one move; on the remaining figures, that soldier who took the king's place in the middle line moves. Once the chong has come up, one may move the next time in any case. The king makes moves only after the first chong; then /341/ he lets the soldiers move. If a soldier makes several steps along the middle line and meets a soldier of the opposite camp, he jumps over him, but does not take him, and only if this latter stands on the destination of the other, is he taken. One must figure out with what figure to make a move to succeed in taking the opponent.

On a chong, the king, making a move, counts only the occupied places; the empty ones do not count. A king cannot be killed; if a soldier moves up to him, he lies down and waits for another move. A chong normally does not take a soldier, except in only the last two nests. A king can move only on a chong; otherwise, he moves only when he has one soldier left. The opponent is taken only when he is on a destination.

During the game one must shout what he wants: kyr, mra, etc. If a king does not have one soldier to change with, the first chong has no effect, but the next one gives the king the right to make a move; a soldier may make a move for him. Sometimes one must combine in order to jump over an opponent's soldier.

The basic rules of the game. The soldiers cross first to the middle line and then move forward into the enemy camp, but do not come back. When there are no soldiers on someone's battle line (basic), then the king may make moves like the soldiers, i.e., in any number.

In accordance with the soldiers knocked out of formation or moved to the middle line, the king has the right, on a chong, to change with his soldier, regardless of distance, but, of course, not on the middle line. At the beginning of the game the kings stand on the middle line at the ends. If a king has made backward

/341 cont./

• 524 steps, then he can be killed. The game continues even after the king is taken. If the old man moves back, then a soldier may kill him with a chong; if there are two chong in a row, then the king can come back (1).

524 184
[115]

1. I offer a variation of the game, recorded by me from the words of the Amur Gilyak Mladzyan, student in the Institute of the Peoples of the North in Leningrad.

The one who begins to play after the chong comes up moves his soldier on the middle line of nests, in accordance with the number of moves which have come up (by the upper surfaces of the cubes), the appropriate number of rests, starting from the right. Then his partner does the same on his side, and when his soldier comes to land on the spot of a soldier of his partner, which is already standing there, he takes it.

After one of the partners has moved to the end of the battle line, he can, on future moves, cross over to the line of the enemy (his partner) and knock out his soldiers, and when he reaches the end of that line, he is considered the winner.

In spite of the fact that the above description differs from the description of the Sakhalin game of chong in Shternberg, we print it, for it may facilitate an understanding of the above-described variant of the game, although this latter differs considerably from that described by Mladzyan. S. Sh.

/644 cont./

855 case of a small boy, but the obstinacy that the latter showed and the howls that he emitted proved all too clearly how unfamiliar and annoying the whole procedure was for him.

In spite of their unwashed faces and often also uncombed hair, 855 the Gilyak children are, as a rule, dressed well and in winter very 291 warmly. In their garments, made for them as a copy of those of the adults, often down to the smallest detail and with all the ornaments and embellishments on a reduced scale, one can see that in this respect the mothers spare no toil or effort for the sake of their children and are probably not lacking in motherly vanity. The fact, however, that one
• 524 sees on many a small boy the fur coat and apron-skirt held together by [273] a belt on which hang all the numerous implements carried by an adult, ngawla- and yi-dshakko, fire steel, tinder box, pipe cleaner, etc., except that they are all carved out of wood in miniature, shows that the fathers, too, in their leisure hours, do not disdain giving some time to their children and involuntarily arousing their imitative instincts.
855 Otherwise, one cannot speak of any education /645/ for the children, 861 of any training in obedience, in respect toward the parents, and the like for them; they simply grow up, following the patterns that they have set before their eyes by parents, siblings, and others, without anyone paying any attention to them.

524 The Gilyak children, like all children, enjoy imitating and mimicking in their games the activities, work, and amusements of parents and adults. One of the earliest, most common, and most popular games of Gilyak children is the moving back and forth of wooden figures which are supposed to represent dogs. It is noteworthy that these figures, which do not remotely resemble a dog, are quite stereotyped among the Gilyak (see Pl. LX, Fig. 6 /see p. 1260 /) and only now and then vary in size. Whether they are made by the parents or by older brothers of the little ones, a copy of the shape of a dog is obviously never intended in producing them. The legs of the animal, for instance, are not in the least even indicated -- rather it is simply the conventionally assumed representation of a dog as a toy. Or could it perhaps be, as one might almost suspect from its general usage among the Gilyak, a fragment of an old conventional picture language among them? Other animal figures allegedly likewise carved for the delight

/645 cont./

• 524 and entertainment of the children, for instance, those of the carp (Gilyak pilengat, Pl. LX, Fig. 5 /see p. 1260/), bear a quite different character, because they reveal an attempt to give a really 857 similar picture of the animal. As soon as the boys are able to 868 romp about freely, they amuse themselves by shooting with small bows and arrows at a target or at imaginary animals, by traveling on small sleds with the whelps, or by faithfully imitating all the manipulations that they see the adults execute with bears, for which one boy represents the bear and behaves like it, but the others try to pull it, subdue it and lead it away, etc., precisely as is done during the processions with the animal at the bear festivals. Very soon they are also taken along by the father or older brother to set up or inspect the animal traps in the woods, for fishing, and the like, and they learn from them the pertinent techniques and in general what to do or to avoid. No less do the girls in their games and occupations imitate their mothers and older sisters and are soon capable of helping them in the handicrafts and all the operations in the household.

595 In a polygamous marriage all the wives live in the same house with the husband, and each of them has a certain section of the sleeping benches for herself and her children. Legally the wives are completely equal and are obliged to care for the household jointly. But as a rule the division of labor is not com-[593] pletely equal among them, since one or another of the wives is almost always favored by the husband, and only the lighter work falls to her, while all the heavier work must be performed by the others. It is by no means the case, however, that the last-purchased or the youngest wife is always the favorite, for sometimes, as Jutschin and other Gilyak told me, the man may take a second or a third wife simply in order to make life easier for the first wife or for one of the two he already has /646/ by placin a new and able worker by her side. Whether he achieves his goal depends, however, on whether and how the wives accommodate themselves to the new arrangement and get along with one anoth For no matter how little jealous they may be, the peaceful

/684 cont./

545 171 theatrical presentations, no fantastic costumes, no masks, etc. whereas other Paleo-Asiatic peoples, for instance, the Aleuts and the Northwest American Eskimo, have such a wealth of these and such great delight in these entertainments that there are complicated arrangements for setting up the stage, the entrance of /685/ the actors, etc. in the kashim for the most part erected [157] for the purpose (1). The Gilyak seem to have such a sober frame of mind that they are not capable of illusion.

1. Concerning the theatrical performances of the Aleuts see in particular: Veniaminov", Zap. ob" ostr. Unalashk. otd. /Notes on the Islands of the Unalaska Sector/, St. Petersburg, 1840, Part II, pp. 85, 93. With regard to the Eskimo, see above, pp. 492-498.

527 [526] Their social entertainments are principally of such a kind as to offer the men an opportunity, in competitive tests, to parade their great skill, fearlessness, boldness, and strength, and afterward to enjoy an opulent, hearty meal, whereas the women, except for their very active participation in preparing the latter, play an almost entirely passive role at them and hardly have a 128 chance to enjoy the results of their own labor. In the next section, devoted exclusively to the bear festival of the Gilyak and their immediate neighbors, I shall also discuss the entertainments on the program for it and in the order in which I myself became acquainted with them.

• 524 439 Mention might be made here, however, of one Gilyak game which does not belong there and which they owe to the Chinese; I mean playing with cards. They are the well-known, small, Chinese playing-cards, which Chinese traders bring from the Sungari and upper Ussuri down the Amur, through the territory of the Goldi and Olcha (2), and thus into the hands of the Gilyak.

[171] 2. Maack (Putesh. na Amur", p. 198) saw for example, these Chinese playing

Goldi RX3

G /685 cont./

• 524 439 171 2. (cont.) cards, the game being played with 120 cards, in use among the Goldi of Ykka.

G 524 525 171 The latter have only the expression pai, that is, gratis or free, for card-playing, proof of the harmless fashion in which it has been practiced up to now. In fact, in my time the Gilyak only played for tobacco, which, in view of the common enjoyment of each pipe of tobacco as a rule, even more reveals it as an entirely harmless pleasure. But they knew that the "Manchu" (Chinese) made a quite different use of it and played for much higher stakes. Przewalski describes how widespread the card game is among the Chinese in the upper Ussuri and the adjacent coastal area, especially along the Zymu-che and Ssutschan, where during the winter unemployed riffraff spend entire days and nights playing cards and cause the ruin of many a formerly rich houseowner (3). Under these circumstances it is surprising that it has not spread more rapidly down the Amur and that it has not found favorable soil in particular among the greedy and acquisitive Gilyak. It is undoubtedly because of the energy with which the latter have been able to keep the Chinese away. In the meantime it may also have been carried to them by the Russians.

3. Przheval'skii, Putesh. v" Ussur. kraie /Journey to the Ussuri Region/, St. Petersburg, 1870, p. 90.

G 648 Before I start the description of the bear festival of the Gilyak, I must cast a brief comparative glance at the peoples immediately adjacent to them, the Olcha and Goldi, with regard to the social and co-operative relations touched on above.

/686/ In my time, after the official Manchu-Chinese trade center of Deren was abandoned sometime in the twenties the Olcha, like the Gilyak, were not tributary to either China or G [439] Russia. Only if one or the other went to the Sungari to trade did they have to pay, as has been mentioned above (1), to the

1. Cf. p. 950.

2;Schrenck--1260 E-5 (1854-1856) 1881-1895 RX2 Gilyak RX2 LX

778 532 751

532

•[524]

1. Iron circlet with animal figures, worn to prevent headaches (Gilyak). 2. Iron semicircle with symbolic figures, worn around the neck to prevent sickness (Gilyak). 3. Amulet-belt with human and animal figures (Olcha). 4, 5. Fish carved out of wood (Gilyak). 6. Gilyak child's toy representing a dog.

7: Kreinovich--9 E-5 (1931) 1934 Gilyak

411 called amlɔus and the sea-end is called ɔz-bax-puks 225 'master's stone tie.' To this end, which is lowered into the 283 sea, is tied ɔz-bax 'master's stone' or 'master stone,' which, according to the Gilyaks, weighs two poods. This stone, the Gilyaks explained to me, forms the anchor of the seine. In place of plummets, stones are attached to the bottom of the seine. They are called tatr-pax. Large wooden floats (vaɣ) are fastened to the upper cord of the seine. When the head of a sivuch gets caught in the net, the sivuch starts to flounder; at times so violently that it throws the lower edge of the seine together with the plummets over the upper cord and finds itself literally in a sack. Sometimes dolphins fall into the seine. The seals payt are shrewd and are seldom caught in the net.

In the past as well as at the present time the Gilyaks of the village Kul set the tola-k'e at Kivf-ŋalu, Ke-ŋalu, Vilk, Lo ri, and ɔt.

614 According to old man Virp, some clans in the village Kul 225 owned seal hunting places in the past.
423 Thus clan Qavjuŋ owned: 1. Lulvax-pər, 2. ŋayqej, • 524 3. ɔt.
471 Lulvax-pər and ŋayreqej are names of rocks sticking out of the water. Seals crawl out of the water onto these rocks. ɔt is a small island close to which there is another such rock.

3. In a fog the hunters come alongside of the shore or of the small island ɔt. Then the young hunters amuse themselves and play. There are one or two laqr-pax stones for a game: "who can lift it and who cannot." Close to the rocks there is a flat place where the Gilyaks compete. The competition consists in jumping on one foot (tejot ferd).

Clan Tnaunuŋ owned: 1. Mat-lo ri, 2. Tŋaqi-xra, 3. Zomi-vər.

The first two places form parts of the shore and are resting places for seals. The third is a rock.

Clan Kezoŋ owned the shore off Vilk, a resting place for seals and Hapzə-vər - a stone.

225 [84] Once at sea, the hunters take a number of measures 552 to ensure a successful hunt. Thus, in conversation, they 198 substitute prearranged names for the usual names of certain 825 objects. This prearranged language is an echo of a distant 789 past when hunters used it to keep their plans from animals

9: Hawes--162 T-3 (1901) 1903 Gilyak
116, 231, 527, 783, 796

"The object of the capture and feeding of the bear is the holding of a great yearly semi-religious festival, in which the slaughter of the beast plays the chief part. It is more probable, that in the older times a full-grown bear was captured just previous to the fête, and that to-day the letter rather than the spirit of the sacrifice is kept up by seizing cubs and rearing them for three or four years. The feeding is a matter of no difficulty, as will be seen when we come to the preparation of the Gilyak's winter stores. [LSS: See category 116, p. 174.] To the owner or capturer of the bear, the feast turns out a very profitable investment, for visitors from neighbouring villages flock in, and while necessaries are provided by the owner, luxuries are on sale, and bring him in a handsome profit.

The animals are kept in stout log cages, adorned with a pine-branch at each corner. Wishing to see, and if possible to photograph one of the occupants, I desired the villagers to bring one out, or at least unroof him. There were, however, too few men-folk at home, and the adult bears were very fierce, as indeed we gathered from their movements and remarks within; so two of the five little cubs were partially unroofed. The poor little orphans snarled, and shrank frightened into a corner, tumbling over one another, and trying in their terror to hide each beneath the other. Ere the month of January, 1905, is passed, or perhaps before, their spirits will have been released to carry messages to the great Pal ni vookh."

9: Hawes--199 [2] T-3 (1901) 1903 Gilyak -1-2
116, 527, 539, 756, 782

"The following, however, is the part played by this functionary at this juncture, [LSS: i.e. the medicine man immediately preceding the sacrifice of the bear at the bear fête] as given me by an observer on the island.

The cham, with a pine-twig in his hand, amid the deep silence of the spectators, goes close to the bear and whispers in its ear—

'You have eaten many berries,
'You have caught many fish,
'You have frightened many people;
'Your ancestors and your comrades have 'broken' many Gilyaks:
'Therefore you must die for it.
'But your "host" has fed you three whole years, not stinting the delicious yukola (dried fish),
'He has given you the best water,
'He has taken you for walks,
'He has bathed you thrice a day (1) in the "summer year,"

1. I am afraid this is imposing on the bear's memory. It is such a difficult business getting him out of his cage; and those I saw were not taken out more frequently, it was then autumn, than once a fortnight for a constitutional.

9: Hawes--174 T-3 (1901) 1903 Gilyak
116, 252, 262, 527

"The roe [LSS: of the salmon] is regarded as a great delicacy, and was being scraped into interesting looking wooden vessels resembling a butcher's tray, which also serve to receive the blood from the slain bear at the great festival. On feast-days, such as at the beginning of the sable and seal hunts, which inaugurate a New Year (the Gilyaks having two years to our one), the roe is mixed and pounded with whortleberries, etc., and made into a much appreciated mess. The tail and head-pieces of the kita are intended for the dogs and the bear, and the former came in for a few bits of fresh fish as perquisites while the operations were going on before us, though for the most part they feed themselves in summer."

9: Hawes--199 [2] T-3 (1901) 1903 Gilyak-2
116, 527, 539, 756, 782

'And three "winter years" you have lived in a nice warm lodging;
'He, your host, will not kill you:
'Therefore you must not complain about him to the great lord of the mountains.' "

9: Hawes--195-196 T-3 (1901) I 116, 231, 527, 796

"Emerging from the hut into a crowd cage. In front hung a birch-bark basket, [LSS: See Visual File] containing fresh dried fish, and holding it before a hole i his great paw out to grasp the fish, the mal, having already attained his majori in the following January.

The bear fête, which probably origina a 'Bank Holiday' in the Gilyak calendar, winter. The proceedings are unique and tured young, and fed up until he attains following January. Invitations are then s habitants, however, need no such annou coming event. On the morning before th guests arrive in great numbers, their s from all parts of the snow-mantled fore description of the bear fête.]" of yelping dogs, we were attracted by the bear as seen in the illustration (opposite p. 196), water for Bruin. His owner fetched a piece of n the cage, the bear, who was of full size, th while I snapped him with my camera. This ani ty, was due to play the chief rôle at a festival ted as a purely religious festival, has become the great break in the monotony of the long interesting. [196] The animal having been ca the age of four, a fête is decided upon for the sent round to neighbouring villages, whose inncement, for they are already well aware of t e fête the village presents a busy scene as the ledges, drawn by teams of dogs, dashing up st. [LSS: See category 527, pp. 196ff. for a fu

ONTINUED
FROM PRECEDING
FICHE

/684 cont./

545 171 theatrical presentations, no fantastic costumes, no masks, etc. whereas other Paleo-Asiatic peoples, for instance, the Aleuts and the Northwest American Eskimo, have such a wealth of these and such great delight in these entertainments that there are complicated arrangements for setting up the stage, the entrance of /685/ the actors, etc. in the kashim for the most part erected [157] for the purpose (1). The Gilyak seem to have such a sober frame of mind that they are not capable of illusion.

1. Concerning the theatrical performances of the Aleuts see in particular: Veniaminov", Zap. ob" ostr. Unalashk. otd. /Notes on the Islands of the Unalaska Sector/, St. Petersburg, 1840, Part II, pp. 85, 93. With regard to the Eskimo, see above, pp. 492-498.

Their social entertainments are principally of such a kind 527 [526] as to offer the men an opportunity, in competitive tests, to parade their great skill, fearlessness, boldness, and strength, and afterward to enjoy an opulent, hearty meal, whereas the women, except for their very active participation in preparing the latter, play an almost entirely passive role at them and hardly have a chance to enjoy the results of their own labor. In the next section, 128 devoted exclusively to the bear festival of the Gilyak and their immediate neighbors, I shall also discuss the entertainments on the program for it and in the order in which I myself became acquainted with them.

524 439 Mention might be made here, however, of one Gilyak game which does not belong there and which they owe to the Chinese; I mean playing with cards. They are the well-known, small, Chinese playing-cards, which Chinese traders bring from the Sungari and upper Ussuri down the Amur, through the territory of the Goldi and Olcha (2), and thus into the hands of the Gilyak.

[171] 2. Maack (Putesh. na Amur", p. 198) saw for example, these Chinese playing

/699 cont./

*796 After these preliminary and general remarks concerning the bear festival of the Gilyak, I shall turn now to a detailed description of it. At the beginning of 1856, I was visited /700/ at the [123] Nikolayev post by the oft-mentioned Gilyak, Judin from Tebach, renowned among his countrymen as the organizer of great bear festivals. Since he was very favorably disposed toward me and even owed me a debt of gratitude, I asked him to give me an opportunity to attend one of these festivals from the beginning, whereupon I was told in reply that within the next few days such a festival was to take place at his house and that he had come to Tschorbach, as the Russian post was called by the Gilyak, precisely in order to make a few purchases for the forthcoming festi- [114] val. With my friend and later colleague at the Academy, C. Maximowicz, who was a skilled draftsman and happened to be visiting me at the time, we set out for Tebach on January 9 (21). After spending the night in Allof, we entered Wair about noon on the following day, where we saw traces of bear festivals that had already taken place: one of the houses was distinguished by a tall, slender little fir tree which stood in front of its transverse walls on either side and had most of the bark and all the branches removed up to the top, where a scanty crown towered over the gable of the house. A cord ran from one little tree to [178] the other, slightly above the ridge of the roof, and from it bundles of curled wood-shavings, the so-called zach of the Gilyak, hung down to the roof. A stick stuck in the snow near the house door likewise bore on its tip a fir branch and a bundle of wood shavings. There was a bright full moon when we drove up before Judin's house in Tebach, which was decorated just like the one in Wair. As we were driving up the long, bank steeply sloping down to the river, on whose ridge the village of Tebach lies, we heard noisy cries of jubilation, and now we saw a crowd *796 of Gilyak moving about in front of the house. They were young 526 men from the village and other guests invited to the feast, who, [504] in a gay mood, were playing various games that are always associated with a bear festival. The games looked very similar

/700 cont./

*796 to some of our French rounds: the players joined hands, forming 526 a circle; the circle moved around rapidly until it broke at one point, and a single row was made out of the circle. As soon as this happened, the first man passed under the raised arms of the last two members at the other end of the row, pulling the whole row after him, and making it necessary for the last man to turn himself around himself. If he succeeded in doing this and thus became the first man, he did what the first one had done, and so it alternated on and on, until the clumsiness of one of the leaders or a slip and fall by a member of the chain caused the whole row to break up, which happened not infrequently in the slippery, unevenly packed snow in front of the house and was always accompanied by the resounding laughter of all the bystanders. Close by another circle made up of young boys romped about and imitated exactly everything relating to the adults (see Plate XI /p. 991/). Many women, girls, and small children of the village had gathered around both circles and at every opportunity expressed their approval by wildly shouting in unison and by stamping and loudly beating on their furs and robes.

*796 After the game had come to an end, Judin approached us 231 and urged us to enter the house, /701/ into which the whole crowd from outside followed us. The dogs' table had been removed and in its place were three bears who were tied to the two central posts of the yurt and to the supports on either side of the absent dogs'-table top, for the latter alone would not have offered enough resistance. The bear wears a stout leather band around its neck and a second on its back connected with the first around its body directly behind the front legs, which serves to keep the neck-band from slipping over the head of the animal. The space otherwise taken up by the dogs' table is rather small for three bears, especially since the animals cannot be put too close together, so the chains running from the neck-band, which are extended by a long rope on either side, are drawn quite taut, but always so that the animals can lie down, get up again, and move somewhat to the side. This greatly restricts the free

/701 cont./

*796 traffic within the yurt, for now with every step one has to stay 231 close to the edge of the sleeping benches in order not to be unexpectedly seized by the paw of a bear.

Only two of the bears, a very large animal of the female sex and a considerably smaller, yet fully grown, seven-year-old male bear, belonged to Judin, who had bought them in the villages of Tschilwi and Aure, inhabited entirely and half by Olcha, respectively; the third and likewise male bear of medium size came from Kalm and was the property of another Tebach Gilyak. As in size, the animals also differed in coloring: the small bear was light brown, the large one dark brown, and the medium-sized one almost black. Moreover, the large bear differed from the other two in that it had a whitish-gray band on the lower part of its neck, but not enough to be called a collared bear (Gilyak molk) by the Gilyak, which happens only if the white is quite pure and extends over a large part of the throat. Finally, the three bears also differed in their behavior, especially in the way they defended themselves, as we shall presently see.

*796 Immediately after we, followed by the throng, had taken 526 seats on one of the sleeping benches, another game was begun [171] here, despite the limited space, the one that I described above in discussing the Goldi games and which consists of jumping over a rope swung by two persons. The Gilyak called it tyk-tyk (1).

[192] 1. Tyk means cord.

and the activity that goes with it, tykyrtsch. But it did not last long and was not performed nearly as skillfully as by the Goldi. Nevertheless it is part of the entertainment program during a bear festival and, judging by the noise, shouting, and laughter of the onlookers, found hearty approval. I did not see it performed by the Gilyak at other times, and the fact that it took place in the limited space of the house and not outside, where, in the moonlit night, it would have been much better and more comfortable for the fur-clad players as well as for the spectators, and the brief duration of the game, /702/ almost permit one to conclude that

'[LSS: Before the bear fête] Great preparations of food have been made for days past. e huts are crowded, and hospitality is freely dispensed. At the same time the owner the bear and his nei ghbours will be gainers by the feast, for luxuries such as tobacco, e, vodka, etc., are on sale, and will bring in a goodly profit. The staple article of st is of course yukola, or dried fish, but a variety of dishes is concocted by the yak housewife, with this as a base. Dried and frozen hard, it is grated to fine powder l mixed with seal-oil and whortleberries; and when you add to these three ingredients e, salmon-roe, and roots, the possible combination of messes are many, and the ults to the Gilyak highly palatable. The roots in most common use are pu-chi and pis ecies of wild rhubarb, I believe). [LSS: Erratum; this should read Heracleum batum and Laminaria esculenta] These are in demand for flavouring their stew of r's, deer's or seal's flesh; while a lily, which they name kashk, is eaten generally h fish-roe. At special feasts and near Russian settlements, the guests may be regaled h potatoes, in which case they are doled out sparingly, and not a particle of them or ir skins must be wasted."

"The day before the feast a rehearsal is held. Several men of the village go with the owner to the cage and proceed to lift off one or two of the roofing logs. Inserting a thong in the form of a loop at the end of a stick, they skilfully slip this over the head of the bear, and then over a paw and shoulder to prevent strangling him when the strap is tightened. To this loop are attached other thongs, [197] and the men can now proceed to unroof further and haul him out. In the case of the bigger bears the hauling is generally unnecessary, for he emerges too readily with a snarl and a growl; and the one thing desirable now is to pull all the thongs taut, to prevent him attacking one or other of his captors. Methods differ slightly in different parts of the island; but in this case the reader will see by the illustration [LSS: See Visual File] that native-made ropes of grass were looped over his paws; and to prevent his doing harm these ropes were carried under a pole placed between his fore-and hing-legs, and projecting on each side of him, on which several men stood. Held thus it was impossible for him to move his paws, and now the Gilyaks could proceed to muzzle him. Taking a piece of stick with a rope attached they teased him until he took it in his mouth, whereupon his muzzle was quickly and tightly bound to this 'bit.' To complete his toilet, in place of the leather band round his neck and shoulder, a seal-skin collar with two short lengths of chain was slipped over his neck. To the ends of the chains were attached thongs, which served for him to be led about by.

The animal was then taken for a short walk to test his new 'dress,' and afterwards tied up and eventually put back again in the cage.

quickly described, but the actual process takes a ready for evacuating the cage occupying half an h

4:Ivanov et al. E-4 (no date) 1964 RX2 Gilyak RX2

439 with the Chinese. After the appearance of the Russians in the Amur region, 282 the Nivkhi began to use small quantities of bread, sugar and salt.
[263] The immemorial, and until recently the only, domestic animal of the 231 Nivkhi was the dog. It served as a draught animal and provided for fur clothing and meat for food; it was widely used as a medium of exchange and played an important part in religious ideas and rituals. The number [550] of dogs in a household was an index of wealth. As a rule, every household [422] kept 30-40 dogs, which demanded considerable care. They were fed chiefly fish and seal-fat; feed had to be stocked for the whole winter, when dogs were used most as draught animals.

492 The old sled of the Nivkhi, which was still found in use by Shrenk in [175] the middle of the last century, was so narrow that the driver sat astride it, resting his feet on small skis; sometimes he raised himself and ran in this position on skis. The runners of this sled were curved both in the back 492 and in front. The dogs were harnessed to the towing strap alternately on either side, rather than in pairs. The harness was a simple collar, so that the dog pulled with the neck.

499 Until quite recently, dog races were still a part of the bear festival; in 493 these, the Nivkhi used the old sled and the old type of harness. The harness and the sled which appeared among the Nivkhi in the beginning of the 20th [526] century were considerably different from the old type. They were of the so-called Eastern Siberian type; the sled was of greater capacity and [191] equipped with a vertical shaft-bow and paired harness, not in collars but in yokes, which the dogs pulled with the chest.

179 The development of the carting trade brought with it a new type of sled, 492 its greater size and stability permitted the transportation of up to 200 kg 493 of goods. It was usually drawn by 9 to 11 dogs. The best trained and most valuable dog was the leader. The driver—kayur—usually called out his directions to this dog. The dogs were stopped with a shouted order and a brake pole. Dogs were sometimes also harnessed to a boat on a longer tow strap.

492 The horse as a draught animal appeared among the Nivkhi relatively 179 recently.

In addition to dog transportation, winter travel on land was done by 281 skis—bare skis without fur lining, or skis lined with seal fur. The former were used for short trips; the latter, for distant expeditions during the fur-hunting season. The Nivkhi skis were distinguished by the wooden strips nailed over the fur.

Travel along the rivers (particularly in Sakhalin) was in light hollowed 501 boats made of poplar. These dugouts were so light that they were carried [824] by hand across barriers (shallows and isthmuses). They were propelled with oars or poles (usually employed for upstream travel). For long-[171] distance travel, the Nivkhi had a large boat similar to that of the Ulchi, [824] Nanays and Orochi. It was made of three wide cedar boards, of which the bottom one was bent upward in front, projecting like a spade. It was rowed with 2 to 4 pairs of oars, by lifting alternately the right and the left ones.

361 The Nivkhi villages were usually situated near the mouths of spawning-rivers, and seldom exceeded 20 dwellings. Until recently, the dwell-342 ings of kinsmen were set side by side. Some 40 to 50 years ago, the 175 Sakhalin Nivkhi still widely used the dugout house. It was made by digging a pit some 1.25 meters deep, over which a wooden framework was [354] built of thin logs, and covered on the outside with earth. The smoke vent [358] served as a window as well; the hearth was built in the center, and plank beds were set around the walls. At the end of the 19th century,

4:Ivanov et al. E-4 (no date) 1964 RX2 Gilyak RX2

342 291 231

Feeding a bear.

the sea. Both the Nivkhi dwelling and every river had its yz', who took care 771 of man. The sky was thought to be inhabited by "sky people." The sky 776 people—the sun and moon—had no close relations with man, but the Nivkhi were always in close relations with the yz'. "Receiving" from them fish, sea animals, etc., the Nivkhi had to "give" them in return—to sacrifice to them. The cult connected with the "masters" of nature was of pronounced clan character.

The "mountain man," the "sea man" and the bear, in the Nivkhi 796 thinking, were common to the clan. And the bear festival (chkhyf-le- 714 kherno—"bear game") was a clan festival. The clan which celebrated the 253 festival assumed the expense and work of arranging it. This festival was 869 connected with the cult of the dead, since it was usually held in memory of a dead clan kinsman. A bear cub was caught in the taiga or bought and placed in a special frame building. The cub was reared by members of the given clan. On specific days it was taken out and led on a chain through the encampment. The bear was reared for several years. Before the festival, all the clan members gave the bear's master products and money. The master's family prepared food for the holiday (usually held in February), built a platform—a shooting ground with one or several pairs of trees—poles hung with ritual shavings (inau) and covered with carving. The bear was tied between them. The honorary duty of killing the bear was given the narkha—people of the clan in the relationship of "son-in-law" to the clan holding the festival. The festivities sometimes lasted several days and consisted of a complex ceremony of killing the bear with a bow and arrow, ritual feasting on the bear meat, the sacrifice of dogs, and so on. The bearskin with the head was lowered into the yurt through the smoke vent on a high pole. In the intervals between eating, there were dog races, [526] shooting matches with bow and arrow, fencing with sticks, and dancing. After the festival the head and bones of the bear, the ritual utensils et ceters were put away in the special clan storehouse. Wherever a Nivkhi lived, he retained his contact with his clan storehouse, where he always brought the skulls of the bears he killed.

The burial rites of the Nivkhi differed sharply from those of the 764 Tunguso-Manchurians of the Amur regions. The Nivkhi characteristically

4:Ivanov et al. E-4 (no date) 1964 RX2 Gilyak RX2

177 Many Nivkhi with secondary schooling enter higher educational institu-648 tions. In 1953, 2 Nivkhi attended Leningrad State University, and 10 studied 873 at the A. I. Herzen Pedagogical Institute. At present, 16 Nivkhi are attending the institute. Among the students there are also women. In 1963, Lisa Dekhal' of the village of Pad on the Amur graduated successfully from the A. I. Herzen Institute in Leningrad. The Nivkhi Chuner Taksami of the [463] village of Kal'ma is today doing graduate work at the Institute of Ethnography of the USSR Academy of Sciences. Nivkhi with special training are working today as captains, enginemen on cutters, teachers, librarians and club directors.

The political activity of Nivkhi workers has grown tremendously. Many 177 have risen to leading posts on collective farms and in various institutions; 648 many work as instructors with rayon Party committees and executive 474 committees.

Wide educational work among the Nivkhi has been conducted and is con-[64] ducted today by the cultural bases established on their territory. The first of these was founded in 1928-29 in the village of Nogliki, at the mouth of the Tym' River in Vostochno-Sakhalinskiy Rayon. The second cultural base of the peoples of the North was founded on Sakhalin in 1946, in the village of Yukovo. These bases have libraries, reading rooms, clubs, seven-year schools for Nivkhi and Evenk children, and also dormitories and boarding schools.

[52] At the amateur concerts on the collective farms, both men and women entertain, singing and performing native and Russian dances. Frequently the songs are created on the spot, impromptu. The collective-farm youth also participate in regional Olympic games.

Theatre arts are also developing among the Nivkhi. In the beginning, the [545] Nivkhi, who had never seen a theatre before the Revolution, were merely spectators at performances organized by Russians. Soon, however, dramatic clubs were organized in the collective-farm clubhouses, and the Nivkhi began to present plays in their own language.

[526] The Nivkhi are great lovers of sports. In former times they did not know how to swim and feared the water. Today the Nivkhi young people enthusiastically engage in water sports. There are now special sports omorochki (canoes) with a single oar, in which young men and women hold speed races.

The Nivkhi have also preserved native sports, such as rope-jumping.

[182] The changed working, living and cultural conditions of Nivkhi life—the collectivization of their economy, their participation in industry, the unification in collective-farm villages of people who had formerly belonged to different clans, and the general rise in their cultural level—all these factors have completely destroyed the old ties and rules, based on the numerous remnants of clan relations which had survived until the Revolution. The old 177 religious ideas, holidays and rituals have lost all their meaning. The 648 greatest change has occurred in the position of women. In former times, the 634 Nivkhi woman was timid and oppressed, and knew only the narrow circle of 562 her domestic duties. She could be bought and sold, or turned out of the house. When she met men, she had to cover her face and turn her back to them. During the early post-Revolutionary years, a great deal of effort had to be applied toward the elimination of survivals of the past. When they attempted to study, many young women and girls were ridiculed by their fathers, husbands and mothers. Some were unable to withstand the pressure and discontinued their studies. It proved especially difficult to overcome the ancient custom of placing a woman in childbed in a special hut, built near the dwelling. This tent was usually cold and damp. The woman had to remain under these conditions for several days without any help,

9: Hawes--200 [2] T-3 (1901) 1903 Gilyak
116, 526, 527

"[LSS: During the bear fete] The youths competed in archery, wrestling, and running, while primitive musical instruments were brought forth and songs were sung, telling of the exploits of heroes of the hunt. A favourite game with them is a game of ball. The aim is to keep it bounding in the air without its touching the ground. Only the hands may be used. The ball is made from the fungus of a tree."

3 Gilyak-2

Thus ended the rehearsal. It is long time, the getting of the animal our."

9: Hawes--197-198 T-3 (1901) 1903 Gilyak
116, 527, 535

"The following day [LSS: The day after the rehearsal for the bear fete; see category 527, pp. 196-197.] the same performance was gone through, and the animal led to the hut of his owner and around it three times. Each time that he passed the door the master poked him with a tzakh, or twig adorned with shavings, and broke it with the force of the thrust. This circumambulation was done to the strains of a unique band. Three or four young women, keeping time, beat with sticks on a log supported on short uprights. This highly varied 'musical' performance was accompanied by [198] dancing. Although the 'artiste' in this case was the oldest woman of the village, the display was far more interesting than the ritualistic dancing which the traveller in the East meets with generally, such for instance as that of young girls in the sacred temple of Nara in Japan.

First of all the old lady, dressed in seal-skins, stamped down the deep snow, and formed a little level square plat. Then taking two pieces of evergreens she threw herself into queer postures, using the branches as fans. Her movements were not rapid, but occasionally, and all unwittingly, she overstepped the limit of the plat and fell floundering in the deep snow, to the amusement of band and spectators too; but this in no way disconcerted her, for she came up laughing to renew the performance."

9: Hawes--198 T-3 (1901) 1903 Gilyak
116, 527, 825

"[LSS: During the bear fête] The bear was then paraded down an avenue of tzakhs stuck in the ground, to the place of execution. On the mainland there is much more merciless teasing of the animal than on Sakhalin. On the banks of the Amur the poor brute is dragged round for three days, and visits each hut in turn, where he is tied up and poked and teased, not always without danger to his tormentors. The smallness of the Sakhalin dwellings prevent such exhibitions on the part of the bear. While the poor animal was left tied up to ruminate over his position, the natives went off to feast; but first they took of their luxuries, rice, whortleberries, etc., and fed their victim until he could eat no more. This is a characteristic trait of their attitude towards Bruin. They were about to kill him, yet they fêted him. It was an attitude of apology. They realized that their conduct must appear ambiguous to him, and therefore, though he had to die at their hands, yet they would do all that they could to retain his good-will. Therefore they feast him loyally with all manner of dainties before he meets his fate at their hands."

posture in rowing. Paunches and hunchbacks, etc. are not to be found, and in general bodily abnormalities and deformities are much less often found among these savages than among civilized peoples. Their features are not beautiful, although the Gilyak are by no means the ugliest race of men. Their heads are broad and markedly brachycephalic. Their thick black hair, parted in the middle, falls down their back in a braid. Their eyebrows are thick, black and often bristly toward the root of the nose. Their eyes are small, but not conspicuously so, as is the case with some other races. (1) They are straight and slant somewhat upward and outward. Their color is without exception dark. The cheek bones are moderately prominent, the nose short and usually flat. In women the column of the nose is not pierced as is the case with Goldi women who wear nose rings. They do not have a large mouth, their lips are thick and red. They frequently hold their mouths open, showing two complete rows of strong, white teeth. If one examines their mouths closely one discovers that the incisors are more or less worn down from their pipes. Their beards and moustaches are black, but thin. The ear-lobes of both men and women are pierced for earrings.

1. Thus, in my opinion, the eyes of the Buryats, rather than those of the Gilyak are like slits.

Their complexion is brownish. Their facial expression is serious; friendly faces are less often found among them than among the Goldi. However, the women have a gentler expression, although their type is very similar to that of the men. They wear two braids which are often tied together at the bottom.

Tattooing is not common among the Gilyak. Their bodies, also, are not exceptionally hairy. Their skin, if it does not happen to be covered with eruptions, is very smooth, but usually dirty. Their hair, which they oil copiously, is usually not free of lice. The odor characteristic of the Gilyak is a mixture of smoke and fish, with the former predominating.

As far as muscular strength is concerned, it seems to fall below that of Europeans, but they have more physical endurance; the women, moreover, are relatively strong. One cannot say that the Gilyak excel in speed [107] and agility of bodily movement. Only in rowing and mountain climbing are

526 they masters. It is very strange that among these people 516 who live on and along the water there are few good swimmers; and a goodly number, especially of the women, cannot swim at all. In general, the Gilyak is somewhat indolent and clumsy, and for this reason the energetic and nimble Tungus regards him with some disdain.

151 I did not conduct any particular experiments to test the sight and hearing of these people, but in general these senses may be said to be very keen. They distinguish colors well. The fact that their sense of touch is duller than that of the European could be deducted from a number of experiments. When I was taking their head measurements, I occasionally pulled a hair so violently that, according to our conception, it must have been painful; but the Gilyak did not mind it.

142 The characteristics here described apply also to the 171 Sofiysk-Gilyak (Mangun), for they are more closely related to the pure-blooded Gilyak than they are to the Goldi. They have broader faces, coarser features and flatter noses than the Goldi, and they never shave their heads, whereas the Goldi shave a narrow strip of hair above the forehead. Furthermore, as we said, the Goldi women wear nose-rings. Also, the clothing of the Goldi is less primitive, more like that of the Manchurians.

IV. Clothing

281 In summer the clothing of the Gilyak consists mostly of a 291 linen or cotton shirt, pants of the same material, and a wide, pyramid-shaped hat made of birch bark, which may be fastened under the chin with a little string. This hat is made of a single piece of bark. It is white and on it are sewed or pasted dark curlicues. Their feet are bare, or else they wear shoes or half-boots made of fish-or seal-skin. For this they use the skin of various fish, especially the kita, a species of of salmon. For this purpose the skin is beaten with a wooden clapper, in order to make it more flexible. They also have shirts and coats of fish skin, but these are no longer worn much. The shoes made of seal-skin are heavier and more durable. To make these, they use sharp iron instruments to scrape the fur from the skin; but the upper part of the boot often consists of unscraped [108] skin. Elkskin is also used, but more often by the Goldi.

291 In winter their foot covering (the torbassa) consists of longer boots made of unscraped seal-skin; between the boots and the upper part of the thighs their legs are stuck into

527

527 REST DAYS AND HOLIDAYS--days reserved for rest from labor; conceptualization (e.g., as harvest celebrations, as patriotic or commemorative occasions, as reserved by religious taboos); secular festivals (e.g., harvest, housewarming, patriotic); birthdays and anniversaries; holiday activities (e.g., feasting, drinking, visiting, games, pageants); etc. For ceremonies associated with specific economic activities see elsewhere under specialized categories (e.g., agricultural ceremonies, see 24). See also:

Potlatches	431	Feasting	574
Distribution of labor and leisure	461	Victory celebrations	727
Leisure time activities	517	Taboos	784
Pageants	541	Religious festivals	796

/684 cont./

545 171 theatrical presentations, no fantastic costumes, no masks, etc., whereas other Paleo-Asiatic peoples, for instance, the Aleuts and the Northwest American Eskimo, have such a wealth of these and such great delight in these entertainments that there are complicated arrangements for setting up the stage, the entrance of /685/ the actors, etc. in the kashim for the most part erected [157] for the purpose (1). The Gilyak seem to have such a sober frame of mind that they are not capable of illusion.

1. Concerning the theatrical performances of the Aleuts see in particular: Veniaminov", Zap. ob" ostr. Unalashk. otd. /Notes on the Islands of the Unalaska Sector/, St. Petersburg, 1840, Part II, pp. 85, 93. With regard to the Eskimo, see above, pp. 492-498.

527 [526] Their social entertainments are principally of such a kind as to offer the men an opportunity, in competitive tests, to parade their great skill, fearlessness, boldness, and strength, and afterward to enjoy an opulent, hearty meal, whereas the women, except for their very active participation in preparing the latter, play an almost entirely passive role at them and hardly have a 128 chance to enjoy the results of their own labor. In the next section, devoted exclusively to the bear festival of the Gilyak and their immediate neighbors, I shall also discuss the entertainments on the program for it and in the order in which I myself became acquainted with them.

524 439 Mention might be made here, however, of one Gilyak game which does not belong there and which they owe to the Chinese; I mean playing with cards. They are the well-known, small, Chinese playing-cards, which Chinese traders bring from the Sungari and upper Ussuri down the Amur, through the territory of the Goldi and Olcha (2), and thus into the hands of the Gilyak.

[171] 2. Maack (Putesh. na Amur", p. 198) saw for example, these Chinese playing

9: Hawes--200 T-3
116, 527, 756, 782

"At the end of this adjuration t pine-twig over the bear's head.
forward, and at a couple of yards the bow. The animal, however, he turned round, when the archer but simply tried to rub the arrow round as if nothing had happened.
and the animal, still making no s this time merely hit the collar. vent, the poor beast sank down a with sticks and lifted up the paws ground three times.

When the cham is present, he the pieces to the most honoured the sacrificed beast will be assu

The skin having been quickly s cauldrons were soon steaming w roots, roe, seal-oil, etc., were sat in groups, the women waited he cham moves a little to one side, still holding the At this point the accounts agree. An archer now came s or so from the bear fitted his iron-tipped arrow to would not expose his heart, and had to be teased until r let fly. Strangely enough poor Bruin emitted no sour y out with his paw, and failing to do so, sat looking . The arrow had missed the heart, but pierced the lur sign of pain, only coughed. Another arrow was shot, b

The first was then pulled out, and the blood now findir nd died. When quite dead, the women came forward s, and the carcase was dragged round the execution-first cuts out the heart of the bear, and dividing it, gi members present. To these partakers of the heart of red successful hunts during the whole of the season.

stripped in this case, the carcase was cut up and the ith bear stew. All the delicacies of dried fish, rice, brought forth, and the feasting again began. The me upon them and then took part in the feast."

Hawes--196 T-3 (1901) 1903
6, 262, 527

"[LSS: Before the bear fête] Great preparat he huts are crowded, and hospitality is freel the bear and his nei ghbours will be gainers ce, vodka, etc., are on sale, and will bring ast is of course yukola, or dried fish, but a ilyak housewife, with this as a base. Dried a nd mixed with seal-oil and whortleberries; a ce, salmon-roe, and roots, the possible con esults to the Gilyak highly palatable. The roo pecies of wild rhubarb, I believe). [LSS: Er rbatum and Laminaria esculenta] These ar ear's, deer's or seal's flesh; while a lily, w ith fish-roe. At special feasts and near Russ ith potatoes, in which case they are doled ou eir skins must be wasted."

ions of food have been made for days past. y dispensed. At the same time the owner s by the feast, for luxuries such as tobacco, in a goodly profit. The staple article of variety of dishes is concocted by the and frozen hard, it is grated to fine powder nd when you add to these three ingredients nbination of messes are many, and the ots in most common use are pu-chi and pis ratum; this should read Heracleum e in demand for flavouring their stew of hich they name kashk, is eaten generally sian settlements, the guests may be regaled t sparingly, and not a particle of them or

116, 231, 527

"The day before the feast a rehearsal is h owner to the cage and proceed to lift off one in the form of a loop at the end of a stick, th bear, and then over a paw and shoulder to p tightened. To this loop are attached other th unroof further and haul him out. In the case unnecessary, for he emerges too readily wi desirable now is to pull all the thongs taut, captors. Methods differ slightly in different reader will see by the illustration [LSS: See were looped over his paws; and to prevent h a pole placed between his fore-and hing-legs which several men stood. Held thus it was i now the Gilyaks could proceed to muzzle hin they teased him until he took it in his mouth tightly bound to this 'bit.' To complete his t neck and shoulder, a seal-skin collar with t his neck. To the ends of the chains were att led about by.

The animal was then taken for a short wal

eld. Several men of the village go with the or two of the roofing logs. Inserting a thong ney skilfully slip this over the head of the revent strangling him when the strap is ongs, [197] and the men can now proceed to of the bigger bears the hauling is generally th a snarl and a growl; and the one thing to prevent him attacking one or other of his parts of the island; but in this case the Visual File] that native-made ropes of grass is doing harm these ropes were carried under s, and projecting on each side of him, on mpossible for him to move his paws, and
n. Taking a piece of stick with a rope attached , whereupon his muzzle was quickly and oilet, in place of the leather band round his wo short lengths of chain was slipped over ached thongs, which served for him to be k to test his new 'dress,' and afterwards

"The following day [LSS: The day a 527, pp. 196-197.] the same performa hut of his owner and around it three t poked him with a tzakh, or twig adorn the thrust. This circumambulation wa four young women, keeping time, bea This highly varied 'musical' perform the 'artiste' in this case was the olde interesting than the ritualistic dancin erally, such for instance as that of yo

First of all the old lady, dressed in formed a little level square plat. The self into queer postures, using the br but occasionally, and all unwittingly, floundering in the deep snow, to the a no way disconcerted her, for she cam fter the rehearsal for the bear fete; see category ance was gone through, and the animal led to the imes. Each time that he passed the door the master ned with shavings, and broke it with the force of as done to the strains of a unique band. Three or t with sticks on a log supported on short uprights. ance was accompanied by [198] dancing. Although st woman of the village, the display was far more g which the traveller in the East meets with gen-oung girls in the sacred temple of Nara in Japan.

n seal-skins, stamped down the deep snow, and n taking two pieces of evergreens she threw heranches as fans. Her movements were not rapid, she overstepped the limit of the plat and fell amusement of band and spectators too; but this in ne up laughing to renew the performance."

"[LSS: During the bear fête] When the feasting, drinking, smoking, and talking were at an end, a start was made for the execution-ground. On [199] their way the company halted at the beginning of the avenue to allow a few of their number to shoot blunt, wooden-ended arrows towards the bear. There seemed no attempt on their part to hit the animal, or else they ignominiously failed, for the shots were lamentably short of or beyond the mark. This appears to be only another example of the weakening of traditional custom, for the shooting with blunted arrows at the poor bear was one of the greatest pieces of 'fun' in olden times. Arrived at the ground the crowd grouped itself in front of the animal in a semicircle."

9: Hawes--211 T-3 (1901) 1903 Gilyak
116, 224, 527, 805

"Among the Gilyaks the hunt is preceded by an interesting ceremony. The sable (Mustela zibellina) and seal hunts commence each a new year in the Gilyak kalendar, and thus he has two years to our one. If only the Gilyak child kept 'birthdays,' he would be the envy of his western compeers. These two years which begin in October and April respectively, are called the winter year (tulf-an) and summer year (tolf-an), and are opened by holiday festivals. The sable holiday goes by the name of Pal ni vookh chi-sonch, or 'the prayer to the lord of the forest.' "

"Customs differ from coast to coast, and from village to village, and here is a point of divergence. In many cases I believe the cham, or medicine-man, is not called in to officiate [LSS: At the sacrifice of the bear during the bear fête] possibly because the influence of his office is on the wane, and as the Tro Gilyaks told me 'we have no great cham now.' "

9: Hawes--252-253 T-3 (1901) 1903 Gilyak-1-2
116, 225, 411, 527

"On shore preparations are being made for the Chak vi hŭnch, or Tol vi hŭnch, i.e. the water or sea holiday; for this is the inauguration of the tolf-an, or summer year.

Wild men, with raven pigtails and high cheek-bones, are bustling about at the mouths of the rivers preparing to receive the unsuspecting guests. [LSS: i.e. seals] Last year's provisions are all consumed, and the Gilyaks await with suppressed excitement the approach of their fat lazy visitors. The wind from the sea increases in vehemence, ice-floes seen on the horizon are being driven closer and closer to the shore. Now they are quite near, forming great glistening fields. The whole Gilyak village is alive, the inhabitants running about on the swaying white floor quickly taking up [253] positions, concealing themselves behind the bergs. Each one has in his hand a harpoon similar to the fish-spear already described on a larger scale. The pole consists of five lengths jointed, each 7 metres long, and is therefore at full length about 135 feet. The end, to which the harpoon is attached by a thong, is ski-shaped, with its end bent upwards, the better to thrust into the side of the seal. The thong itself is also 135 feet long, to allow the seal sufficient play. This great length of weapon enables the Gilyak to harpoon his unsuspecting prey at a considerable distance. He stealthily approaches his victim, taking cover behind the bergs, and placing the harpoon on the ice slowly unwinds the thong. By a quick thrust the animal is speared, and flings himself frightened into the water. In so doing he frees the head of the harpoon from the shaft, to which, however, he is ed up and eventually put back again in the cage. Thus uickly described, but the actual process takes a long eady for evacuating the cage occupying half an hour."

ended the rehearsal. It is time, the getting of the animal

: Hawes--201-202 T-3 (1901) 1903
16, 527, 776, 782, 825

s another consideration which lurks, however Not only is the bear the most dangerous anim as deteriorated to the seizure of cubs and the st rival of the Gilyaks. He lives, as they do, he forest; and even robs the Gilyaks' snares ore on every [202] count he must die."

unconsciously, behind this ceremony.
al to capture, although now the custom rearing of them; but he is also the strong-on the fish of the river, the berries of of the small animals caught therein. There-

9: Hawes--202 T-3 (1901) 1903
116, 183, 527, 782, 825

"It is useless to ask the Gilyaks of to-day the ra bear fête] for they do not know; and, in any case the hidden meaning of their rites. The following to find out the signification of the ceremony, and Gilyak. It means the offering to Pal ni vookh.
Russian. Why do you not recite about it during th Gilyak. I don't know.
Russian. Do the Gilyaks punish the bear for his Gilyak. No.
Russian. Why does the cham recite these charge Gilyak. The Gilyaks have done this from ancient know something about it.

The old men, however, on being asked, knew ison d'être of the custom, [LSS: The

, they would not reveal to a stranger is how a Russian fared when he tried I met with no more success.

ne killing of the bear?

crimes?

es in the bear's ear?
times. Ask the old men, perhaps they no more."

9: Hawes--202-203 T-3 (1901) 1903

116, 527, 764, 775, 782, 825

"There is one incident in the ceremonial [ tioned, but which possesses some special si head, which is never on any account eaten. A dogs which I bartered for were all minus the

It is noticeable that while the bear's head i bring success and courage to the hunters, bu eating of the brain would render the consume The skull is relegated at length to the Gilyak phins, etc., placed on sticks. This is a habi place theirs near their huts and make offerin and gain their protection; whereas the Gilyal of the woods, and are not frequented by ther of these golgothas, is, I do not know; but it of the animals whose spirits have gone back those of the Gilyak; or that the spirits of the and either guard the remains of the Gilyak o

LSS: The bear fête] which I have not men-gnificance. This is the saving of the bear's A skin offered to me, and the fells of the heads.
is not eaten, the heart is. The latter will at I gathered that the Gilyak believes the er bear-like, and an enemy to his fellows.
cemetery, and there, with skulls of dol-t common among the Ainus, who, however, ngs of sake (spirit), etc., to pacificate them ks' cemeteries are in the secret recesses
n. What the idea that lies at the [203] root seems probable that they think the remains to the great Pal ni vookh should rest near se animals will come back to these spots r at least refrain from haunting the living."

9: Hawes--252-253 T-3 (1901) 1903
116, 225, 411, 527

now held by the thong. His efforts to get awa grip, and the poor animal is hauled in and ki ay only serve to give the harpoon a firmer lled by a blow on the head."

9: Hawes--253-254 T-3 (1901) 190
116, 183, 225, 527, 782

"The first catch is collected and left on th devoured there would be a graceless, greed sanction to the domestic use of them. Such seal season, owing to the god's anger. No; though at some inconvenience, in full view o On the bank, therefore, fires are kindled with it is hashed up anything left over from the feasting commences, and lasts all day.
banks, but in the huts; at the same time it i newly caught seals shall not be brought with even the blood spilled. If the god has allowe them to be consumed only on his premises, attention on the part of the Gilyaks, Tol ni send them abundance of seals and all manne ne shore. To take it to their huts to be y thing to do, for there is as yet no divin a proceeding might result in a failure of the feasting must be done openly, and, of the god's province.

; and the flesh of the seals is cooked, an the winter's stores. When all is prepare Eating and drinking go on, not only on th s strictly observed that the pieces of the in the hut, nor left scattered about, nor d seals to be caught, he has [254] permi
i. e. the banks. By this courtesy and litt vookh will be content, and in future will r of inhabitants of the sea."

Hawes--201-202 T-3 (1901) 1903
, 527, 776, 782, 825

'The original signification of the whole cere gely lost, but the religious motive in the m sending of a messenger to the great lord o their punctilious observances of the rites o nger may not miss his destination, it was u me villages to assist the spirit of the bear i ls were given him, one the planting of a sti st where the great lord lived, and the other re to hunt Bruin's spirit to Pal ni vookh. F was a Gilyak was not a pious Gilyak. He w d all dwellers in the taiga by Pal ni vookh a d water, but in nothing would he give thanks erings after every meal, therefore it could find Pal ni vookh, or if knowing should be i ys most punctilious in placing some fish or erings to Pal ni vookh, and on one occasion n from a watery grave to this timely act of Probably the fact of the bear being the most ds to the value of the offering, of which the emony of the feast [LSS: The bear fête] is inds of the Gilyaks of to-day seems to be of the mountains, Pal ni vookh, to witness f offerings; and, in order that their messual, and is, I believe, still so among n finding his way to Pal ni vookh. Two ck on the execution-ground, pointing to the

, the killing of two dogs, whose spirits or it was explained that the bear, though ould eat of the provisions made for him nd Tol ni vookh, the lords of the forest
; whereas a true Gilyak always made not be expected that he should know where nclined to go to him. Even Vanka was al-tobacco on the ashes of our camp-fire as we owed, so he assured us, our preserva-his.
difficult and dangerous animal to capture bear's spirit would be a witness. There

Hawes--200 [2] T-3 (1901) 1903
, 526, 527

LSS: During the bear fete] The youths competed in ile primitive musical instruments were brought fo e exploits of heroes of the hunt. A favourite game m is to keep it bounding in the air without its touch used. The ball is made from the fungus of a tree.

archery, wrestling, and running, rth and songs were sung, telling of with them is a game of ball. The ing the ground. Only the hands may
"

9: Hawes--306 T-3 (1901) 1903 Gilyak
116, 224, 483, 527

"He [LSS: Vanka, the author's Gilyak boatman] was in high spirits, for two or three days since there had been a bear-hunt by his friends of Ado Tim, in which a dam and two cubs had fallen to their prowess. One old Gilyak described to me how the hunt had gone. Starting out with the dogs, they had come up with the ch'uff and cubs in the fore and the dogs immediately began to worry the cubs, biting at their hind-legs until the mother bear called to them to 'take care,' and run up a tree. This they did, but, mea while, the dam was shot. An experienced hunter then proceeded to follow the cubs wit a seal-hide noose in his hand. With this he lassoed them, and, descending, forced the to climb down by degrees. The carcase of the dead animal was then placed upon a sle drawn by the dogs, and the orphaned cubs were led, pushed, and dragged to the villag Hence on the morrow there was to be a great holiday fête, and Gilyaks from all aroun were coming in to celebrate it."

224 For the bear festival (see below) live young animals are 527 sought and are raised in a special enclosure. If they cannot be caught in any other way (1), they are sought out together with the mother bears. The Gilyak wait for winter and then seek out a bear cave. On the appointed day 10-12 Gilyak set out for the cave with lances, hatchets, straps, and several empty dog sleds. They begin to irritate the bear by thrusting long sticks into the cave. Whereupon bruin begins to roar tremendously and starts to leave his cave. At this instant the bravest and strongest of the Gilyak takes his stand close to the entrance with his pelt coat on backwards, and as soon as the bear appears he hurls himself with his chest against the bear's head. The others hurl themselves on their leader and thus the alarmed bear is felled by the combined impact and is soon bound. If he is strong and raging so that he cannot be handled, he is immediately killed. Sometimes a noose is also put around his neck as soon as he appears. If the prisoner was a female with cubs, they are all taken home in sleds.

1. Sometimes young bears roam about so far from their mamas that they can be easily caught.

136 The elk is not found in the lower Amur region, that is, in 224 the vicinity of Nikolayevsk-na-Amure, but is seen somewhat farther up at the Amgun river. It is usually hunted in winter because, like the horse, it can travel only with difficulty in the deep snow, and the Gilyak on his snow shoes can easily overtake it and kill it with his lance. In summer time the animal is killed with rifles. Its meat is very popular and its skin is used for shoes, straps, etc.

The reindeer is also hunted chiefly in winter in the same manner. Occasionally the lance is also thrust at some distance from the target.

The wild boar does not occur on Sakhalin and the lower Amur; however, it appears 40-50 versts above Nikolayevsk. It is hunted with lances and with rifles. Its meat is very popular, its skin, among other things, is used for the shaman drums.[122]

224 The fox is preferably poisoned with the vomic nut which 278 the Gilyak buy from the Chinese. But this poison is not very 439 strong; much faster, in fact almost instantaneous, is the effect of its alkoloid, i.e., strychnine, which Russian fox hunters use but which the Gilyak seldom get hold of. But oats. However, there are some to be found among them vho are considered singers; they are improvisors of a sort vho entertain the others with their song.

The dance does not exist among the Gilyak, unless one inludes in this category the spontaneous leaps with which a ipsy one occasionally cools off his exuberance. There is a eason for the Gilyak's facial expression of which we spoke bove. It is neither sullen nor sad, but also not unhappy r good natured; it is serious or indifferent. But I must asten to add that this immobility and indifference only eaches to a certain point. The Gilyak's imagination and is sense of humor are not immediately apparent, but in eality he possesses both. The favorite pastime on winter venings is listening to a story teller, and his voice is lternately interrupted by laughter and exclamations.

Holidays and festivals. There are no special rest days which would, for instance, correspond to our Sundays.
The bear festival is the only one worthy of this name. It is elebrated once a year during our January, it lasts two veeks and is accompanied by various entertainments. Young ears which, as we said, are brought up for this festival, re taken direct from their caves or they are bought from akhalin kinsmen. Occasionally 100 rubles are paid for a ne-year-old. Young bruin is put into a hollowed-out tree runk to which he is fastened with a chain, and thus he is ransported by sled. The yurts where this traveler halts are onsidered particularly lucky. It has happened now and then hat the bear, because of negligence on the part of the people ransporting him, has crushed a child to death, but such ccidents are not mourned by the parents, who regard it as good omen.

The bear is kept in a special enclosure in his new home.
n old woman is appointed to feed him and give him water. he latter is offered him in a long wooden spoon which is nserted through a little opening. His chief food consists of ried fish, sometimes he also gets millet and various craps. [236]

Not all villages have bears, therefore people from different illages usually assemble for the festival, even from those laces that had their own bear festival and had already conumed their bear. Often Sakhalin-Gilyak come to the main-and at this time, although they themselves are well supplied ith bears.

Besides feasts, various amusements take place at the stival; for instance, dog races. A track is cleared on the e and staked off, and the trained dogs run for wagers.

527 Sometimes the dogs al 541 Dog racing, besides 437 tical significance, for buyers. In fact, the b various things are bar 527 The chief figure of t 825 fed throughout the who the village, at which t this is done in such a to another at an angle, river. This symbolic abundance of fish". H put up the necessary n sides. In the houses h berries, and sometime prostrate themselves ship, however, as som some in earnest, calli revenge on them after not given such express 527 When the bear's imm 782 which has been driven 766 arrows. In this proce selves. At last the un blow with a lance. He with his fore-paws res happens the woman wh to weep loudly. Finall seat themselves aroun passed around and befo roasted. Eating and te bear festival. The sti tertainment has been d 527 in the village of Kola.
361 of the Gilyak settlemen 534 about 200 versts from

1. This distance curves in the coa would be much s to be found - and this h old church bells bearin supposed to have been destroyed by the Chine

so draw sleds in these races.
being an amusement also has a practhe good runners find immediate ear festival is a sort of fair, where tered.
he festival, namely the bear, is well-le period and is repeatedly led through me he pays a call at each house and vay that he has to go from one house by way of the adjacent section of the procedure assures the house of "an is always led by several men who umber of chains and ropes on all e is treated to fish, millet, and crans he is also teased. Some Gilyak also before him. This is by no means wore have assumed. Some do it for fun, ng on the spirit of the bear not to seek he is dead. Sometimes the bear is ions of veneration. nolation nears, he is tied to a stick in the ice, and then he is shot with dure the archers seek to outdo them-fortunate bruin is given a merciful usually dies in peace and majesty, ting on his wounded chest. When this o has had charge of him is often heard y, funeral pyres are lit and the Gilyak d them. Pieces of bear meat are ore they are eaten they are lightly [237] a-drinking are the main activity at a ck music which is here offered as en-escribed. Special music is produced This village is the northern outpost t, on the coast of the Sea of Okhotsk, Nikolayevsk-na-Amure. (1) Here are is measured according to the st line; in a straight line it horter.

as only recently been discovered -two g Slavonic inscriptions. They were taken from Fort Albasin when it was se and since then to have belonged to

527 the natives of the Amur. An old Goldi who finally obtained 361 them gave them to his daughter when she married a Gilyak 534 from Kola. The daughter probably left them to the community, for now they do not belong to an individual, but they are regarded as sacred. During the bear festival they ring incessantly, and on other extraordinary occasions the shamans make use of them in different ways.

527 Finally, many visitors of the bear festivals are also to be 524 seen playing cards and checkers. Both games the Gilyak 177 have taken over from the Russians and Chinese, but the 777 Chinese passion for it they have fortunately not imitated. They do not play for money, and they play without great emotion. Russian as well as Chinese cards are used. (1)

1. The Chinese playing cards are about seven centimeters long but only two centimeters wide, and are decorated with various figures. About 120 cards are used in the game.

Finally, we must add that, according to the belief of the Gilyak, the village in which the most bears have been celebrated and consumed, has the greatest prospect of abundance. The pelt and the skull of the dead animal are kept and represent a sort of talisman.

527 Occasionally the Gilyak also have a pig festival, that is, 782 the comsumption of a pig (if they can get hold of one) is accompanied by ceremonies. The pig is not brought into the house through the door but through the window; on the floor, besides the pig, are placed all kinds of delicacies, such as millet porridge, berries, etc., as well as all the idols that the people happen to have. [238] Then the idols are bowed to and the feast begins.

On the island of Sakhalin there is a festival known as cheung which falls around Easter. It consists merely of a feast, at the beginning of which bits of food are thrown in all directions, probably in order to ask the gods for abundance.

764 The burial ceremony is identical with that existing among the ancient Slavs (1), that is, the corpses are burned. The

1. The Arab Ibn-Foslan who traveled through present-day Russia in the years 921 and 922 witnessed cremations among the tribes living on the banks of the Volga (called Itil by him). Spiess, Vorstellungen vom Zustande nach dem Tode. 1877.

/722 cont./

in the snow on either side of the path in front of the house for the departing guests, to be taken along by those driving by -- only bear meat and fat were missing, for they had already received this in their midst as provisions for the trip.

Because of the feast, the feeding of the dogs and the dog races did not take place until shortly before noon. In the afternoon, however, for the first and only time the women actively participated in the festive entertainments, in that they executed a dance to the drum music which resounded in a very strange and wild rhythm. At any one time only one dancer was in motion, holding in her hands either fir branches or constant-like wooden clappers, and the dance actually consisted of only the craziest postures and contortions of the upper body in relation to the lower part. It vividly reminded Dittmar of the bear dance of the Kamchatka women, and even the music was similar, except that here it was drummed, likewise by women, on a swinging beam with cudgels and sticks, whereas in Kamchatka the dancers and the spectators jointly sing. Incidentally, I must note that such an outburst of merriment among the Gilyak women is probably very rare, because in general they are even more serious and sedate than the men and are always much butier than the latter at all sorts of work and activities. And it could by no means have been the result of high spirits induced by liquor, for this is, or was at the time of my visit among the Gilyak, absolutely prohibited during the bear festivals, a measure, as has been mentioned (2), prompted by cool reasoning and evidence of their great strength of character. Another fact is much more surprising and much more difficult to explain, namely, that no shamanistic activities are permitted in a house where a bear festival is being celebrated. The reason for this may be that in the eyes of he Gilyak the uncanny art of the shaman would disturb the festive mood and, through the power that it exerts over the spirit world as well as over the human spirit, would cause bewilderment and misfortune among the participants in the festival.

2 See p. 719 above.

/387 cont./

and wide in comparison with the foot part, are made out of the thinner and more pliable skin of the last-named species of seal, with the hair turned outward; they almost reach the knee and, after the ends of the trousers have been tucked in, are tied under it with a leather strap sewed to or on them. In view of the heavy growth of hair of the Gilyak, a head-covering is usually unnecessary during the summer. Nevertheless, for protection against rain and sunshine, they wear a peculiar, rather shallow-conical hat made out of birch bark (Gilyak chib-hak, i.e., in literal translation, "birch-bark hat"), which as a rule is decorated with different kinds of black and red arabesques arranged to radiate out around the tip and, likewise cut out of thin birch-bark, sewed on hat by means of fine catgut (see Pl. XVII[1] and Pl. XX, Fig. 1 and 2)[2].

2. The colors (black and red) are not washed off by rain; I therefore suspect that they are produced by a mixture of Chinese ink or iron ocher with fish or seal train-oil.

The women wear quite similar undergarments, but a longer shirt reaching far below the knees, and over it a robe /Rock/ provided with sleeves, arranged in front for buttoning, and made either of cotton material or of fine fish skin; the latter robe usually have a broad edging of material in a different color, over which is put as decoration, especially on the robe, one or several rows of variously shaped brass disks of Chinese workmanship hanging down on little straps, or /388/ of the well-known Chinese copper coins with a square hole, running all around (cf. Pl. XVII and Pl. XVIII). As a result, all the movements of the women, every step that they take, is accompanied by a clatter made by the striking together of the above-mentioned metal disks or coins. This custom, as the ornaments themselves reveal, is undoubtedly of

[See Category 116, P. 947 -- Analyst]

[See Category 116, P. 1000 -- Analyst]

511 DECORATIVE ART.—types of artifacts decorated and not decorated; decorative techniques (e.g., carving, engraving, painting, inlay, embroidery); use of color and relief; designs and patterns (e.g., naturalistic, geometric); decorative symbols and their meanings; elaborated styles; associated beliefs and practices; specialists, etc. See also:

Textiles	19	Armoring	1
Leather	29	Decorative arts	341
Cloth, metals, and spinning	47	Interior decoration	360
Ceramics	123	Manufacture of paints and dyes	396
Ironwork	301	Enamels	817
Face and body decoration	302

/388 cont./

1. (cont.)
characters on it -- no matter whether written or printed -- I hoped that perhaps through him I would succeed in obtaining possible diaries or other written notes of de la Brunière. But despite the high monetary reward that I offered the Gilyak for them, only a few scraps of one of D'Anville's maps of China were brought to me by them after the lapse of some time, when I had already again returned to the Nikolayev post.

3. U-tschen, in the translation by Wassiljef /Vasil'ev/: "Zapiski o Ningutie /Notes on Ningutie/" (Zap. Russk. Geogr. Obshch., Pt. XII, 1857, p. 99). The translator adds in a note that boots whose soles are stuffed with this type of grass are also sold in Peking.

I am unable to state whether the Gilyak use the same type or any specific type of grass for the purpose mentioned, but this much seems to me to be beyond doubt, that they do not act in this without making some sort of selection, for when, in the winter of 1855, I asked the owner of the yurt of Pogbobi on Sakhalin to give me some of this grass, he refused my request with the remark that he himself had very little of it.

Finally, an important piece of Gilyak clothing is the belt, in particular, the belt worn by some of the implements always accompanying the Gilyak. First and foremost among them is a large knife, the so-called ngawta-dhakko, which is used for cutting wood, if necessary, as a defensive or offensive weapon. Like almost all of the iron implements, it is always of Gilyak workmanship and usually simple, with a large blade and a short, wooden handle diagonally striped as a rule (Pl. XXXI, Fig. 1) (4), or sometimes wholly of iron with inlaid silver

4. The caption concerned, "ngawta-dhakko," should be corrected to ngawla-dhakko.

[See Category 116, P. 1011 -- Analyst]

/395 cont./

and copper arabesques and various engravings (Ibid., Fig. 2). The sheath is always of thick seal leather (from Phoca barbata) adorned with various kinds of enclosed arabesques, and is very uniform in shape, widest in the middle, tapering toward the bottom, and not closed at the tip, but only provided with a bundle of leather lappets to protect the blade of the blade (Ibid., Fig. 3, and Pl. XIX[1]). Usually a second knife is also worn at the belt: the yi-dhakko (Pl. XXXI, Fig. 4) quite indispensable to the Gilyak, with a small, pointed blade on a strong wooden handle, which, for greater firmness, is equipped with a bone ring at the lower end; it is always inserted in a firm sheath made of sturgeon skin, with a wooden or bone tip (Ibid., Fig. 5). The yi-dhakko is used for cutting wood and making all kinds of crude as well as delicate articles out of it. It should be noted that the Gilyak always cuts toward himself, not away from himself, as Mamia Rinso points out about the Ainu, too, in contrast to the

5. On Pl. XVIII, the neer absent, large belt-knife was omitted by mistake.

/396/ Japanese (1). Just as rarely lacking in a Gilyak's belt as

1. Cf. Mamia Rinsô, "Tô-tats ki ko," in Siebold's Nippon, VII, p. 188, besides the latter's note, p. 202.

the above-mentioned knife is the fire apparatus: a container for tinder and flint, and a steel. The former is either a small bag of seaskin (see the Gilyak technical, Pl. XXVIII, Fig. 3), usually similarly decorated with embossed arabesques or with small fur rosettes sewed on it (2), or a box (Gilyak mlo; Ibid.,

2. In the village of Tyk on Sakhalin I saw a specimen of this kind that was decorated with small pieces of the fur of Otaria ursina, the first from this animal that I had encountered in the Amur region (see Vol. I, p. 189, of the present work).

[See Category 116, PP. 999, 998, 1011 *1008 respectively -- Analyst]

/396 cont./

which runs around the neck and throat and from which two long tips, with beads sewed on them, hang down from the shoulders over the breast.

/397/ The winter headgear of the Gilyak women is peculiar and manifold in nature. The everyday cap, in which one sees them even at their domestic chores, when they fetch supplies from the storehouses, carry water from the river or firewood into the yurt, care for the dogs, etc., is the so-called tuki-hak, i.e., simply "winter cap" (Pl. XXI, Fig. 2). It has a peculiar shape, with the high crown, usually provided with a cord clasp, and the extensions running down at the back and sides for the protection of the neck and ears, not unlike a helmet, a similarity to which the concentric or scalloped quilting on the outside, corresponding to the shape, to some extent contributes. This latter contists of straight Chinese brocade, usually black or dark-blue cloth. On the inside the cap is lined with fox fur and trimmed on the edge with otter skin. The tscharp-hak, i.e., "silk cap" (Pl. XXI, Fig. 3), used on longer trips and on festive occasions, is more elegant. It is similar in shape to the fur cap of the men, but with a somewhat higher crown and extending down farther over the ears and the neck. Corresponding to the designation, it is made out of Chinese silk, on which gay-colored dragons and other figures, worked in here and there with gold thread, are represented (1). On the inside this cap is likewise lined with fox

1. It is well known that the dragon design on fabrics, furniture, and other articles is very popular among the Chinese, but only the emperor is said to be entitled to have five-clawed dragons on his clothing and utensils, whereas all other persons, from imperial princes and mandarins down, must content themselves with four-clawed dragons (Van-Braam, Voyage de l'Ambass. de la Comp. des vers l'Emper. de la Chine en 1794 et 1795, publ. by Moreau de St. Méry, Paris, year VI, Vol. II. p. 237 [editor's note] - Girard, France et Chine, vie publ. et privée des Chinois anc. et modernes, Paris, 1869, Vol. 1. p. 59). The dragon on the above-illustrated tscharp-hak belonging to a Gilyak woman from the village of Ailof was of the latter type.

[See Category 116, P. 1001 -- Analyst]

/397 cont./

1. (cont.)

292 fur, which in a broad strip also goes around the front edge of the 293 cap, trimmed at the bottom and in back with otter fur. The 294 tscharp-hak, however, is still not the peak of elegance among the 295 Gilyak women. The most elegant and distinguished piece of their entire winter wardrobe is the lynx cap (tschlyhi-hak, Pl. XXII, Fig. 4). It is made out of the head and tail pieces of a lynx skin. The former, with the upright, tufted ears of the animal, forms the crown of the cap. The shells of the ears are lined with red Chinese silk and on the edges are provided with small bunches or tufts of blue silk threads or of black sheep's wool (2). A row

2. The Gilyak designated the material of the black tufts to me as such, which, since the Gilyak themselves have no sheep, must likewise be of Chinese origin.

of such tufts also runs along the center of the headpiece, from the forehead to the tip of the snout. The fur of the lynx head is trimmed all around with a wide band of sable fur, which ends in an elongated tip at the bottom on either side to protect the ears. In the rear the lynx tail hangs down from the trimming to 301 the back, like a braid, and at its tip it is provided with a small ring or one of the pierced brass jaws into which the women 302 customarily adorn the edging of their robes. Through such use 237 of the lynx-head /398/ fur and of the tail the tschlyhi-hak

/399 cont./

291 skin undoubtedly affords better protection against cold, wind, and rain when the hair is on the outside than when it is turned to the inside, and if it were first tested in this position, it would be natural to add another layer of it or of another skin in the opposite position, with the hair on the inside, and thus, avoiding a foreign covering, to obtain that double fur undoubtedly giving the best protection, as one finds among all the northern and polar peoples.

291 The above-described or illustrated garments are sufficient 292 to show that the Gilyak like to provide their clothing with all 53 kinds of variously shaped, gay-colored embroidery and other ornamentation. I have sometimes seen among them whole collections of embroidery designs, and I brought back some of them. These consist of fabric or fish-skin patches on which the designs are embroidered or on which various figures cut out of thin hitch-bark and symmetrically arranged are pasted (Pl. XXIII and XXIV). Among them, however, are also found larger pieces of fabric sometimes made up of several multicolored patches and not used for embroidery, but on which arabesques and animal figures of the most varied kinds are colorfully, but always symmetrically arranged beside or intertwined with one another (Pl. XXV-XXVII). If for the moment, we disregard the latter, to which I shall come back later, particularly in connection with the animal figures, and if we consider only the designs to be embroidered on the articles of clothing previously discussed, we find in them a peculiar character and taste which fundamentally distinguishes them from those of the Siberian 53 tribes. Whereas among the Siberian Tungus, for instance, a 171 who like-wise adorn their clothing with embroidery, the simplest patterns and motifs recur with great uniformity and often, for example, only rows of the same simple figures, small triangles, squares, circles, crude cuttlefishes, and the like, running over or beside one another, are to be found (as the Tungusic specimens illustrated on Pl. XXIII, Fig. 1, and Pl. XXIV, Figs. 5 and 6 show), in the Gilyak designs and ornamentation beautiful, curved and interlaced lines, diverse arabesques artistically overlapping.
[1] [See Category IIc, pp. 1003-1004 - Analysis]
[2] [See Category IIc, pp. 1005-1007 - Analysis]

/399 cont./

53 and small-shaped spiral figures prevail throughout.

/400/ As on their garments, the Gilyak like to decorate 53 all the other implements in their household and their lives with 197 all kinds of designs and ornamentation, as we noted on the above-mentioned implements worn at the belt and as we shall frequently have occasion to see below. The general character of these decorations is always the same, as is described in more detail above, whether the articles are made of wood, tree bark, leather, bone, or iron, and only the execution will be less exact and neat in the case of more brittle material, although with every type of object we shall come across some which testify to the great skill and dexterity on the part of the Gilyak in the use of the simplest tools. The talent of the Gilyak for ornamentation, 53 however, appears to us in its boldest and greatest development in 294 the embroidery for the decoration of their clothing, utilizing for this in particular, besides the easier reproduction of diverse lines and figures, also the effects obtained by putting together various colors. And of this the Gilyak, as much as in general they prefer somber colors for their clothing, also popular among the Chinese (1), a more or less dark blue or gray, make liberal,

1. Du Halde, Descr. de l'Emp. de la Chine, Vol. II, p. 82. Girard, France et Chine, vie publ. et privée des Chinois anc. et mod., Paris, 1869, Vol. I, p. 59.

but moderate and tasteful use in decorating their clothing, as [128] the above illustrations show. This is made possible by the variously colored silk and cotton thread obtained in trade from the Chinese.

53 I have previously described the general character of Gilyak 197 ornamentation as unique and completely different from that of the Siberian peoples. Also, no trace of Russian national influences, as are quite explicable among the latter as a result of centuries old, manifold, and constant intercourse with the Russians, is found among the Gilyak. On the other hand, much of the Gilyak ornamentation, spiral-shaped coiled lines,

53 /401 cont./
197 the Chinese, and reach their climax among the people farthest 197 from the latter, the Gilyak. I think that the reason for this is 53 not, say, in the superiority of the peoples concerned, 197 but in political conditions. The Gilyak were able to keep themselves independent of Manchu-Chinese domination and to prevent direct visits and settlements of the latter in their territory (1).

1. See p. 144 above.

[128] Since in this manner they escaped continuous exploitation by the Manchu officials and the Chinese merchants, they could attain greater affluence than the Tungusic Amur peoples subject to the Manchu-Chinese, and, secure in their possessions, they must have found greater joy in them and along with this felt a desire and an incentive to concern themselves, beyond acquiring the mere necessities, with decorating and beautifying their clothing and other equipment, in which they were furthermore lent a helping hand by the trade with the Chinese, conducted on their part with innate cunning and circumspection.

Returning specifically to the clothing of the Gilyak, I must 294 mention a few tools customarily used among them for making it.
[197] For sewing and embroidering the Gilyak of today use only steel needles, which, on the mainland, they obtain from the Chinese, or, more recently, from the Russians, and on Sakhalin from the 294 Japanese (2). The container for storing the needles (Gil. mgnit, 415 [114]

2. Steller's statement that the Kamchadal obtained steel needles from the Japanese and the erroneous explanation of their designation for them linked with it are discussed above (pp. 407 ff.) in detail.

from mug, "the needle"; see Pl. XXIX, Fig. 3) is worn by the women at the belt, is peculiar. It consists of a bone tube through which a strap provided with two stoppers runs and into which the needles are stuck: whereas the lower stopper is tied fast to the strap, the upper one can be moved along it. If one lifts the
[1] [See Category IIc, p. 1009 - Analysis]

/401 cont./

294 latter and pushes it upward, the strap with the needles sticking in 415 it can be pulled out of the tube at the lower stopper. This in-53 genious construction of the needle box is also /402/ found among 197 the Eskimo: Dall saw it among the Innuit on Norton Sound (1).

1. Dall, Alaska and its resources, Boston, 1870, p. 142, with woodcut.

[170] And all the Tungusic neighbors of the Gilyak have borrowed it from them, the Orok (2), the Olcha (3), and the Negda.

2. Through Mr. Poljakof, our museum obtained several Orok specimens of this kind, which completely correspond to the Gilyak specimens.

(Gil. luba) that the Gilyak know how to make from the ordinary stinging nettle, and which is also used for making cord and fish-[170] ing nets (6). The garments made out of cotton or cloth are sewed

6. As is also known for the Siberian peoples, the ancient Kamchadal (Steller, op. cit., p. 83; Krascheninnikof, op. cit., Vol. I, p. 332), and others. The Gilyak method of making thread and cord from nettle fibers will be discussed in this work in a later section dealing with fishing.

with Chinese cotton thread, and for the various quiltings and embroideries the Gilyak use either the latter or the silk thread like-294 wise obtained from the Chinese, depending on the delicacy of the [170] work and the elegance aimed for. I have never seen a Gilyak [170] woman use scissors during her sewing and embroidering. Although [170] they know of them, thanks to the Chinese and have a special term [53] (chasa) for them: instead they only use a knife. For smoothing [53] the fabric they use a smoothed piece of wood (pam), which is

/402 cont./

294 beveled at one end and, needless to say, is provided with some 412 decoration on the upper side and on the handle, as well as at the 53 tip (Pl. XXIX, Fig. 3).[1] 236 /402/ At first glance it seems very surprising that the Gil 283 who are so skilled in all kinds of handicrafts and achievement 197 and despite the fact that they know how to make thread out of the fibers of a native plant and to make string and fishing nets out of it, do not know how to use this material to make a fabric for clothing, in other words, that the art of weaving seems to be so completely unknown to them. This is all the more strange as their nearest kins-folk, the Ainu on Jesso / Yezo and Sakhalin, and the Kuriles, are dressed in materials that in part they weave themselves out of the fibers of the nettle and the bast of trees (1), and one comes across this art, and, to be sure,

1. Müller, Samml. Russ. Gesch. /Collection on Russian History/, Vol. III, pp. 86, 87, 91. - La Pérouse, Voyage aux du monde /Voyage around the World/, Vol. III, p. 39. Broughton, A Voyage of discov. to the North Pacific Ocean, pp. 88, 105. Krusenstern, Reise um die Welt /Voyage around the World/, Vol. II, p. 78. Mamia Rinsô, "Tô-tats ki ko" (Siebold, Nippon, VII, pp. 182, 188, 199, 200). Siebold, Aard.-en volkenkund. toelichting, 1858, p. 11, Note 1. Fr. Schmidt, "Reisen im Amur-Lande und auf der Insel Sachalin" /Journeys in the Amur Region and on the Island of Sakhalin/ Mém. de l'Acad. Imp. des sc. de St. Pétersb., VIIth series, Vol. XII, No. 2, 1868, pp. 99, 210 ff.). Dobrovorskii, "Inzhnaia chast' ostr. Sakhalina /The Southern Part of the Island of Sakhalin/" Zapiskii Sibirsk. Otd. Russk. Geogr. Obsheb., Vol. I, 1870, Nos. 2 and 3, p. 27). Polonskii, "Kurily /The Kuriles/" (Leip. Imp. Russ.

[2] [See Category IIc, p. 1009 - Analysis]

53

SS /417 cont./

302 however, how to explain such a coincidence of the Chinese hai 301 style and the unusual use of nose rings among the natives of the 171 lower Amur region, for, as is well known, the Chinese do not 177 wear such an ornament. Moreover, this coincidence is found only in the lower, not in the upper Amur region. To be sure, t T Manchu-Chinese hair style has also spread into the latter, and [302] even far more than in the former, and yet none of the tribes the [301] wears nose rings, neither the Birar, the Manegir, nor the Oroch [171] Thus the custom is limited, on the whole, to only a few of the many Tungus tribes of the Amur region and may perhaps be regarded as only a remnant from an earlier time when it was presumably more widespread.

G A more common customary ornament among all the peop 301 of the Amur region, in particular for the female sex, are silver 171 or copper finger rings, several of which are sometimes stuck on one finger, and bangles (Gilyak tyisj) made out of the same ma G terial or out of bone, /418/ which are worn above the wrist. O [531] Plate XXIX, Figs. 8 and 9, a few such bangles of Gilyak workmanship made out of copper with inlaid silver disks and small engravings are shown.

Another piece likewise generally widespread in the Amur region is more interesting -- it is the large and strong ring worn only by men on the thumb of the right hand. Among the Gilya who call it aam, it is of the shape and size shown on Plate XLV Fig. 5 /in the original work; the size of the figure has been reduced for the translation/, made of copper or lead, decorated with various figures that are engraved or consist of inlaid brass and silver and provided in the inner circumference with a silver hoop securely soldered and overlapping on the outside. This G; ring, by the way, is not merely adornment, but has a definite [301] practical purpose. La Pérouse, who saw it among the Orochi [462] (or Olcha) on de Castries Bay, was of the opinion that it serves them as a prop in skinning and cutting up fish (1). This work, G; however, is not done by the men, but by the women.
[113]

1. La Pérouse, Voyage aut. du monde, ed. by Milet-Mureau, Paris, year V (1797), Vol. III, p. 64.

Zn [See category 116, p. 1025--Analyst]

2: Schrenck--1002 E-5 (1854-1856) 1881-1895 RX2 Gilyak RX2

29/531

XXII

Gilyak clothing: 1, 2 -- ear muffs; 3 -- stomacher; 4, 5 -- fur sleeve-bands.

9: Hawes--193 T-3 (1901) 1903 Gilyak
116, 177, 531, 751, 778

"I turned my attention to two or three 'works of art.' Two small flat pieces of wood cut into the forms of a disc and a crescent hung from a beam. These represented the sun and the moon, and were used as charms. There were also two sticks, with shavings on, similar to the one I have described as protecting the canoe during its construction from evil spirits; but these particular ones, I learnt, were for placing over a sick child, and would ensure its recovery.

But no signs of worship were there, no graven images, for the great 'Kiskh' is invisible to mortal eyes. Charms there are, though with the decline of the cham's influence and the contact with Russians these are losing their value in the eyes of the Gilyaks, and they laugh when questioned about them by the foreigner, yet not without a lurking sense of fear at the bottom of their hearts."

Gilyak winter caps: 1 -- men's cap; 2 -- wome cap made of Chinese silk material; 4 -- the sa

2: Schrenck--1001 E-5 (1854-1856) 1881-1895 RX2 Gilyak RX2

IX

237
292

291 n's everyday cap; 3 -- women's elegant me made of lynx fur with sable trimming.

/501 cont./

Gilyak Boat Construction

For this purpose several sticks are driven into the ground opposite one another on either side to serve as supports for the boards; around the upper end of each pair of the sticks standing opposite each other a strap or cord is looped (see the accompanying woodcut), and by a stronger or weaker tightening of it the side boards can be brought precisely into position so that their lower edges coincide with those of the bottom board. Once the boat has been tied together in this manner, its final strengthening can /502/ begin. First several crosspieces (Gilyak tschylch) are put between the side boards, connecting them with each other. One such connecting stick is found in the rear end of the boat, another in the middle, and a third just before the prow. The fastening of the side boards to the bottom board, and likewise all the other boards to one another, is done by means of wooden pegs, which, with the help of a little iron rod (Gilyak ottauwa, Pl. XXXII /see p.1017/, Fig. 7), are driven into holes made beforehand with the large drill (Gilyak lung, ibid., Fig. 6) along the edges of the boards concerned.

In passing it should be mentioned that these implements, not used merely in making boats, but also on other occasions, for example, for attaching the above-mentioned sole-mountings on the sleds, are always neatly made in Gilyak fashion and likewise provided with many decorations, the little iron rod with fine strips of inlaid copper and silver, the wooden handle of the drill with many graceful carvings. Two persons are required to

/558 cont./

1. (cont.)
of this event had spread from Ulban Bay to the Amur and Liman, and the Gilyak were afraid that I might have a similar magic wand.

In my time the only shooting weapons of the Gilyak were the bow and arrow, which they used on occasion against large as well as small animals. The bow (Gilyak puntsch, on Sakhalin punt) is of the same nature as among the Tungus and other Siberian peoples. It is made of the wood of young ash trees or, lacking them, of good birch wood. In the Tymy Valley on Sakhalin the Gilyak designated to me the kind of wood called per by them, i.e., according to Schmidt and Glehn, Evonymus macropterus Rupr., /559/ as their "punt-tschchar" (bow wood) (1), as is also the case among the Ainu (2).

1. Or, as they said as a rule, "punt-lytynt-tschchar," that is, bow-making wood.

2. Schmidt, "Reisen im Amur-Lande und auf der Insel Sachalin, Botanischer Theil /Travels in the Amur Region and on Sakhalin Island, Botanical Section/" (Mém. de l'Acad. Imp. des sc., seventh series, Vol. XII, No. 2, pp. 99, 213, 215).

In order to protect the wood from dampness and to retain its flexibility, the bow has fine birch bark pasted on it, or, as I have seen on especially fine specimens, for example, on the bow from Tebach shown on Plate XLIV /see p.1024/, Figs. 4 and 5, is covered with fine elk skin on the inside, i.e. on the side turned away from the marksman when shooting, but on the outer side turned toward the hunter, with whalebone (Gilyak asm) (3),

3. The s is soft here, like the French z.

/559 cont./

which also bears fine silver decorations on the specimen illustrated. Sometimes used for this purpose are thin plates from Chinese buffalo horn, which for this reason the Gilyak call puntsch-ngynif, i.e., bow bones, or from the nose-piece of the Rhinoceros tichorhinus, which presumably reaches the Amur region by way of the Tungus and Yakut. The bowstring (Gilyak kich) is twisted out of fine strips of the skin or gut of the white whale. A case made out of fur or fish skin (Gilyak puntsch-chal) is used to protect the bow, especially on trips. The arrows (ku) have wooden shafts with vanes from the tail feathers of the fishing eagle (Haliaëtos albicilla) set in the lower part of two opposite sides (Pl. XLV /see p.1025/, Fig. 4) (4) and points of various forms,

4. By this characteristic alone they are essentially different from the simple shafts of the arrows used on the self-firer and, accordingly, have a special designation in that they are called uch, but the latter winngyr. The eagle feathers on the arrow shaft are called kyla-ngar in Gilyak; the notch at the lower end of the shaft, used for setting the arrow on the bowstring, is called korm.

depending on the animals for which they are intended. In my time among the Gilyak iron arrow points (Gilyak luch) were almost the only ones used, but there were also some of bone (Gilyak krangch), which were supposedly made of the leg bones of the musk deer in particular. Some of these iron arrow points intended for larger animals, elk, reindeer, and the like, and equipped on either side with a more or less sizable barb and in most cases also with a series of smaller barbs and notches, are illustrated on Pl. XLV /see p.1025/, Figs. 1-3. The two-pronged point (kor) used on the arrows for both the bows and the self-firer for killing smaller animals, sable, otter, fox, etc., has already been discussed above. An arrow with a very special shape, called

/560 cont./

5. Putesh. na Amur /A Journey to the Amur/, p. 75.

Manegir smear their arrows with a putrid fat acting as a poison, but I am not familiar with anything of this kind among the Tungusic tribes of the lower Amur region.

The quiver (Gilyak pi) used for stowing away the arrows among the Gilyak is as a rule made of wood, decorated with carved arabesques or other figures, and is provided at the top with a fur edging or a fur flap for the protection of the arrow point (Pl. XLV /see p.1025/, Figs. 6 and 7). Characteristically it is relatively heavy and clumsy, and therefore is not very suitable for being carried on the hunter's back, which probably happens only rarely and to a very limited extent. If, on the other hand, one holds the exceedingly light and portable quiver of the Orochi from Kaiserhafen, made solely out of animal skins (ibid., Fig. 8)(

6. It is made out of pieces of reindeer and elk leg-fur; the crossband in the middle is made of otter fur.

this in itself would show that hunting among the Gilyak, in comparison with their Tungusic neighbors, falls far behind.

I doubt very much that the Gilyak are skilled archers, though I do not have sufficient experience to be able to say anything more definite about it. The one time I saw them shooting was under conditions which would not permit drawing any conclusion as to their skill. It was at the bear festival in Tebach, when the three bears, held by chains and led about, were finally shot. The marksman in each case approached the erect animal from the right side to within about five paces. The first two bears went down with loud roars after the first shot, struck in the right lung; in one of them the arrow had penetrated to the middle of the shaft. The third marksman had struck his victim too low, in the abdomen, and therefore had to send a second arrow, which cut down the animal and caused it to die slowly.

/560 cont./

411 Among the Gilyak the thrusting weapons, bear pikes, spears, and lances, are far more popular than the bow for hunting the large animals of the forest, and they handle them /561/ much [192] more skillfully than the shooting weapon. The bear pike uni- [191] versally used among them (Gilyak lachtsch (2), Pl. XLVI /see p.1026/, Fig. 2) is of the same nature as among the Tungusic and other Siberian peoples -- a large, broad, single-edged, pointed blade which is attached to a sturdy wooden shaft five to six feet long. [192] The lances (Gilyak kach) (1) are of even greater length. The shaft is uniformly thick and does not begin to taper off toward the point until about two feet from it. The spears sitting on this shaft are two-edged, long and narrow, and along their middle line have a projecting, rounded keel gradually flattening out toward the tip. The spears used in daily life are of cruder workmanship [531] and undecorated, but there are also elegant, very neatly and finely [126] worked pieces, on which all kinds of animal figures, arabesques, and the like are inlaid in silver, copper, and brass, such as the specimens illustrated on Plate XLVI /see p.1016/, Figs. 4 and 5, which I saw and acquired in Tebach (2). Such specimens, however,

1. I heard the Gilyak sometimes call the whole lance this and sometimes only the iron lance-point, just as is done in German with the word "Speer /spear/." And yet they certainly must have different designations for them, as we have seen above in the case of the harpoon and its point.

2. The illustrations were made by Mr. Maximowicz on the spot. On one of these spears (Fig. 4), among the identical figures on both sides, are to be found excellent representations of the sable as it bites into a fish, etc.

175 /566 cont./ During his captivity in Siberia at the beginning of the previous 114 century, Strahlenberg was told that a people living at the mouth 411 of the Amur, the Kilani, whom the Russians call "Kilaki," 326 "make excellent, fine weapons, and among them the best bows,
[10] and work in iron" (2) -- a report which was given so little credence

[113] 2. Ph. Joh. v. Strahlenberg, Das Nord- und Ostliche Theil von Europa und Asia /The Northern and Eastern Parts of Europe and Asia/, Stockholm, 1730, p. 386.

by a later traveler, Gmelin, chiefly no doubt on account of the indeed very strange linking of the Kilani with the Persian province of Gilan and the Awaren /Avar/ to it, that he felt obliged to question the very existence of such a people (3). Gmelin thought

3. See p. 203 above.

that if there were a people there which was especially distinguished by its weapons-making, all of Siberia must be filled with them, and these weapons would long since have been available, if not from the people themselves, at least through the [531] Chinese (4). Nevertheless, the report which came to Strahlenberg's [321]

4. J. G. Gmelin, Reise durch Sibirien, Göttingen, 1752, Vol. II, Preface.

attention more than one and a half centuries ago is now confirmed, for both the above-mentioned bows faced with buffalo horn and decorated with silver and the beautiful lances, spears, and knives with inlaid figures in copper, brass, and silver, which have no equal among any of the Siberian peoples, are of Gilyak 326 workmanship. If, however, these beautiful weapons were unknown
411 in Siberia in Gmelin's time, and even today scarcely go beyond 556 the Amur region, the reason lies, on the one hand, in the small quantity of metal available to the Gilyak, and, on the other hand, and even more, in the high value which they themselves put on

/568 cont./
114 Gilyak (1).
325 326 192 [293]

1. See p. 590 above and Plate XXVIII /see p.1008/, Fig. 1.

325 For this type of work among the Gilyak, in addition to 326 iron (Gilyak wytsch), other metals, as has been mentioned, are also used, especially copper (Gilyak paghla, i.e., red), brass [531] (Gilyak tussj), and silver (Gilyak totta) (2). The more of the [435] latter that is inlaid in a spear or knife, the higher the value of the piece. Since it is used only for this purpose or to make orna- [439] ments, such as rings, ear pendants, clasps, and the like, they prefer the Chinese silver above all others as the softest, because pure, and therefore the easiest to use for their purposes (3).

[192] 2. The quicksilver which they saw in my possession was totally new to them and caused great surprise among them, but they immediately gave it the characteristic designation of "totta-tschach," that is, silver-water.

[436] 3. A few words about the use of silver and gold coins in trade, which was still almost unknown to the Gilyak in my time, will be said at the proper place in the next chapter.

[174] The high degree of skill that is expressed in the above-mentioned Gilyak spears, knives, and the like indicates that the forging of iron and other metals is an art practiced by the Gilyak for a long time, and the above-mentioned report by Strahlenberg 325 stands in agreement with this. Undoubtedly, however, they have 189 borrowed this art from one of the two civilized peoples of East 194 Asia neighboring them. The only question is whether from the Chinese or from the Japanese. The circumstance that their relations

531

Gilyak patterns for needlework.

531

Gilyak patterns for needlework.

531
824 322

Gilyak patterns with animal figures and arabesques of birch bark.

531
824 322

Gilyak patterns with animal figures and arabesques of birch bark.

/446 cont./

15 the two hearths to the right and left of the entrance, but in the 77 earth yurt and in the summer yurt is placed on the platform of the hearth on top of three stones. It is always of Chinese origin and is used for the preparation of the fish broth for the dogs and some of the dishes for the people. In addition, however, the Gilyak also have smaller kettles which they use, depending on the circumstances, in the earth yurt or summer yurt in the hunting tent or, when camping, in the open, and which are in part likewise of Chinese, in part of Japanese origin, like those illustrated on Plate XXXIII, Figs. 4 and 3: matsch-wunj (i.e., small kettle) and kughi-wunj (i.e., Ainu kettle). To stir and ladle the broth 12 made in the large kettle large wooden spoons (Pl. XXXIV, Figs. 5 and 6,[3] Gilyak myich and mityr) are used, and for smaller kettles, smaller ladles of iron (Pl. XXXIII, Fig. 5, Gilyak komb).
15 To prepare and serve mush-like dishes, such as the above-mentioned groats and the like, the Gilyak, according to need, use larger or smaller wooden troughs (Gilyak odong and orong), which are quite similar in form to those out of which the dogs 531] are fed and are sometimes used for this. A specimen of this kind from the village of Tebach, decorated at the ends with carved arabesques, is illustrated on Plate XXXIV, Fig. 1. I saw other 324] foodstuffs and dishes, such as the above-mentioned flour-cakes, 531] beans, various berries, etc., served in low, roughly square bowls made of birch bark, whose bottoms and rims were decorated with various arabesques; they are the so-called tottangr in Gilyak (Pl. XXXIII, Fig. 8). Like these vessels, which, in accordance with their use, one might designate as the bowls of the Gilyak service, so also do the vessels intended for the use of individuals as cups and plates differ in accordance with the nature of the dish to be 64 served. If it is only a matter of a few strips of jukola, it is suf-415 ficient, as was already mentioned (1), to have a small wooden tray

1. See p. 647 above.

(chachtschitsch), on which they are cut up in order to be dipped in fish oil and consumed. Liquid foods, like the above-mentioned

[3] [See category 116, p. 1014 -- Analyst]

/446 cont./

264 broths, are eaten from wooden bow 415

2. Ngir means bowl in XXXIII, Fig. 6), and, to be sure, eaten with a spoon. For the enjoy blubber, and the like, rectangular [104] 3. The s is soft in this pronounced like the Fr

415 (ibid., Fig. 7), are used. Also use wooden, circular, rather shallow b 2 and 3), about a foot in diameter, the name aam-ngir, ring bowls or account of their round form similar [439] ring (aam) (4). The Gilyak, howe

[192] 4. Among the Olcha th selves, but obtain them from the G 415 with turning them. At the bear fes numbers by the Gilyak, as well as • 531 eating the above-mentioned kinds 796 any means /447/ implements used these festivities, as might be concl the complete lack of any ornament the Gilyak use them often enough i to these mass-produced, undecorat all the other above-mentioned vess Gilyak themselves always stand out tions put on them, which, howeve carvings which we shall discover on 322 at the bear festivals. For the manu 412 sented above, bowls, spoons, etc., on them and on other utensils, the ls, Gilyak mumk-ngir (2) (Pl.

general.

more often noisily drunk than ment of solid food, fish, meat, shallow bowls, Gilyak es-ngir (3) word and is to be ench z.

d for the same purpose are owls or plates (Pl. XXXIV, Figs. which among the Gilyak bear humb-ring bowls, obviously on to the above-mentioned thumb-ver, do not make them them-ey are called kota.

oldi, who occupy themselves tivals they are used in great by the Olcha, in particular for of groats, though they are not by exclusively in connection with uded from their exotic origin and ation and carving. I myself saw n their everyday life. In contrast d bowls turned by the Goldi, els made freehandedly by the because of all sorts of decoraremain far behind the artistic the implements used exclusively facture of all the vessels pre-for the execution of the carvings Gilyak use, in addition to the

/469 cont./

000 1. (cont.)
de St. Pétersb., VIIth series, Vol. XII, No. 2, p. 99).

276 415 (171) Among the Gilyak, the tobacco, chopped fine on a special board (Pl. XXXIV, Fig. 8)[1] and, when dry, disintegrating almost to powder, is kept in a pouch, which, adopted everywhere in the Amur region, seems to be of one and the same Manchu-Chinese form: long and narrow and provided with a lateral slit close to the upper end, by means of which the pipe is stuck in, in order to be filled with tobacco inside the pouch. It is always carried in this position, together with the pouch, which as a rule is fastened to one of the top buttons of the fur coat or the shirt and hangs down from there over the chest. Usually it is ordinarily [237] [531] made of fish skin, leather, or a piece of fur, bordered with Chinese cotton or silk along the edges, decorated at the top with some embroidered or painted arabesques, and occasionally made out of one of these fabrics.

276 574 The Gilyak likes to share the pleasure of smoking tobacco with others. This is never done, however, by passing the pipe around among all the persons sitting around the hearth or a fire burning outdoors. This is prohibited simply by the small size of the pipe, as well as by the social or moral differences usually existing between those present. As a rule, however, one sees the pipe go back and forth between two persons sitting side by side. In particular, if a newcomer appears in the yurt, the host, after he has taken a seat beside him, hands him his newly lighted pipe, which the latter, after he takes a puff from it, returns again to the former, receives it from him again, and so forth, until the pipe is finished, whereupon the guest pays him back in the same way. This is always a sign of friendly welcome and of good understanding, or of a certain esteem and equal footing. [439] I often saw the Chinese merchants on the Amur do this with the natives who entered the yurt and approached them, which undoubtedly was for the purpose of winning them over by such advances, very flattering to them, and putting them in a more favorable mood for the business dealings.

[1] [See category 116, P. 1014 — Analyst]

0 cont./

Among the Gilyak the thrusting weapons, bear pikes, spears, lances, are far more popular than the bow for hunting the ge animals of the forest, and they handle them /561/ much re skillfully than the shooting weapon. The bear pike uni- sally used among them (Gilyak lachtsch,(2) Pl. XLVI /see p.1026/, . 2) is of the same nature as among the Tungusic and other erian peoples -- a large, broad, single-edged, pointed blade ch is attached to a sturdy wooden shaft five to six feet long. e lances (Gilyak kach) (1) are of even greater length. The ft is uniformly thick and does not begin to taper off toward point until about two feet from it. The spears sitting on this ft are two-edged, long and narrow, and along their middle e have a projecting, rounded keel gradually flattening out toward tip. The spears used in daily life are of cruder workmanship l undecorated, but there are also elegant, very neatly and finely rked pieces, on which all kinds of animal figures, arabesques, and like are inlaid in silver,copper,and brass, such as the specimens strated on Plate XLVI /see p.1016/, Figs. 4 and 5, which I and acquired in Tebach (2). Such specimens, however,

1. I heard the Gilyak sometimes call the whole lance this and sometimes only the iron lance-point, just as is done in German with the word "Speer /spear/." And yet they certainly must have different designations for them, as we have seen above in the case of the harpoon and its point.

2. The illustrations were made by Mr. Maximowicz on the spot. On one of these spears (Fig. 4), among the identical figures on both sides, are to be found excellent representations of the sable as it bites into a fish, etc.

175 /566 cont./ During his captivity in Siberia at the beginning of the previous 114 century, Strahlenberg was told that a people living at the mouth
411 of the Amur, the Kilani, whom the Russians call "Kilaki," 326 "make excellent, fine weapons, and among them the best bows,
[10] and work in iron" (2) -- a report which was given so little credence

[113] 2. Ph. Joh. v. Strahlenberg, Das Nord- und Ostliche Theil von Europa und Asia /The Northern and Eastern Parts of Europe and Asia/, Stockholm, 1730, p. 386.

by a later traveler, Gmelin, chiefly no doubt on account of the indeed very strange linking of the Kilani with the Persian province of Gilan and the Awaren /Avar/ to it, that he felt obliged to question the very existence of such a people (3). Gmelin thought

3. See p. 203 above.

that if there were a people there which was especially distinguished by its weapons-making, all of Siberia must be filled with them, and these weapons would long since have been available, if not from the people themselves, at least through the • [531] [321] Chinese (4). Nevertheless, the report which came to Strahlenberg's

4. J. G. Gmelin, Reise durch Sibirien, Göttingen, 1752, Vol. II, Preface.

attention more than one and a half centuries ago is now confirmed, for both the above-mentioned bows faced with buffalo horn and decorated with silver and the beautiful lances, spears, and knives with inlaid figures in copper, brass, and silver, which have no equal among any of the Siberian peoples, are of Gilyak 326 workmanship. If, however, these beautiful weapons were unknown
411 in Siberia in Gmelin's time, and even today scarcely go beyond 556 the Amur region, the reason lies, on the one hand, in the small quantity of metal available to the Gilyak, and, on the other hand, and even more, in the high value which they themselves put on

/568 cont./
114 Gilyak (1).
325 326 192 [293]

325 For this 326 iron (Gilyak also used, esp • [531] (Gilyak tussj)
[435]

[192] latter that is the piece. Si [439] ments, such a prefer the Chi pure, and the [436]

[174] The hig mentioned Gi forging of iron for a long tim 325 stands in agre 197 borrowed this 174 Asia neighbor Chinese or fro

2: Schrenck--1026 E-5 (1854-1856) 1881-1895 RX2 Gilyak RX2

XLVI

Gilyak hunting equipment: 1 -- arrow for shooting birds; 2 -- ax with long shaft; 3 -- long cudgel; 4, 5 -- spear with inlaid work.

2: Schrenck--1045 E-5 (1854-1856) 1881-1895 RX2 Gilyak RX2

/642 cont./
114 winter-houses (tschadryfs), which are erected jointly by the 844 villagers and are usually occupied by several families. I cannot 768 affirm it from my own experience: during my stay in the Nikolayev post several deaths occurred in the nearby village of Kuĭk, without any of the houses being abandoned, much less torn down, but the persons concerned may have died outside. On the other hand, I once saw a corpse lying in a house, which will be discussed later in connection with the mode of burial of the Gilyak, but it, too, could have been brought back in after death had occurred outside the house. If the association of ideas suspected by Dr. Seeland is to be found among the Gilyak, this would prove that at every birth they are primarily thinking of the probable death of either the mother or the child, which, of course, fully justifies their own barbaric treatment of the woman in childbirth. Along with this, however, they resort to all sorts of other 844 superstitious treatments to insure an easy and successful birth.
532 Thus, well before the birth, a figure referring to the act of birth 782 is carved out of wood (see Pl. LIV, Fig. 6 /see p. 1254 /) and provided with small offerings of food, tobacco, and the like in order to pacify and make favorably disposed toward them the evil spirits that might have an influence on the birth.

No one is permitted to enter the tent where the woman is in 844 confinement, with the exception of the midwife and other women 413 giving assistance. The umbilical cord is cut with a special knife • [531] (Gilyak kysmrk- or kyssk-dshakko, Pl. XXXII, Fig. 5 /see p. 1012/), the handle of which is provided with especially rich carving and which may not be used for any other purpose (2). Evidently, the [126] 2. I obtained the specimen illustrated, which belongs to our museum, from the same village of Kuĭk.

Gilyak attribute especially great significance to this act. At the place where the child was born it is washed and cared for by the women and is kept there, if it has not died in the meantime, until it moves into the house with the mother, where she alone takes care of it.

. See p. 590 above and Plate XXVIII
see p.1008, Fig. 1.

type of work among the Gilyak, in addition to ytsch), other metals, as has been mentioned, are ecially copper (Gilyak paghla, i.e., red), brass and silver (Gilyak totta) (2). The more of the

. The quicksilver which they saw in my ossession was totally new to them and aused great surprise among them, but hey immediately gave it the characteristic esignation of "totta-tschach," that is, lver-water.

nlaid in a spear or knife, the higher the value of nce it is used only for this purpose or to make ornas rings, ear pendants, clasps, and the like, they nese silver above all others as the softest, because efore the easiest to use for their purposes (3).

. A few words about the use of silver and old coins in trade, which was still almost nknown to the Gilyak in my time, will be id at the proper place in the next chapter.

h degree of skill that is expressed in the above-lyak spears, knives, and the like indicates that the and other metals is an art practiced by the Gilyak e, and the above-mentioned report by Strahlenberg ement with this. Undoubtedly, however, they have art from one of the two civilized peoples of East ing them. The only question is whether from the m the Japanese. The circumstance that their relations

Gilyak clothing: 1, 2 -- summer hat made of birch bark, 3, 4 -- mittens; 5 -- ear muffs.

2: Schrenck--1000 E-5 (1854-1856) 1881-1895 RX2 Gilyak RX2

An extraordinarily elaborate Gilyak tomb.

2: Schrenck--1269 E-5 (1854-1856) 1881-1895 RX2 Gilyak RX2

LXIX

764 557 1884 531

4:Ivanov et al. E-4 (no date) 1964 RX2 Gilyak RX2

342

Mud hut.

342 175 the entrance to the hut was no longer from the roof, but through a long low corridor.

From about the period of the Ming dynasty, the Nivkhi dugouts began to give way to Manchu fanzas of the frame type, which spread over the entire Nanay territory and were taken over by the Nivkhi. The structure and lay-[171] out of the winter dwelling were similar to those of the Ul'chi. In summer-time, the Nivkhi usually lived in summer dwellings built on piles some 1.5 m high. They usually consisted of two parts: the rear part, which served as living quarters and was lighted by an opening in the roof, and the front part, which served as a warehouse. The summer house was usually sur-[171] rounded by racks for jerking fish and storehouses on piles for storing various products. The general appearance of the Nivkhi summer dwelling was similar to the Ul'chi summer storehouse.

291 The old summer dress of the Nivkhi men was similar in many features to that of the Nanays. It consisted of trousers (varsh), a robe, reaching to the knees and closing from left to right, footwear of sealskin, and a conical birchbark hat (kh'ifkh'akk). The trousers and robe were made of blue or gray cotton cloth. The women's summer robe of fishskin or fabric was longer, and was decorated along the edge with copper disks. In winter, an outer garment of dark fur, with the fur outside, was worn above the robe. During sled trips, the men wore a kilt of sealskin above the fur garment, to save it from wear (sealskin was not used for dressing the dead). The head ● [531] was protected by earmuffs and a fur hat. Men's and women's clothing differed only in that the latter had more embroidery and appliqués, and was made of a greater variety of materials (silk, cloth, lynx-fur on the hat).

Gilyak patterns with animal figures and arabesques of 291 pipe-like pants (gari) made of seal-skin. The upper part of these are not fastened like regular pants but are held to a strap belt by a few thongs. In fall and spring some of them wear these gari made of padded Chinese cotton. Under the gari they wear a pair of regular linen pants which reach to the knees. Instead of wearing stockings, they stuff straw into their torbassa. Straw is a poor heat-conductor, and the same is true of seal-skin. These boots are also water-proof 177 if they are properly sewed. The Gilyak's bodies and arms 291 are covered with a short jacket made simply of dog skin with the fur on the outside. This jacket is sewed like a shirt and has a slit on the left side of the chest, which can be buttoned up. The shirt does not have a collar, the neck and back of the neck are covered by a cap. The color of the jacket differs with the color of the dogs, but the all-black ones are most sought after as gala attire. Sometimes this jacket consists of coarse gray Russian cloth, or only the upper half is of cloth and the lower half of unscraped seal-skin, but this type of jacket is worn more frequently between seasons. The jacket is tied with a belt on which hang various necessary implements, such as the knife, tinder, needle box, etc. Under this outer jacket they wear another, not cut like a shirt, made of blue Chinese cotton, fastened by means of bulbous, Chinese buttons. Under this, many of them wear a coarse linen shirt. Head, neck and back of the neck are covered with a cowl-shaped cap made of dog skin. In very cold weather they also wear fur gloves, with the fur on the inside, and the outside sewed with fish skin; these are fastened with a little band at the wrist.

294 They now sew their clothes with needles and a coarse 439 thread, both of which they buy from the Russians or the Chinese. Formerly they used home-made implements.

291 Women's clothes are very similar to men's. The Gilyak 301 women also wear gari made of skins, which are fastened 531 around the hips with straps. Their shirts, coats and jackets [109] are usually longer than those of the men. The hem of their coats are often sewed with intertwining figures made of sheet brass. They themselves make the figures with the aid of a file. Stylish ladies also wear bracelets which are soldered over an ordinary hearth fire fanned with a bellows. In general the women love to affect a certain neatness of attire. They have aprons for gala occasions, which also have brass ornaments. Their caps, fish-skin boots and torbassa are sometimes decorated with ornaments made of colored cloth, and particularly their gloves are thus decorated. They

291 wear huge pewter ear-rings, five centimeters wide, which 301 are decorated with colored glass beads. Pewter and beads 531 are bought from the Chinese, but they make the ear-rings themselves. Around their necks the women wear beads of colored glass, on these are sometimes hung little wooden amulets representing human figures.

177 Pipes and tobacco pouches are so much a part of the Gilyak 276 personality that I am tempted to give them space here. Their 531 pipes are of Chinese origin and have the uniform shape of the Manchurian pipes. The stem is about an ell long, made of black horn which has been turned with a lathe; the mouth piece is of jade. The cup-shaped brass bowl of the pipe is no larger than a hazel nut. On their belts they wear a bone spike, ornamented with scrolls, which is used as a pipe cleaner. Their tobacco pouch is tied with strings to a disk of walrus tusk which is also decorated with curlicues, and this is fastened to the upper button of the jacket. As soon as they have finished their smoke, they stuff their pipe and tobacco into the slit in their jacket.

V. Food and Diet

261 If the Gilyak is short on provisions he eats only twice a day. He endures hunger relatively easily, he can hunt or pursue other activities for two days without any kind of food, only on the third day does he feel weakness and discomfort. On the other hand, as soon as the hour of plenty is at hand, he undoubtedly eats five times a day.

It would be difficult to say how much nourishment a Gilyak takes but in general they are blessed with a good appetite. From an eye witness I learned that once two Gilyak on a winter journey consumed one pood (about 16 kilograms) of frozen sturgeon in one day [110]

251 Their staple diet consists of fish: sturgeon, various types 262 of carp, whiting, but particularly salmon and mainly kita (salmo longocephalus) and gorbusha (salmo gibbosus). A freshly-caught fish is eaten raw, but the greater part of the salmon catch is dried for the cold season. For this purpose the fish are cut lengthwise and are hung about six feet from the ground; by means of air currents they become a dried non-rotten substance. This is the so-called sukola. The kita provides the bulk of these winter stores, and the fish appears at the end of summer. The fish caught in winter are stored in a frozen state and eaten thus. (1) Sukola is also the main

1. The Russians of Siberia also eat frozen

411 instead of this point some arrows have a crescent-shaped piece of pointed iron. This latter device is used for duck 325 shooting, if there is no powder to be had. On the hunt the 411 arrows are usually kept in a quiver, which usually does not 439 hold more than three. It consists of a flat and hollowed-out 531 small board and is usually decorated on the outside with various designs or figures of animals. It is fastened to the belt.

The lance consists of a shaft about one and three-quarters meters long with a flat iron tip. Some lances made by Gilyak are artfully decorated with silver and gold figures. Moreover, all weapons except firearms are made by the Gilyak themselves. Forging is done simply at the domestic hearth, but the fire is kindled with a bellows. Iron is bought from the Chinese or Russians. Occasionally fragments of Chinese pots are made over into knives, etc.

178 Finally, I must mention the shield of which few examples 411 are still to be found among the Gilyak. These shields are 422 very heavy, probably close to 35-40 pounds, very crudely 439 fashioned, and consist of iron rings. They come from China and at present have no practical value because no one thinks of carrying them. Nevertheless they are regarded as something very valuable and are estimated at 200 rubles. It has happened that the owner of such a shield has pawned it to a Russian merchant, but as soon as he got some money, bought it back.

X. Marriage and the Rearing of Children

58 Men who have reached middle age are seldom unmarried, and it is even rarer to find married men with four or five wives, for this requires a certain amount of means; besides, there are too few women. The beginning of a [126] marriage requires the payment of a ransom (kalym). This does not consist of money, but of certain necessary items-weapons, dog sleds, etc. An average kalym amounts to 200-300 rubles. There are no special marriage ceremonies, but the wedding celebrations which must also be paid for by the bridegroom last a rather long time, -a week or more. Besides millet, fish and tea, a great deal of alcohol is consumed.

A curious, although not altogether unique custom are marriages between four and five year old children. As soon as the parents reach an agreement, a boy and girl are pronounced man and wife. The father of the boy pays the kalym and takes the girl with him, in order to bring her up with her "husband"; sometimes, however, she remains a few more 511 grave drawbacks. For one thing they have an astounding number 136 of mice which attain the size of rats, almost, and which are so bold that they nibble at the clothes that the inhabitants are wearing on their body. Jakobsen was told that they even gnaw at the fingers of the little children.

171 The clothing of the Gilyak of the male and female sex is gen-291 erally like that of the Goldi; they also use the same materials: 177 fish skin, hides and Chinese or Russian cloths. The festoons customary among the Goldi women (see above, number XI, p. 173) [see Goldi source 18: Genest--Analyst] do not exist among Gilyak women; the latter generally seem to be interested less in gracefulness than durability in their clothing. The curious belt worn not only by the Goldi but also by the transitional people mentioned repeatedly earlier, is also in use among the Gilyak and with the 177 same appendages as there. It might be mentioned right here, also 372 that, aside from stone and steel for lighting a fire, matches are already in use with them in boxes which are either made by the 171 Gilyak or imported from the Russians. The arms of the Gilyak 411 are the same as those of the Goldi. Everywhere they still use 531 bow and arrows, knives and lances, and the last-named weapon often appears in beautifully worked models with inlaid figures of 227 silver or copper. For fishing they use nets which they make them 411 selves, angling hooks and harpoon-like instruments which at 501 times have three to four spikes. To move on the water they use larger boats and skiffs made of birch bark which go by the name 492 of amerotschä; on land they travel in winter by narrow sleds to 231 which are harnessed eight to ten dogs. For that reason one will find a large number of dogs in the Gilyak settlements just as in the Goldi villages. These dogs are highly vicious and on occasion even dangerous for the stranger.

171 During his brief stay among the Gilyak, Jakobsen was of course 751 unable to form a judgment of their character; nevertheless his 301 experiences are sufficient to make the following assertion: The Gilyak are no less superstitious than their neighbors. The amulets (1) against diseases which one so often encounters

1. Be it noted on this occasion that Gilyak virgins wear rings on their chests as amulets and no offer however high can induce them to sell them. All the same, our traveller was able to acquire such a ring from an old Gilyak who had stolen it. The latter did not dare to offer it for sale to Jakobsen in the village itself, but met him on the river to conclude the bargain there. The traveller believed in this case that it would be permissible to silence his conscience and to enter upon the bargain.

Gilyak implements: 1, 2 -- iron pipe-cleaner, 3 -- the same made of bone; 4 -- tinder box of sturgeon skin; 5 -- the same made of seal leather; 6 -- tobacco-oil pouch.

Gilyak implements: 1 -- fire steel; 2 -- needlecase; 3 -- stick for smoothing cloth; 4, 5 -- shirt button; 6 -- large earring; 7 -- small earring; 8, 9 -- bangles.

Gilyak implements: 1 -- fish knife; 2 -- knife, "tan-dshakko"; 3 -- knife for fine woodworking; 4 -- knife for hollowing; 5 -- umbilical-cord knife; 6 -- large drill; 7 -- small iron rod that goes with it; 8 -- small drill.

Gilyak household equipment: 1 -- bucket of birch bark, and 2 -- shoulder yoke; 3 -- iron kettle of Japanese workmanship; 4 -- ditto, of Manchurian workmanship; 5 -- iron ladle and scoop, 6, 7 -- wooden food bowls and chopsticks; 8 -- bowl of birch bark for serving food.

Gilyak household equipment: 1 -- wooden trough for serving food; 2 -- large wooden bowl; 3 -- the same from below; 4 -- portable tables; 5, 6 -- wooden ladle and scoop, 7 -- ordinary eating spoon; 8 -- board for cutting up tobacco; 9 -- board to put under a child's cradle.

Gilyak hunting equipment: 1-3 -- iron arrowheads; 4 -- lower part of an arrow shaft; 5 -- thumb-ring for stretching the bow; 6-7 -- quivers; 8 -- Orochi quiver.

Mud hut.

the entrance to the hut was no longer from the roof, but through a long low corridor.

From about the period of the Ming dynasty, the Nivkhi dugouts began to give way to Manchu fanzas of the frame type, which spread over the entire Nanay territory and were taken over by the Nivkhi. The structure and layout of the winter dwelling were similar to those of the Ul'chi. In summertime, the Nivkhi usually lived in summer dwellings built on piles some 1.5 m high. They usually consisted of two parts: the rear part, which served as living quarters and was lighted by an opening in the roof, and the front part, which served as a warehouse. The summer house was usually surrounded by racks for jerking fish and storehouses on piles for storing various products. The general appearance of the Nivkhi summer dwelling was similar to the Ul'chi summer storehouse.

The old summer dress of the Nivkhi men was similar in many features to that of the Nanays. It consisted of trousers (varsh), a robe, reaching to the knees and closing from left to right, footwear of sealskin, and a conical birchbark hat (kh'ifkh'akk). The trousers and robe were made of blue or gray cotton cloth. The women's summer robe of fishskin or fabric was longer, and was decorated along the edge with copper disks. In winter, an outer garment of dark fur, with the fur outside, was worn above the robe. During sled trips, the men wore a kilt of sealskin above the fur garment, to save it from wear (sealskin was not used for dressing the dead). The head was protected by earmuffs and a fur hat. Men's and women's clothing differed only in that the latter had more embroidery and appliqués, and was made of a greater variety of materials (silk, cloth, lynx-fur on the hat).

Formerly, the Nivkhi obtained material for their clothes from Chinese and Russian merchants. Footwear, robes and overcoats were made of burned their de ing, they broke dogs. Their me

"sendoff of the ing the tree."
hut for the figu

At the cem clothing for the
to the figurine real gun, kettl that on this day ated undergrou

A variety spirit was an connected with spirits, milk their own helpi veloped among part in the clan

Folk Arts

The traditi of various kin the most anci natural phenom (tyl'ugd), desc myths also in According to Nivkhi descend

Among the and bone, emb
Most of the ar bark boxes, k mittens—were taste and skill ings. In motif Ul'chi and Na and birchbark almost spiral skin, fabrics patterns, tran and hats, and reproduced on birchbark, fis on birchbark, bone was de craftsmanship

The origi Amur people motifs (such tionably sugg erable local lithic times.

oples of Northern Siberia and the Far East ad, but they also buried them in the earth. During the burne the sled on which they had brought the corpse and killed eat was cooked in large cauldrons and eaten on the spot. The soul" took place several days later, on the day of the "lift-as the cemetery was called. There they built a raf—a little rine which represented the dead.

etery more dogs were killed on this day. The women sewed figurines. Models of hunting and fishing gear were attached , and a variety of household articles were laid with it. The e, teapot and other articles were broken nearby. It was held the soul migrated in a sled into the world of the dead, situ-nd. The dead were buried only by members of their clan.
of taboos were connected with the fire, whose "master" old woman. The shaman's duties among the Nivkhi were "healing" and with the constant struggle with the evil and kinr, which caused illness and death. The shamans had ng spirits (kekhn). However, shamanism was not greatly dethe Nivkhi. It is interesting that the shamans did not take any cults.

onal poetic works of the Nivkhi are varied. There are songs ds, tales, proverbs and sayings, and also myths, reflecting ent ideas about the origin of the world, of nature, of various nena, and of spirits. There are also epic and historical tales ribing hunting feats, wars between clans, etc. The Nivkhi clude the Tunguso-Manchurian myth about the three suns.
one of the Nivkhi myths, people descended from trees: the led from the larch, the Orochi, from the birch. decorative arts, the most developed were carving on wood roidery and appliqué on robes made of fabrics and fishskins.
ticles of daily use—wooden troughs, spoons, dippers, birchnife handles, spear-tips, pillows, blankets, robes, hats and covered with spiral-ribbon designs, executed with great . Wood-carvings also decorated barns, burial huts and dwell-and style, the Nivkhi design is related to the design of the nays. The principal motifs of the ornamentation of clothing utensils were symmetrical combinations of bent lines, often and stylized representations of birds. Appliqués from fish-nd birchbark were cut out according to birchbark or leather smitted from generation to generation. Robes, birchbark boxes ther articles had standard combinations of ornamental motifs, articles of specific groups. The main colors in appliqués of hskin and fabric were black, white, red and blue. Appliqué fabric and fishskin was women's work; carving on wood and ne by men. Many women were famed for their skill and of the Nivkhi ornamental art, as well as the art of other s, has not yet been sufficiently established. Some of the as roosters, dragons and monster-serpents) were unquessted by Chinese art and mythology, but underwent consid-ransformation; others (spirals) probably date back to neo-121 In 1931 I was sent to the Amur Gilyaks for the purpose of studying their dialect and of collecting materials for an ABC book. I was able to devote some of my time to the study of problems in the field of ethnography, such as: the history of the Gilyak clans, land property of the clans, interclan relations, the fishing industry, etc. In the following survey I put before the reader the material gathered in the course of this work and pertaining to the fishing industry of the Gilyak in the village of Kul.
.

225 At the first signs of spring, beginning with the month of 782 qar-lo (crow month') (1), the Gilyaks of Kul go seal-hunting

1. Corresponds approximately to the end of February-beginning of March.

They get out hooks and replace the old strings on them with new ones. Then they perform a religious-magical ceremony which consists in exposing the hooks to the smoke of spruce and of a plant locally known as (tʃkr) bogulnik and set out on sleighs pulled by dogs to the tremendous ice fields of the sea of Okhotsk. On arrival, the Gilyak hunter lets a kuti-ŋəŋ-gar 225 (a dog seeking holes') search for seal air-holes. The Gilyak 411 lowers his hooks into each of the holes found by the dog. The hooks are fastened to a stick put across the air-hole. When the seal wants to breathe, it sticks out its head. The hooks i the air-hole hinder the seal, and when the seal wants to submerge, one or two hooks are thrust into its body. The hooks of the tackle kitə (2) which go into the implements for huntin

2. Tackle for seal-hunting in the summer. The main part of this tackle is a large number of sharp hooks.

seals in air-holes are so sharp that they pierce the body at the slightest resistance. On the following day the Gilyak returns to the same place. He looks to see if a seal caught 225 on his hooks. The Gilyak first pulls the captured seal throug 411 the air-hole and then kills it by hitting it over the head with a 531 striker specially made for the killing of seals. This striker called tor-tas (from tor 'head', za-d 'hit', a suffix pertaining to the implement used in the action), is made of a bough of some strong tree. The bough is cut off together with a piece of stem at its base which is then rounded. At the lower end of the handle of this peculiar hammer is a carving which represents the snout of a seal.

ak knives: 1 -- ordinary large belt-knife (ngawta-dshakko ected to ngawla-dshakko on p. 589, note 4/); 2 -- belt-knife inlaid-work; 3 -- sheath for same; 4 -- knife for cutting d, etc. (yi-dsh.); 5 -- sheath for same; 6 -- knife for cutting

Analyst]. The Gilyak on Sakhalin Island whose houses 372 Jakobsen entered were likewise highly indignant whenever 462 he left the house with a lighted pipe or when his companions 776 extinguished the fire burning in a hut by pouring water on it. For in their opinion such things tended to conjure up destruction not only over the inhabitants of the one hut but over the whole tribe. The inhabitants of one house in the village of Varki below Nikolayevsk predicted the same result when Jakobsen was about to light a fire for making the tea, and they forced him to wait till the house-wife saw to this task, since, in their opinion, this was a job only to be performed by her. Plainly this conduct has its basis in the sacred position of fire. [380] Though this no longer leads to a personification of a fire god among the Goldi and the Gilyak, it no doubt existed among them at one time as it still does today among the Buryat.

776 The system of gods of the Gilyak is in no way behind that 171 of the Goldi in variety. Human and animal figures in color-825 ful diversity serve as representations of celestial beings.
796 Here, too, there is a great similarity to the religious conceptions of the Goldi; the most important difference seems to me the one that was touched upon earlier (XIV, p. 223), [see Goldi source 18: Genest--Analyst] the fact that the Goldi pay zealous homage to the tiger while the Gilyak do honor to 796 the bear. It is true, though, that this homage is disastrous 415 to the bears since it means keeping a number of these 531 animals imprisoned in the cages in every village and killing 231 them at a bear festival. Before the festival the bears are fed plentifully for an extended time by means of large wooden spoons prepared especially for the purpose and decorated 796 with ingenious carvings. These bear festivals are usually held late in autumn and in winter and they are affairs of the greatest importance to their celebrators. I will now give the description of the festival that Jakobsen had the opportunity of observing in person.

796 On the 7th of February, 1885, the traveller arrived in 622 the early morning at the Gilyak village Vaida about 30 versts 574 above Nikolayevsk, where, as he had been informed, a festival was to take place on that day. From several other villages, some of which were considerable distances away large numbers of guests had come in already, and the whole place was astir in anticipation of the festival at hand. The opening of the bear festival is in the hands of the village on a bed of fir twigs as on a bed of state and the participants n the festival visit it for the last time. After two or three lays they pull off its hide and the meat is distributed among he guests who eat it with relish. There is a strange con- radiction in these bear festivals. On the one hand, they honor he bear as a celestial being, as is proved not only by its ictures serving as idols and amulets but also by the tender ttentions that they show the animal during its imprisonment. For this speaks also the solemn way of killing it, as well as he ceremonious procedure used in treating the corpse; also, he circumstance not mentioned above, that the traveller was ot allowed to take with him one of the willow sticks of the ence which was later used for the bed of the dead bear. He would all the sooner have done so since the stick was distin- guished by tasteful carving. On the other hand, they are not fraid to kill this animal that they honor as a divine being, nd by a death, even, that is only the conclusion of a rather arbaric torture. Furthermore it is a curious circumstance hat during the whole course of the festival, as far as Jakobsen was able to observe it, the shaman was not even visible, even hough the latter plays such an outstanding role at all the religious ceremonies of the Amur peoples. What, besides, is he purpose of leading the bear out on the ice of the river? [in the bear festival; see p. 381--Analyst] Should it suggest he idea that the animal is to be offered as a sacrifice to the river honored as a god? And if this is really the case, what strange idea it is to sacrifice one god to another and to eat him up in the end. And why don't they kill the bear on the river bank and let at least its blood flow into the water, just as the fish gods are entrusted to its waves? What, further- more, is this sacrifice meant to effect? and what is its nature? Are we to imagine it as a sacrifice of thanks offered up to the river dispensing blessing and nourishment, or as a sacrifice of expiation by which the river is supposed to be made favorable to the dwellers near it, because the latter are well aware of their dependence on the river and its power to bring them destruction? In the former case one would think that the celebration would take place as soon as possible after the time fishing ended, that is, about September or beginning October, while these festivals actually are not till later. The second assumption does not agree, again, with the circum- stance that the nature of the festival is a thoroughly joyful one, as is proved, at least to my mind, by the description of it given above. This is not contradicted, either, by the solemn silence which reigns during the lethal shot and the preparation for it. For it is by no means necessary to see

20: Bush--99 T-2
116, 531

[LSS: Traveling on the Amur] " before--the banks dotted with sma admiring the taste displayed by ma ture of their hats. They are made outside covered with beautiful scr

(1865) 1871 Gilyak

The scenery was much the same as that of the day ll Russian and Gilak settlements. I could not help any of these Gilaks whom we passed in the manufacof birch-bark, shaped like a low, broad cone, the oll-work figures cut from stained bark."

/715 cont./ AT This window,
after the bear's head has been carried through, a representation of a toad (Gilyak mipitsch), cut out of birch bark, is pasted from the outside onto the thin fish-skin pane that replaces the glass (see the woodcut, p. 1157), while in the interior of the house, on the adjacent bench of honor, there sits a figure which is supposed to represent a bear in Gilyak clothing (Plate LVIII /p. 1258 /, Fig. 3) (2). The significance of this symbolic act seems to me to be somewhat as follows. The toad, an animal that has the worst reputation among the Gilyak and is often represented independently as well as in connection with the bear and the bear festival (3), > 3. See, among others, Plates LI /p. 1251 /, LIX /p. 1259/, LX /p.1260 /, LXI /p.1261 /, which will be discussed in detail later.

> 2. In order to be seated, the figure concerned is movable in the hip and knee joints; the clothing, of course, is only very crudely and rudimentarily realized.

is regarded as an evil spirit and the actual instigator of all the misfortune that happens to the bear through its capture, death, and finally, consumption. It is the scapegoat upon which the Gilyak heap all guilt and responsibility for their actions against the bear, and it is therefore not admitted into the festively decorated house, but remains /716/ outside of it stuck to the window, where it may witness its misdeeds. The bear, on the other hand, is greeted as a welcome guest by the participants at the festival and, as an equal (hence the clothing) is given a place on the bench of honor. Further proof of the correctness of this interpretation, which I can express only as a conjecture, will be given in the following. /Illustration appears here./

Immediately after the feeding of the dogs, which even on this day takes place in the house in spite of the festive decorations, the work of the day begins -- the cooking of the bear meat in the hearth concerned. This work is given to only the oldest men, the graybeards, as a high post of honor; the women and girls, the boys and youths are excluded, and it therefore proceeds very slowly, deliberately, and, so to speak, solemnly. First the kettle in the fireplace was surrounded with a thick wreath of wood shavings, and a similar half-wreath was spread in front of the vent hole. Then the kettle was filled with snow for it is uïtsch to use water for cooking bear meat, and the fire under the kettle was kindled with shavings and fir branches, with the latter also used for incense from time to time. Simultaneously a large wooden trough was hung on straps directly under the bears' snouts so that it hung about three feet above the floor. The trough was richly decorated with all sorts of arabesques and figures and in particular on one side showed a bear carved in relief and on the other side a toad likewise executed.

Toad made out of birch bark.

The work of the old men proceeded so slowly that it was not until toward evening that they began to cut up the meat of the legs and feet. Each leg was first placed upon the fir branches in front of the bears, as though to ask first for their permission to prepare it; only then was it cut up and put in the kettle. The cooked pieces were fished out of the kettle with an iron hook and transferred to the trough it of the bears so that they taste them first. Besides ly a dog remained in the house, and, to be sure, so y to lick clean the implements used in the cooking r to the trough.

n the morning on the following day (January 28) the d their work of cutting up and cooking the meat, rrupted only by the usual feeding of the dogs in the ce beforehand with specially decorated animals d them only the tail of a fox or dog, as was men-Next, a number of articles were brought in from , /717/ all of which were hung or otherwise attached k in colorful confusion pieces of fur and the skins viously killed bears, the chains on which they were e, dried bear-penes wrapped in birch bark, knives oint of attachment of the blade have a bundle of bear's penis region around them, the so-called uïng-Gilyak, with which it is uïtsch to cut anything other t and fat (see Plate LI /p. 1251/, Fig. 3), and a ely carved spoons and peculiarly shaped bowls. The t to use immediately, being filled with the broth obe bear meat, which was sipped either directly or with e spoons. This service, used by the Gilyak only when rs, is very interesting and deserves a more detailed owls called nichyry-ngir or nichyry-ngith, i.e., bearby the Gilyak after the bear spoons (nichyr), are always a single, often quite long piece of wood, which about or near the one or the other end has either a rather shallow oval hollow (Plate L /p. 1250/, Figs. 1 and er are specifically intended for eating the bear-meat er (the same place, Fig. 3) for the bear meat or fat.

ese bowls especially interesting, however, is that one, sometimes the other end of the piece of wood, both the front and the handle ends, are provided rvings referring to the bears and the bear festival.
also found in profusion on the handles and sometimes

322 /717 cont./
*796 even on the lower end of the spoons which are used by the Gilyak 412 at the bear-festival feasts. I succeeded in bringing back to our 415 museum quite a number of bear-festival bowls and spoons which •532 had belonged to the distinguished Gilyak, Ssogin in Kuik, and [126] came into my hands only through a lucky accident. At the time of my visit the Gilyak refused any offer, however high, for a utensil used in connection with their bear festival, with the assertion that such a transaction would be too greatly uïtsch. If one examines these carvings more closely, one discovers that they attempt to depict the bear in all the various situations and positions in which it is put during the bear festival: on Plate L /p. 1250/, Fig. 1, for instance, it is shown with the neck and body band; on Plate L, Fig. 3, and Plate LII /p. 1252/, Figs. 3 and 5, attention is called to the revolving ring on the upper side of its body band. Plate LII, Fig. 4, shows it eating from the bear spoon; Plate LI /p. 1251/, Fig. 6, shows how, led on a chain, it defends itself against its attackers, and the same figure, as well as Fig. 5 on Plate LII, shows the bear's head in the läsng and later looking down from the rack in the house. The most interesting, however, is the spoon illustrated on Plate LI, Fig. 6, not only because it can be regarded as a masterpiece of Gilyak wood-carving, but also because it alone shows almost all those situations of the bear at the festival held in connection with it and, in addition, by linking the bear's head looking down from the rack in the house with the toad depicted in the bowl of the spoon, it shows the latter as the spiritual initiator of the whale bear festival. These bowls and spoons are always made only during the bear festival, and here in /718/ Tebach two Gilyak sat on the floor in front of the bears busily occupied with the carving of such implements.

*796 In the afternoon of the same day new quantities of bear 252 meat were brought from the storage chambers and placed on the 263 floor covered with fir branches in front of the bears. As before, 784 the kettle was filled with snow, and the cooking now proceeded more energetically -- but always without any salt, the use of which is strictly forbidden, not only in the preparation of bear meat and broth, but also for all other foods during the bear festival,

/718 cont./
*796 sturgeon lying in front of the bears, and a little to one side, in 252 an unworthy place, so to speak, where they could not be seen b the bears, the women began to prepare various dishes, such as mosy, several kinds of groats bea.s with fish oil or seal oil, ar the like -- work which, undertaken quite differently and in the ordinary way, proceeded rapidly and vigorously.

*796 /719/ The morning of the following day (January 30) be gan with putting on the bear rack the two pelves of the bears, three carp (Cypr. carpio, Gilyak pilengat) and a portion of all dishes prepared the day before and put in various bowls of birch bark, whereupon an old man seated himself in front of the bears and immediately began to eat some of the freshly prepared mos out of two bear-bowls.

There followed the customary feeding of the dogs inside the house and, as on the previous days, a race of decorated dog along with drumming by the women. Next, strips of bear fat w again hung on the étagère and then, amid the heavy incense of branches, the internal organs of the bear were cut up and placed [252] small bear-bowls. It seems that these parts are not cooked, but eaten raw, like the fat.

At the same time, the women congregated in one corne of the house around a little old woman and, out of motley rags, began to sew together a band about ten inches long and three inches wide -- the so-called tschudbas of the Gilyak. At sunset *796 this band is wound around the snouts of the bears just below thei 325 eyes in order to dry the tears welling out of them. Fastened in •532 middle of it, however, on the ridge of the snouts, there is a 324 representation of a toad, cut out of birch bark (1). I can give n 824

1. Like the one pasted on the window, see p. 1157.

interpretation for this symbolic act in connection with what has been said above other than the following. With the cutting up of its internal organs, heart, liver, and the like, the bear know that its fate is sealed and sheds tears over the evil spirit, the toa

532

2 REPRESENTATIVE ART--techniques in painting and sculpture (e.g., drawing or painting on flat surfaces, incising in relief, modeling or carving in the round); materials and implements used; subjects (e.g., still life, landscapes, human beings, abstractions); use of color; composition; appreciation of form and perspective; styles (e.g., naturalistic, idealistic, symbolic, abstract), special products (e.g., etchings, bas-reliefs, masks); specialized fields (e.g., portraiture, commercial art, religious sculpture); artists and sculptors, etc.
See also:

Commemorative statues	211	Advertising	447
Photography	215	Art supplies industry	549
Art galleries	217	Idols and images	778
Laundry art	306	Ideas about form and color	922
Paints and pigments	306

/103 cont./

*614 791 even to his own clear advantage, but he has, as we know, an already tested expedient, with the help of which he pacifies the gods with full observance of his own interest; he resorts, as in other cases, to pious deception of the gods, which offers him the opportunity both to fulfill his religious duty and to derive material

*614 628 791 gains from the conflict. Usually, this most important religious procedure of the institution of blood money is completely ignored, and indeed traces of religious ceremonies of reconciliation are not preserved among all peoples, among the Gilyak, as we shall recount later on, this is distinctly clear from the ritual of ransom, which demands a preliminary imitation of blood revenge in the form of a battle between representatives of the warring clans, the killing of dogs, and the feeding of the spirit of the dead man with their blood.

628 Now let us proceed to the practice of this institution.

537 The principal role in the procedure of reconciliation is played

554 by the so-called khlaj-nivukh'i (1).

*614 [192] [197]

1. I use the term of the more widespread western dialect.

Khlaj-nivukh -- literally: the explaining man, /104/ eloquent, orator. Such a man enjoys special regard in the eyes of the Gilyak, for in his view the eloquent individual is the chosen one of a particular deity who constantly inspires him, dwells in him, and inspires in him beautiful, convincing speeches and an irresistible influence on his hearers. The very quickness of speech, the ability to speak fluently and rapidly for a prolonged time, even apart from the content of the speech, is already considered a talent of the highest order. "His tongue turns like the wings of a windmill," thus, with awe, does the Gilyak characterize outstanding orators. The latter, in turn, regard themselves as chosen

• [532] ones. On the continent they always carry a wooden rod, on the head of which is carved a human face, depicting, apparently, that deity which inspires them and helps them to convince others. At pathetic moments they wave these threateningly, swearing to break them in the event of the failure of their arguments and bring the wrath of the gods upon themselves and their intractable opponent.

/119 cont./

*614 554 556 not only in natural products, but also purchased ones, tobacco, rice, kumiss, etc., because his wealth and associations make it possible for him to undertake distant journeys for the barter of furs and the acquisition of goods at firsthand. He is the guardian of the common "shagund" of his closest kinsmen, and the possessor of his own rich collection of "shagund," which his clansmen may use in case of necessity.

For the whole clan he is not only a man whose home is always open, where one can always go to eat well, enjoy the delights of tobacco, and hear interesting things, but one who always comes to assist in time of need. Especially invaluable, however, is his help at times of common misfortune, such as war, conflicts arising from revenge, disputes with members of other clans. He has supplies of the best weapons and conveyances, his name strikes terror into the foe, who for that reason will more willingly consent to a reconciliation, and, finally, he has supplies of "shagund" when it becomes necessary to pay ransom. Moreover, such a person usually possesses exceptional intelligence, eloquence, rich experience, and

[537] knowledge of life and people. He is the natural orator, "khlaj-nivukh," who plays such a weighty role in affairs of revenge and civil disputes; even neighboring clans resort to him when the intervention of intermediaries is necessary. Among these yz'i there are individuals who enjoy enormous fame and respect throughout all the territory settled by the

• [532] Gilyak. In the image and likeness of these yz'i are fashioned images of the gods, the "masters" of the mountains, seas, heavens, rivers, etc. Moreover, they do not simply display respect toward him, but also a feeling of religious adoration. From among such individuals, under favorable circumstances, are developed those elements of authority which we find in other tribes standing on a higher level of cultural conditions.

[623] In some cases, such yz'i will become the council of elders, which before the clan assembly decides the affairs of the

[622] community in the name of the clan. Under other circumstances, when the tribe is compelled to conduct frequent wars,

Amur

/307 cont./

765 next to the umbilical cord. A wooden board is attached to the ground at some distance from the place of the cremation of the 764 dead man -- mu n'ivukh tuv. The body of the deceased is dressed in stockings, a waistband, a woman's hat of lynx; if the deceased is a man, then in a man's winter hat, while to his belt is attached, on one side, a curved knife (ig:dzeko) and, on the other, kes'kes -- an iron chain and a needle case, and, in the front, mly -- a purse with a flint, tinder, and steel. Then alongside is placed a little stake, and on it a human hair (from the wife, sister, mother) -- mu n'ivukh kiur, which will serve the deceased as an insole for footwear upon going over into the world beyond the grave; next to this, a little stake with three horns (branches), on which is placed a small cup for a cuckoo (pyk nir); furthermore, a little stake with a wooden cuckoo -- mu n'ivukh pyk, i.e., "the cuckoo of the dead man," and finally still another little stake with an eagle feather -- chamngar.

The building of a little grave house can be postponed, but the dressed stuffed doll -- k:ak (1) must be made without fail.

• [532] [194]

1. K:ak -- wooden image of the deceased, a receptacle for his soul.

Temporarily a little balagan of bark, k:ak-raf, is erected over him. Finally a little house, raf, is built, and the funeral repast is held.

765 In a day, a week, a month, the closest kinsmen arrive, drink, cry, and commemorate; they do this for a year, in some cases for two or three years, but if there is no one to do this, then for one month, depending on status. At the end of the term of "observation" (tigr az'adz: -- "observation of the tree," the time of periodic funeral repasts at the house of the deceased), they buy vodka and rice, assemble the kinsmen and the "in-laws," and for three or four days go to the grave and commemorate; this is the last funeral repast (raf pykyz'dz:, tigr pykyz'dz:).

[231] They walk to the tuv, the place of the cremation of the deceased, pour vodka there, sprinkle it from all the dishes,

Sakhalin

/532/

775 825 This bird (the soul of the slain man) enters the avenger of

• [532] the slain man and instills courage in him. Its image (vagn, taldhchvunga) is made out of the roots of the alder tree and placed, with the roots upward, not far from the raf over the grave of the [518] slain person. The chldnaj of this bird must be made out of the root, and a small knife must be placed in its mouth.

775 The resurrection of the soul. The soul of the deceased will sometimes be born again. If a boy is born with a sign indicating his origin from a person who has died, he will say, even before sustained speech, words that indicate his knowledge of the past.

775 789 When he attains intelligible speech, his father puts a hat on him backwards and begins to ask him questions about the past, and then he says quietly, "Well, that is enough, forget the past," and puts the hat on him in the proper way, Then the boy forgets everything and will live for a long time. If the father does not do this, the boy will die. The procedure with the hat drives away the milk.

II.

Hunting and Fishing

224 982 Sacrifices to the sea -- Tol vyznd (fynydz:). 1. When winter sets in and there is not a single unfrozen patch of water on the surface of the sea, the men of the same khal'a (women do not participate) set out in the dark of night for the sea, a hole in the ice, and through it each of them throws wood -- "wood fire," which has been started with a piece of tinder -- to the sea. Later on, at home, they "eat," i.e., feast.

2. In summer, people who leave the shore in a rowboat throw things out of a bowl for sea offerings -- tol a ^ich: -- to the master of the sea, Tol yz ^dokh.

To Tol they always sacrifice a white dog, a white fir, everything smooth and clean; to Pal and Mif, on the other hand, everything fanciful; to Kur -- a red dog, a red cock, a bright cup, vodka.

/337 cont./

845 Gibel'ka's wife gave birth to twins; one of the twins was a bear.

[532] A representation of twins -- tongch: -- is placed in a little [778] storehouse. If one of the twins dies, they place one tongch:, while [782] if both die, then two joined together on the sides. Chukh-chugynd is given to them at the full moon and at the new moon. Kinsmen and strangers sacrifice down to the third generation.

[775] When a twin dies, he goes to his father, Pal-n'gyvyn, who [787] gave birth to him, appearing to his mother in a dream.

A dead twin is not cremated, but is seated in Turkish fashion 766 in a specially built little house, in which a wedge is driven to support him.

He is dressed in a white shirt and trousers and is surrounded with shavings -- inau. The mother of twins is likewise not cremated after death, but is dressed in white and buried, also with inau placed around. According to B. Pilsudski, the same is done with the father of twins.

778 The tongch: helps catch bears and in hunting in general.
274 The tongch: is fed in case of sickness, especially tuberculosis 164 (Slyavo).
782

Infanticide. Infanticide is committed sometimes in secret or 847 even upon the order of the father of the underage husband of a woman.

682 A woman who was accused by a shaman of poisoning a boy, the son of another woman, was beaten, and, after they cut off her braids, she was thrown into a funeral pyre.

753 Illness. Illness is sent either by Pal-n'igyvyn or by Tol-n'igyvyn, 776 but each of them takes a milk not from his kingdom.

/338/ A milk can be of different shapes and often is red as blood and hard as stone, but when he enters a person, he becomes lively, "as if he were walking."

732 A violently insane person is imprisoned in a cage (in 958 summer) and fed; he must not be killed.

Kkhmas'ind -- to be sick from not getting what one saw 753 and wanted. Either the one who did the seeing or his family becomes sick. Then it is imperative to get at least a small crumb of what one saw and to touch it, and the person gets well.

/458 cont./

ODD China, for its pig-breeding. Besides the domestic pig, one also 235 finds among the Goldi the first domestic poultry, and, to be sure, primarily chickens (Goldi tscheko), which also come from the Sungari region. Maack (8) came across some in Chula on the Amur,

8. Op. cit., p. 230.

a little above Da, and I myself saw the Goldi in Chaizo on the Ussuri raising chickens just like the Chinese living beside them (9).

9. This fact, noted in my travel journal, was overlooked by me in the discussion G [235] of domestic fowl in the first volume of this work (p. 404); on the other hand, it is G [532] mentioned there that the hen is known by sight to the Goldi, Olcha, and Gilyak from the Chinese and is popularly represented by them in woodcarvings and metalwork.

G 24 Finally, the Goldi also learned from the Chinese about the cultiva-177 tion of vegetables and cereals, only the rudiments of which are understood by them. The northernmost point along the Amur River G [103] where at the time of my journey there was still a small vegetable garden cultivated by Chinese was the village of Zjanka, as the Chinese called it, or Otza, as the Goldi called it, consisting of one Chinese house and two Goldi houses, located on an island near the mouth of the Gorin. At such places, whose number increases going upstream and up the Ussuri, the Goldi were able to learn, indeed, must have learned about a number of vegetables and cereals at first hand, and already in the vicinity of the mouth of the Ussuri, in Messur, Turme, and even /459/ more along this latter river, we saw them cultivating beans, squash, cucumbers, cabbage, onions, etc., and even maize, in their own gardens. Naturally at the same time, as the result of greater proximity to the agricultural Chinese along the Ussuri and Sungari and more active intercourse with them, the use of the cereals handled by them in trade, such as millet, barley, sorghum, wheat, etc., increased among the Goldi.

/503 cont./

396 very delicately and carefully so that the boards, held together [824] only by wooden pegs, are not driven apart. Therefore, only [412] with the help of a knife, some moss is stuffed from the inside into the seams wherever they permit it, and then a narrow wooden strip is fastened over them, again with small wooden pegs. In addition, however, stronger and wider strips, obtained by splitting thick willow switches, are put over the two long seams from the outside, so that on land the boat rests, so to speak, on two soles, convex on the outside, which, in addition to protecting the seams, also have the utility of reducing the rubbing of the bottom board on the sand and gravel of the shore in pulling the boat into or out of the water [192] and thus protect it against damage. The analogy between these exterior mountings on the boat and the soles, or even more the sole-mountings, on the sleds is so obvious that even the Gilyak, despite the absence of generalization in their language, designate them with the same term as the latter (motassj), whereas they have a special term (twy) for the strips put over the seams inside the boat. Finally, two, or in the [192] case of larger boats even three, pairs of car-pins /Ruderpinnen/ (Gilyak misgyr), that is, small boards, each equipped with a vertical prong, are put in the front part of the boat on the edges of the sides. They are likewise fastened to the side boards with wooden pegs, so that not a single nail or piece of iron of any kind is used on the entire boat of the Gilyak, or on their sled. Needless to say, the Gilyak do not fail to adorn their boats, too, [532] with a few decorations. For example, the tip of the bottom board projecting below the prow usually runs out into a crudely carved head of a snake, bird, or other animal, the two prow-boards always bear several carved arabesques on their inner surface, and, as a rule, a carved, black or colorfully painted figure, a square, star, or the like, is likewise found on the back of the stern-board. Finally, before the boat is put in the water, it is slightly charred from the outside on the bottom and the lower part of the side-boards for protection against rot,

/519 cont./

226 (umyssj) running from the walls of the bag betray the entrance /520/ of the fish, the net is drawn together, and the fish is caught. Sometimes this bag net is set permanently in the river, for which two posts are driven as firmly as possible into the river bed as far apart as the diameter of the bag opening, and the net is fastened to them by means of the rings and cords on its edges on either side. A Gilyak sitting in a boat takes up his station at one of the posts and holds the signal strings in his hand so that, as soon as a fish has entered the net, he either catches it definitively and recovers it himself or he procures the help needed to do it.

The two last-mentioned nets are also used for fishing in winter, but the ice cover of the river then makes necessary a few other devices and manipulations. First of all, for each net, two holes must be made at a distance corresponding to its length, or, in the case of the bag net, to the diameter of its 226 opening. To scoop out the detached pieces of ice floating in 192 the holes the Gilyak use the hand net (Gilyak chuntulk) (1)

[227] 1. The net stretched in the hoop is called assj in Gilyak, the crosspiece in the lower part of the hoop -- lott, the long and crude handle-stick, with which the new ice that perhaps arose in the hole is sometimes broken up -- kip.

[227] illustrated on Plate XL /see p.1020/, Fig. 3. A special instru-[532] ment is used for setting up the net under the ice: it is a long, flat, wooden staff curved slightly upward toward the tip, the so-called odn, which on the end runs out into an approximately triangular plate with two points directed toward the rear and with two eyes carved in it in a primitive manner, which bears the name odn-tschongr, i.e., odn head (see Pl. XL, Fig. 4).
226 One reaches into one of the holes in the ice with this staff and shoves it forward, close under the ice, until the tip, the odn-tschongr, comes out at the other hole. Here one of the two

/520 cont./

226 upper corners of the net, or, in the case of the bag net, one of the sections of the bag opening equipped with the rings and cords, is hooked onto the prongs of the odn-tschongr, while the other corner of the net, or the place on the bag opening diametrically opposite the first one, is fastened to a pole placed across the hole, and the rest of the net, weighted with stones at the lower edge, is let down into the water. Now the odn is withdrawn, and the corner of the net coming out with it at the other hole is fastened, like the first one, to a pole. In this fashion the net is set up, like a wall directly under the ice, between the two holes. From these also emerge the cords by which it can be raised, and, finally, to one of them run the signal cords from the wall of the net or bag, so that the presence of fish in the net must be watched for here. From the foregoing it is to be seen that the length of the odn, determined by the size of the net and the distance of the holes in the ice from each other, is very considerable. It may therefore consist of several pieces.
[532] The representation of a face on the odn-tschongr is always necessary, however, according to Gilyak belief, and very essential for success in catching sturgeon or hausen. In this connection another /521/ Gilyak superstition should be considered, one specifically referring to the catching of sturgeon [885] and hausen with nets. It is that a cuckoo feather attached to the net will make the fishing successful -- a superstition to which I shall return later with regard to its consequences.

226 Another way of catching sturgeon and hausen among the 171 Gilyak, though far less common, is to set out fishhooks. This is the same method of fishing that is known in Siberia as saamolowy (automatic fishing) and has been described by Pallas in the various modifications with which it is practiced along the lower Obj, on the Irtysch, Jaik, and along the Volga (1).

1. Pallas, Reise durch versch. Prov. des Russ. Reichs, Vol. II, pp. 339, 444; Vol. III, p. 88.

/546/

225 825 789 532 Needless to say, there are a number of superstitions connected with seal-hunting among the Gilyak. Thus, the lych, like the above-mentioned odn-tschongr (1), always bears on its upper side, near the point, a crudely carved face, whose presence is regarded as essential for the successful use of the weapon. 225 825 Furthermore, superstition requires that, first of all, and before any use is made of a slain seal, its eyes be gouged out with a knife, whereupon the eye fluid, caught in the hollow of the hand, is thrown into the water, and, furthermore, the snout, or, to achieve both things at the same time, the whole head, is chopped off and put into the water. [779] The guiding thought in this is to leave the slain animal in ignorance about its murderer and thus to prevent any possible revenge by its manes causing ill-luck in seal-hunting in the future. [191] The same conception is evidently the basis for the above-mentioned similar procedure of the Manegir with their slain sturgeon and hausen. The Gilyak, however, prize these fish too much to sacrifice the heads each time and may therefore come to terms with this superstition in another and less costly way. Perhaps they content themselves with gouging out the eyes, though I did not see this myself. Their above-described procedure with the

1. See p. 808 above.

Use of the lych for seal-hunting among the Gilyak.

/564 cont.

224 825 to fishing circumstan them hunt the degree

223 In d the huntin
A few pert the greates not killed on the who the moltin but not inf diving into these they septentrion ever, is do of superstit their meth white grou tschleolathe Nikola by them i [532] which one [825] although i I likewise relating to they great

For fishing eag tscham) an interior of only rarely the latter,
the region [439] tscham (ea from it co

/

or seal-hunting, a natural explanation is found in the ce already pointed out in the beginning, that among ing does not by far stand in the foreground of life to that fishing and seal-catching do.

iscussing the various kinds of arrows used by the Gilyak, g of wild fowl was also considered above in passing.
inent remarks might in addition follow here. By far st number of ducks, geese, and other waterfowl are by the aforementioned knob-shaped arrows, which le are used very little, but are caught in nets during g season and simply beaten to death. Only incidentally, requently, they capture birds that get their food by the water and become entangled in the nets. Among pay special attention to the divers. Colymbus alis L. and C. arcticus L. (Gilyak ugn), which how-ne, not for practical, utilitarian reasons, but out ion, about which I shall speak later when discussing ods of burial. The hazel grouse (Gilyak hang) and se (Gilyak parrä, along the Tymy on Sakhalin nga), with which the Gilyak /565/ amply supplied yev post during the winters of 1855-1857, are caught snares (Gilyak kusi). With regard to the white grouse, also finds represented on amulets among the Gilyak, n a completely unrecognizable, only symbolic fashion, noted among them the above-mentioned superstition the head of the animal, in that in selling this bird ly desired to remove the head first.

the Gilyak the most important of all the birds are the les. Haliaëtos pelagicus Pall. (Gilyak tscharngai-d H. albicilla Bris. (Gilyak mygh-tscham, in the Sakhalin ach-tscham). The former, however, occurs in their territory and chiefly along the seacoast, but on the other hand, is common and occurs throughout and it is therefore always meant when merely the gle) is mentioned. The benefit that the Gilyak derive nsists in the fact that these rectrices are an important

/642 cont./

114 winter-houses (tschadryfs), which are erected jointly by the 844 villagers and are usually occupied by several families. I canno 768 affirm it from my own experience: during my stay in the Nikolayev post several deaths occurred in the nearby village of Kuik, without any of the houses being abandoned, much less torn down, but the persons concerned may have died outside. O the other hand, I once saw a corpse lying in a house, which wil be discussed later in connection with the mode of burial of the Gilyak, but it, too, could have been brought back in after deat had occurred outside the house. If the association of ideas suspected by Dr. Seeland is to be found among the Gilyak, this would prove that at every birth they are primarily thinking of th probable death of either the mother or the child, which, of cou fully justifies their own barbaric treatment of the woman in chi birth. Along with this, however, they resort to all sorts of othe 844 superstitious treatments to insure an easy and successful birth.
532 Thus, well before the birth, a figure referring to the act of birt 782 is carved out of wood (see Pl. LIV, Fig. 6 /see p. 1254 /) and p vided with small offerings of food, tobacco, and the like in ord to pacify and make favorably disposed toward them the evil spirits that might have an influence on the birth.

844 No one is permitted to enter the tent where the woman is i 413 confinement, with the exception of the midwife and other wom [531] giving assistance. The umbilical cord is cut with a special kni (Gilyak kysmrk- or kyssk-dshakko, Pl. XXXII, Fig. 5 /see p. 1 the handle of which is provided with especially rich carving and which may not be used for any other purpose (2). Evidently, th

[126]

2. I obtained the specimen illustrated, which belongs to our museum, from the same village of Kuik.

Gilyak attribute especially great significance to this act. At th place where the child was born it is washed and cared for by the women and is kept there, if it has not died in the meantime, u it moves into the house with the mother, where she alone takes care of it.

/737 cont./

A 796 horizontally a few times and murmuring a few words which Scheube 782 did not understand. This is repeated in front of the bear's cage, 535 whereupon the women and girls execute a dance in front of it and in doing so turn toward the bear with caressing glances and movements. /Page 738 is blank, and the following unnumbered page is the title page for the appendix, "Excerpts from the Travel Books, Notebooks, and Journals Left by the Author."/

500 /739/

I. Religious Conceptions of the Amur Peoples. -- Idols, Amulets -- Shamans.

Religious Conceptions

G 76 24 1. Gilyak. It is very difficult to obtain information concerning the religion of the Gilyak. I learned the following from Jutschin and Labgun (*). They call "God" ŷžigy () and designate

G 61] * From the villages of Patcha and Wassj at the mouth of the Amur.

G 04]  Wherever the author used ы and ю from the Russian alphabet, they have been replaced by y and ja /according to the system used here, these letters would be transliterated as y and ya, respectively/.

him as the good one, kíngulātsch, an attribute that means the G 778 same as good (sontz). They did not understand my question as to 532 whether "God" lived in heaven, or where else? -- and said only that they did not have any god (idol) in their yurts. I all the more doubted the assertion repeatedly given to me by the Gilyak that they did not have any idols, since I myself have human and animal figures carved in wood from the village of Kulk (). But they

G 61]  On the left bank of the Amur, below Nikolayevsk, also Kuëgda, Kuëgra, Kuëgri-wo, see pp. 448, 535.

/740 cont./

771 powers always only directed against him and superior to him in strength, and which he more or less personifies in concrete, but 771 crude representation. This feeling of his own helplessness in the 812 face of the forces hostile to him, and yet the inalienable wish to avoid their harmful encroachment upon his life -- these causes, together with the inevitable, involuntary, and unconscious view that in the action of these powers, as in his own actions, there is a cause-and-effect, cause-and-consequence relationship, lead him to a series of conclusions through which his own acts and the action of the powers hostile to him are brought into a causal nexus 771 And this is the origin of his many-shaped superstition which gives 812 rise to customs and special performances that are intended to pacify the evil forces or to keep them away, as well as to the per-532 sonified representation of the evil powers in this or that crude, approximate fashion, through carving animal and human figures in wood, and to shamanism The many wooden figures of bears, lizards, toads, snakes, and even of human beings which are found among the Gilyak may have this origin and meaning. The Gilyak does not regard them as gods and does not worship them. They are only representations or intimations of hostile powers in Nature from which he seeks to escape. The fact that human figures are also found among them should not be interpreted as though they were personified representations of divine beings, such as anthropomorphism has created in more spiritual fashion in other places.
771 In the view of a primitive people, and the Gilyak, too, man stands 812 wholly and exclusively within Nature; according to their superstition he stands /741/ in a close and immediate causal relationship with the events of Nature (or evil powers), and this in itself may make the representation of a human being necessary for the performance of many a shamanistic act. The conception of God, the [776] Good One, however, is much too vague and lacking in content among the Gilyak to make it possible to speak of any connection with it and thus also of anthropomorphic ideas and representations. But though the Gilyak do not regard this superstition and shamanism, etc. as divine service or prayer, but only as a practical act in their lives in order to escape all harm, nevertheless we are obliged to call this their religious consciousness. And thus we find a strange

/741 cont./

771 tradition, reaching any pretensious of a religious one or completely 174 driving out and replacing that empty concept of God among the 812 Gilyak.

I realized that the wooden idols of the Gilyak do not 778 actually enjoy any very great esteem or reverence among them [124] from the fact that the Gilyak from Kulk from whose deserted yurt /742/ I had appropriated a collection of their idols in the summer of 1854, did not seem to notice the loss upon their arrival in the village, or at least did not consider it worth mentioning. In the same village I also once saw a small boy come out of the house playing with a wooden bear figure, a sign that these things were not as inaccessible to him as they certainly would be if they enjoyed special veneration. (Bm. I, pp. 22-27.)

Idols and Amulets in Human Shape

778
789 2. Gilyak. The various idols carved in wood, some-532 times human or sometimes animal in shape, which served to ward off danger, misfortune, sickness, and the like, were designated to me by the Gilyak with the general names of kāgn and tschngai (1).

[199] 1. The word mafk also seems to refer to idols in general.

In addition, however, special names for individual figures were also given to me. A crude representation of the whole human form (Plate LIII /p. 1253/, Fig 1) or at least a bust of one is found as a rule in the yurt of the Gilyak on the crossbeam of the roof-frame, above the sleeping benches along the narrow side of the yurt away from the entrance (that is, above the place where among the Olcha 778 and Goldi the similarly-shaped sāwa stand). Sometimes, however, 789 the Gilyak wear similar small idols on their chests, to which they 755 give the name pangch (Plate LIII /p. 1253/, Fig. 5). If a Gilyak 532 is seriously ill, the shaman carves such an idol for him, or advises him to carve one and to wear it so that he will become well. But [756]

/742 cont./

778 it is not the general custom to wear idols around the neck. Often 789 it is not exactly an idol, but some other kind of amulet, straps 755 knotted in a ball and the like, which is put around the sick man's 532 neck on the advice of the shaman and worn even after recovery. Such an amulet is called ngif and kissj. From Judin in Tebach I [126] obtained an amulet in the form of a carved bow with a human face (see Plate LVII /p. 1257/, Fig. 9). (Bm. I, pp. 57, 58.)

778 3. Gilyak. The village of Poghobi on the west coast of 755 Sakhalin. In one yurt I saw my host cut long curls of wood-shaving 184 on a stick. When these were quite voluminous, he cut off the whol bundle from the top of the stick and tied it together there. This zach was intended for a sick woman in the yurt, who had pains in her chest and sat there groaning and complaining. The zach was tied round her neck, and she tucked the ends carefully in her bosom, pressing them against her body. This was supposed to be a remedy. In fact, after she had received this medicine, the woman stopped groaning and behaved very calmly and quietly the rest of the time. Thus, in this case, as often happens, a superstition may have a curative effect. The zach is therefore still used on Sakhalin as an amulet /743/ against sickness and seems to take the place of the various forms of idols and similar figures which are used for similar purposes along the Amur and Liman. (2 W.R. I, p. 6.)

778 4. Gilyak. The idol in human shape illustrated on Plate 755 LIII /p. 1253/, Fig. 4, was named for me by the Gilyak as myikr.
532 It is distinguished in shape by having only one arm; the other one was omitted intentionally. I was unable to learn what the circumstances were with regard to this representation. This idol, too, is carved by a shaman, or upon the advice of one, for warding off [126] sickness. I acquired it in the village of Kulk. In the same vil-778 lage among the belongings of the Gilyak that had been put away for the summer in a storage chamber, I found carved idols of 532 another kind, but likewise of human shape. They were cylindrical pieces of wood, on one side of which was a crudely represented human face. The upper end of the wooden piece is conically pointed and bears a sort of cap of thin strands of bark, which hang

/743 cont./

778 down to the forehead in front, but over the entire wooden piece in 532 back and seem to represent hair. Below the face the hair is fastened to the wooden piece by similar little bands of bark. Plate LIII /p. 1253/, Fig. 2, shows such an idol. Several such idols stood in a little house made out of boards and covered with loose grass, which is shown on Plate LIII /p.1253/, Fig. 3. These idols were named for me by the Allof Gilyak as tybys. The Gilyak Surgin, however, did not know this name and used the expression tyf-ýžigy, i.e., house god. This was the first time that I heard the word ýžigy used in connection with the idols of the Gilyak, and I believe that this was done only in order to make me understand. I was likewise unable to find out whether by tyf, that is, house, the yurt of the Gilyak or the little idol-house was meant. Since the latter bears the name kánigs, I must relate it to the yurt of the Gilyak, and it therefore seems that these idols mainly play the part of lares or guardians of the house. (Bm. I, pp. 58, 59.)

778 5. Gilyak. In the Gilyak village of Patt (on the right bank 184 of the Amur) I saw three idols standing outside a storage chamber, 532 human figures hewn out of blocks of wood, very similar to those 171 of the Olcha, though not with the particular expression which seems to be characteristic of all the idols of the latter. When I inquired, the Gilyak informed me that they revere these kägn like gods. In Patt, they said, they are also kept in the yurts, but not among other Gilyak. I then had the idols in the yurt showed to me: three large, wooden human-figures with old, smoky zach around their necks, as is also the custom among the Olcha, stood there on the beams of the yurt above the rear sleeping-bench. -- 778 In the village of Kuik, too, I saw idols in the yurts, standing in the 532 same place as in Patt. This is a very dark spot in the yurt, con-184 cealed from sight, and anyone who does not know that the Gilyak [353] keep their idols there will not easily find them. Many a yurt may therefore have contained idols, while seeming to me not to have any. But many a one actually does not have any, as I discovered in Wait. -- It seems to me that /744/ the farther downstream one goes on the Amur the less esteemed or at least less obviously revered the idols are. (1 W.R. II, pp. 119, 137, note 5.)

/744 cont./

778 6. Gilyak. Through C. v. Dittmar, following his visit in 755 Tebach for the bear festival, I obtained a series of Gilyak idols 532 which in part refer to the festival itself, such as Fig. 3, Plate LVIII [126] /p. 1258/, in part to other things. Subsequent inquiries about their significance enabled me to obtain new insight into the religious views of the Gilyak. These idols and representations of various kinds are amulets intended to keep the various sicknesses away from man or, if they have attacked him, to remove them. Most of them are made with flexible joints and for that very reason are supposed to remove the stiffness or sickness of certain limbs (*).

* See Plates LIV /p. 1254/ and LV /p. 1255/.

For example, Figure 2, Plate LV /p. 1255/, with a jointed body, is intended for removing sicknesses of the back and body, the one with jointed legs (knees), ibid., Fig. 4, for healing sicknesses of these extremities. The large figure with jointed head, back, and legs, Fig. 1 on the same plate, the tschaltscha-tschngai, is made, as was mentioned above (), in connection with the birth of children and held in front of them so that, by looking at it, they may be spared ailments of the neck, body, or extremities. The small idol with a cut-out in the chest and jointed arms and back, Plate LV /p. 1255/, Fig. 3, is intended for curing ailments of the chest, coughing, etc., as well as ailments of the joints concerned.

 See p. 1046.

[778] All these idols or amulets, the tschaltscha-tschngai not excepted, are fed with berries and other things in order to pacify their power or to win their favor, the wooden pieces bearing traces of this. These representations, however, are not worn around the neck, but are hung on the wall in the yurt.

778 Related to these idols are two amulets that have a similar 532 purpose: they are the lalž and kissj (Plate LX /p. 1260/, Figs. 1 751 and 2). -- The former is an iron ring, open at one place, which is worn around the head to prevent headaches. The two opposing ends

/744 cont./

778 run out on either side into two points, one of which represents a 751 lizard, the other a snake, the similar shapes of both ends facing one 532 another alternately. Unfortunately the specimen under discussion is somewhat worn by frequent use and is lacking the lizard at the one end.

778 The other amulet is an iron semicircle, from which hang 706 figures of different significance made of the same metal, specifi-532 cally: at the one end, a crude human shape and a roughly triangular piece that, according to some of the Gilyak, is supposed to represent a ptarmigan, and at the other end an identical alleged ptarmigan and a heart; in the middle, finally, a roughly human shape with two heads, which is supposed to represent the kins, the evil, destructive power, that is, the devil. According to the re-[753] ports of the Gilyak themselves, they believe that sickness is nothing [761] but the kins gnawing at a human being and finally fatally devouring him. That is the end of all who /745/ die of sickness. It is no 775 wonder that with such a belief the Gilyak do not claim heaven for 766 the souls of those who die of sickness, but have them wandering on earth, while the souls of all the murdered and even of suicides fly 776 to heaven. According to Gilyak belief, the earth is the abode of countless kins or devils who hide in the forests and mountains, as well as in the water and everywhere. The kins are represented with [532] two and three heads by the Gilyak, perhaps in order to indicate [778] with the extra ones, in contrast to man, their power over the latter (1).

1. According to the Gilyak, one of the heads on these two or three-headed forms is a human head. This therefore indicates that the kins has seized the human being.

778 I do not know the significance of the alleged ptarmigans, 532 if that is what they are. The heart, however, has reference to the [751] purpose of the whole semicircle. Namely, it is to be worn around the neck against chest ailments, coughing, and the like. The name kissj, however, which was given to me for it, seems to have a

G 778 /745 cont./
532 more general meaning and to refer to amulets in general (Bm. II, pp. 30-32).

Gi 778 7. Idols in human shape among other Amur peoples. The 532 wooden idols, säwa, of the Samagir are shaped exactly like those [184] of the Olcha and Goldi (Plate LIII /p.1253/, Figs. 6-8) and stand in the same place, propped upright on the sleeping bench along the transverse wall of the yurt, away from the door. (1 W.R. II, p. 77.)

Gi [171] 8. Goldi. The same custom as among the Gilyak, wearing [126] idols around the neck, probably exists among all Amur peoples. Fig. 1 on Plate LIV /p. 1254/ represents such a small idol worked in lead, which I obtained from a Goldi on the Ussuri. (Bm. I, p. 58.)

9. Samagir. I found a small idol hanging in a deserted hunting-hut of the Samagir along the Gorin, and it reproduced the human figure in exactly the same manner and with the same features as the large säwa which one sees in the yurts of the Samagir, Goldi, and Olcha. The single deviation was that it bore a wooden eyelet on the head, through which a strap was drawn for the purpose of wearing it around the neck (Plate LIV /p. 1254/, Fig. 2). When this is done, my guide said, the säwa is fed by the one wearing it, in that the owner smears around its mouth a bit of everything that Gi he himself eats. When I asked what the säwa actually is, he said that [755] it is everything, the well-being of everyone, and thus his, my guide's, physical well-being, for example, the healing of his leg bitten by one 000 of my dogs. I could not find out anything more (2). There is

2. The guide of the author also called säwa the little stick, mentioned on p. 1113, deposited for a musk deer taken from a hunting tent on the Gorin (1 W.R. II, pp. 84, 85).

Gi There is 778 evidently connected with the säwa the idea of the prosperity and 777 well-being of man under the influence of a power outside of him 171 and superior to him. This conception may not be very different 000 from that of the Gilyak. A /746/ fact which speaks very much in 178 /746 cont. /A /746/ fact which speaks very much in 791 favor of the religious conceptions of the Tungusic Amur peoples, 171 whoever they are, in comparison with the Gilyak, is that the former are not nearly as apprehensively superstitious as the latter (1 W.R. II, pp. 85, 86).

Animal Idols

178 10. Gilyak. The bear plays the primary role among the 632 animals that are represented in wood as idols by the Gilyak. The 325 reason for this is the danger to which they are exposed in their fights with this beast of prey, for they are particularly fond of pursuing the bear (as was mentioned in connection with the bear festivals). The bear kägn or tschngai serve to prevent the injuries and fatalities which can be expected on these occasions. I have mentioned above the superstitious beliefs associated with the death of a man killed by a bear among the Gilyak (1). Hence one rarely enters a village

1. See p. 1127.

near which, upon closer inspection, one does not come across a few [171] bear idols. And this is common to both the Gilyak and the Tungusic Amur peoples.

The bear idols are usually very crudely fashioned. The animal ordinarily appears to be sitting, sometimes standing. The idol pictured on Plate LVIII /p. 1258 /, Figs. 1 and 2, from the village of Kuĭk, is one of the best that I have seen. It is further distinguished by the fact that a raised band runs around its body, upon which other animals sacred to the Gilyak, or, more accurately, uncanny and portentous, are represented (these are most of the reptiles produced in Gilyak country): the toad -- mipitsch (2) on [126] 2. Besides this representation I obtained two individual toad-idols of the Gilyak, carved in wood, which are illustrated on Plate LIX /p. 1259 /, Figs. 7, 8.

/746 cont./
the front side of the bear-idol, the lizard mä(t)ngai on the back side of it, and the snake kŷlanga, whose image is found on either side between the first two. I often witnessed the awe and fear of the Gilyak before reptiles (*).

* See Appendix 20, paragraph 2 /p. 1204/.

Among the Gilyak, besides the bear, one finds idols of the att or märeder, with downright superstitious fear connected with it among them. But since the tiger and leopard, which are united under the same name of att or märeder, are rarely seen in their northern homeland and casualties caused by them are rare, the idols of the att are less common than those of the bear. The slight acquaintance of the Gilyak with these predatory animals causes them to make the idols of them poorly and superficially (3).

3. See Vol. I, pp. 92-94, of this work.

see Plate LVIII /p. 1258/, Figs. 4, 5, 6. Fig. 4 represents an att idol which I found in the village of Kuĭk. It bears none of the marks which characterize the tiger and leopard and are present on the representations of these animals among the Goldi. Only the general shape is similar to those figures. /747/ But that this figure is in fact supposed to represent an att is certain, since I obtained the idols from a Gilyak expert in this. (Bm. I, pp. 59, 61.)

11. Gilyak. A fish carved out of wood, which came from the Gilyak village of Tebach, seems to serve less as an idol or amulet than as a piece of carving, as a representation, tschngai in general. It is supposed to represent the fish ngy-tscho, which is unknown to me. Even earlier I acquired from Tebach the figure of another small fish, the pilengat, Cyprinus carpio, which likewise had no significance other than that of pai (see p. 1090). Both are illustrated on Plate LX /p. 1260/, Figs. 4, 5. Later, I obtained another carved fish from Tebach, which was supposed to represent the pak(ch?)-tscho, i.e., a large pilengat-tscho. (Bm. II, p. 32.)

/749 cont./
Idols and Amulets Combining Human and Animal Figures and Others

19. Gilyak. The belief in the transmigration of souls with reference to the bear may be the basis of a number of pictorial representations among the Gilyak -- amulets or small idol-images that are worn around the neck in case of sickness. Among them one finds double figures of a human being and bear. This is ordinarily a small piece of wood which at one end branches out into two parts, one representing a human head, the other a bear's head. I acquired specimens of this type from Kalm and Allof. The former, in addition to the two representations mentioned, also has a human face on the single end (Plate LVII /p. 1257/, Fig. 8), while the latter ends there without any carving. On both, however, the division of the points marked with human and bear heads continues for a while in the form of a groove which gradually tapers off at the single end. The Gilyak explained to me that this groove continues to separate the human half from the bear half until they merge. (Bm. II, p. 59.)

20. Gilyak. In the forest near the village of Chiare, not far from the place where corpses are buried, several idols of the Gilyak were placed under trees in the customary manner, that is, standing upright close to the foot of a tree and hidden with sticks and other pieces of wood (see Plate LXV /p.1265 /, left). For instance, there was the double figure of a tiger (att) and /750/ a human being, with the nose of the latter being represented by a bear (Plate LXVI /sic, see Plate LVI, /p. 1256/, Fig. 2). Another idol bore on a human body provided with movable arms and legs an att head with a four-toothed comb on it (Plate LVII /p. 1257/, Fig. 2).

Finally I found here the representation of an animal reminiscent of a crocodile or alligator. It was evidently an amphibian, and the wide snout was densely studded with teeth. The natives called it chaž, or, as an idol, chaž-kägn, but knew nothing about the animal which the figure represented, in that they had neither seen such an animal in the water or on land nor heard it mentioned in their traditions. They simply said that this

/750 cont./
figure was made in case of backaches, in order to rid oneself of the ailment (Plate LIX /p. 1259 /, Fig. 9). (2 S.R. I, p. 15.)

21. Gilyak. In the village of Kalm I was able to buy many idols, all different and some of them very interesting, for example, one idol of human shape with a bear's head (Plate LVII /p. 1257 /, Fig. 3). It was named for me as ogink, a designation that other idols in purely human shape also had. Another had the head of an owl (ki) on a human body (Plate LVII /p. 1257 /, Fig. 5); in the case of a third one the owl sat on the head of the human being (Plate LVI /p. 1256 /, Fig. 4), several human figures had cavaties in the body to hold food.

One idol consisted of a block of wood with a human face and a row of prongs on top of the head, each of which was provided with a human face.

I also bought here the bowl in which food served to the idols is put and which is called toll-ngir or kägn-ngir.

Then there were idols of the white whale (pŏmi-tscho) with a human being on it (Plate LVI /p. 1256 /, Fig. 5), as well as of the wolf, amulets with two heads, that is, of the bear and raven, etc., here.

In the village of Tschelmok many idols with zach wound around them and several clothed in bearskin stood on a shelf in the corner of a yurt. I acquired a small tiger-idol with a human figure on top of it (Plate LVII /p. 1257 /, Fig. 1), and furthermore an amulet with three idols, one of which represented a human being, the second a wolf, and the third another animal that could not be named for me. Next to the idols there were a great many idol bowls, all of about the same shape with representations of various kinds, sometimes with a human face, sometimes with a toad, a lizard, and the like on them. These were all toll-ngir. Only one idol-bowl was completely different and consisted of two cups made out of a piece of birch bark and placed side by side in the form of an 8 (Plate LXI /p. 1261 /, Fig. 1). This vessel was called tschobrä and was used for the same purpose. No amount of persuasion, however, helped in getting the woman who owned them to sell one or the other of these idol-bowls. She said that it was uitsch and would cause her death.

/750 cont./
Several neatly carved and interesting idols were also sold to me in the village of Patt. On one the back of the head had the shape of a heart, on another two human figures stood on a block which represented two hearts (Plate LV /p. 1255 /, Fig. 5). /751/ The heart (ngif), by the way, is very often used on such carvings (see 13 /p. 1292/ above).

Among the idols here there was one with the head of a tung or sea bear /fur seal/. The sea dog /harbor seal/ is also represented in idol form, but I did not obtain any (2 S.R. I, pp. 6-9).

22. Gilyak. A figure carved in wood which was found not far from Tschchyrkrach at the mouth of the Amur roughly represents a flying fish-man. The head is similar to the head of a fish, with iron teeth in the upper and lower jaws. The eyes are represented by blue glass-beads. The front and rear extremities are attached near the back of the neck. The former are evidently arms with hands on them, the latter legs with feet, similar to those of a human being. The former are stretched out toward the front, the latter toward the rear, approximately on a horizontal plane with the head, so that the figure seems to be represented in flight (Plate LXVI /p. 1266/, Fig. 1). C. v. Ditmar (who was in part instrumental in my obtaining the figure) told me that among the Gilyak of Patchä there is a legend which he was not disinclined to connect with it, since this village and the cape mentioned were not far apart.

"Once upon a time," the story goes, "the Gilyak of Patchä returned from fishing on two boats laden with fish. They were too tired to unload the fish at once and postponed the work until the next morning. The boats were merely pulled out and the fish covered with birch bark or the like. The next morning, when they wanted to set to work, they found the boats empty. All around, however, lay many scraps from the fish which clearly proved that someone had made a hearty meal of them. They therefore set out again to fish and again returned with a full load. But again they postponed the unloading, and the same thing happened to them as on the day before. They went fishing for the third time and again brought back two full boats. But this time they decided to keep watch during the night in order to detect the destroyer of their catch. They succeeded and the culprit was caught. It was a strange shape with the head of a fish and human arms and legs. The monster was placed in a structure similar to the one erected for the bear and was fed with fish. It lived in this captivity for a year, and then it asked the Gilyak to free it. They took it to a cape on the Amur River between the village of Patchä and Cape Tschchyrkrach and tied it there to a well. But the monster bit the rope in two and disappeared, so that when the Gilyak returned it was no longer there."

/751 cont./

I now asked among the Gilyak what the figure represented and what its purpose was. They replied unanimously that the figure was called wagn, and they explained to me that this designated the place where the corpse of a slain Gilyak was burned (Bm. I, pp. 50, 51.)

23. Gilyak. Standing in the brush near the village of Patt (on the right bank of the Amur) there was a wagn which was for a Gilyak who had been killed by an Amgunj /Amgun/ Nägda /Negda/. The wagn was old and the eyes had fallen out, but the extremities were all there, only much less carefully /752/ worked than on the specimen acquired by me in Tschchyrkrach. The wagn reached from the ground up to my belt and was pointing with the head to where the murderer lived, that is, in the direction of the Amgunj. I do not wish to say, however, that such an arrangement was the rule among the Gilyak. (2 S. R. I, p. 8.)

24. Olcha. The Olcha assign an identical fate to those who die peacefully and those killed by human hand and erect no wagn for the latter, as do the Gilyak. According to the information of the Olcha Chossiambo the representation of the wagn is based on the bird kŏro whose appearance in any village is disastrous for its entire population. For whoever sees it must die. Such a case had happened many years before in the village of Chala, opposite Kisi (Kidsi?). The kŏro had come and perched on the tip of a larch tree (Olchä sissa, Gilyak koi), where the inhabitants of Chala saw it, and all who saw it died, and only a very few escaped

/754 cont./

825 753 sick and dies, if he does not use the proper means to free himself of the mipitsch. The only means that can help him, however, 755 is a shaman. He conjures up a kägn (a good god), who removes 756 the mipitsch from the sick person. At the same time a mipitsch 532 carved by the shaman himself or by someone else at the order of [787] the shaman is hung around the patient's neck and must be worn by the sick person from then on to protect himself in the future. A sick man wears a single mipitsch, a woman a double one. The mipitsch are always carved out of wood, especially the wap-[322] mipitsch. It is only on the snout-band of the dead bear (see pp. 462 1156, 1162) that a single mipitsch of birch bark may be found. [824] This is made by the women, but the wooden ones are always made by the men, since wood carving of all kinds is an occupation for only the men, while the women are skilled at cutting arabesques and figures out of cloth and therefore also out of birch bark.

753 The ideas of the Gilyak concerning the lizard (mā(r)ngai) are 755 similar to those concerning the toad and snake, except that much 825 less power is attributed to it. It allegedly crawls into the head of the sleeping person and is removed in a way similar to the above by a shaman and by putting an iron amulet-ring (lalź) (1) around the head. This ring bears the representation of a lizard on either side, in the region of the temples; in front, closer to the forehead, there is a human figure on either side, supposedly indicating a man on one side, a woman on the other. Finally, at the very front, on the forehead, the lalź bears a frog shape. This is striking, since the frog (dhal) is not regarded as unlucky, is not magá. (Bm. II, pp. 44-46.)

1. See Appendix 6 /p. 1196 /.

756 30. Gilyak. Amazing, miraculous acts which the Gilyak 554 shaman performs are chiefly the means by which he wins admiration and esteem among his countrymen. The more these acts deviate from the natural course of things, the greater is the reputation of the sorcerer. Such is enjoyed, for example, by the Gilyak

/761 cont./

000 II. Conceptions of the Amur Peoples concerning Life after Death and the Corresponding Treatment of the Dead

Fate of the Souls after Death

775 42. Gilyak. The (Amur) Gilyak (according to Surgin's account) believe that the soul of anyone murdered, not excepting suicides, flies to heaven, while persons who die a natural death journey on the earth or under the earth. This flying up to heaven [532] is most likely represented by the flying figure of the wagn, which [798] resembles a flying human being with the characteristic bird's or fish's head. (Bm. I, p. 53.)

775 43. Gilyak. The (Amur) Gilyak Jutschin dictated to me an 533 interesting song, for which, through further questions, I obtained [724] a most instructive commentary in part. The song had been sung by the Gilyak Orkin from Magho to his wife, Rschyvguk, from Wair, whom he had abducted (*). Orkin was still alive at my time,

* See the Gilyak text in the appendix to Vol. III of this work, "Linguistic Findings, Compiled by Dr. W. Grube," p. 41 /the book translated here does not contain this appendix/.

but his wife had died.

The chief content of the song seems to refer to a "village Mlygh-wo," and I therefore inquired as to what kind of a village it was and where it was located. I learned that it was the place [766] in the interior of the earth to which the souls of all those who die of sickness migrate, while those of murdered persons () fly to heaven.

 According to another report, also the souls of suicides (see Appendix 42 above.)

764 /768 cont./

on the upper end of which is set a small spoon-shaped wooden bowl (Plate LXVIII /p. 1268 /, Fig. 4); moreover, there is a small stick whose point is inserted into the quills of 1-3 and four eagle-feathers, tscham-ngar () (ibid., Fig. 5), and a third small stick, hook-shaped at the top, tututor pyk, is carved out of a branch (ibid., Fig. 3). Also lying in the little house, usually crossed over one another, are a couple of arrows without points, variously colored rags, baskets of birch bark, wooden plates with carving, and the like. Sometimes several of the aforementioned boards are present, and they /769/ then do not occupy the middle of the little house. That is probably regulated by the number of corpses whose remains rest under the little house. (Bm. I, pp. 16, 51, 69.)

 Tcham-eagle.

54. Gilyak. According to Surgin's explanation, a bit of [765] the skull and head hair from the remains of the cremated corpse is placed in the middle of the kakk where a wooden peg is driven in. The rags around the kakk signify garments which the dead person needs (on the journey of his soul). Also, various kinds of food, such as berries and fish, are set down for the deceased as long as the corpse is still in the yurt and later, after the cremation, for the ashes in the raff; therefore in every raff one finds all kinds of implements, baskets, and bowls of birch bark and the like, on which the food is placed. The little stick with the small bowl at the tip is to serve the dead for more quickly journeying on (therefore as a walking stick); the eagle feathers on the other stick are supposed to lend wings, as it were, to the soul. (Bm. I, p. 54.)

[532] 55. Gilyak. According to the information by Judin from Tebach, the little stick, tututor pyk (*), which one finds in the

* Pyk occasionally alternates with pyt in the author's work.

/769 cont./

764 raff next to the kakk, is supposed to represent a dove (tútut) or a 532 cuckoo (pyk). The former is for a man, the latter for a woman. The dove or the cuckoo is also involved with the small stick with the bowl, in which berries and the like are placed as food for the bird; hence the designation tututor-ngir and tututor-ngit or pyk-ngir and pyk-ngit, the dove or cuckoo bowl, for these sticks. The representation is the same for both birds, for it only most crudely 764 shows a bird's head by means of a couple of notches. The word pittyssj, on the other hand, designates another item in the raff. It is a small framework of little sticks (*), on which hang berries,

* According to the appended, very cursory sketch, a triangle attached to a stick, on which various articles are hung.

tobacco, etc., the purpose of which remains unknown to me. On the tscham-ngar, Judin said, six feathers are placed for a deceased man and eight for a woman. Since these are supposed to [562] be a means for the more rapid journeying on of the soul, perhaps this takes into account the difference in physical strength and -- according to the Gilyak view of women -- also the difference in psychic energy of the two sexes. The tututor pyk is supposed to have almost the same purpose as the tscham-ngar, which is very probable on the basis of the explanation given by Judin concerning these objects. (Bm. I, p. 87.)

764 56. Gilyak. Near the village of Tacht (on the right bank 184 of the Amur) a newly erected raff stood very close to the bank and close to it a pittyssj, i.e., a storage chamber for the raff, which is therefore called raff-njo on Sakhalin. It consists of a small roof which rests on two poles, similar to a small dovecot. Its roof is higher than the raff. Under the roof of the pittyssj, berries, fish, and the like are hung for the deceased.

764 In Kalm (on the right bank of the Amur), I found an ex-184 tremely elegant raff which a rich Gilyak, Kimrkan, had erected 556 in memory of his wife, a daughter of Judin's, and his daughter. On the outside it was provided with carvings and arabesques of various kinds. The /770/ carvings, painted black, red, and white,

CONTINUED ON NEXT FICHE

2: Schrenck--1259 E-5 (1854-1856) 1881-1895 RX2 Gilyak RX2 Goldi RX3

Idols in animal form: 1--tiger (Goldi); 2, 3--leopard (Goldi); 4--seal (Olcha); 5--unidentified animal, a human heart in its mouth (Olcha amulet); 6--white whale (Gilyak); 7, 8--toad (Gilyak); 9--"chas" of the Gilyak.

2:Schrenck--1260 E-5 (1854-1856) 1881-1895 RX2 Gilyak RX2
LX

778 532 751

532

[524]

1. Iron circlet with animal figures, worn to prevent headaches (Gilyak). 2. Iron semicircle with symbolic figures, worn around the neck to prevent sickness (Gilyak). 3. Amulet-belt with human and animal figures (Olcha). 4, 5. Fish carved out of wood (Gilyak). 6. Gilyak child's toy representing a dog.

2: Schrenck--1266 E-5 (1854-1856) 1881-1895 RX2 Gilyak RX2

766 [412] [532] [415]

1. Grave marker of a murdered Gilyak. 2. Small wooden trough, along with 3, a pestle, from the tomb of a drowned Olcha.

Implements used at the bear festival of the Gilyak: 1--bowl for size); 2--long spoon for feeding the bears; 3--knife for cutting for splitting the bear's skull; 6--s

2: Schrenck--1251 E-5 (1854-1856) 1881-1895 RX2 Gilyak RX2

412
415 532 231 196 collecting bear fat (reduced in bear fat and meat; 4, 5--ax poon.

ONTINUED
FROM PRECEDING
FICHE

/771 cont./

880 years, and consequently also the visits to it for a cure. The corpse 766 of a person killed by an att (tiger and leopard) is taken to a simi-778 [262] lar burial house, supplied with food, and the latter is used as a [755] remedy. (Bm. I, pp. 54-56.)

58. Gilyak. Between Hokk and Kalm (on the right bank of the Amur), I passed on the bank the tomb of a Gilyak who had met misfortune in the river. Here stood a small low house, in the manner of all Gilyak graves, surrounded by birch-bark baskets and bowls of various sizes, which were strung on the adjacent brush. This is the usual general custom of the Gilyak for designating the grave sites of persons and animals (bears, etc.). Next to the tomb lay a boat, probably the one in which the accident had occurred (). (1. S.R. I, p. 7.)

 Cf. Pl. LXVII /p.1267 /.

764 59. Gilyak. The inhabitants of the villages of Kuk, Hokk, 184 and Tschilvi (on the right bank of the Amur) are said to inter their corpses, but the others, including those of Taur-wo and the villages up to Chiare (incl.), cremate them and erect raff for [162] them. I personally saw many raff in Chiare. In the villages named, however, the population is in part Tungusic. (2 S.R.I, p. 8.)

[778] 60. Gilyak. Near My (on the Amur-Liman) I saw a fresh Gilyak grave. The raff was not yet erected, the ashes (of the cremated corpse) were covered with boards set vertically and horizontally, and at each of their two ends there was wood shavings (zach). (2 W.R. II, p. 38).

766 61. Gilyak. If a Gilyak is murdered, his corpse is likewise 778 (like all others) cremated, but no raff is erected over the ashes 532 in the forest; instead, a wagn is set up (). It is made out of a tree trunk which is dug out of the soil with the roots. The various root-knobbles serve to represent the head, arms, and legs of the

 See Appendix 22 /p. 1206/.

/771 cont./

766 wagn (†). The trunk is chopped off several feet above the roots, 778
532

† On the specimen given to the Academic Museum by the author one of the rear extremities was supplied by a piece of wood specially inserted, which subsequently fell off (see Plate LXVI /p. 1266 /, Fig. 1).

pointed (the top of the stump), /772/ and, with the pointed end, is sunk into the ground at the place where the ashes of the murdered person lie, so that the root, representing the wagn, [674] projects above it. Since murder is not infrequent among the Gilyak, there are wagn in many villages on the Amur, for instance, in Wassj, Kaki, Wair, Kalgho, Tebach, and elsewhere.

According to Surgin's information, a wagn is set up only for a murdered person who was killed by the hand of a Gilyak from another village. On the other hand, if one Gilyak kills another in the same village, the latter does not get a wagn. Similarly no wagn is set up if a father or mother kills the son, and vice versa, or a brother, or in general if one relative kills another. In such cases the corpse is simply cremated. The same is done with the corpse of a suicide; it is cremated, and no wagn is set up.

778 The bird's head of the wagn is said to be patterned after the 532 ugn (Colymbus arcticus). This bird is regarded as sacred by the 825 Gilyak and is kept, stuffed, in the same flying position as it has on the wagn. Such stuffed skins of Colymb. arcticus and septentr. are sometimes seen hanging on high frameworks in Gilyak villages. In the representation for the wagn, the Gilyak give the head of the ugn teeth of iron, which are supposed to serve for him to take revenge on the murderer (1).

[628] [627] 1. Perhaps the wagn, by its threatening aspect, is supposed to be a reminder of the obligatory blood revenge, and this is the reason that no wagn is set up in cases where revenge is deemed inadmissible -- as between relatives and the

G /772 cont./

778 1. (cont.)
532 members of a village -- or -- as in the case 825 of a suicide -- it is automatically omitted.
827
628

Since the soul of a murdered person flies to heaven, it does 766 not need any of the articles such as are placed in the raff for the 775 wandering soul of a person who died a natural death. (Bm. I, pp. 52-54.)

G 62. Gilyak. As the Gilyak (on the west coast of Sakhalin) 764 told me, they burn their corpses and erect wagn over the ashes 184 of murdered persons. (2 W.R. I, p. 8.) 778

63. Gilyak. The Tymy Gilyak assembled in Ngachd-wo G 764 (on the left bank of the Tymy on Sakhalin) said that they like-184 wise usually burn their corpses, as is done along the Amur, in the Liman, and on the west coast of Sakhalin up to Arkai (excl.). A raff is erected over the ashes of the cremated corpse and, as along the Amur, has a kakk, pyk or tutut, and pyk-ngit or tututngit in it. The pittyssj is present in the raff and among the Tymy Gilyak bears the designation raff-njo, that is, burial-house storage-chamber, which wholly corresponds to its significance. Only the tschant-ngar is missing (*). (2. W.R.I, p. 45.)

* See Appendix 53 /p. 1233/, 55 /p. 1234/.

G- 64. Gilyak. From Arkai on, along the west coast of [784] Sakhalin, south to Pilja-wo, the last Gilyak village, the Gilyak [171] are said not to cremate their corpses which is regarded as uitsch, but to deposit them in wooden coffins in small houses, just as among the Tungusic tribes of Manchuria and Sakhalin and the Ainu (2 W. R. I, pp. 8, 45.)

/773/ According to another report, the corpses are interred south of Arkai (2 W.R. II, p. 28).

G-i 65. Olcha. In the forest not far from the Russian village of 764 Bogorodskoye in the vicinity of the Olcha village of Pulji (Pulu 531 on the map, on the right bank of the Amur), there were two very gracefully worked Olcha tombs ornamented with various paintings

Implements used at the bear festival of the Gilyak: 1-5, bowls for eating bear fat; 6, wooden hooks for lifting the kettle from the fire.

The Nivkhi 781

Playing a wooden percussion instrument.

The wooden religious sculpture was akin to that of the Orochi, Ul'chi and Nanay. The figurines of bears on dippers and spoons used in the ear festival were finely made and realistic in style. The bear dippers ere often remarkable in their craftsmanship. Some of them were carved ith pictographs, relating the history of the hunt or rearing of a given ear. The carvings on the dipper handles were also symbolic; they ndicated by a variety of symbols whether the bear was killed in a hunt r reared in captivity, whether it was killed in the summer; and so orth.

The musical culture of the Nivkhi was very poor. They played a primitive one-string instrument (t'yugrygg) and a lip jew's-harp (kanggyh, during the bear festivals they used, instead of musical instruments, an ordinary log, which the women struck with sticks.

Education was entirely lacking among the Nivkhi before the Revoluion. The Nivkhi-Nanay alphabet written in the 1880's by the missionary, Protod'yakonov, was not used by the Nivkhi.

In 1895 an elementary school was opened in the city of Mariinsk; two there were opened in 1899. By 1905 they were closed for lack of funds.
Only a few individual Nivkhi attended Russian schools.

Contemporary Life of the Nivkhi

In 1918, soon after the establishment of the Soviet government in the Far East, this area, and especially the Amur Basin and Sakhalin, became the scene of civil war and intervention. Guerrilla units were organized o fight the White Guards and interventionists. The bitter fighting lasted several years.

116, 532

"Dr. Laufer, a member of the recent Jesup Expedition, despatched from Washington, U.S.A., and the greatest [195] authority on the art of the Amur tribes, has declared of the Gilyaks and Golds that their art is lacking in realistic representations. Their purely decorative work—and he excludes from this all wooden objects, animals, etc., carved as charms or toys—he alleges, is confined to copies of Chinese representations of animals which these natives have never seen, such, for instance, as the cook, the tortoise, and the mythical phoenix. It is interesting in this connexion to note that in this particular hut in the village of Kamavo, I found several carvings on the timbers of the wall of the hut of bears, as well as other crude mural decorations of a chess-board pattern. Perhaps these may be regarded as the exception which proves the rule."

825 and if he gets caught, he is killed. But even after that he is 789 handled with respect, that is, his corpse is laid before the 278 house of the idols and left there until it begins to decay.
Besides the skin, the bones and the gall are immediately sold, for the former are held by the Gilyak to make a man brave, and the latter is used for all kinds of medicaments.
775 Of the numerous spirits whom the Gilyak are supposed to 782 know about, some are good and protect man, but the majority are more or less evil, and must therefore be propitiated with gifts. The chief of the evil ones is called Kins (on the island of Sakhalin: Kinsh) and to a certain extent corres-778 ponds to the devil, Ahriman, etc. of other peoples. "Spirit" 782 and "idol" are both called kegn, for the idols are not only 532 symbols, but at times also the dwellings of the spirits or kobolds. Usually they are kept in the storage huts and only hauled out on special occasions. If an idol is "heavy" it means that its inhabitant, the kobold, is at home, but when it gets "lighter" than usual, the spirit is roaming about somewhere. The offerings here also consist of millet, tobacco, etc.; very often the face of the idol is smeared with cranberry juice, which seems to have a powerful effect. Wood chips are also hung around its neck. The idols have different appearances. A guardian spirit, for example, [24] lives in a wooden cone that is placed somewhere in the vicinity of the yurt when it is built. If the yurt must be taken down, the idol remains, and at the new dwelling a new one is made. Some idols are crude imitations of humans, others have the shape of a bear and are sewed into bear skin, still others have the shape of a bird, etc. Some human-like idols represent children, others old people. Some have hands and feet, others only a head which sits on a body showing a navel. Small idols are sometimes worn as talismans. These also usually have human forms, but some look very 789 different. Thus the talisman against a difficult birth is a 844 figure carved of wood, representing a double acorn.

Besides the idols, there are some more or less strange-778 looking objects not made by the Gilyak themselves, which 782 have a mysterious significance for them. Such an object 777 stands on the so-called Tyr (1) about 80 versts from

1. From the Gilyak village Tyr.

Nikolayevsk-na-Amure. On a high, precipitous river bank a Bhuddist temple formerly stood; of this only a few stone pillars remain, bearing Chinese and Mongolian inscriptions.

533

/65 cont./

796 On this day, however, no one is allowed to taste the prepared 504 bear meat. This takes place on the next day, which is called the day of treating the narkh'i (narkh-arin-ku). The narkh'i seat themselves ceremoniously along the plank beds, while the host solemnly walks among the rows and distributes pieces of [576] bear meat. More gracious hosts feed their guests with their own hands, sticking into their mouths /66/ a huge piece of fat; the guest bites off a piece, leaving it to his neighbor to finish
[782] what he has started. Only the narkh'i are allowed to eat bear [614] meat; and his clan are denied this right; they are allowed to eat only a soup of rice or buda with the fat from the bears' carcasses. This soup is prepared and consumed in enormous quantities.

796 It is considered the greatest honor for the host to feed his 264 guests to satiety. His graciousness goes so far that when a 576 guest who has eaten too much of the fatty soup begins to vomit it, the host respectfully offers his mouth and drinks the vomit. It would be hard to imagine more refined graciousness. In intervals between feasting, dog races, games, fencing with sticks, and circle dancing are arranged.

796 All day the girls take turns playing music on the suspended 532 log and accompany their primitive music with humorous and at 273 times very frivolous songs. Not the least role in the feast is played by Russian vodka or Chinese grain vodka, which lifts [554] the gaiety of the feasters to its apogee. To make one's guests drunk is considered the greatest honor. "At my house yesterday the narkh'i got drunk two times," the master of a bear once boasted to me.

796 Finally the last day of the festival comes, the day of departure of the narkh'i. Carcasses of bear meat and all kinds of viands prepared for their families and clansmen are placed [782] on their sleds. At the last moment the narkh'i lead several dogs into the yurt and tie them around the plank bed of honor to the bear's skull. In addition, as a present, they put a spear, a thong, and other such items next to the head of the animal or stuck into it. Again, in farewell, the nark'i are lavishly

/680 cont./Sometimes, when it lasted too long for me, I myself, or more often my men, put a stop to it. The Gilyak, however, are perfectly accustomed to this disturbance of the night's rest, and I never heard them raise an objection to it. It is the same among the other natives of the lower Amur region, Olcha, Samagir, Goldi (1), only among them the call of ga urging

1. On the other hand, the Siberian Tungus who accompanied Erman on his voyage from Yakutsk to Okhotsk liked to sing in the daytime, but when he once asked them to repeat their songs in the evening by the fire, they explained unanimously and with a sort of religious awe that it was sinful to sing at night (Erman, Reise um die Erde, Histor. Bericht /Journey around the World, Historical Report/, Vol. II, p. 354). Perhaps the Russians taught them this so as not to be disturbed during their night's rest.

the continuation of the song is replaced by a nasal kā, kā (2).

2. Brylkin ("Pis'ma s" Sakhal. /Letters from Sakhalin/," Zap., Sibirsk. Otd. Georg. Obshch., Bk. VII, Irkutsk, 1864, p. 29) relates that an Ainu in the village of Tschikapergunai, after drinking sake, had begun to sing a song, an improvisation about his voyage. As soon as he stopped, all the Ainu called out in unison the words kā, kā, i.e., more, more, in order to make him keep on singing, and so it went on endlessly. Hooper (Ten months among the Tents of the Tuski, London, 1853, p. 137) similarly reports that the Chukchee, as spectators at such performances as dancing, imitations of the Eskimo, etc., which take place among them, express their approval with the words kahi kahi, which means the same as da capo.

/680 cont./

513 On the whole, it is surprising how often and readily the Gilyak, 171 or Olcha, etc., interrupts his night's sleep even apart from the nocturnal singing, he abandons his bed as soon as sleep leaves his eyelids, gets up, squats in front of the hearth, stirs up the fire in it or on it, smokes one pipe after another, etc. But I never [123] saw him, day or night, pace back and forth in the yurt, and whenever I did it, which was not infrequent on stormy days which permitted no activity in the open, this walking back and forth, inexplicable to them, evoked general amazement and smiles among those present, indeed, sometimes a direct question as to the purpose of it.

533 Since I rarely heard the Gilyak sing in the daytime, for the reasons given above, a statement by Middendorff about this, which I found among his handwritten notes left for me to use, is all the more interesting to me. My predecessor in the northern Amur region (3) became acquainted with the Gilyak at the Tugur and Ulbanj Bays, that is to say, at their extreme northwestern boundary, to which he had come in the company of some Yakut and Tungus. Through the latter his attention was called to the fact that there were some accomplished singers among the inhabitants of the place, and he requested them to exhibit their art. At first they refused; then one sang for a while, but soon, perhaps becoming embarrassed, he broke into laughter, whereupon all the others followed him. Now each one had to step forward in turn. In general they sang with far more melody than the Yakut, but gutteral and /681/ nasal trills also always played an important

3. It is well known that Middendorff crossed the northern river system of the Amur from the mouth of the Tugur and via the Amgunj /Amgun/, the Bureja /Bureya/, and Dseja /Zeya/ to Ustj-Strelka, at the confluence of the Schilka /Shilka/ and Argunj /Argun/ to the Amur (see Beitr. zur Kenntn. des Russ. Reiches, Vol. IX, Part 2, pp. 615-625).

/681 cont./

533 part. In pithy and drastic language, after a statement about the music concerned, Middendorff characterizes the style of singing of the individual singers. "First, the Gilyak Lamran stepped forward. He had a pleasant voice and truly a great deal of skill. During the singing one could hear only a few words besides anga -- ynga, and it seems as though these words, used as an introduction and refrain with each song, had no meaning, but simply belonged to the singing. Here are the notes:

The preliminary note was held as long as the breath allowed and formed (without words) the introduction. The trill is a gutteral trill and is likewise held a long time. Since Lamran held a very pure note and also had an acceptable vibrant gutteral trill, this slow style was very pleasant, but not a little melancholy.

The second singer was the Gilyak Dsheien, and his melody the following:

Dsheien's style of singing was much faster than that of Lamran, but the over-all impression was somewhat sad. Although the holding [194] of the gutteral trills was also the most important thing for him, a special virtuosity was added: in holding the note, he suddenly acted as if he were losing his breath and as if someone were choking him, so that one became quite fearful and afraid that he would suffocate, but then the word begun came out quite clearly. Moreover, in between there was a sort of belching and sobbing, during which only the beginning of the word was pronounced, as by a stutterer, for example, ań --- ańga then the loss of breath and the sobbing and belching fol-owed, and then the ańga came out clearly. This did not merely introduce the whole and the various stanzas, but was even frequently inserted between individual words.

Finally the Gilyak Njaungur stepped forward as third. He sang as follows; /see No. 3 above/

/681 cont.

533 Njaungur showed special virtuosity in singing; even the melody was much more varied than the previous ones; in addition, however, he, too, produced the stuttering, the loss of voice, strangulation and the stopping of the gutteral sounds, besides the subsequent belching out /682/ of the words like greater skill, and, moreover, besides the sobbing gutteral trill, he also made a falsetto nasal trill. In his case the trills, and especially the latter, reminded one vividly of the vibrating sound of the jew's-harp. These trills require a great deal of practice, and it is impossible for us to hold them so long and to produce them so clearly. It is also interesting physiologically that in producing these trills the soft palate plays an important role."

Middendorff continues: "From all these songs the differences caused by the individuality of the singers became clear: whereas Lamran, with a good voice and a clear trill, had in his way a melancholy, pleasant, and grave style of singing, the other two singers were like our artistic virtuosos who play violin variations on the cello. Along with the singing it must also be kept in [194] mind that the Gilyak language, and thus also the ańga, sounds as though the nose had a chicken wishbone clamped on it; in addition there is the childish pronunciation of the r, which sounds as though it were midway between the r, g, and l and which is connected with d, g, and b, and, furthermore, the French ñ, the English th and w, the g combined with d, etc."

Middendorff also noted down the words of the last two songs, 114 but unfortunately I must disregard them here since they cannot be 533 even approximately deciphered. And this should not surprise one, for, in view of the traveler's very short sojourn among the Gilyak, the many and very peculiar sounds of their language must have sounded most strange and bewildering to his ear, which was as yet wholly unaccustomed to them. And there is also the circumstance, making comprehension more difficult to so great a degree, that the singer has the greatest freedom to change and to modulate the words as he pleases to make them fit his rhythm and melody -- a freedom which he does not give up as a rule even in repeating the words, because they were once impressed upon his memory this way during the singing. Hence it is more than doubtful that an interpreter, of

/682 cont./

533 whom at that time there were only some of the poorest kind among
114 the Russians, could have understood the content of a Gilyak song; instead, he rendered it, as did not escape Middendorff, only praeter propter. The aforementioned license of the singers is also [126] the reason why I understand so little of the Gilyak songs dictated to me by Jutschin, Tenghan, and others toward the end of my stay of two years among the Gilyak that I can only recognize isolated words in them, such as the place names and personal names occurring in them. The same thing happened to Dr. Grube, though, besides my Gilyak vocabulary, the lexical material collected by Glehn was available to him. Only the song given to me by Jutschin under the title of Waighytsch (1) has greater interest for me, and this only on account of the explanations which he gave me in connection with the /683/ place Mlygh-wo mentioned or sung about in it, a place to which, according to Gilyak belief, the souls of those who die a natural death are supposed to go. More about this later.

1. No. III in Dr Grube's Gilyak word list; see the appendix to Vol. III of this work, p. 41 /this appendix is not included in the book translated here/.

534 The musical performances of the Gilyak are even poorer, but are not by far as peculiar as the singing. Aside from the drum of the shamans, which serves other purposes, the Gilyak have only two [439] musical instruments -- both of a very primitive kind. One of them is a jew's-harp (Gilyak kanga or wutschranga; Olcha mugheny), an instrument which they allegedly get from the "Manchu" and, accordingly, prize very highly, but which is so simple in construction that they could very well make it themselves. It is distributed among them in three forms: made out of brass, made out of wood, and made out of iron. (See the woodcuts a, b, and c below.) The first (a) consists of a narrow brass plate several inches long, into which a tongue-shaped lamina is cut lengthwise, remaining attached to the frame at one end. Both ends of the frame are pierced and equipped with a thread in order to hold the instrument in front of the mouth, and, by expelling air, the tongue-shaped lamina is

/683 cont./

534 made to vibrate. The second form (b), made out of a thin wooden board, is manipulated in the same way, but it is wider, and the initially likewise wide tongue-lamina suddenly tapers at half its length and is equipped there with a small hole and a peg which precisely fits into it in order to help the vibration and to permit modulating it as desired. Finally, the third form (c) consists of a narrow and rather massive bent piece of iron, between the shanks of which there is a thin lamina of the same metal, bent upward at the free end. In order to play on this jew's-harp it is ordinarily pressed to the lips with the iron blade of an ax, which makes the tone come out more clearly and at the same time serves for resonance.

517 During his leisure hours the Gilyak, stretched out on the 533 sleeping bench, greatly likes to take up his jew's-harp and draw 534 forth from it the trills, which in his singing, too, are so agreeable

534

Gilyak jew's-harps.

517 to his ear, and other melodies, which are always rather melancholy.
533 And the skill which he shows at it is truly quite extraordinary.
534

/684/ The other musical instrument, which is also familiar 534 to the Gilyak but is not nearly as widespread among them, is a stringed instrument, a monochord or very primitive violin (Gilyak [824] tyngrsch, Olcha tankara). It consists of a small birch-bark cylinder-[825] casing (Gilyak tyngr-tschobrai), which is closed on top by means of a tautly stretched fish-skin (Gilyak tschobrai-tywrch). A small stick is stuck through it crosswise, one end of which projects out of the cylinder-casing only a little, but the other end quite far.

2: Schrenck--1251 E-5 (1854-1856) 1881-1895 RX2 Gilyak RX2

Implements used at the bear festival of the Gilyak: 1--bowl for collecting bear fat (reduced in size); 2--long spoon for feeding the bears; 3--knife for cutting bear fat and meat; 4, 5--ax for splitting the bear's skull; 6--spoon.

2: Schrenck--1252 E-5 (1854-1856) 1881-1895 RX2 Gilyak RX2

Spoons used at the bear festival of the Gilyak.

2: Schrenck--1253 E-5 (1854-1856) 1881-1895 RX2 Gilyak RX2 Goldi RX3

Idols in simple human form. 1,2--Gilyak house idols. 3. Dwelling of the idols. Fig. 2 (reduced). 4. One-armed Gilyak idol. 5. Gilyak neck-idol. 6-8. House idols of the Goldi (reduced).

2: Schrenck--1254 E-5 (1854-1856) 1881-1895 RX2 Gilyak RX2 Goldi RX3

1. Neck-idols of the Goldi. 2. Same of the Samagir. 3-7. Gilyak idols for certain conditions or illnesses.

1: Shternberg--246 E-5 (1890-1897, 1910)1933 RX2 Gilyak RX2

/164 cont./

582 614 marriage is that with the daughter of the mother's brother. "Pfandfukh an'g:ej gen urdra" -- "from the clan of your 'pandf' (see above), from the clan from which you originated (were born), i.e., from the clan from which your mother came, you [533] should take a wife," runs the Gilyak maxim. "I miss the house of my mother's brother" -- such is the motif of the contemporary Gilyak song. And statistics prove the degree to which these principles play a role in reality. From the very first days of my statistical census, when I was not yet conversant with all the subtleties of the kinship nomenclature, I was astounded that in each clan there were so many kinsmen's wives who were taken from one and the same clan, who called each other, according to the generation of the husband, sisters and aunts, and who actually seemed to be such. It was necessary to record many Gilyak who were married several times, and most often their wives turned out to be from one and the same clan, specifically, from the clan of the husband's mother. One of my companions on my journeys, Isayka, had been married three times, and always to wives from the very same clan. And in the majority of cases, it turned out that the husbands and wives were not only cognate cousins, but were corresponding children of own sisters and brothers.

582 171 The preference shown for this form of marriage even today is always the result of the religious imperative; we have seen above that only such a marriage is considered "pure." As to the role of this form of marriage among the Gilyak, one may express it in the same words that have been used to describe the same phenomenon among the Song and Bygar tribes of the province of Satpûras in central India. In these tribes, "marriage between cousins is almost /165/ compulsory when a brother has a daughter and his sister a son" (1).

1. Fison and Howitt, Kamilaroi and Kurnai, p. 154.

1: Shternberg--274 E-5 (1890-1897, 1910)1933 RX2 Gilyak RX2

/184 cont./

*835 183 587 768 [614] levirate. Then, in order that the woman remain in the clan of her deceased husband, she is given, according to the decision of the clan council, to any clansman of an ascending or descending degree of kinship with her late husband.

684 *835 Ordinarily the very idea of sexual connection with persons of the forbidden categories evokes an instinctive disgust. [796] In the rare instances where feelings of love arise between such persons, the Gilyak regard it as the inspiration of an evil spirit, as a phenomenon unnatural not only in men, but in [825] beasts. We have seen that in such instances they even slay a fornicating dog. The attitude toward people is entirely the [762] same. Ordinarily lovers in the forbidden categories slay themselves by mutual agreement or under the direct urging ● [533] of their relatives. In one last song of such an unhappy pair, the woman sings of how /185/ her elder sister called her a "bitch" for her love for her uncle, and called the latter a "devil," and how all -- her mother, father, and sisters -- urged upon her: "slay thyself, slay!" Incidentally, the object of her criminal passion, her uncle, could be of her age, could grow up far apart from her, and the love between the criminal pair might seem perfectly natural in our eyes.

*835 The feeling of sexual repulsion toward persons of the forbidden categories has been transformed into an instinct, like the very similar feeling toward one's mother or own sisters in our society. The impression of an instinct is also produced on us by that amazing ability of the Gilyak to suppress in himself the feeling of jealousy, an ability which he manifests when the question of the group-husbands of his individual spouse arises. Without these instincts, or in any case the noteworthy virtues of self-control and self-restraint, the realization of the sexual norms would be impossible; unrestrained jealousy would result in the destruction of group

1: Shternberg--367 E-5 (1890-1897, 1910)1933 RX2 Gilyak RX2

/251 cont./

831 [192] words signifying "my man, my woman," -- n'az'mych, n'an'kh. The Gilyak themselves consider love a normal stage of life which everyone must experience in his youth. This view is very well conveyed in a song which I noted down on the Amur, in which a girl, complaining of her mother's nagging about her passion, sings:

[539] Mother, mother, dear mother,
Has thou forgotten thine own youth?

(Literally: "Thou hast forgotten thine own past time, let me be!")

831 882 593 Parents, however, never reproach their children for their amorous passions. When the youth do hear the grumbling of their elders, it is most often due to purely economic considerations, since during the period of passion the young people neglect their work and become careless and inaccurate. In general it is not even permissible to react in any way to the sexual passion of the children, maidens included. If the [684] father or brother finds out about the fornication of his daughter or sister, he not only may not use force against the seducer, but it is even forbidden to summon him to a duel, and he may not even be angry with the daughter. They treat the amorous passions of the children as a perfectly natural phenomenon. The mother in particular is often even the confidante of the amorous secrets of her children. In many ● [533] songs which I noted down on the Amur, sons constantly address their mother, sharing with her their amorous sufferings, seeking advice as to where and how to find their beloved. Serious remonstrances by the parents, active remonstrances [835] going to the point of pitilessness, are encountered only in [762] the case of love for a person of a forbidden category. In such cases, the parents themselves urge their daughter to 584 commit suicide. Often the pitilessness of the parents, mainly 593 of the father, becomes manifest when love frustrates an advantageous marriage, one which has been agreed on since

1: Shternberg--368 E-5 (1890-1897, 1910)1933 RX2 Gilyak RX2

/251 cont./

584 593 childhood, and they forcibly give the girl in marriage to an unloved man. But these are exceptional cases

831 In its content, love among the Gilyak does not differ in any way from love in civilized society. Coarse sexuality is completely lacking in it. In the love of this primitive people we find the whole scale of universal feeling, from the tenderest tones of poetic sentimentality and tranquil lover's sorrow to the stormiest outbursts of heroic passion, which neither halts before any obstacle /252/ nor shrinks before a manly resolution to part with one's life.

831 ● 533 These psychics of the Gilyak are very well reflected in love songs, especially in the songs of women.

Nature endowed the Gilyak woman with a depth and delicacy of feeling which she is able to express in touching images and forms. "Night and day do I think of thee... As on my own mother do I gaze...If thou leavest me, only of thee shall I think, where thou didst walk, there shall I walk. From the well whence we both did drink, thy dark shadow shall I drink. As of many trees the tallest one doth most greatly please, so of all men art thou most beautiful and best. O, take me with thee, I would be the wallet and flint that hang from thy belt. I shall be the bottom of thy boat, with thee would I be. My left tear flows and falls like rain, the calf of my right leg fails me, it has become immovable, wholly dry have I become, my legs do not move" -- with such expressions, taken at random from various Gilyak songs, a woman expresses her love. But it is noteworthy that the same sentimental notes sound in the songs of the men, and the references to left and right tears pattering like rain, to the knee, the same grief over separation, the same sweet dreams of reunion, are just as frequent. One finds such emotional expressions as "I have loved thee wholly, all of thee"... Only rarely does clumsy vulgar (from our point of view) crudity creep in, for example, "Of a fat thigh the joint (the calves) spins(twitches), that is how I like it." But never any cynicism.

1: Shternberg--369 E-5 (1890-1897, 1910)1933 RX2 Gilyak RX2

/252 cont./

831 ● 533 The importance of the role of love in the life of the Gilyak may be judged by the wealth of song material. Not every Gilyak can relate a story or poem, but everyone knows love songs. Songs play a quite exceptional role in Gilyak love. The song is the language of lovers. At their assignations lovers sing improvised songs to each other in place of conversation, and, if they find it impossible to meet, they send each other songs, composed ad hoc, through a third person. Special terms have even been made up for such songs.

831 584 593 762 An idea of the intensity of love among the Gilyak may be gained from the reaction of lovers in cases where their love encounters insuperable obstacles. In such cases the solution is suicide. Obstacles in the Gilyak environment are of a twofold nature. Most frequently the obstacle is presented by the parents, who, either from mercenary motives or from an unwillingness to violate /253/ the childhood agreement of betrothal, force a marriage, or when a woman is violently carried away. In such cases suicides 831 58 frequently take place quite a long time after the involuntary 593 marriage. In such cases the woman first of all seeks to save 762 herself from the unloved man by flight and, in the event of failure, ends with suicide. I remember one such characteristic instance. A girl from the village of Nyanivo was given in marriage against her will. Soon she ran away from her husband to her father, who handed her over to her lover, tempted by the idea of getting a second bride price from him. Her first husband would not reconcile himself to this and utilized a favorable moment to take her back by force. Within half a year the unfortunate woman hanged herself. [847] There have been instances where a woman, fleeing from her unloved husband, has slain the children that she had 831 by him. Men prefer to defend their rights to love by action. 58 Ordinarily they seek to carry the woman away by force with 159 the aid of clansmen, but they will not stop at slaying the [682] husband of their beloved. I noted one very outstanding

2: Schrenck--1165 E-5 (1854-1856) 1881-1895 RX2 Gilyak RX2

76 /721 cont./
94 on it raw and cooked bear-meat and several strips of bear fat, as 94 well as a small heap of fine wood-shavings (zach). This was the 42 first bear meat that was eaten. The portions were very ample, and 42 gradually everybody present in the house or newly arrived partici-53 pated in the meal; indeed, even the women and children re-55 ceived their share of it, in that a few young people walked among 5 the diners with bowls of a special shape (Pl. L /p. 1250 /, Fig. 5, and Pl. LI /p. 1251 /, Fig. 1-- called ans-tymyk (2) in Gilyak)

04) 2. The s in this word is to be pronounced soft, like the French z. The bowl is called ans-tymyk because of its similarity to a hand (tymyk).

and collected contributions to be divided among the women and children. The quantity of bear meat and fat consumed that day was therefore very great. What was left over of the portions /722/ that the guests had, they wrapped up in the fine wood-shavings and fir branches and took home -- a package that the Gilyak are said to call môps (1).

14) 1. A designation which I myself did not hear.

The gnawed bones, on the other hand, were put back into the kettle from which the cooked meat had been distributed. As the meal came to a close, an old man with a fir branch in his hand stationed himself at the door of the house and, gently striking each one, drove out everyone passing through it who had eaten bear meat and fat -- an act which was supposed to be a sort of 97 punishment for the misdeed committed against the bear. Once 33 outside, however, those who came out were less gently treated, for here they were greeted with a cross fire of snowballs with which the boys pelted them, while the women drummed vigor-
4) ously on the suspended beams. An identical meal with a similar aftermath also took place in the house where the owner of the third bear lived. Here, too, just as before, quantities of small individual heaps of food -- sturgeon, mossj, etc. -- were put out

2: Schrenck--1212 E-5 (1854-1856) 1881-1895 RX2 Gilyak RX2

756 /754 cont./ such is enjoyed, for example, by the Gilyak 55 Räppun in Tebach, about whom the following miracle is reported.
55 His hands are tied to his back by straps, and his throat is likewise 789 strangled by a strap. Then he sits down on the floor of the yurt, in which the light and the hearth fire are extinguished. As soon ● [533] as it is dark, he begins singing, which, in shaman fashion, is performed with long prolongations, monotonously frequent repetition and transposition of the same words, and with a trembling, wailing voice. After this the shaman falls down as if dead. /755/ Now all those present in the yurt, men, women, and children, begin a song that serves to conjure up a kägn.

During this conjuration a kägn appears, invisible to everybody [787] except the shaman, loosens the straps on his neck and hands, and gives him new life. As soon as the singing has died away, the shaman stands there, restored to life.

The shaman Chorvin from Tschcharbach is less powerful, but he is only a boy, a matscherlagu-tscham. Nevertheless, he, too, does miraculous things. Thus the Gilyak say that he sits down in the yurt with his hands tied to his back, the fires are [787] extinguished, and all the onlookers begin a shamanistic song, in which the kägn is called upon to come and to dance, and in fact, while the singing is still going on, a small kägn hardly larger than a nail comes and dances on his arms. As soon as the singing ceases, the boy shaman stands there unfettered.

Each shaman has his own songs; I could not find out what they 756 mean and whether they are also sung on definite occasions. It 533 seems certain that every shamanistic song serves for conjuring up a 787 kägn who is supposed to appear and to lend assistance, be it for curing a sickness or for divulging the future, etc. It also seems that, according to the conception of the Gilyak, the kägn always produces his effect while dancing, a conception that may be connected with the practice of dancing on the part of the shaman himself. In the aforementioned shamanistic songs the kägn is expressly invited to dance (lärta). But the appearance and the dancing of the kägn are never visible to anyone in the yurt other than only the shaman, and this is precisely the mark and proof of his higher power and supernatural strength. (Bm. II, pp. 47, 48.)

2: Schrenck--1213 E-5 (1854-1856) 1881-1895 RX2 Gilyak RX2

/755 cont./

756 31. Gilyak. The Gilyak Jutschin from Patchä gave me a [124] minute description of the procedure during the conjuration of a spirit which is done through the power of a shaman. His report corresponded to the shamanistic performances described above to a large extent. I shall let it follow here.

It is night and dark in the yurt. On the floor, in the center 756 of the yurt, where the dogs' table has been removed, a shaman 787 is lying with his arms tied to his back, a noose of straps around 789 his neck, both ends of which are held by two Gilyak sitting far apart and at some distance from the shaman. There is not a sound in the yurt until the shaman shouts the word tfwyssj, whereupon a noise which sounds like dancing pieces of wood is made in the yurt -- it emanates from one or several kägn who have appeared in the yurt. The Gilyak sitting around immediately address the kägn, asking him various questions as to why he has appeared: whether he needs berries, or elk fat or a root, and the like, or whether he has simply come, etc. The kägn answers each question affirmatively, negatively, or evasively, expressing himself by different kinds of noise. If the question is followed by a simple hammering, the answer is affirmative; if a mere scraping follows, it is negative; finally if a single hammering and then a scraping follow, it means "I do not know."

/756/ Now the kägn, during constant noise, approach the shaman lying bound and noisily dance on him. The shaman breathes his last, audible to everyone. If he is dead, all the ● [533] Gilyak sitting in the yurt begin the conjuration song of the kägn; but if he is alive, only one of the Gilyak sings, for the choosing of whom the kägn is questioned. This is done by asking him, "Should this one (the name in question) sing? Should that one (so-and-so) sing?" etc., until the answer is affirmative. The [533] song which the Gilyak begin to sing after the death of the shaman runs: "Restore to life soon, come soon, why hesitate? Come soon, dance soon!"

This song moves the kägn to dance noisily again down from the shaman. Once more one hears him heave a deep sigh -- this time breathing in life anew -- and now he stands there freed

2: Schrenck--1222 E-5 (1854-1856) 1881-1895 RX2 Gilyak RX2

/761 cont./

000 II. Conceptions of the Amur Peoples concerning Life after Death and the Corresponding Treatment of the Dead

Fate of the Souls after Death

775 42. Gilyak. The (Amur) Gilyak (according to Surgin's account) believe that the soul of anyone murdered, not excepting suicides, flies to heaven, while persons who die a natural death journey on the earth or under the earth. This flying up to heaven [532] is most likely represented by the flying figure of the wagn, which [998] resembles a flying human being with the characteristic bird's or fish's head. (Bm. I, p. 53.)

775 43. Gilyak. The (Amur) Gilyak Jutschin dictated to me an 533 interesting song, for which, through further questions, I obtained ● 533 a most instructive commentary in part. The song had been sung [124] by the Gilyak Orkin from Magho to his wife, Rschyvguk, from Wair, whom he had abducted (*). Orkin was still alive at my time,

* See the Gilyak text in the appendix to Vol. III of this work, "Linguistic Findings, Compiled by Dr. W. Grube," p. 41 /the book translated here does not contain this appendix/.

but his wife had died.

The chief content of the song seems to refer to a "village Mlygh-wo," and I therefore inquired as to what kind of a village it was and where it was located. I learned that it was the place [766] in the interior of the earth to which the souls of all those who die of sickness migrate, while those of murdered persons () fly to heaven.

 According to another report, also the souls of suicides (see Appendix 42 Above.)

6: Kreinovich--3 E-5 (1931) 1935 Gilyak

225 The sketches do not include all the details of the beluga hunt. Mytka's account, dictated to me on June 29, 1931, in the village Puir, supplements the sketches. We give here a faithful translation of his account.

"During the ebb tide the belugas head inshore. After the tide receded, he gathered his friends (and said): 'Let us go after it (in the sea).' We went in pursuit. When the beluga headed out to the fairway we chased it back to a shallow. When it could not go any further the man at the prow who held a harpoon got ready and waited for it (the beluga) to appear (to come up). When it broke the surface, he lanced it. Then he threw the float. We let the beluga drag the float. When it got tired we approached it and lanced it a second time. Then we came close to it and hauled it to the side of the boat. We hooked the beluga and hauled it (out of the water). Then he hit it with a lance (that is, pierced it) (2)

2. The Gilyaks kill the beluga by lancing it in the area of the respiratory orifice.

When we killed it we tied a rope to it and hauled it ashore. 225 While we were hauling it, the old woman came down to the ● 533 shore and began striking the board with a stick. (3) When we 824 182

3. Only in Puir do they welcome the caught beluga by such music. I have not observed this custom in any other village.

brought it (to the shore), we came up to the shore prow first. (4) Having untied the beluga, we hauled it to the shore

4. Usually the Gilyaks come up to the shore stern first, but when they bring a beluga, they come prow first.

[112] and pulled it out. We put the board on which the woman was beating under the head of the dolphin. The old men sent the youths to gather dozgon grass and piskar plant. (1) Then we

1. The Amur Gilyaks "feed" the plant piskar to all captured sea-animals such as sea-lions, seals, and belugas. They put this plant in the mouth of the killed animal (cf. our article "Morskoĭ Promysel

2: Schrenck--1250 E-5 (1854-1856) 1881-1895 RX2 Gilyak RX2

796 415 412
532

Implements used at the bear festival of the Gilyak: 1-5, bowls for eating bear fat; 6, wooden hooks for lifting the kettle from the fire.

764
532

764

1. G

lyak tomb. 2-5. Objects of symbolic significance found in the tomb.

1-4. Gilyak idols for various illnesses. 5. Gilyak amulet.

778
532
825

Gilyak idols made out of combined human and animal forms. 1. Human being and tiger. 2. Human being, tiger, and bear. 3. Human being and bear. 4. Human being and owl. 5. Human being and white whale.

778
532
825

Gilyak idols made out of human and animal forms combined: 1--human being and tiger; 2--human being with tiger head; 3, 4--human being with bear head; 5--human being with owl head; 6--human back-joint with bear head and paw; 7, 8--Gilyak amulets with human and bear heads; 9--similarly, a bow with human head.

778
532 825

[796]

Gilyak idols in animal form: 1--bear, a toad in front on the belt; 2--in the back, a lizard and two snakes; 3--bear, jointed, dressed in fish skin; 4-6--tiger.

16
2 32

Spoons used at the bear festival of the Gilyak.

G 778 532

Gi 778 532

Idols in simple human form. 1, 2--Gilyak hou of the idols. Fig. 2 (reduced). 4. One-arme Gilyak neck-idol. 6-8. House idols of the Gi se idols. 3. Dwelling d Gilyak idol. 5.

ldi (reduced).

778 532 755
G [844] [782]

Gi 778 532

1. Neck-idols of the Goldi. 2. Same of the Samagir. 3-7. Gilyak idols for certain conditions or illnesses.

823 and if he gets caught, he is killed. But even after that he is 789 handled with respect, that is, his corpse is laid before the 278 house of the idols and left there until it begins to decay.
Besides the skin, the bones and the gall are immediately acid, for the former are held by the Gilyaks to make a man brave, and the latter is used for all kinds of medicaments.
775 Of the numerous spirits whom the Gilyak are supposed to 785 know about, some are good and protect man, but the majority are more or less evil, and must therefore be propitiated with gifts. The chief of the evil ones is called Kiza (on the island of Sachalin: Kinsh) and to a certain extent corres-779 ponds to the devil. Abrimm, etc. of other peoples. "Spirit" 782 and "idol" are both called kegn, for the idols are not only kegn-mimi, but at times also the dwellings of the spirits or kegn-beddi. Usually they are kept in the storage pits and only brought out on special occasions. If an idol is "heavy" it means that its inhabitant, the kobeldi, is at home, but when it gets "lighter" than usual, the spirit is roaming about somewhere. The offerings here also consist of millet, tobacco, etc.; very often the face of the idol is smeared with cranberry juice, which seems to have a powerful effect.
Wood chips are also hung around its neck. The idols have different appearances. A guardian spirit, for example, [24] lives in a wooden cone that is placed somewhere in the vicinity of the yurt when it is built. If the yurt must be taken down, the idol remains, and at the new dwelling a new one is made. Some idols are crude imitations of humans, others have the shape of a bear and are sewed into bear skin, still others have the shape of a bird, etc. Some human-like idols represent children, others old people. Some have hands and feet, others only a head which sits on a body showing a bowel. Small idols are sometimes worn as talismans.
These also usually have human forms, but some look very 789 different. Thus the talisman against a difficult birth is a 944 figure carved of wood, representing a double acorn.
Besides the idols, there are some more or less strange-778 looking objects not made by the Gilyak themselves, which 782 have a mysterious significance for them. Such an object 777 stands on the so-called Tyr (I) about 80 versts from

1. From the Gilyak village Tyr.

Nikolayevsk-na-Amure. On a high, precipitous river bank a Buddhist temple formerly stood, of this only a few stone pillars remain, bearing Chinese and Mongolian inscriptions.

/63 cont./

796 On this day, however, no one is allowed to taste the prepared 5714 bear meat. The feast takes place on the next day, which is called the day of treating the nash'i (nash'-arin-ash). The nash'i seat themselves ceremoniously along the plank beds, while the host solemnly walks among the rows and distributes pieces of 576 bear meat. More gracious host feed their guests with their own hands, sticking into their mouths /68/ a huge piece of fat;
the guest bites off a piece. Leaving it to his neighbor to finish [24] what he has started. Only the nash'i are allowed to eat bear [24] meat; and his clan are denied this; they are allowed to eat only a soup of rice or buda with the fat from the bears' carcasses. This soup is prepared and consumed in enormous quantities.

796 It is considered the greatest honor for the host to feed his 2471 guests to satiety. His graciousness goes so far that when a 5714 guest who has eaten too much of the fatty soup begins to vomit it, the host respectfully offers him water and drinks the vomit.
It would be hard to imagine more refined graciousness. In intervals between feasting, dog races, games, fencing with sticks, and circle dancing are arranged.

796 All day the girls take turns playing music on the suspended 5714 log and accompany their primitive music with humorous and at times very frivolous songs. Not the least role in the feast is played by those who have contributed most to which lifts 634 the gaiety of the feasters to its apogee. To make one's guests drunk is considered the greatest honor. "At my house yesterday the nash'i got drunk two times," the master of a bear once boasted to me.

796 Finally the last day of the festival comes, the day of departure of the nash'i. Carcasses of bear meat and all kinds of viands prepared for their families and classmen are placed [192] on their sleds. At the last moment the nash'i head several dogs into the yurt and tie them around the plank bed of honor to the bear's skull. In addition, as a present, they put a spear, a thong, and other small articles next to the head of the animal or stuck into it. Again, in farewell, the nash'i are lavishly

/64 cont./

582 164
114 marriage is that with the daughter of the mother's brother.
"Handfish angoj gen udra" -- "from the clan of your uncle" (see above), from the clan from which you originated (were born), i.e., from the clan from which your mother comes, you ● [533] should take a wife," runs the Gilyak maxim. "I miss the house of my mother's brother" -- such is the motif of the contemporary Gilyak song. And statistics prove the degree to which these principles play a role in reality. From the very first days of my statistical census, when I was not yet conversant with all the subtleties of the kinship nomenclature, I was astonished at the frequency of the marriages of Amurmen's wives who were taken from one and the same clan, who called each other, according to the generation of the husband, sisters and aunts, and who actually seemed to be such. It was necessary to record many Gilyak who were married to several times, and most often their wives turned out to be from one and the same clan, specifically, from the clan of the husband's mother. One of my expeditions on my journeys, Isayka, had been married three times, and always to wives from the very same clan. And in the majority of cases, it turned out that the husbands and wives were not only cognate cousins, but were corresponding children of own sisters and brothers.

582 The preference shown for this form of marriage even today 119 is always the exception, and it is important to observe; we have seen above that only such a marriage is considered "pure." As to the role of this form of marriage among the Gilyak, one may express it in the same words that have been used to describe the same phenomenon among the Sog and Ryga tribes of the province of Saptpas in central Asia. In these tribes, "marriage between cousins is almost /165/ compulsory when a brother has a daughter and his sister a son" (1).

1. Fison and Howitt, Kamilaroi and Kurnai, p. 154.

/164 cont./

831 levirate. Then, in order that the 192 woman remain in the clan of her 142 deceased husband, he is given, according to the decision of the clan council, to a relative of the ascending or descending degree of [24] kinship with her late husband.

634 Ordinarily the very idea of sexual connection with persons ● 835 of the forbidden categories evokes an instinctive disgust.
In the rare instances where feelings of love arise between such a man and his relatives, it is considered the inspiration of an evil spirit, as a phenomenon unnatural not only in men, but in [796] beasts. We have seen that in such instances they even slay a fornicating dog. The attitude toward people is entirely the [825] same. Ordinarily lovers in the forbidden categories slay [842] themselves by mutual agreement or under the direct urging [533] of their relatives. In one last song of such an unhappy pair, the woman sings of how /165/ her elder sister called her a [634] "bitch" for her love for her brother, and how the latter a "devil," and how all -- her mother, father, and sisters -- urged upon her: "slay thyself, slay!" Incidentally, the object of her criminal passion, the brother, could be of her age, could grow up far apart from her, and the love between the criminal pair might seem perfectly natural in our eyes.

● 835 The feeling of sexual repulsion toward persons of the for-bidden categories has a psychological character, like the very similar feeling toward one's mother or own sisters in our society. The impression of an instinct is also produced on us by the feeling which prompts the Gilyak to suppress in himself the feeling of jealousy, an ability which he manifests when the question of the group-husbands of his individual spouse arises. Without these instincts, or in any case the noteworthy virtues of self-control and self-restraint, the realization of the sexual norms would be impossible; unrestrained jealousy would result in the destruction of group

/251 cont./

831 words signifying "my man, my woman," -- n'ad'mych, 192 n'ad'ch. The Gilyak themselves consider love a normal stage 142 of life which everyone must experience in his youth. This view is very well conveyed in a song which I noted down on the Amur, in which a girl, complaining of her mother's nagging about her passion, sings:

Mother, mother, dear mother,
Has thou forgotten thine own youth?

(Literally: "Thou hast forgotten thine own past time, let me be!")

831 Parents, however, never reproach their children for their 192 amorous passions. When the youth do hear the grumbling of 575 their elders, it is most often due to purely economic considerations, since during the period of passion the young people neglect their work and become careless and inaccurate. In general it is not even permissible to react in any way to the sexual passion of the children, maidens included. If the [634] father or brother finds out about the fornication of his daughter or sister, he not only may not use force against the seducer, but it is even forbidden to summon him to a duel, and he may not even be angry with the daughter. They treat the amorous passions of the children as a perfectly natural phenomenon. The mother in particular is often even the confidante of the amorous secrets of her children. In many ● [533] songs which I noted down on the Amur, sons constantly address their mothers with requests to protect their sufferings, seeking advice as to where and how to find their beloved.
Serious remonstrances by the parents, active remonstrances [192] going to the point of pitilessness, are encountered only in the case of love for a person of a forbidden category. In such cases, the parents themselves urge their daughter to 582 commit suicide. Often the pitilessness of the parents, mainly 575 of the father, becomes manifest when love frustrates an advantageous marriage, one which has been agreed on since

/250 cont./

831 childhood, and they forcibly give the girl in marriage to an 192 unloved man. But these are exceptional cases 575

In its content, love among the Gilyak does not differ in 831 any way from its civilized counterpart. Coarse sensality is 192 completely lacking in it. In the love of this primitive people we find the whole scale of universal feeling, from the tenderest tones of poetic sentimentality and tranquil lover's sorrow to the torrinent outbursts of heroic passion, which neither halts before any obstacle /252/ nor shrinks before a manly resolution to part with one's life.

The psychics of the Gilyak are very well reflected in ● 831 love songs, especially in the songs of women.
192

Nature endowed the Gilyak woman with a depth and delicacy of feeling which she is able to express in touching images and forms. "I think and day do I think of thee...
As on my own mother do I gaze...If thou leavest me, only of thee shall I think, where thou didst walk, there shall I walk. Food shall I eat, water shall I drink, thy dark shadow shall I drink. As of many trees the tallest one doth 831 most greatly please, so of all men art thou most beautiful 192 and best. O, take me with thee, I would be the wallet and 573 that that hangs from thy belt. I shall be the bottom of thy boat, with thee would I be. My left tear flows and falls like rain, the calf of my right leg falls me, it has become immovable, wholly shall I become, my legs do not move" with such expressions, taken at random from various Gilyak songs, a woman expresses her love. But it is noteworthy that the same sentimental notes sound in the songs of the men, and the references to left and right tears patterning like rain, to the knee, the same grief over separation, the same sweet dreams of reunion, are just as frequent. One finds such emotional expressions as "I have loved thee wholly, all of thee". Only rarely does crudity creep in (from our point of view) crudity creep in, for example, "Of a fat thigh the joint (the calves) spins(twitches), that is how I like it." But never any cynicism.

831 The importance of the role of love in the life of the 192 Gilyak can be judged by the wealth of song material. Not ● 575 every Gilyak can relate a story or poem, but everyone knows love songs. Songs play a quite exceptional role in Gilyak love. The song is the language of lovers. A thirsty 831 sanguinous lovers sing improvised songs to each other in 192 place of conversation, and, if they find it impossible to meet, they send each other songs, composed ad hoc, through a third person. Special terms have even been made up for such songs.

An idea of the intensity of love among the Gilyak may 831 be gained from the reaction of lovers in cases where their 192 love encounters insuperable obstacles. In such cases the 831 solution is suicide. Obstacles in the Gilyak environment 192 are of a twofold nature. Most frequently the obstacle is 575 presented by the parents, who, either from mercenary motives or from an unwillingness to violate /253/ the childhood agreement of betrothal, force a marriage, or when a woman is violently carried away. In such cases suicides 831 take place quite a long time after the mercenary 192 marriage. In such cases the woman first of all seeks to save 573 herself from the unloved man by flight and, in the event of failure, ends with suicide. I remember one such characteristic instance. A girl from the village of Nyanivo was given in marriage against her will. Soon she ran away from her husband to her father, who handed her over to her lover, compelled her to become his wife, and forbade her to leave him. Her first husband would not reconcile himself to this and utilized a favorable moment to take her back by force. Within half a year the unfortunate women hanged herself.
831 There have been instances where a woman, fleeing from 192 her unloved husband, has slain the children that she had ● 575 by him. Men prefer to defend their rights to love by action.
831 Ordinarily they seek to carry the woman away by force with 192 the aid of relatives, but they will not stop at slaying the 575 husband of their beloved. I noted one very outstanding instance of such erroneous beauties in the village of Hyaiwe. The most respected and wealthiest man of the local clan at this time was a Gilyak by the name of Nyugun. At one time he received was foolish gives in verse, but there was also the file saw his competitor, after which he was arrested and taken to Nikolaevsk. In the meantime the brother of the widow again gave her in marriage against her will to another man. Breaking out of prison, Nyugun immediately set off for the settlement of his beloved. Going up to her yurt, he stripped everything off himself, except the short pants of coarse cloth, and naked, despite the cold of winter, he danced in this state into the yurt, which was overflowing with people, and by his appearance struck such fear into those present that he was able without hindrance to take his wife by the hand and take her to his home, after which he lived with her constantly for many years (the last time he had time to see him about him for-far-off years and fear for such out of sable traits.

/234 cont./

The most tragic obstacle in love is the position of lovers in the forbidden degrees of kinship. Here the tragedy is inevitable. The parents themselves insist on suicide. Ordinarily in such cases the lovers go to the place of their death and relives side by side on two trees. Before taking their lives, they sing songs to each other, singing of their journey to the world beyond the grave and of their happiness in their love. Some of these songs have come down to us in the following way. It has happened that the parents, narrow, the man, beside loose and after this loses the desire to repeat the attempt. It is he who preserves for posterity. /235/ his long song. One of these tragic cases of illicit love has become a popular legend. The time was a hundred years ago. The certain nation became attracted to the wife of the brother of her father. Shortly after this, her sweetheart set out on a long trading trip to Manchuria. At the same time, the [illegible] (now idea of monarchy) in the Gilyaks was expressed by the term [illegible], literally -- "of a good face." [illegible] the good that he had brought back, released his bear, which [illegible] fetching out for a feast, [illegible] and [illegible] himself. The song which the unhappy girl sang at the moment of parting has been preserved. We present it in its entirety in the text in lyrics. Here we quote only the first lines: "Take me with thee, the board of the bottom of thy bark will I become... Now one must think only about Myen (1).

1. The world beyond the grave.

That you may remember me, keep the earrings hung up on the wall of my yurt.

The Gilyak empty magic means against unequited love. One of these means is the dried-up brain of the cuckoo, which is mixed with white beeco and offer to the girl in food. But they surreptitiously see the feather of a cuckoo to her dress. But there are other means that are not so harmless and lead to tragic consequences.

As they relate, one who has tasted these potions, these drugs, falls into a deep melancholy, and in a few days dies. I know two persons, somewhat Russified, who used to such drugs for a high price, and several women died of them.

Among the Gilyaks, as in our country, there are timid individuals who are being tormented by the unfortunate feeling of love in person. In such cases the intermediaries are old women, who, for, this, must be given "tea" or a present. Sometimes they send some present through these intermediaries, ordinarily cloth, in which they tie several knots, corresponding to the number of days until the admirer will pay his visit.

There remains to be discussed only what the stimuli of love are. Generally speaking, the individual attracts the beauty of her father. Shortly after this, her sweetheart set out on a long trading trip to Manchuria. At the same time, the [illegible] (now idea of monarchy) in the Gilyaks was expressed by the term [illegible], literally -- "of a good face." [illegible] the good that he had brought back, released his bear, which [illegible] fetching out for a feast, [illegible] and [illegible] himself. The song which the unhappy girl sang at the moment of parting has been preserved. We present it in its entirety in the text in lyrics. Here we quote only the first lines: "Take me with thee, the board of the bottom of thy bark will I become... Now one must think only about Myen (1).

1. The world beyond the grave.

That you may remember me, keep the earrings hung up on the wall of my yurt.

The Gilyak empty magic means against unequited love. One of these means is the dried-up brain of the cuckoo, which is mixed with white beeco and offer to the girl in food. But they surreptitiously see the feather of a cuckoo to her dress. But there are other means that are not so harmless and lead to tragic consequences.

As they relate, one who has tasted these potions, these drugs, falls into a deep melancholy, and in a few days dies. I know two persons, somewhat Russified, who used to such drugs for a high price, and several women died of them.

Among the Gilyaks, as in our country, there are timid individuals who are being tormented by the unfortunate feeling of love in person. In such cases the intermediaries are old women, who, for this, must be given "tea" or a present. Sometimes they send some present through these intermediaries, ordinarily cloth, in which they tie several knots, corresponding to the number of days until the admirer will pay his visit.

There remains to be discussed only what the stimuli of love are. Generally speaking, the individual attracts the beauty of her father. Shortly after this, her sweetheart set out on a long trading trip to Manchuria. At the same time, the [illegible] (now idea of monarchy) in the Gilyaks was expressed by the term [illegible], literally -- "of a good face." [illegible] the good that he had brought back, released his bear, which [illegible] fetching out for a feast, [illegible] and [illegible] himself. The song which the unhappy girl sang at the moment of parting has been preserved. We present it in its entirety in the text in lyrics. Here we quote only the first lines: "Take me with thee, the board of the bottom of thy bark will I become... Now one must think only about Myen (1).

1. The world beyond the grave.

That you may remember me, keep the earrings hung up on the wall of my yurt.

The Gilyak empty magic means against unequited love. One of these means is the dried-up brain of the cuckoo, which is mixed with white beeco and offer to the girl in food. But they surreptitiously see the feather of a cuckoo to her dress. But there are other means that are not so harmless and lead to tragic consequences.

As they relate, one who has tasted these potions, these drugs, falls into a deep melancholy, and in a few days dies. I know two persons, somewhat Russified, who used to such drugs for a high price, and several women died of them.

Among the Gilyaks, as in our country, there are timid individuals who are being tormented by the unfortunate feeling of love in person. In such cases the intermediaries are old women, who, for this, must be given "tea" or a present. Sometimes they send some present through these intermediaries, ordinarily cloth, in which they tie several knots, corresponding to the number of days until the admirer will pay his visit.

There remains to be discussed only what the stimuli of love are. Generally speaking, the individual attracts the beauty of her father. Shortly after this, her sweetheart set out on a long trading trip to Manchuria. At the same time, the [illegible] (now idea of monarchy) in the Gilyaks was expressed by the term [illegible], literally -- "of a good face."

/235 cont./

childhood a little girl is taught to speak with a soft melodic quality of voice. Her mother sings a young girl there is even her lullaby.

A woman not infrequently succeeds through her talent for singing. In their songs the women are capable, not only of expressing their love with great delicacy, but also of ridiculing a unwanted lifiter most maliciously. In her sarcasm the woman does not stop at any hyperbole. In one song the nose of the undesired one is compared to open patches of water in a frozen surface, to an open door, and his clothing, his dogs, his harness, etc. are described in similar tones.

/236/ Samail Abnormalities and Perversions. I asked the Gilyak many times if such sexual perversion as pederasty had bestiality were known among them. He replied, "No, apparently, had ever heard of any cases of pederasty. As for bestiality, there is one instance, a dog, which, I have seen them with dogs, of one psychically sick Gilyak who had copulated with a dog. The attitude of the Gilyak to these perversions is made clear by the following legend, which I wrote down on the Amur. The tiger, the panther, and even the lion (?) were sitting on a big shoal when a Gilyak passed by. He saw that they were copulating through the rear orifice. Then he indignation he said: "Well, since you copulate like beasts, henceforth you be beasts forever." Then, in the view of the Gilyak, the above-mentioned perversions are acts which make a man like a beast.

The Gilyak have an extremely simple attitude toward hermaphrodites (called in the eastern dialect, [illegible] -- in the western dialect, [illegible], in whose peculiarities they apparently see a plain anomaly, but feel no abhorrence for them and are glad to have sexual intercourse with them. Marriages of hermaphrodites are a common event.

/236 cont./

Representatives of a intermediate nature. To compose, [illegible], a song in honor of a man, [illegible] is a great honor.

[illegible] may (the body is a [illegible]-[illegible] (menyuel) (1) a shamanic cradle and a [illegible] (2) a [illegible] (3) [illegible]-[illegible], who sits on the tongue of the speaker. When initiating about the possibility of improvisation, Koynyt (a shaman) said, "I can," and begin [illegible] (1) father and mother; 2) brother of the father; 3) elder brother of the groom; 4) husband of the sister of the father. The role of the latter individual is explained apparently by the norms of orthodox marriage. According to this law, the husband of the sister of the father is the father of the husband of the sister of the groom. Since by the norms of Gilyak marriage his daughter cannot marry the brother of her father-in-law, the husband of the sister of the father considers it his duty to promote the marriage of his daughter to the brother of his own father-in-law. If the father is dead, he is replaced by one of the [illegible] (honored persons) among his clansmen. Since the [illegible] of the relation of the father of the clan, have frequently participates, in addition to these persons, several honored clansmen. When the betrothal involves a very wealthy person, the honored clansmen come in several boats, bringing with them at once the articles of the trade price, and frequently, if the bridegroom is poor, the clansmen, because of the proper impression, they immediately take the maiden away with them upon the conclusion of the negotiations.

The bridegroom also attends the betrothal. If he is all alone, or if, on the contrary, he is quite wealthy and renowned, he can become betrothed by himself. In one song the maiden sings to her beloved: "Holding my hand, betroth me."

Matchmakers are unnecessary in the case of a married man who wants to marry a second wife. Then he himself usually goes to the clan of his first wife, but often the latter are glad to have sexual intercourse with them. Marriages of hermaphrodites are a common event.

/237 cont./

orthodox marriage. For an appointment concerning an orthodox marriage, the clan of the groom sends a young girl there or even the bride herself.

Gilyak-[illegible], who sits on the tongue of the speaker. When initiating about the possibility of improvisation, Koynyt (a shaman) said, "I can," and begin [illegible] (1) father and mother; 2) brother of the father; 3) elder brother of the groom; 4) husband of the sister of the father. The role of the latter individual is explained apparently by the norms of orthodox marriage. According to this law, the husband of the sister of the father is the father of the husband of the sister of the groom. Since by the norms of Gilyak marriage his daughter cannot marry the brother of his father-in-law, the husband of the sister of the father considers it his duty to promote the marriage of his daughter to the brother of his own father-in-law. If the father is dead, he is replaced by one of the [illegible] (honored persons) among his clansmen. Since the [illegible] of the relation of the father of the clan, have frequently participates, in addition to these persons, several honored clansmen. When the betrothal involves a very wealthy person, the honored clansmen come in several boats, bringing with them at once the articles of the trade price, and frequently, if the bridegroom is poor, the clansmen, because of the proper impression, they immediately take the maiden away with them upon the conclusion of the negotiations.

The bridegroom also attends the betrothal. If he is all alone, or if, on the contrary, he is quite wealthy and renowned, he can become betrothed by himself. In one song the maiden sings to her beloved: "Holding my hand, betroth me."

Matchmakers are unnecessary in the case of a married man who wants to marry a second wife. Then he himself usually goes to the clan of his first wife, but often the latter are glad to have sexual intercourse with them. Marriages of hermaphrodites are a common event.

/237 cont./

[illegible] (menyuel) (1) a shamanic cradle and a [illegible] (2) a [illegible] (3) [illegible]-[illegible], who sits on the tongue of the speaker. When initiating about the possibility of improvisation, Koynyt (a shaman) said, "I can," and begin [illegible] (1) father and mother; 2) brother of the father; 3) elder brother of the groom; 4) husband of the sister of the father. The role of the latter individual is explained apparently by the norms of orthodox marriage. According to this law, the husband of the sister of the father is the father of the husband of the sister of the groom. Since by the norms of Gilyak marriage his daughter cannot marry the brother of his father-in-law, the husband of the sister of the father considers it his duty to promote the marriage of his daughter to the brother of his own father-in-law. If the father is dead, he is replaced by one of the [illegible] (honored persons) among his clansmen. Since the [illegible] of the relation of the father of the clan, have frequently participates, in addition to these persons, several honored clansmen. When the betrothal involves a very wealthy person, the honored clansmen come in several boats, bringing with them at once the articles of the trade price, and frequently, if the bridegroom is poor, the clansmen, because of the proper impression, they immediately take the maiden away with them upon the conclusion of the negotiations.

The bridegroom also attends the betrothal. If he is all alone, or if, on the contrary, he is quite wealthy and renowned, he can become betrothed by himself. In one song the maiden sings to her beloved: "Holding my hand, betroth me."

Matchmakers are unnecessary in the case of a married man who wants to marry a second wife. Then he himself usually goes to the clan of his first wife, but often the latter are glad to have sexual intercourse with them. Marriages of hermaphrodites are a common event.

/1862 cont./

a wife when an old she-bear with its one or two-year-old cubs is found in the lair. In this case, the all too dangerous battle with the mother bear ends not with the killing of the animal, but rather it is enough to stab it at once, and only the cubs are fettered and led into captivity. The bears killed in the wilderness are also fettered and led into captivity. The bears killed in the wilderness are also fettered and led into captivity. The bears killed in the wilderness are also

9: Hawes--265 T-3 (1901) 1903 Gilyak
116, 533, 558, 562, 593

"All Gilyaks, it is said, know the old, old songs, the epics of their race, but with the lyrics it is otherwise, for they are very numerous, and always being added to. These are composed by the maidens of the tribe, who tell them to their girl friends, and they again to the Gilyak world. It may not be known who the authoress is, for that would be considered a want of modesty. Sometimes one may be heard to say, 'There goes an old woman who made songs in her youth;' but it is not 'good form.' Woman's mission is the ménage. The Gilyak's notions of modesty are very strict. After they have passed the age of childhood brothers and sisters are not allowed to speak to one another. If the former attempted it, the latter would turn away in injured modesty."

151 XIV Amusements and Festivities. Burial Ceremonies.
Among such peoples physical pleasures, naturally, take a most important place, and foremost among the e are the joys of eating and smoking. They are not very sensitive to odors, for fish, smoke, and seal blubber to them have an indifferent, or even an agreeable odor. But they abhor the odor of decay, and conversely, they like a nice fragrance.
Whenever I experimentally held a bottle of eau-de-cologne up to their noses, they always made a pretty face.
822 Among colors, the Gilyak prefer red and blue, but they definitely do not belong to those peoples who go in for bright colors. For instance, many of them could acquire a red shirt or caftan instead of the dirty-blue ones, but it would never occur to them to do this. The colored borders and curlicues on the caps and petticoats of the women suffice; otherwise clothes, houses, weapons, and tools are dark-colored. A black dog pelt as a coat is, as I have said, regarded as particularly beautiful.
534 The Gilyak love music. If neighboring Russian peasants strum their balalaikas or play the accordian, the natives who are present like to listen. Their own music is very primitive. It consists of a sort of jew's harp which looks somewhat like a longish horseshoe. The broad end of the instrument is grasped with one hand, the narrow end is placed on the lips, the tongue of the player is placed forward somewhat, while one finger of the other hand alternately pulls and releases the little hook connected with the tongue of the instrument. The tongue vibrates and a low buzzing tone results, which can be modified by the tongue of the player. Not everybody knows how to play on this "harmonica".
Other quite embryonic music, or rather, clinking noise, is produced as follows: a thin dry tree trunk is suspended parallel to the ground by ropes, and on this they beat rhythmically with a stick. During the bear festival the audience is edified with this sort of "music": some woman who has a talent for this, calls together a troupe of children and, as though under the baton of a conductor, lets them hit 533 the limb with sticks. In winter time on a journey, the Gilyak often sings a monotonous song which actually consists only of all kinds of unrelated sentences about anything that happens to occur to him [235] or that he sees. Actual songs that are handed down from father to son the Gilyak do not possess, and in general they are stingy with their singing. I never heard them sing in the village, their houses, or on their 533 boats. However, there are some to be found among them who are considered singers; they are improvisors of a sort who entertain the others with their song.

535 The dance does not exist among the Gilyak, unless one in-201 cludes in this category the spontaneous leaps with which a 517 tipsy one occasionally cools off his exuberance. There is a 521 reason for the Gilyak's facial expression of which we spoke above. It is neither sullen nor sad, but also not unhappy or good natured; it is serious or indifferent. But I must hasten to add that this immobility and indifference only reaches to a certain point. The Gilyak's imagination and his sense of humor are not immediately apparent, but in reality he possesses both. The favorite pastime on winter evenings is listening to a story teller, and his voice is alternately interrupted by laughter and exclamations.
527 Holidays and festivals. There are no special rest days 787 which would, for instance, correspond to our Sundays.
483 The bear festival is the only one worthy of this name. It is celebrated once a year during our January, it lasts two weeks and is accompanied by various entertainments. Young bears which, as we said, are brought up for this festival, are taken direct from their caves or they are bought from Sakhalin kinsmen. Occasionally 100 rubles are paid for a one-year-old. Young bruin is put into a hollowed-out tree trunk to which he is fastened with a chain, and thus he is transported by sled. The yurts where this traveler halts are considered particularly lucky. It has happened now and then that the bear, because of negligence on the part of the people transporting him, has crushed a child to death, but such accidents are not mourned by the parents, who regard it as a good omen.
527 The bear is kept in a special enclosure in his new home.
231 An old woman is appointed to feed him and give him water.
The latter is offered him in a long wooden spoon which is inserted through a little opening. His chief food consists of dried fish, sometimes he also gets millet and various scraps. [236]
Not all villages have bears, therefore people from different villages usually assemble for the festival, even from those places that had their own bear festival and had already consumed their bear. Often Sakhalin-Gilyak come to the mainland at this time, although they themselves are well supplied with bears.
527 Besides feasts, various amusements take place at the 541 festival; for instance, dog races. A track is cleared on the 437 ice and staked off, and the trained dogs run for wagers.

796 sled race has the same purpose and is likewise held on thi 541 occasion. Here it does not matter either whether the drau 231 dogs show outstanding speed. This is shown by the fact tha 437 only one sled races along the track at time; the test is, rather, how accurately the team and especially its leading dog run along the prescribed route. Such leader dogs, whi show themselves to be particularly reliable, especially in understanding and following exactly the calls of the leader are very highly valued among the Gilyak who pay from 30 796 60 rubles for them. It was interesting to watch how, to tak 541 part in the race, some of the Gilyak who were standing by 522 track threw themselves on the sleds that travelled by them a speed almost equal to that of an express train. Some Gil succeeded very well in this attempt; others, on the other h were thrown along some distance by the speeding sleds an sometimes suffered grave injuries, which they bore, howe with the best good humor despite the pain and the ridicule their luckier companions.
796 At the end of the race, the whole crowd, closely followe by the traveller, of course, went back to the enclosure mentioned above and released the bear from its prison. Th the entire male population of Vaida, together with the gues from outside—altogether more than 100 persons—led the bear down the hill on which the fence was erected, to the v lage. On the way, one half pulled the bear forward by the described above since it gave indications of no longer wan 796 to follow its tormentors willingly. The others steered the 522 more or less by means of the belts attached to its back. D this, the company raised a terrible racket. Now both parti would shout methods of procedure at each other, now one another would fall into the deep snow to the amusement of companions, and those that came after him would kick and jostle him in the most merciless manner, without this, ho 796 ever, spoiling his good humor in any way. Then again, the bear would attempt to seize one of its tormentors with its teeth and claws and it always had to endure a resounding, scornful laughter if it did not succeed. In short, it was a highly agitated scene that presented itself here to the eyes our traveller. When they arrived in the village, [381] they stopped first of all in front of the house in which the bear enjoyed its last meal the evening before. He a beam abo three meters long had been attached to a stand in front of t door in such a manner that it hung down vertically about a 796 meter above the ground. Beside this beam there stood six 533 eight girls and women who were provided with club-like st

9: Hawes--264-265 T-3 (1901)
116, 533, 584, 762

"Among the eighty-eight adults who d S: of Sakhalin] one was a young Gilyak been given in marriage to a man she di dirt-encased, skin-clad, unkempt, ill-of nature;' and yet the old, old songs o death of the disappointed lovers, or of Perhaps one day we may hope to have Mr. P.; [LSS: Pilsudski] meanwhile, h tell the story of another.

The usual motif of these lyrics is the sequent violent and secret attachment t sion is strong, then rather than become she and her lover will commit suicide.
ing a knife to the heart, or by stranglin same way will be together in heaven. T which tells how a young man loved a fai another, and how they agreed to commi and not only did not fulfil his word, but said the maiden's spirit has never ceas you would kill yourself, and you have n ied between 1891 and 1895 on the west coast, [LS woman who hanged herself, because she had sliked. Under this strange wild exterior, this favoured form, we are startled by the 'one touch f this people tell mostly of such events–of the the impassioned appeal to the loved one.

e some of these Gilyak lyrics from the pen of his kindness enables me to give one here, and to betrothal of the girl when young, and her sub-o another and youthful lover. If the mutual pas-e the wife of one chosen by her parents for her,

This they do in the same manner, i. e. by plungg, since those who thus kill themselves in the here is one song, well known among the Gilyaks, r maiden already betrothed in her childhood to t suicide. This man, however, proved faithless, had never intended so to do. Until this day, it is ed to upbraid him, calling always, 'Ah, you said ot. You deceived me! Men are liars!' [265]

9: Hawes--264-265 T-3 (1901) 1903
16, 533, 584, 762

And to-day the reproachful tones of the cru swish of the sledge and the howl of the dogs
'You said you woul
And you did not.
You are a deceiver
Men are liars!' "

uelly deceived maiden may be heard in as the narta starts off'— d kill yourself,

!

Giliakov Derevni Kul'," [Sea fishing among the Gilyaks of the Village Kul] Sovetskaia Etnografiia, 1934, no. 5.).

fed the head of the dolphin. Then we came down (to the shore) and the old men cut up the dolphin. [113] When they cut it up, we called all the people (ordered them to come), spoke to them, and made each one of them take (let them take) his share. We gave less to the "sitting" men (that is, those who did not participate in the hunt). (1) We gave more

1. The Gilyak Shurman, from the village Lyangr, told m that they divide the beluga into equal parts. Only when they kill two--three belugas do they give somewhat greater shares to the hunters.

to those who went to sea. After they had taken away their shares, we cut up the head (literally, broke it up). After w cut up the head, in the evening, we sent the young men to cu some birch wood; we sent them to cut some rowan-trees. Then we got some rowan shavings and put them in the respiratory opening. We cooked some cereal and put it in the sea-dish [Russian, Morskoye blyudo] We prepared som berries and put it in the sea-dish. Then we sent the children to bury the head. When they were ready to go, an old man went with them. They put the head down on the place where offerings to the sea are made. (2) They took the eye

2. Near each village, there is a separate place from which offerings are brought to the sea.

out of the head and, having dug a hole in the ground, they put the eyes in the center (of the hole). (3) After they burie

3. In the village Puir the eyes of the beluga are "buried" on the place where offerings to the sea are made. In other villages the eyes and the head are suspended in a birch tree.

the eyes, they scattered some rice and berries in the sea. Then they carried the head to Elzəs. (4) They hung the hea

4. Elzəs--a place where the heads are "buried". Each clan has its own elzəs. When they kill a beluga, they which they hit the beam rhythmically, two slow hits owed by one fast one; this activity was not accompanied any songs. They led the bear slowly past these women and placed it so that its head was turned towards the house, hough he should take another good look at the place where had received its last nourishment from the inhabitants of village. After a very brief halt they then dragged it further ng to the river bank and then forced it to go on the ice to ut the middle of the river. Thereupon the whole crowd urned to the village and moved to the house inhabited by the mer owner of the bear. Here the bear was awaited by a y similar reception as that described above, except that in place they forced the bear to stick its head inside the house thus, in a way, to take leave from its master and nourisher.

n he was again led to the enclosure, and there they tied up as before.

Only now had the moment come in which the bear was to lose life. Amid general silence which was also commanded with emn mien to our traveller, an old Gilyak--whether he was owner of the animal or not is not indicated in Jakobsen's ount--stepped forth from the crowd and grasped bow and ows which were lying there ready for him. Then he slowly off his under-jacket, wrapped some leather belts around left hand in order not to injure it with the bow string, and ed out an arrow with much solemnity and circumstance ch made a rather comical impression, and finally he placed arrow on the bow. At first it seemed as though he was g to shoot in the air because he raised his bow while he tched it. Then he lowered it again very slowly till the arrow directed exactly at the bear's heart, and then he shot it The bear fell down on the spot, as far its bonds permitted do so, it reiled to and fro a few times, and then died after w convulsive movements, thus proving what a steady hand archer had preserved in spite of his old age. During this le procedure, which lasted rather long, there reigned a athless silence among the Gilyak standing around the fence, this created an even more solemn impression since it was uch sharp contrast to the foregoing deafening tumult. fter the bear's death its former owner came and embraced animal tenderly like a dear friend of whom he wanted to e leave. Then they pulled a number of the sticks of the fence of the ground and laid them down to serve the dead bear as resting place. Later they drag the animal into its owner's se, as the traveller was told, since he did not have the time wait the end of the festival. In the house they lay the bear

534

534 MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS--idiophones (e.g., clappers, gongs, rattles); membranophones (e.g., drums); cordophones (e.g., zithers, lutes, harps); aerophones (e.g., flutes, pipes, trumpets); special instruments (e.g., bullroarers), complex mechanical instruments (e.g., piano, organ); care and repair of musical instruments; etc. See also:

Drum signaling . . . . . 202 Sound recordings 216
Radio . . . . . 207 Musical supplies industry 949

/64 cont./

796 cutting up /65/ the bones, and so forth -- everything is done in conformity with permanently established rules. The first moment of this procedure, immediately following the removal of the skin, presents a very imposing sight for the Gilyak. The white (from the heavy layer of fat), soft body, stretched out on its back, those front paws with long and even fingers, resembling, to the point of illusion, human hands, amid the gloom of night, must irresistibly evoke in the savage the notion that he is not in the presence of a dead beast, but of a man of a particular nature, who has taken off his hairy skin and now majestically rests, following the least movement of his knife. The entire, detached skin of the bear, together with the head, is carried into the yurt, not through the door, but through the smoke opening, and down the high pole with the crown of coniferous needles, which still rises above the earth yurt. The clan elder carefully takes hold of the skin and, striking it lightly with a stick, says: "Remember that you were fed by such and such old man and by such and such old woman."

Meanwhile the women greet the sacred head with a solemn

• [534] march played on a most original instrument. This is a dry log of larch hung on a frame, on which several people in turn beat out in rhythm relatively monotonous sounds. To the sounds of this charming music the clan elder installs the head of the bear on the plank bed of honor, covered with coniferous needles. Under the head there is a quiver with arrows and, by its side, tobacco, sugar, and other viands.

[174] The bear takes along the souls of all these things. The carcasses of meat stay outside on a special wooden platform, and parts are brought in through the smoke opening. The day ends with eating, conversations, games of the youth, dances, and fencing with sticks. The next day is called the day of the feeding of the head. From morning until night kettles boil inside the yurt, and all kinds of dishes of the Gilyak cuisine are prepared. A portion of each dish is put in a separate vessel and placed next to the bear's head. This, then, means "to feed the head."

[372] On the same day the boiling of the bear meat begin. The meat is boiled outside in a special kettle; the fire is ignited with the sacred steel, which is not used on any other occasion.

/317 cont./

349 Sanctifying the house. On the eve of sanctification, on the day of 787 the completion of the building, with the setting of the sun, a reliable man must make his way there and be attentive for a cracking sound or streaks of light.

342 If a cracking sound is heard during the sunset, or purple 787 streaks of light are noticed, this is a bad sign. If the cracking 789 is at dawn or the streaks of light are bright light -- this is a [176] good sign. The bad sign means that not a real "master," but a devil -- kins has settled in the house. Then the shaman must be called, and he makes a chkhnyr chkhnaj, a grass figure, and 342 drives out the demon. A real "master" is fed two times -- in 776 autumn (cleaning) (1) and another time when one wishes. They 782

[372] 1. Evidently speaking of the cleaning of the hearth by feeding the "master" of the fire.

feed all the posts, the door posts, the threshold, the matka, the stone under the threshold near the door, where the old man or the old woman lives, guarding the house against the entering of the evil spirit.

342 /318/ Driving out the evil spirit takes place in the follow-789 ing fashion: a grass figure -- chkhnaj, on three legs, is placed in the middle of the yurt. A man holds it by a string tied to his

• [534] hand; in his other hand he holds a club. A shaman shamanizes [756] with a tambourine. The evil spirit must hide. The shaman enumerates the walls, boxes, and various things in the yurt from which his kekhn must drive out the evil spirit, and he does not mention only one corner -- it is there that the evil spirit is hiding.

342 The shaman then says: "gy, gy (i.e., 'good'), in such and 756 such a corner there is no evil spirit." And all answer: "Gy-gy, 789 gy-gy, such and such a corner does not have evil spirits." Finally the shaman says: "The kings has hidden in such and such a corner.
[176] Mang (apparently the spirit -- assistant of the shaman), go and get him, and the rest make a battue!" "There, he went out, he went out as a dog..." (speaking to the kekhn, i.e., to the spirit).

/682 cont./

533 whom at that time there were only some of the poorest kind among
114 the Russians, could have understood the content of a Gilyak song; instead, he rendered it, as did not escape Middendorff, only praeter propter. The aforementioned license of the singers is also [126] the reason why I understand so little of the Gilyak songs dictated to me by Jutschin, Tenghan, and others toward the end of my stay of two years among the Gilyak that I can only recognize isolated words in them, such as the place names and personal names occurring in them. The same thing happened to Dr. Grube, though, besides my Gilyak vocabulary, the lexical material collected by Glehn was available to him. Only the song given to me by Jutschin under the title of Walghytsch (1) has greater interest for me, and this only on account of the explanations which he gave me in connection with the /683/ place Kliygh-wo mentioned or sung about in it, a place to which, according to Gilyak belief, the souls of those who die a natural death are supposed to go. More about this later.

1. No. III in Dr Grube's Gilyak word list; see the appendix to Vol. III of this work, p. 41 /this appendix is not included in the book translated here/.

• 534 The musical performances of the Gilyak are even poorer, but are not by far as peculiar as the singing. Aside from the drum of the shamans, which serves other purposes, the Gilyak have only two [439] musical instruments -- both of a very primitive kind. One of them is a jew's-harp (Gilyak kanga or wutschranga; Olcha mugheny), an instrument which they allegedly get from the "Manchu" and, accordingly, prize very highly, but which is so simple in construction that they could very well make it themselves. It is distributed among them in three forms: made out of brass, made out of wood, and made out of iron. (See the woodcuts a, b, and c below.) The first (a) consists of a narrow brass plate several inches long, into which a tongue-shaped lamina is cut lengthwise, remaining attached to the frame at one end. Both ends of the frame are pierced and equipped with a thread in order to hold the instrument in front of the mouth, and, by expelling air, the tongue-shaped lamina is

/683 cont./

• 534 made to vibrate. The second form (b), made out of a thin wooden board, is manipulated in the same way, but it is wider, and the initially likewise wide tongue-lamina suddenly tapers at half its length and is equipped there with a small hole and a peg which precisely fits into it in order to help the vibration and to permit modulating it as desired. Finally, the third form (c) consists of a narrow and rather massive bent piece of iron, between the shanks of which there is a thin lamina of the same metal, bent upward at the free end. In order to play on this jew's-harp it is ordinarily pressed to the lips with the iron blade of an ax, which makes the tone come out more clearly and at the same time serves for resonance.

517 During his leisure hours the Gilyak, stretched out on the 533 sleeping bench, greatly likes to take up his jew's-harp and draw 534 forth from it the trills, which in his singing, too, are so agreeable

534

Gilyak jew's-harps.

517 to his ear, and other melodies, which are always rather melancholy.
533 And the skill which he shows at it is truly quite extraordinary.
534

/684/ The other musical instrument, which is also familiar 534 to the Gilyak but is not nearly as widespread among them, is a stringed instrument, a monochord or very primitive violin (Gilyak [824] tyngrach, Olcha tankara). It consists of a small birch-bark cylinder-[825] casing (Gilyak tyngr-tschobrai), which is closed on top by means of a tautly stretched fish-skin (Gilyak tschobrai-tywrch). A small stick is stuck through it crosswise, one end of which projects out of the cylinder-casing only a little, but the other end quite far.

/684 cont./

534 The gut string is fastened to the short end and from there runs over 192 a bridge set up on the fish skin (Gilyak twua, as in the case of the bow) to the other end of the stick, where there is a device for keeping the string taut. The fiddle bow (Gilyak tyngr-puntsch) is sharply curved and strung with horsehair (Gilyak kich). The string, of course, is played between the bridge and the long end of the stick stuck through the cylinder-casing. The instrument seems to 91 me, judging also by its name, to be of Olcha, Goldi, or at any rate Tungusic origin. I saw it and heard it played only in Kidsi, and the monotonous and melancholy melody was very similar to those of the Gilyak.

535 It is very characteristic of the serious, sober, and practical state of mind of the Gilyak that in the course of two years I never saw dancing either at their bear festivals or on any other occasion; apparently this type of social entertainment does not appeal to them at all. Middendorff encountered it, but it took place under quite extraordinary circumstances; it was in Burukan, a place which the Gilyak visit only for trade; the Tungus, presumably excited by alcohol, performed a wild demonic dance, into which the Gilyak, at first only spectators, finally let themselves be drawn (1).

1. Middendorff, Reise, etc., Vol. IV, p 1486.

Otherwise, they said, they did not do it, as Middendorff, too, remarks in his handwritten notes. And at the time their entire behavior revealed this. Whereas the Tungus in their short, tight-fitting fur-jackets moved nimbly and skillfully, the movements of the Gilyak, who kept on their long dog-fur coats reaching down to their calves, were bear-like and extremely stiff and awkward. Moreover, when they tried to imitate the former, the dance always soon ended in exhaustion and a loud burst of laughter, because they felt so childishly silly behaving in this, to them, completely strange and foreign manner.

45 It seemed no less surprising to me to find nothing among 97 the Gilyak that might suggest the performance of masquerades or

/705 cont./

*796 hardly greater -- on each of the otherwise quite empty sleds lay 231 only two brake-sticks stuck into the plaited work -- obstacles of 541 another kind were put in their path. As soon as the dogs were racing along at top speed, a Gilyak standing on the embankment of the racecourse threw himself on the sled and tried to gain control of the dogs and their vehicle by using the brake-sticks, at which, of course, he was not immediately successful. If one failed, a second one did it, and a third: throwing himself upon the sled, he held on to it tightly, the sled overturned two or three times, but the man held on tightly and let himself be dragged along at the utmost speed until he succeeded in sitting astride and, with the two brake-sticks in his hands, driving up the *796 hill in triumph. During the entire race the women drum with 541 cudgels and sticks upon a /707/ beam suspended from a framework 534 in front of the house. This is done with a certain regularity and requires some special knowledge, for there are various types and modes of drumming, depending on the occasion. Every woman is given two cudgels, or one cudgel and one stick, and beats with them on the beam two or three times, either simultaneously or alternately, then cudgel on cudgel or cudgel on stick, then again on the beam, etc., in different rhythms and tempos, as the mode *796 of the moment requires (see Plate XLVIII /p1248/). As soon as all 541 the dogs participating in the races have returned the longed-for meal 231 is set before them in the house by the women. The men, however, in-[521] dulge in a lively discussion of all the details occurring in connection with the races, in that one dog is to be praised and another criticized, but even more to laugh over the ineptitude of one of their countrymen and to marvel at the courage and agility of a second and third. For, as is to be seen from this description, the dog races among the Gilyak do not serve to test the quality of the dogs as much as to give the men an opportunity to show off their above-mentioned physical and moral virtues, just as is the case for other entertainments that are part of the bear festival.

*796 After this interlude, the leading of the bears which had 231 been interrupted in the morning, was resumed, and everything was repeated as on the preceding days, for example, the large

787 /753 cont./
75 that he had been thus informed by the eldest of his people), and 825 pronounced the conjuration or address to the bear and the snake as 782 the two animals most feared by the Gilyak and Russians. During [534] these conjurations he occasionally beat on a drum-like animal-skin stretched over a ring, using a little stick with a snake depicted at one end and a bear at the other. The bystanders howled and danced, and then the shaman beseeched the god for good fishing, good weather, for the rain to run off into the sea, for a favorable and safe sea for Gilyak and Russian. (Bm. I, p. 9.)

29. Gilyak. Shamanistic acts in case of sickness (2). The

825 753 [752]

2. Ineffective in cases of snakebite, for which the only remedy is tying the skin of the snake around the wound.

toad (which brings bad luck) is of two kinds, that is, sometimes a single one, simply called mipitsch, and sometimes a double one, wap-mipitsch, with a doubled body and extremities. The former has its abode on land, but the latter in the water; hence the former is also designated as mif-mipitsch, the latter as tolli-mipitsch (3). Both are powerful and uncanny, magâ, especially

3. Most of these accounts come from Porkuk and her son, Dshaman, from Kuik. Jutschin thought that the wap-mipitsch represents the copulation of the toads, which as a rule takes place in the water and the seeing of which is regarded by the Gilyak as uitsch. According to him, the wap-mipitsch must be worn by women.

the wap-mipitsch, /754/ which, as the Gilyak put it, resembles the devil (kins ngarlatsch), hence, perhaps, its double shape. Their evil power is shown by the fact that they sneak up on a sleeping human being and crawl through his mouth into his inner organs, into his chest and stomach, whereupon the person falls

4:Ivanov et al. E-4 (no date) 1964 RX2 Gilyak RX2

534 29 342

Playing a wooden percussion instrument.

The wooden religious sculpture was akin to that of the Orochi, Ul'chi and Nanay. The figurines of bears on dippers and spoons used in the bear festival were finely made and realistic in style. The bear dippers were often remarkable in their craftsmanship. Some of them were carved with pictographs, relating the history of the hunt or rearing of a given bear. The carvings on the dipper handles were also symbolic; they indicated by a variety of symbols whether the bear was killed in a hunt or reared in captivity, whether it was killed in the summer; and so forth.

532 322 [791]

The musical culture of the Nivkhi was very poor. They played a primitive one-string instrument (t'yngryng) and a lip jew's-harp (kkanggâ). During the bear festivals they used, instead of musical instruments, an ordinary log, which the women struck with sticks.

534 [796]

Education was entirely lacking among the Nivkhi before the Revolution. The Nivkhi-Nanay alphabet written in the 1880's by the missionary, Protod'yakonov, was not used by the Nivkhi.

871 [212]

In 1895 an elementary school was opened in the city of Marinsk; two others were opened in 1899. By 1905 they were closed for lack of funds. Only a few individual Nivkhi attended Russian schools.

Contemporary Life of the Nivkhi

175 648

In 1918, soon after the establishment of the Soviet government in the Far East, this area, and especially the Amur Basin and Sakhalin, became the scene of civil war and intervention. Guerrilla units were organized to fight the White Guards and interventionists. The bitter fighting lasted several years.

9: Hawes--272-273 1-3 (1901) 1905 Gilyak

116, 534

"The younger wife of our host [LSS: The chief of Nivo] was considered the belle of all the Gilyaks, but I will let the reader judge of her claims to beauty from the accompanying illustration, [LSS: See Visual File] in which she is represented playing a musical instrument. Vanka, who claimed to be a cousin of hers, had brought this forth from the recesses of the hut, and both he and she played upon it. It is now in my possession; but I must confess the music appealed more to the imagination than the ear, for when played with the tongue or even the hand it was with difficulty we could hear it. It consists of one string of fish-gut, strung along a stick and over a cylindrical piece of birch bark; and it goes by the scarcely euphonious name of tin-kirn. Other musical instruments are a little wooden jew's harp called a kos-cha [LSS: Erratum; it should read kanga]; a small bag of fish-skin stretched tightly on to a circular piece of wood like a [273] drumhead, containing bones which are rattled; and the fish-skin tambourine already mentioned."

1 XIV Amusements and Festivities. Burial Ceremonies.

Among such peoples physical pleasures, naturally, take a most important place, and foremost among the e are the joys of eating and smoking. They are not very sensitive to odors, for fish, smoke, and seal blubber to them have an indifferent, or even an agreeable odor. But they abhor the odor of decay, and conversely, they like a nice fragrance. Whenever I experimentally held a bottle of eau-de-cologne up to their noses, they always made a pretty face.

2 Among colors, the Gilyak prefer red and blue, but they definitely do not belong to those peoples who go in for bright colors. For instance, many of them could acquire a red shirt or caftan instead of the dirty-blue ones, but it would never occur to them to do this. The colored borders and curlicues on the caps and petticoats of the women suffice; otherwise clothes, houses, weapons, and tools are dark-colored. A black dog pelt as a coat is, as I have said, regarded as particularly beautiful.

4 The Gilyak love music. If neighboring Russian peasants strum their balalaikas or play the accordian, the natives who are present like to listen. Their own music is very primitive. It consists of a sort of jew's harp which looks somewhat like a longish horseshoe. The broad end of the instrument is grasped with one hand, the narrow end is placed on the lips, the tongue of the player is placed forward somewhat, while one finger of the other hand alternately pulls and releases the little hook connected with the tongue of the instrument. The tongue vibrates and a low buzzing tone results, which can be modified by the tongue of the player. Not everybody knows how to play on this "harmonica".

Other quite embryonic music, or rather, clinking noise, is produced as follows: a thin dry tree trunk is suspended parallel to the ground by ropes, and on this they beat rhythmically with a stick. During the bear festival the audience is edified with this sort of "music": some woman who has a talent for this, calls together a troupe of children and, as though under the baton of a conductor, lets them hit 3 the limb with sticks. In winter time on a journey, the Gilyak often sings a monotonous song which actually consists only of all kinds of unrelated sentences about anything that happens to occur to him [235] or that he sees. Actual songs that are handed down from father to son the Gilyak do not possess, and in general they are stingy with their singing. I never heard them sing in the village, their houses, or on their 527 Sometimes the dogs also draw sleds in these races.

541 Dog racing, besides being an amusement also has a prac-437 tical significance, for the good runners find immediate buyers. In fact, the bear festival is a sort of fair, where various things are bartered.
527 The chief figure of the festival, namely the bear, is well-825 fed throughout the whole period and is repeatedly led through the village, at which time he pays a call at each house and this is done in such a way that he has to go from one house to another at an angle, by way of the adjacent section of the river. This symbolic procedure assures the house of "an abundance of fish". He is always led by several men who put up the necessary number of chains and ropes on all sides. In the houses he is treated to fish, millet, and cranberries, and sometimes he is also teased. Some Gilyak also prostrate themselves before him. This is by no means worship, however, as some have assumed. Some do it for fun, some in earnest, calling on the spirit of the bear not to seek revenge on them after he is dead. Sometimes the bear is not given such expressions of veneration.
527 When the bear's immolation nears, he is tied to a stick 782 which has been driven in the ice, and then he is shot with 766 arrows. In this procedure the archers seek to outdo themselves. At last the unfortunate bruin is given a merciful blow with a lance. He usually dies in peace and majesty, with his fore-paws resting on his wounded chest. When this happens the woman who has had charge of him is often heard to weep loudly. Finally, funeral pyres are lit and the Gilyak seat themselves around them. Pieces of bear meat are passed around and before they are eaten they are lightly [237] roasted. Eating and tea-drinking are the main activity at a bear festival. The stick music which is here offered as entertainment has been described. Special music is produced 527 in the village of Kola. This village is the northern outpost 361 of the Gilyak settlement, on the coast of the Sea of Okhotsk, 534 about 200 versts from Nikolayevsk-na-Amure. (1) Here are

1. This distance is measured according to the curves in the coast line; in a straight line it would be much shorter.

to be found - and this has only recently been discovered -two old church bells bearing Slavonic inscriptions. They were supposed to have been taken from Fort Albasin when it was destroyed by the Chinese and since then to have belonged to

527 the natives of the Amur. An old Goldi who finally obtained
361 them gave them to his daughter when she married a Gilyak
534 from Kola. The daughter probably left them to the community, for now they do not belong to an individual, but they are regarded as sacred. During the bear festival they ring incessantly, and on other extraordinary occasions the shamans make use of them in different ways.
527 Finally, many visitors of the bear festivals are also to be 524 seen playing cards and checkers. Both games the Gilyak 177 have taken over from the Russians and Chinese, but the 777 Chinese passion for it they have fortunately not imitated. They do not play for money, and they play without great emotion. Russian as well as Chinese cards are used. (1)

1. The Chinese playing cards are about seven centimeters long but only two centimeters wide, and are decorated with various figures. About 120 cards are used in the game.

Finally, we must add that, according to the belief of the Gilyak, the village in which the most bears have been celebrated and consumed, has the greatest prospect of abundance. The pelt and the skull of the dead animal are kept and represent a sort of talisman.
527 Occasionally the Gilyak also have a pig festival, that is,
782 the consumption of a pig (if they can get hold of one) is accompanied by ceremonies. The pig is not brought into the house through the door but through the window; on the floor, besides the pig, are placed all kinds of delicacies, such as millet porridge, berries, etc., as well as all the idols that the people happen to have. [238] Then the idols are bowed to and the feast begins.

On the island of Sakhalin there is a festival known as cheung which falls around Easter. It consists merely of a feast, at the beginning of which bits of food are thrown in all directions, probably in order to ask the gods for abundance.
764 The burial ceremony is identical with that existing among the ancient Slavs (1), that is, the corpses are burned. The

1. The Arab Ibn-Foslan who traveled through present-day Russia in the years 921 and 922 witnessed cremations among the tribes living on the banks of the Volga (called Itil by him). Spiess, Vorstellungen vom Zustande nach dem Tode. 1877.

771 More frequently one finds those who recognize a supreme being and immortality, but do not bother much about them. Some do not even believe in the idols, and these may already reflect the opinions of those of other beliefs. Thus the little village of Kula near Nikolayevsk has for some time already had neither idols nor shamans. I was visited by two brothers who were born there and who were both wide-awake and good-natured chaps; they confessed to me that they believe in god, but regard the idols as foolishness.

756 The shamans are the mediators between the visible and 789 invisible world; they always excel in experience and 782 perspicacity, whereby they know how to predict many things, for instance, changes in the weather, and thus they exert their influence. Their chief function consists of driving out sickness which is mainly the work of evil spirits. Incidentally they are [243] also consulted on other occasions. For instance, there may be few fish at one place or another; the shaman is consulted and orders a dog of such and such color to be killed and offered up in the river at the designated place. The sacrificial gifts are generally made according to the shaman's prescriptions. A competent shaman knows how to "drive away the rain" by threatening the clouds and denouncing them loudly. Likewise, of course, he understands how to make rain and thunderstorms. "As soon as he begins his magic song, rain clouds immediately appear", a Gilyak believer told me. His magic practices can also bring harm. For instance, he can cause a human somewhere far off in some village to die of a fish or a drink which does not harm others. He can flood a village, and so forth. Occasionally the magic practices are feared, but the magician is never persecuted. However, the shamans are usually merciful enough to stick to threats only, if someone irritates them; and besides, not everybody believes in them.

755 If a shaman is invited to visit a sick person he appears 534 in his official costume. He wears a girdle on which hang numerous clinking tin objects. In his hand he carries his drum and his staff. The drum is about two-thirds meters long and consists of a wooden ring on which is stretched a pig skin or the skin of a stag, and on which hang a number of little bells. He alternately beats his drum and sings

755 softly or whispers magic formulas, walks back and forth 534 like a pendulum, far into the night. Sometimes he leaps over a burning pile of wood, or he makes the sick person 755 run about if he is able. Some shamans impress their public 786 with more difficult tricks. They appear laden with chains, 778 whirl about like mad, and in a state of ecstasy may hurl themselves into the fire and make believe it does them no harm. Narcotic drinks are not given, but the sick person sometimes gets certain herb infusions from which the shamans expect healing effects. The magic feats are corroborated with various prescriptions relative to the spirits. For instance, an idol in the shape of a human being is placed next to the sick person, its face smeared with cranberry juice, and the sick person himself has wood chips hung around his neck, etc. Or the shaman orders that the clothes of the sick person be hung out in the woods and that he be [244] dressed in others. This is done in order to outwit the kobold who saw him only in his old clothes.

755 This medical magic is usually begun in the evening, at 789 twilight, when the imagination is more active and also when deception can be more easily concealed. The shamans also seek to consolidate their authority by means of various magic tricks that otherwise have no practical meaning. For instance, they swallow knives and needles. Not long ago there lived a celebrated magician near Sofiyskoye who gouged out his eyes and thrust a knife into his belly, which was afterwards excreted. He was later exposed in these juggling tricks by an itinerant Russian merchant. It was shown that the knife blade, instead of penetrating his belly, disappeared into his pants and passed into a receptacle. After that the magician was completely discredited.

789 Finally, there are a few superstitious practices we must 372 mention. If a Gilyak goes on a journey he must drink some 271 water in the yurt shortly before he leaves; he does the same thing as soon as he has returned. The hearth fire is also to a certain extent sacred for the Gilyak; it is not carried outside and the Gilyak do not like to have a traveler light his cigar at it and then leave the house.

177 This chapter is also the place to say a few words about the 797 baptized Gilyak. There are not many of them, but no one knows exactly how many, first of all because many of these "Christians" let themselves be baptized several times, in the city, for instance, as well as by their village divine. From this we may see how much they really understand of their new religion. We have said before that they regard

535

535 DANCING--dance styles (e.g., imitative, pantomimic, symbolic, stylized); technique (e.g., movements of the head, trunk and limbs); gestures, postures, and their symbolism; solo, pair, and group dancing; choreographic patterns; extemporization and formalization; rhythm; musical accompaniment; occasions for dancing and associated dance forms (e.g., war dances, shamanistic dances, ballroom dancing, tap dancing); participants and spectators; dancing places (e.g., dance halls); dance costumes and paraphernalia; emotional expression in dancing; training in dancing; specialized dancers and dance leaders; choreographic arts allied to dancing (e.g., figure skating); etc. See also:

Gestures	201	Dance performances on the stage	545
Postures	616	Night clubs	547
Skating	628

/684 cont./

534 The gut string is fastened to the short end and from there runs ov [192] a bridge set up on the fish skin (Gilyak twua, as in the case of th bow) to the other end of the stick, where there is a device for keeping the string taut. The fiddle bow (Gilyak tyngr-puntsch) i sharply curved and strung with horsehair (Gilyak kich). The strin of course, is played between the bridge and the long end of the [191] stick stuck through the cylinder-casing. The instrument seems t me, judging also by its name, to be of Olcha, Goldi, or at any rate Tungusic origin. I saw it and heard it played only in Kidsi, and the monotonous and melancholy melody was very similar to those of the Gilyak.

•535 It is very characteristic of the serious, sober, and practical state of mind of the Gilyak that in the course of two years I neve saw dancing either at their bear festivals or on any other occasio apparently this type of social entertainment does not appeal to th at all. Middendorff encountered it, but it took place under quit extraordinary circumstances: it was in Burukan, a place which t Gilyak visit only for trade; the Tungus, presumably excited by alcohol, performed a wild demonic dance, into which the Gilya at first only spectators, finally let themselves be drawn (1).

1. Middendorff, Reise, etc., Vol. IV, p 1486.

Otherwise, they said, they did not do it, as Middendorff, too, remarks in his handwritten notes. And at the time their entire behavior revealed this. Whereas the Tungus in their short, tight-fitting fur-jackets moved nimbly and skillfully, the movements of the Gilyak, who kept on their long dog-fur coats reaching down to their calves, were bear-like and extremely stiff and awkward. Moreover, when they tried to imitate the former, the dance always soon ended in exhaustion and a loud burst of laugh because they felt so childishly silly behaving in this, to them, completely strange and foreign manner.

545 It seemed no less surprising to me to find nothing among 171 the Gilyak that might suggest the performance of masquerades c 27, pp. 196-197.] the same performance was ut of his owner and around it three times. E oked him with a tzakh, or twig adorned with ne thrust. This circumambulation was done t our young women, keeping time, beat with st his highly varied 'musical' performance was ne 'artiste' in this case was the oldest woma nteresting than the ritualistic dancing which rally, such for instance as that of young girl First of all the old lady, dressed in seal-sk ormed a little level square plat. Then taking elf into queer postures, using the branches a ut occasionally, and all unwittingly, she ove oundering in the deep snow, to the amuseme o way disconcerted her, for she came up lau s gone through, and the animal led to t ach time that he passed the door the m shavings, and broke it with the force to the strains of a unique band. Three ticks on a log supported on short uprig s accompanied by [198] dancing. Althou n of the village, the display was far m the traveller in the East meets with ge ls in the sacred temple of Nara in Japa kins, stamped down the deep snow, an two pieces of evergreens she threw h as fans. Her movements were not rapi rstepped the limit of the plat and fell ent of band and spectators too; but this ughing to renew the performance."

/104 cont./

8 Most infrequently the khlaj-nivukh is a chosen one of the gods in 7 other respects as well: he is a rich man, adept in hunting, worldly-4 wise, courageous, has a great natural wit, and enjoys authority 4 among his fellow tribesmen.

Every clan, every settlement has its own small khlaj-nivukh, but there are celebrities who enjoy extensive fame among many nationalities of the region, and who, when necessary, are sought after, just as renowned lawyers are among us. They perform their functions rather honoris causa, because the customary honorarium -- a Chinese silk costume and a Japanese saber -- can hardly be a recompense to a rich man for the loss of his time and the burden of the obligation. The clothing and arms presented to them serve rather as their insignia magistratus, their official vestment, in which they carry out their obligations during the discussions.

4 And so, when the clan of the avengers has sufficiently worn 8 itself out in its attempts at a bloody retaliation, or if from the 37 first the slaying took place under conditions easily lending themselves to a reconciliation, then they begin to search for a khlaj-nivukh who would undertake the negotiations and be able to obtain the most profitable conditions. The khlaj-nivukh must necessarily be from a neutral clan. One may not send a clansman in the first place, until the reconciliation, it is a sin to have anything whatever to do with the clan of the slayer; moreover, in view of the naturally inflamed feelings of the parties, negotiations through a clansman might end in another slaying. The other side, in turn, selects its "orator," who is /105/ obligated to defend its interests in the negotiations over the ransom. Ordinarily the offended side takes the initiative.

One fine day a company of the armed avengers, with their khlaj-nivukh at their head, appears at the settlement of the slayer. In the adjacent taiga or on the shore of a river the avengers light a fire and make camp, while the khlaj-nivukh in his regalia, with a spear in one hand, a kettle in the other, goes alone to the enemy settlement. Here, in one of the yurts, await the opponents with their khlaj-nivukh at their head... Leaning on his spear, or sitting down and lighting his pipe (only with "his own" fire) he

/105 cont./

*614 628 ●537 [426] what a man! His right arm was worth so many "syalakhr" (1):

1. The syalakhr is a monetary unit which the Gilyak for some reason translate into Russian by the word "tselkovi" /one ruble/ and value in our money at three rubles, -- apparently the Chinese customs duty. It is in these units that the Gilyak evaluate their exchange values -- the shagund (see above).

if he were living, would he be content to take that much? His left arm was worth so much, etc." Then all the other parts of the body are listed, and the amount of the blood money is computed. If the opposing side agrees, it lays in the kettle of the orator as many pieces of wood as it has agreed to pay "tselkovi." But agreement is never reached at once. The orator of the opposing side seeks to find excuses for the slayer and offers a minimum ransom. This angers his opponent, and he wrathfully departs, threatening to break off negotiations. His colleague hastens after him, urging him to make concessions. They sit down, each one lights up a pipe, always with his own fire, they quarrel, again one of them flies into a passion and hastens off, again they come together and return to the settlement...

[576] Etiquette demands that an agreement should not be reached at once, but only after stubborn opposition; therefore sometimes two and three days pass in endless meetings and [171] [198] separations. Some khlaj-nivukh on the Amur resort at the last moment, after the manner of the Tungus tribes, to the aid of their magic rods, which they threaten to break and thereby bring the wrath of the gods upon themselves and their stubborn opponents.

*614 628 536 When an agreement has been reached, the religious feature that I mentioned above enters in, the procedure of an imitation of a bloody battle, which is supposed to conceal from the soul of the slain man and the clan gods

/105 cont./

*614 628 536 A procession of the avengers with the khlaj-nivukh at their head sets out toward the settlement of the foe, and out to meet them comes /106/ a similar procession of the clan of the slayer. At a distance of several dozen sagenes from each other, both sides stop, and out comes the closest kinsman with his khlaj-nivukh, and from the other side advances the slayer with his "intermediary," both armed with bows and spears. At a signal given by the khlaj-nivukh'i they begin to shoot arrows at each other or attack with their spears, adroitly dodging the arrows and blows. The duel, of course, is fictitious, although there have been instances where the opponents grew excited and the matter ended sadly. All this time the khlaj-nivukh'i pacify their clients
[782] insisting on reconciliation. In the meantime the clansmen lead a dog apiece among their opponents and kill them with spears ("blood for blood"). Then the opponents hasten to embrace each other, and peace is concluded. The heart of the slain dog is sacrificed to the bird-avenger (see above), while the meat is eaten at the feast that follows.

*614 628 Then the representatives of both sides set off for the yurt of the slayer, where the objects constituting the tkhusind are placed -- kettles, spears, sabers, silken materials, and so forth. All the clansmen participate in the payment of the latter, each according to his wealth, considering it a great sin to evade his proportionate share. On the other hand, the acquired tkhusind becomes the common property of the clan of the slayer /sic/. In part it replaces those valuables which were needed for the dead man in the "settlement of the dead"; in part it becomes a fund for the family of the slain man and the clan requirements.

628 ●537 554 The negotiations over tkhusind for other causes, such as, for example, the abduction of a woman, the defilement of sacred things, and so on, are also conducted through the intervention of khlaj-nivukh'i, but without any particular ceremony. The intermediaries judge the moot points in the presence of the assembled people, hear the opinions of those present, and the decision is, as it were, the verdict of the whole gathering.

/119 cont./

*614 628 536 not only in natural products, but also purchased ones, tobacco, rice, kumiss, etc., because his wealth and associations make it possible for him to undertake distant journeys for the barter of furs and the acquisition of goods at firsthand. He is the guardian of the common "shagund" of his closest kinsmen, and the possessor of his own rich collection of "shagund," which his clansmen may use in case of necessity.

For the whole clan he is not only a man whose home is always open, where one can always go to eat well, enjoy the delights of tobacco, and hear interesting things, but one who always comes to assist in time of need. Especially invaluable, however, is his help at times of common misfortune, such as war, conflicts arising from revenge, disputes with members of other clans. He has supplies of the best weapons and conveyances, his name strikes terror into the foe, who for that reason will more willingly consent to a reconciliation, and, finally, he has supplies of "shagund" when it becomes necessary to pay ransom. Moreover, such a person usually possesses exceptional intelligence, eloquence, rich experience, and knowledge of life and people. He is the natural orator, ● [537] "khlaj-nivukh," who plays such a weighty role in affairs of revenge and civil disputes; even neighboring clans resort to him when the intervention of intermediaries is necessary. Among these yz'i there are individuals who enjoy enormous fame and respect throughout all the territory settled by the [532] Gilyak. In the image and likeness of these yz'i are fashioned images of the gods, the "masters" of the mountains, seas, heavens, rivers, etc. Moreover, they do not simply display respect toward him, but also a feeling of religious adoration. From among such individuals, under favorable circumstances, are developed those elements of authority which we find in other tribes standing on a higher level of cultural conditions.
[523] In some cases, such yz'i will become the council of elders, which before the clan assembly decides the affairs of the
[522] community in the name of the clan. Under other circumstances, when the tribe is compelled to conduct frequent wars, 628 614 628 682 ●537 [542] /356 cont./ every means to mask the sex of the newborn child. Only women are excluded from acts of vengeance. It is understandable that from the first moment of the murder there begins a painful, burdensome period for both clans. The clan of the murderer lives under a true sword of Damocles, awaiting a stroke from any comer, at any time, and in any place. The clan of the slain man feverishly tracks down its victim, who is on the lookout and in any case does not intend to give up his life cheaply. At the same time, in the first minutes immediately after the fateful murder, the clan of the murderer sends some person from a neutral khal' (necessarily neutral; a clansman would be killed) to the clan of the murdered man with apologies and an offer of ransom. But not always, and in any case not speedily, is accord obtained; sometimes years pass until, weary of the unsuccessful hunt, the clan of the avenger consents to a reconciliation.

I shall describe one of the many variants of the procedure for 614 reconciliation and ransom. Each of the hostile clans selects from 628 some neutral clan an able and eloquent /357/ man ("khlaj-nivukh" -- 682 literally: orator -- from the verb "khlayndzh" -- to speak, and ●537 the noun "nivukh" -- man). These will be the intermediaries be-[292] tween the parties. Each clan provides its khlay-nivukh with a silk gown, a cap of the same material, bow and arrows, a spear, and sometimes a Japanese saber. This is, so to speak, the official uniform of the intermediaries. One fine day, an armed deputation of khal'-nivukhi (clansmen), with the avenger and the khlay-nivukh at their head, appears near the hostile settlement. Then, somewhere in the nearby taiga or on the bank of some stream, the new arrivals light a fire and, so to speak, make their camp. From here the khlay-nivukh of the avengers sets out for the village of the murderer, where in one yurt his assembled clansmen khal'-nivukhi), with their orator at their head, await the emissary. The latter, having sat down and lighted his pipe (necessarily with his own flame), begins to set forth the demands for ransom. The role of the khlay-nivukh consists of stipulating as much as possible. The clansmen of the murderer reply with excuses and with a plea for a reduction of the conditions of the ransom. But the khlay-nivukh

/357 cont./

614 628 682 ●537 of the avengers, stubbornly insisting on his demands, departs in anger. The khlay-nivukh of the murderer goes after him and tries to enter into negotiations with his comrade-in-arms. More than once the two diplomats sear themselves on the ground and light their pipes, each with his own steel, until they finally reach the camp of the avengers, where the negotiations continue. It sometimes happens that the khlay-nivukhi move back and forth in this fashion from one camp to another for two or three days. Finally an agreement is reached. Now the company of the avengers begins to draw near the settlement, and out to meet them come the clansmen of the murderer, and both sides finally stop, facing each other within the distance of a bowshot. From one side, accompanied by his khlay-nivukh, the avenger steps forward, in gala attire, with a spear and a drawn bow; from the other steps the slayer, also with a drawn bow, side by side with his khlay-nivukh. The bow of each adversary is aimed directly at the heart of his enemy... A momentary flare-up -- and blood may flow. But the khlay-nivukhi strictly restrain the adversaries, speaking over and over again about peace and forgetting. And this is not merely a ritual, for there have been cases where in that minute the avenger has boiled over with wrath and slain his enemy on the spot. Then the adversaries simultaneously throw down their arms, run toward each other, and embrace. The reconciliation has been achieved, and the clansmen of the avenger, together with the latter, peacefully enter the yurt of the slayer, where the stipulated objects of ransom are laid before the plank beds and where /358/ excellent refreshments have been prepared. In another variant, the avenger and the slayer stand facing each other, each with his spear resting against the breast of his enemy; when the khlay-nivukhi call upon them for reconciliation, each of the clansmen on each side leads a dog between them, and then these animals are killed with spears (blood for blood).

/358 cont./

614 628 682 It is quite natural that the ransom should correspond to the condition of the murdered man and the wealth of the clan of the murderer. This explains to us the origin of the ancient punishments for murder among the Germanic and Slavic tribes, among whom there was no set amount for the fine (blood money); it depended on the rank and wealth of the murdered man. It is natural, also, that an unintentional killing entails a much smaller ransom than an intentional one. The entire khal' of the murderer participates in the payment, each according to his means. A

614 628 682 murder within the clan finds its avengers among the closest kinsmen of the murdered man and in the brother of his mother (i.e., a person from an alien clan, and he gets half of the ransom). An unintentional slaying within the clan among the Amur Gilyak incurs no consequences.

614 628 628 The khlay-nivukhi obtain as a reward for their labors their fine costumes, arms, and a dog. In conclusion, it must be said of vengeance that among the Gilyak vengeance is a sacred and

● [539] obligatory debt. And in life one must be indulgent toward phenomena of this sort. The Gilyak take vengeance frequently, not from any predisposition toward it, but from obligation. Re-

[762] venge is also extended to cases where someone has been driven to suicide, but in such a case the affair ends with the payment of a ransom or the infliction of property damage on the guilty person.

614 628 772 One of the forms of clan vengeance is war. Wars between clans came to an end with the appearance of the Russians, but the recollection of them lives in the popular memory; they tell [777] of them in tales; they sing of them in songs. Women were the most frequent cause of wars. A Gilyak abducts a woman and then falls into the hands of the kinsmen of the abducted woman; they kill him -- and a cause for war is provided. And, in general, injuries inflicted by the entire clan ended in war. There was no preliminary declaration of war. Once a clan had inflicted a blood injury on another clan, it awaited the unavoidable attack. And indeed, one fine day the whole adult population of the injured clan, armed with bows, spears, and knives, set off on an expedition

538

538 LITERATURE--literary styles; poetry (e.g., epic, lyric); verse forms (e.g., couplets, stanzas); poetic techniques (e.g., meter, rhyme, alliteration); prose forms (e.g., tales, sagas, proverbs, fiction, short stories, essays); narrative plot and structure; literary subjects and themes; characters (e.g., animals, men, gods); treatment (e.g., realism, fantasy, allegory, satire); composition; literary conventions; recitation and narration (e.g., occasions, audiences); specialists (e.g., poets, prose authors, story tellers, ghost writers); etc. This category is reserved for generalized descriptions of literature. For literary texts, and analyses and commentaries related to specific literary works see 539. See also:

Stylistics	198	Riddles	894
News norms and magazine articles	204	Lectures	644
Books and their publication	214	Mythology	779
Esthetic ideals and canons of taste	817	Sacred literature	779
Wit and humor	820	Humanistic studies	814

/26 cont./

224 traps begin. This is perhaps the most interesting season in the manifold yearly activities of the Gilyak. He leaves his home for several weeks and betakes himself to his inherited sable stream to watch for the valuable little beasts. During the daytime he inspects his snares and traps, shooting birds and any kind of animal that he meets along the way; for the night he betakes himself to his little balagan. He must live through some difficult moments in this little balagan. Here, in the wild taiga, amidst the gloom of night, the silence of the wilderness, or the howl of a snowstorm, to the lonely savage, cooped up at his minuscule hearth or vainly trying to warm himself /27/ at the temperature of the freezing of mercury, each rustle, each strange sound, each snap of a tree, howl of the wind, moan of a night bird, and, finally, the hallucinations of his own frightened imagination depict in all their terrible reality all the horrors of the Gilyak demonology. The devils and ogres of all the elements in the imagry of the Gilyak appear to him, to cause his destruction. And the terrible exhaustion after his labors, the lack of food -- all this aggravates the horror of the situation, bringing sickness often even death. Sable hunting, however, promises more than just terrors and adversity. A successful catch, gay company, a triumphal return home with the catch, stories about experiences, all this fully rewards the hunter worn out with suffering. But, on the whole, the Gilyak is not a hunter. Hunting with dogs is unfamiliar to him, the risky pursuit of bears, of which the Tungus are so fond,

[242] does not attract the Gilyak. By and large he is an ichthyophagist, and someone has very correctly said about him that he lives by frutti di mare /the fruits of the sea/.

221 The winter months are the gayest ones in the year. The supplies of fish have not yet been exhausted. On the earnings from

[874] the catch, tea, tobacco, rice, and buda were stored up, and the [796] Gilyak cares little about the future. Endless visiting begins, and

● [538] listening to the storytellers at night, and, beginning in February, there are the bear festivals, the happiest days in the life of the

[261] Gilyak. In March, however, the results of the winter extravagance [164] begin to tell, and there come the hard days of hunger and sometimes scurvy, which carries away dozens of flourishing lives. In

/55 cont./

776 For the Gilyak, the most important gods--"masters" are 825 Pal'-yz' -- the master of the mountains and of the taiga, and Tayrnadz, the same as Tol'-yz' -- master of the sea. The first lives on the highest mountain, and with him, whole settlements of his clansmen. Bears serve him as dogs. All the beasts of the taiga are subordinate to him, and, at his discretion, he distributes them to the Gilyak. It is he who orders the sable to dress himself in a new skin and hurry into the noose of the Gilyak; he, again, orders the bear to offer a good spot for a true blow. The god of the sea, Tayrnadz, lives on the bottom of the Sea of Okhotsk. He is a very old man with a white beard, who lives with his old wife in an underwater yurt. In the yurt there is a huge number of boxes with all kinds of spawn, which he throws by the handful into the sea from time to time. It is he who, at the appointed time, sends the countless detachments of salmon, without which the life of the Gilyak would be impossible; it is he who sends out the kosatki to establish order in the sea and drive all kinds of sea animals toward the Gilyak.

776 Besides these most important gods, there is a great number of less important ones who watch over the Gilyak. In the house of the Gilyak the master of the fire and the mistress of the threshold, keep vigil over him. Some kind of "master" watches at every stream, looking after the well-being of the Gilyak...

Not all the gods, however, are on such close terms with man. The sky is inhabited by whole tribes of tly-nivukh'i, heavenly people, who only rarely interfere in the affairs of the Gilyak, and then to no purpose, for a joke; for example, out of mischievousness a heavenly man will lower a fishing rod with hooks to the earth in order to catch some Gilyak. This does not always work, however. For example, the young

● [538] Gilyak, Il'k, from the village of Arkovo told me that tly-nivukh once caught his father with a golden hook, and he just saved himself by grabbing a tree, thus getting away with only a scare and a torn coat.

/100 cont./

000 To meet the maddened /101/ throng of avengers. Chivalry

* 614 manifests itself in many other forms. Although ordinarily 628 the raid of the avengers is too impulsive for people to be

721 able to think about any kind of formalities of attack,

● [538] epics and legends have preserved many formulas for the declaration of "war" through special intermediaries, about whom we shall speak in more detail later.

The conventional formula laconically declares: "He (the avenger) has irrevocably said that he prepares to come to do battle with thee; if thou art stronger, thou wilt slay him, if he is stronger, he will slay thee -- thus he spoke."

Military expeditions are undertaken for purposes other than avenging the slaying of a clansman. Extremely frequently they are on account of women. "Lovely Helens" are the tragic causes of war among the Gilyak much more frequently even than slayings. The latter are extremely rare and never bear a mercenary character, being exclusively a case of a momentary flare-up on the part of an easily aroused "barbarian" because of a slight offense to his vanity. But conflicts over women are much more frequent. Either a group of clansmen undertakes a purely romantic raid to abduct the beloved of their comrade. Or expeditions are undertaken with the forcible recovery of the abducted wife of a clansman as their objective -- a more serious incident, because this action is as obligatory for the clan (up to the third generation exclusively) as revenge and blood money for the slaying of a clansman. Customarily they strive to avoid bloodshed, choosing a time for the attack when the men are absent, but the matter rarely ends -- either at the time of the abduction or during the pursuit -- without bloody conflicts, which inevitably bring on the necessity of "raising the kindred bones," i.e., war with all its consequences.

/137 cont./

614 all in the fact that it embraces persons of both sexes alike;

*601 it equally signifies brother and sister. Another peculiarity --

602 still more important -- consists in the fact that under tuvn an understood not only own brothers and sisters, i.e., the children of one father, but also the children of all brothers of the father, own and collateral of all degrees of kinship, i.e., m and female first cousins, second cousins, etc. in the male line. Thus, within the clan, all the male and female agnat of the same generation are brothers and sisters; male and female cousins in the male line and likewise a married wom and the wives of the brothers /138/ of her husband are tuvn in relation to each other. But a man, as we shall see, can

*601 have tuvn outside his clan as well, namely, the children of 602 those persons outside his clan whom he calls father and mother (see the class of fathers and mothers). Within this class there is one large and important subdivision that plays a leading role in both terminology and sexual norms, namely the one for those persons who are older than the speaker or person referred to and persons younger than he, namely, "akand, aki" -- elder brother or sister (tuvn) and "ar'khand, ar'kh" -- younger brother or sister (tuvn). For the designatio of the elder sister, in view of the peculiarity of her position in sexual rights, there is in addition the term "nanakhand, nanakh, nankh" -- identically used in reference to her by bo men and women. Certain special terms for separate categ of this class, however, have been developed. Thus, there is a general term to designate the concept of "sister" in the class sense, namely, ranr (same root as ranikh -- sister). One meets (very rarely, however, and only in poetry) the term "kivung, kiun" -- brother (1). Descriptive forms are

● [538]

1. "Chikhys' kivung khendra" -- "I considered you a brother," says the heroine to her beloved in one song. "Kiun" could also be formed from the rare form akikhun.

"[LSS: During a cure by a medicine man] The eyes foams at the mouth, and sings the orders of the evil s

'Take two great dogs,
One black,
The other white;
Kill these two offerings
There,
Where is kept the bear;
That will make the sick man well.'

The first syllable in each line is articulated quickly slowly, merging into a howl. (1)

1. Each line in the Gilyak original is made to end

If the cham is angry with the sick man, or has any he may ruin the whole family by his interpretation of t to bring all their dogs and everything that they value m times human offerings were demanded."

of the cham are like flames; he pirit—

, and the last vowels in the line in a—aa.

spite against him or his relatives, he spirit's demands, forcing them nost. It is even said that in olden boats. However, there are some to be found among them who are considered singers; they are improvisors of a sort who entertain the others with their song.

The dance does not exist among the Gilyak, unless one includes in this category the spontaneous leaps with which a tipsy one occasionally cools off his exuberance. There is a reason for the Gilyak's facial expression of which we spoke above. It is neither sullen nor sad, but also not unhappy or good natured; it is serious or indifferent. But I must hasten to add that this immobility and indifference only reaches to a certain point. The Gilyak's imagination and his sense of humor are not immediately apparent, but in reality he possesses both. The favorite pastime on winter evenings is listening to a story teller, and his voice is alternately interrupted by laughter and exclamations.

Holidays and festivals. There are no special rest days which would, for instance, correspond to our Sundays. The bear festival is the only one worthy of this name. It is celebrated once a year during our January, it lasts two weeks and is accompanied by various entertainments. Young bears which, as we said, are brought up for this festival, are taken direct from their caves or they are bought from Sakhalin kinsmen. Occasionally 100 rubles are paid for a one-year-old. Young bruin is put into a hollowed-out tree trunk to which he is fastened with a chain, and thus he is transported by sled. The yurts where this traveler halts are considered particularly lucky. It has happened now and then that the bear, because of negligence on the part of the people transporting him, has crushed a child to death, but such accidents are not mourned by the parents, who regard it as a good omen.

The bear is kept in a special enclosure in his new home. An old woman is appointed to feed him and give him water. The latter is offered him in a long wooden spoon which is inserted through a little opening. His chief food consists of dried fish, sometimes he also gets millet and various scraps. [236]

Not all villages have bears, therefore people from different villages usually assemble for the festival, even from those places that had their own bear festival and had already consumed their bear. Often Sakhalin-Gilyak come to the mainland at this time, although they themselves are well supplied with bears.

Besides feasts, various amusements take place at the festival; for instance, dog races. A track is cleared on the ice and staked off, and the trained dogs run for wagers.

536

536 DRAMA--compositions for dramatic representation; types (e.g., tragedy, comedy, farce); themes (e.g., from myth, history, everyday life); treatment (e.g., realistic, stylized); conventional limitations on dramatic composition; characters and parts; impersonation; acting techniques (e.g., gestures, postures, emotional expression); costumes and paraphernalia; make-up; staging (e.g., scenery, lighting, props, musical accompaniment); acts, scenes, choruses, and interludes; specialists (e.g., playwrights, actors, stagehands, directors); relation of drama to dancing, mythology, magic, and ritual; special types of plays (e.g., puppet shows, shadow plays, musical comedies); special roles (e.g., clowns); etc. See also:

Gestures	201	Humor	522
Patterned expressions of emotion	201	Masks	532
Radio and television	207	Pageants and circuses	541
Cosmetics	302	Stage productions	546
Theater buildings	345	Motion pictures	546
Postures	516	Religious ceremonial	706

/105 cont./

* 614 628 537 [436] what a man! His right arm was worth so many "syalakhr" (1):

> 1. The syalakhr is a monetary unit which the Gilyak for some reason translate into Russian by the word "tselkovi" /one ruble/ and value in our money at three rubles, -- apparently the Chinese customs duty. It is in these units that the Gilyak evaluate their exchange values -- the shagund (see above).

if he were living, would he be content to take that much? His left arm was worth so much, etc." Then all the other parts of the body are listed, and the amount of the blood money is computed. If the opposing side agrees, it lays in the kettle of the orator as many pieces of wood as it has agreed to pay "tselkovi." But agreement is never reached at once. The orator of the opposing side seeks to find excuses for the slayer and offers a minimum ransom. This angers his opponent, and he wrathfully departs, threatening to break off negotiations. His colleague hastens after him, urging him to make concessions. They sit down, each one lights up a pipe, always with his own fire, they quarrel, again one of them flies into a passion and hastens off, again they come together and return to the settlement... [576] Etiquette demands that an agreement should not be reached at once, but only after stubborn opposition; therefore sometimes two and three days pass in endless meetings and separations. [171] [789] Some khlaj-nivukh on the Amur resort at the last moment, after the manner of the Tungus tribes, to the aid of their magic rods, which they threaten to break and thereby bring the wrath of the gods upon themselves and their stubborn opponents.

* 614 628 ● 536 When an agreement has been reached, the religious feature that I mentioned above enters in, the procedure of an imitation of a bloody battle, which is supposed to conceal from the soul of the slain man and the clan gods the peaceful solution of the conflict.

/105 cont./

*614 628 •536 A procession of the avengers with the khlaj-nivukh at their head sets out toward the settlement of the foe, and out to meet them comes /106/ a similar procession of the clan of the slayer. At a distance of several dozen sagenes from each other, both sides stop, and out comes the closest kinsman with his khlaj-nivukh, and from the other side advances the slayer with his "intermediary," both armed with bows and spears. At a signal given by the khlaj-nivukh'i they begin to shoot arrows at each other or attack with their spears, adroitly dodging the arrows and blows. The duel, of course, is fictitious, although there have been instances where the opponents grew excited and the matter ended sadly. All this time the khlaj-nivukh'i pacify their clients insisting on reconciliation. In the meantime the clansmen [782] lead a dog apiece among their opponents and kill them with spears ("blood for blood"). Then the opponents hasten to embrace each other, and peace is concluded. The heart of the slain dog is sacrificed to the bird-avenger (see above), while the meat is eaten at the feast that follows.

*614 628 Then the representatives of both sides set off for the yurt of the slayer, where the objects constituting the tkhusind are placed -- kettles, spears, sabers, silken materials, and so forth. All the clansmen participate in the payment of the latter, each according to his wealth, considering it a great sin to evade his proportionate share. On the other hand, the acquired tkhusind becomes the common property of the clan of the slayer /sic/. In part it replaces those valuables which were needed for the dead man in the "settlement of the dead"; in part it becomes a fund for the family of the slain man and the clan requirements.

628 537 554 The negotiations over tkhusind for other causes, such as, for example, the abduction of a woman, the defilement of sacred things, and so on, are also conducted through the intervention of khlaj-nivukh'i, but without any particular ceremony. The intermediaries judge the moot points in the presence of the assembled people, hear the opinions of those present, and the decision is, as it were, the verdict of the whole gathering.

/325 cont./

756 538 [688] Improvisation of a storyteller-shaman. To compose, tyl'gund, is not allowed; it is a sin. This is a legend, truth.

[776] N'as'tund may (be told) by a n'as'tun'-n'ivukh (storyteller) or a shaman, who is helped by a special kind of kekhn (mif-n'ivukh-kekhn, who sits on the tongue of the speaker. When inquiring about the possibility of improvisation, Koynyt (a shaman) said, "I can," and began to improvise.

With my own eyes I saw that this was inspiration by the richness and elusive quickness of the flow of words and the force of the speech. Tyurn listened with ecstasy and with interest asked for explanations.

756 533 538 Even before that he sang songs. The melody of the song was far from that which accompanies n'as'-tund; there is a great deal of grace and tenderness in it.

In places a quiet tenor vibrates beautifully with the sounds of a cello and in places flows into the thinnest pianissimo, while shrieks and artificial throat vibrations sound with tremendous dissonance. The entire song is sung without stopping for a breath, and at the end of a stanza the shaman comes to the end by abruptly cutting off with the words "hand furu" -- "thus it is said." Frequently, he finishes his song covered with perspiration.

Declamation and singing in narration. 1. In a nas'-tund: a) first humming, b) then -- monotonous, vibrating, doleful singing with all one's might, ending in c) fortissimo with exhaling.

2. In descriptions -- a single-tone recitative.

• [536] 3. Dramatism: the artistic communication of conversations in a rhythmic recitative is especially good. If one becomes accustomed to it, it is very melodious.

4. Those present support him with yells: "Ola! epoj, epoj!" etc.

756 776 The kenchkh is a bird which comes on the wind. They pull on a thong with the kenchkh during the song. Two men (one a shaman) cast a rope, and the kenchkh seizes it and pulls over the people.

537

537 ORATORY--rhetorical style; patterned forms of oratory (e.g., narration, debating, exhortation); techniques of declamation (e.g., exaggeration, repetition, figures of speech); gestures and postures in orating; training in public speaking; occasions for oratory; etc. See also:

Stylistics 195
Gestures 201
Postures 516
Boasting 521
Lectures and debates 544 Parliamentary debates 646 Electioneering 666
Arguments in court 695 Pronouncing of spells 789 Preaching 793

*614 even to his own clear advantage, 771 already tested expedient, with th gods with full observance of his c other cases, to pious deception o opportunity both to fulfill his rel *614 gains from the conflict. Usually 628 procedure of the institution of bl 771 and indeed traces of religious ce preserved among all peoples, am count later on, this is distinctly which demands a preliminary im form of a battle between represe killing of dogs, and the feeding their blood.

628 Now let us proceed to the pr
● 537 The principal role in the pro 554 by the so-called khlaj-nivukh'i ( *614 [192]
[197]

1. I use the term of western dialect.

Khlaj-nivukh -- literally: t orator. Such a man enjoys speci for in his view the eloquent indiv ticular deity who constantly inspi spires in him beautiful, convinci influence on his hearers. The ve ability to speak fluently and rapi apart from the content of the spe talent of the highest order. "His windmill," thus, with awe, does standing orators. The latter, in t [532] ones. On the continent they alw head of which is carved a human deity which inspires them and hel pathetic moments they wave thes them in the event of the failure o wrath of the gods upon themselves but he has, as we know, an e help of which he pacifies the wn interest; he resorts, as in f the gods, which offers him the gious duty and to derive material

, this most important religious ood money is completely ignored, emonies of reconciliation are not ong the Gilyak, as we shall reclear from the ritual of ransom, itation of blood revenge in the ntatives of the warring clans, the of the spirit of the dead man with actice of this institution. ocedure of reconciliation is played 1).

the more widespread he explaining man, /104/ eloquent, al regard in the eyes of the Gilyak, vidual is the chosen one of a par-ires him, dwells in him, and in-ng speeches and an irresistible ery quickness of speech, the dly for a prolonged time, even ech, is already considered a tongue turns like the wings of a s the Gilyak characterize outturn, regard themselves as chosen ays carry a wooden rod, on the face, depicting, apparently, that lps them to convince others. At e threateningly, swearing to break f their arguments and bring the s and their intractable opponent.

/145 conc./

Both the case-form gilenq, in the form gila ч̌ьнчун or ginenq, appear at a kinship term — namely, in the meaning of younger brother of the father: gila-ч̌ун — father — is a term that has evidently been made up under the influence of the Tungus ajja.

Plural kinship terms. Due to the classificatory system there has developed the concept of the plural of the term such as father, mother, wife in reference to a single individual, for example, ч̌ун plurals ч̌ун — "I am going to my fathers" (i. e., to the village where the clan of the speaker's father lives, even though his own father may no longer be alive); ч̌ун plurals ч̌ун — "I am going to my fathers and mothers."

/146/ Owing to the frequent use of such terms in the plural, a sudden curious phenomenon has resulted. In the first place, they have begun to use the plural form of a given term in those cases where by the sense that reference is to only one person, for example, in the phrase, "I have a kinsman" — "where did my father go?" they often say, "ч̌ун-ин (kinsman) ч̌ун — "where did my fathers go?" Another example: "ata, ритйин ninja" — "O, elder brother, only one father (?)"! Said immediately after the characteristic example

1. L. Sibenrieg, Materialy po inostrannoj gilliarskoju azyku I Sa'ksyr (Materials for the Study of the Gilyak Language and Folklore), I, p. 15, Iste 173. Petersburg, 1896. Published in the Notes of the Gilyak Language and Folklore, I, p. 15, Iste 173. Petersburg, 1896. Published in the Notes of the Imperial Academy of Sciences, Vol. 73, Appendix No. 1.

from one of the texts taken down by me (G). The hero of a 2. Ibid., p. 85, Iste 108-109; p. 86, Iste 110-112.

/146 conc./

In these cases where the "older brother" are evidently form the class "ata" with respect to the river of "younger brother" — namely, the "younger brother" is the "older brother" of the deceased, but here also, in the absence of "younger brother," one of the "older brothers" is obliged to accept the name "ata" — "father." However, in killed too, give him my daughter. Do not fail to carry out my will in my report." In such is the force of the elective categories of importance of marriages between the categories common relatives. This interpretation, the Gilyak ритйин ninja, must speak in detail. The levirate marriage is a more or less exceptional phenomenon, when he has not the exemption in comparison with the bears of marriage later on. For one purpose the right—although not necessarily—of the levirate, and ритйин lies in the other classes of this category, which are well-known to us from the marriage terminology, in other words, in the condition of the normal marriages. This right—obligation characteristic of the levirate, which, as we have seen, is a thing more considerably shaken under the influence of causes about which we shall further — the Gilyak ata is also used in the meaning of father and mother, father and clansmen, "Гоголевайн" (relatively, "my wives") — in the sense of the beloved and her girl-friends. The term "ata" (namely, "father-in-law /ритйин") — the son-in-law together with his wives. In a curious clan in Tamgu we evidently meet the same phenomenon. I judge this by one case introduced by Imbut'sen, where a man says "my father" (father-in-law) of "my father", although Imbut'sen admits that the plural could be used out of respect to the man's father, namely, in the case, in the same context — "a friend to my fathers will wander" — the father is being addressed by the plural form, which, most apparently there is no need for rendering any particular respect.

/147 conc./

Marriage of the Gilyak. Then he immediately enters the killer to be summoned to his house, that is, the man against whom blood vengeance is obligatory, although the killing was unpremeditated, and he says to him: "I have come to allow into his house, and in the presence of the assembled members of the clan he solemnly says: "Brother, I have killed, I killed you, give him my daughter. Do not fail to carry out my will in my report." In such is the force of the elective categories of importance of marriages between the categories common relatives. This interpretation, the Gilyak ритйин ninja, must speak in detail. The levirate marriage is a more or less exceptional phenomenon, when he has not the exemption in comparison with the bears of marriage later on. For one purpose the right—although not necessarily—of the levirate, and ритйин lies in the other classes of this category, which are well-known to us from the marriage terminology, in other words, in the condition of the normal marriages. This right—obligation characteristic of the levirate, which, as we have seen, is a thing more considerably shaken under the influence of causes about which we shall further — the Gilyak ata is also used in the meaning of father and mother, father and clansmen, "Гоголевайн" (relatively, "my wives") — in the sense of the beloved and her girl-friends. In the Gilyak ata also stands for the son-in-law /ритйин/ — the son-in-law together with his wives. In a curious clan in Tamgu we evidently meet the same phenomenon. I judge this by one case introduced by Imbut'sen, where a man says "my father" (father-in-law) of "my father", although Imbut'sen admits that the plural could be used out of respect to the man's father, namely, in the case, in the same context — "a friend to my fathers will wander" — the father is being addressed by the plural form, which, most apparently there is no need for rendering any particular respect.

/147 conc./

body was laid on the funeral platform amidst a huge and solemn crowd of Gilyak who had assembled from all directions, the relatives of the deceased, before the wife of the older brother, with her hair unbound as a sign of mourning, climbed up to it, made obeisance to the corpse, and in complete silence, as if in a trance, she solemnly says: "Brother, I have killed you, give me your daughter." Then the relatives of the deceased, and in complete silence, as if in a trance, and in complete silence, as if in a trance, and in complete silence, as if in a trance

/336 cont. /

In view of the fact that in ethnographic literature sexual intercourse and marriages of Gilyaks women are often confused with homosexuality, I shall cite very characteristic instances of hermaphroditism from the life of the Gilyaks known to me. On Sakhalin I know of two cases. In the settlement of Yanu, near Aleksandrovsk, there lived an old Gilyak, Chokhu, who was known as a hermaphrodite, since up to a certain age he considered himself a woman (the membrum stille was underdeveloped) and wore woman's clothing. Later the membrum virile attained the proper development, and he began to wear men's clothing and finally married. I learned of another instance in the settlement of Ney Gyrk on the western shore in the far north of Sakhalin. There I once met two young people sitting on the dikes, a man and a woman, who appeared to be spouses. I immediately noticed that the latter very much resembled a man in dat face. My companion explained that only a year ago the had been wearing men's clothing, considered herself a man, and was very friendly with her present husband. Once they went fishing together. They had to spend the night together, and then the hermaphrodite revealed her sex to her friend. From that time on they began to live together and ended up by getting married, although people strongly urged the young man against it. /Taking this into account, there can be no question of a rise to the legends about transformed persons (those werewolves), / but the latter very boldly and seriously spoke to me with concerning his hermaphrodite friend. The latter had been a girl up to a certain age. Suddenly he began to notice that he was developing a membrum virile, which could send sometimes grow larger, sometimes diminish, and sometimes disappear completely. He communicated this to his lover, who came to him at night and was convinced of the truth of his words and on the next day told everyone about it. In the course of several years the hard grow and the male organ was definitely developed, although his vagina was also fully developed, and he could have intercourse with men. After

/337 cont. /

XII.

Methods of Obtaining a Wife

/338 Data from the epos. It is first of interest to reconstruct the picture of the acquisition of a wife in the old days according to the old texts of epic poems. Judging from these texts, especially from the so-called yrkhnad (poems), the acquisition of a wife in the old days was not at all an easy matter (1).

/339 (1). That the procuring of a wife was a matter of great difficulty is very expression for this undertaking, gulyk i yarpgyl, literally "to the dogs, to wash or nanygyled is a technical term for the hunting of a beast, usually accompanied by difficulties with the stench and all sorts of dangers.

On the contrary, one of the chief exploits of the heroes is the search for a wife. In order to find his wife, the hero of a Gilyak poem must undertake the most difficult and arduous journeys to the end of the world; he must kill over normy seas, even among the heavens in the underworld or the bottom of the sea, not to speak of all sorts of heroic deeds with whole clans of the most fearsome foes -- deeds concerned in the course of these peregrinations.

Why is it so, why must the hero, a strong man, of necessity seek his wife far away, when he has every opportunity to find a wife nearby?

First of all, we shall note that the aforementioned term nanygyled "to seek a wife" is very clear, and we have to think that the ordinary mode of securing a wife for the heroes was force, abduction. They, the heroes, did not buy wives, but most frequently they obtained their wives in the most peaceful manner, without even paying anything. This is evidence is known to every interested individual, and consequently we can find them in the same settlement. But such is the fate of heroes; marvellous adventures always fall to their lot. Commonly they are isolated people, whose lives have suffered some catastrophe. In the epics they relate that the hero appears with his demands he is addressed by the term yrmyl -- son-in-law /yrgyl/, and the woman to whom he makes claim are designated ninyl, he then also refer to some other possible candidates, silent to him, they do not call her ninyl. Here is a characteristic example. The hero of one poem (2) /360/ was rejected by his lawful nanygyl, who declared that if she had to marry him she would kill herself. Then the hero said: "Why, why, why? Once the maiden does not want him, what can you do? Go and seek another woman." And, appearing at the house of whom he is to be his wife, he must kill over normy seas, even among the heavens in the underworld or the bottom of the sea, not to speak of all sorts of heroic deeds with whole clans of the most fearsome foes -- deeds concerned in the course of these peregrinations.

/359 cont. /

2. L. Shternberg, Materialy po inorodtsam gilliatskogo laryka i t.d. Sbornik Muzeiskogo Obozreniya. Otdel. Gilyatsk Language and Folklore/, 1908, p. 118.

Why is it so, why must the hero, a strong man, of necessity seek his wife far away, when he has every opportunity to find a wife nearby?

First of all, we shall note that the aforementioned term nanygyl literally means "to seek a wife," and we have to think that the ordinary mode of securing a wife for the heroes was force, abduction. They, the heroes, did not buy wives, but most frequently they obtained their wives in the most peaceful manner, without even paying anything. This is such statements, as we shall see further on, are not at all rare. In the epic poems of the Gilyaks, the hero, faced the man of olden times -- either to marry his lawful nanygyl, who belongs to him by law, or to obtain a wife by force, while at the same time there is almost no mention of betrothal to an alien woman as a special form of marriage -- proves that obtaining a woman by purchase was a later institution, established as a corrective of the custom of abduction with /bilyl yrk/ as its bloody consequence, just as ransom was a corrective of blood revenge.

/360 cont. /

The one and the same, the father of the bride, questions the hero: "Then art a man from where?" Our Gilyaks: "I am a dweller of the village in the middle of the bay; I have come to take my daughter in marriage." The hero said: "Give me, Father, my child, this giant has come to take thee, go with him." This woman said: "Why, why, why? I shall go with him." The hero said: "No, slaves! Prepare a meal, feed the guest". -- Our Gilyak sat with his wife. Having eaten, having finished, he set out with his wife" (1). Another example: the hero depicts this simplicity of ritual. "That old man (the father of the bride) said: 'Eat with your husband.' Then that woman sits with our Gilyak. Having eaten, they went out, attained, came to the house of the bridegroom, got in under one blanket, lay down, and slept." On the following day the hero departed with his wife and the dowry (2).

2. Ibid., 81.

But along with such lawful marriages there are also marriages of a different character, which have no sanction. And this is quite natural, for such misfortune may overtake the hero that the clans of his lawful father-in-law may become extinct, and willy-nilly he must obtain a wife by force.

/361 cont. /

Contemporary method of obtaining a wife. Up to the present time Gilyak law has retained the old custom of marrying a woman of the nanygyl category, a woman who is regarded as his wife by right, which, however, is frequently not consecrated "pure." And people who are staunchly for the laws of antiquity try to observe the old law. Of all the categories of nanygyl the most complete example is the daughter of the mother's brother, in other words, the most schedule in marriage. The hero is more dear than the daughter of a brother and the son of his sister. Such a marriage is so highly valued that even before the future spouses appear in the world of the living they promise to each other their word to unite the children in marriage. Even before the birth of the children, when they have reached age of three or four, there takes place in the presence of the classmen of one side or the other a formal act of agreement in the form of betrothal of the future spouses. The mother of the groom may carry on the negotiations, not with the father of the bride (as is the case in other cases, versation between brother and sister is prohibited) but with his wife. The whole procedure of agreement amounts to this: the mother-in-law /yrat/ /yrat/ /yrat/of safety from evil magical influences) and social, as a symbol of friendship, sympathy or the desire to take a wife from the clan of one's mother, and then one can even get her for nothing, and what is important is that, it is not in any case. In the past one did not pay for a woman if she was from the clan of one's mother. It is not permitted to intermarry between clans. Here, too, men's daughter is given for sale to the wife's brother, but the latter cannot marry her.

/ГЛ1 conds./

There is a prohibition against the descendants of one's sister down to the fourth generation.

In Vaydy (see above) there are Gilyak of the Ilimsing clan who have entered into a union with the Chukcy with the Khydyr' in Chal'bo. Formerly, they lived together in the same locality and belonged to the clan of the tiger. There is a Gilyak who which has become related to a snake (there are snakes on the Amgun: they were sent on the Amgun by Pytyvu (1). There are also Golds who are kin to snakes.

1: In the text, "bea," but, judging by sense it is a misprint for "bea," meaning "marbleskin glitterbugs satyba I fed Mom Pakhamsin to the Gilyak and Tungus and Yukagir and Yukhtsyr, this is a mistake

A young man from Vaydy fell in love with the wife of a Koman, a Gilyak woman, and enjoyed reciprocity. She went to the town with a fish; the Koman stayed to guard the potatoes. Then the lover was in the town. They met and spent two weeks in the town. She came home — her mother also liked the Gilyak.

The Koman demanded that his wife sleep with him. But she resisted. At night the Gilyak woman ran outside and slept with the Gilyak. The husband gave her a beating, a tumpline saber, and also burned tried to protect her; the Koman complained, why did he take a Gilyak woman. He killed the Koman (petitioner) the

/ГЛ2/
A person can take two sisters as wives. Brothers may take widows without marriage. A man is helped by a sister to take a wife from the clan of one's mother, and then one can even get her for nothing, and what is important is that, it is not in any case. In the past one did not pay for a woman if she was from the clan of one's mother. It is not permitted to intermarry between clans. Here, too, men's daughter is given for sale to the wife's brother, but the latter cannot marry her.

There is a prohibition against the descendants of one's sister down to the fourth generation.

In Vaydy (see above) there are Gilyak of the Ilimsing clan who have entered into a union with the Chukcy with the Khydyr' in Chal'bo. Formerly, they lived together in the same locality and belonged to the clan of the tiger. There is a Gilyak who which has become related to a snake (there are snakes on the Amgun: they were sent on the Amgun by Pytyvu (1). There are also Golds who are kin to snakes.

1: In the text, "bea," but, judging by sense it is a misprint for "bea," meaning "marbleskin glitterbugs satyba I fed Mom Pakhamsin to the Gilyak and Tungus and Yukagir and Yukhtsyr, this is a mistake

A young man from Vaydy fell in love with the wife of a Koman, a Gilyak woman, and enjoyed reciprocity. She went to the town with a fish; the Koman stayed to guard the potatoes. Then the lover was in the town. They met and spent two weeks in the town. She came home — her mother also liked the Gilyak.

The Koman demanded that his wife sleep with him. But she resisted. At night the Gilyak woman ran outside and slept with the Gilyak. The husband gave her a beating, a tumpline saber, and also burned tried to protect her; the Koman complained, why did he take a Gilyak woman. He killed the Koman (petitioner) the Interpretation of a storytelling character. To compose, to tend. In Gilyak dialects, it is kin. This is a legend, truth.

/ГЛ4/ Kin

/ГЛ5/ Kmal may be tied to a gl'ka/ "gl'ksh (marvellous) in Amurian, meaning a feeling of joy and happiness. / gl'ksh-/ Gilyak, who sits on the origin of the speaker. When interrupting stories (multiple) or conversations, Gilyak (a Gilyak) said, "I can," and begin to improvise.

With my own eyes I saw that one man who was impatient by the richness and elusive quickness of the flow of words and the force of the speech. Tyen listened with ecstasy and with interest mixed for explanations.

Even before that he sang songs. The melody of the song was far from that which accompanied /ГЛ7/conds. There is a great deal of grace and tenderness in it.

In Amur-Sakhalin region Gilyak dance beautifully with the sounds of a cello and in places flows into the thinnest pizzicato, while they believe that Gilyak pizzicato sound with tremendous elegance. The strike song is sung without stopping for a breath, and at the end of the strike, the Gilyak performer, the cat by the shoulder, and the word: "Kmal ka" — "than it is said." Frequently, in the Gilyak language, there are Kmal, Kmal, Dictatorium and singing in narration. In a /ка/ conds. a) fact belonging, b) that which belongs, c) belonging, d) singing with all one's might, ending in e) fortitude with exhaling.

1: Dictatorium — a single-verse recitative.

2: Dictatorium, the artistic communication of conversations in Gilyak: recitative and especially Gilyak. The sick woman is accompanied to it, it is very melodious.

4: Those present support him with yells: /ylk/ /ylk/ /ylk/ /ylk/ etc.

The /ылк/ka is a kind which comes on the wind. They pull the /ылк/ka, and the /ылк/ka sings the song. Two men come a distinct and a tape, and the /ылк/ka raises it and pulls over the jungle.

/ГЛ9 conds./
with a feeling that is strange for people with a primitive mode of life. Tyen attempts to sing and has great reverence in this feeling. That a rich man should inspire fear and respect is a thing easy to understand, but the feeling of respect for a poorer man is a peculiar source, not complete, rather, however, to our understanding. It was the feeling of respect for the poor man (Gilyak) said, "I can," and begin to improvise.

With my own eyes I saw that one man who was impatient by the richness and elusive quickness of the flow of words and the force of the speech. Tyen listened with ecstasy and with interest mixed for explanations.

Even before that he sang songs. The melody of the song was far from that which accompanied /ГЛ7/conds. There is a great deal of grace and tenderness in it.

In Amur-Sakhalin region Gilyak dance beautifully with the sounds of a cello and in places flows into the thinnest pizzicato, while they believe that Gilyak pizzicato sound with tremendous elegance. The strike song is sung without stopping for a breath, and at the end of the strike, the Gilyak performer, the cat by the shoulder, and the word: "Kmal ka" — "than it is said." Frequently, in the Gilyak language, there are Kmal, Kmal, Dictatorium and singing in narration. In a /ка/ conds. a) fact belonging, b) that which belongs, c) belonging, d) singing with all one's might, ending in e) fortitude with exhaling.

1: Dictatorium — a single-verse recitative.

2: Dictatorium, the artistic communication of conversations in Gilyak: recitative and especially Gilyak. The sick woman is accompanied to it, it is very melodious.

4: Those present support him with yells: /ylk/ /ylk/ /ylk/ /ylk/ etc.

The /ылк/ka is a kind which comes on the wind. They pull the /ылк/ka, and the /ылк/ka sings the song. Two men come a distinct and a tape, and the /ылк/ka raises it and pulls over the jungle.

burned their dead, but they also buried them in the earth. During the burning, they had to make a fire, which they had brought the corpse and the shaman. Shaman's corpse was placed in the fire, and the shaman was placed in the fire. The burning of the corpse took place indefinitely later, on the day of the "rib." The fire in the corpse was burned, and the shaman was placed in the fire. The fire in the corpse was burned, and the shaman was placed in the fire. The fire in the corpse was burned, and the shaman was placed in the fire.

/121 conf./

Lakkam. Whatever I have, (with it) am ready to aid thee, although I have nothing.

539 Pavu. If thou hast something, wait thou not pay me, with this not wish to laugh?

Lakkam. To day I have nothing (but nothing, it is not so?

Pavu. Of course.

Lakkam. If thou hast something, then wait have pay me.

Pavu. Then thou hast have nothing, I gladness me. Thus in truth thou not ready to give me what thou hast?

Lakkam. What I have, if thou shall ask, I am ready to give thee.

After this the matchmaker again proclaimed, and finally, everyone fully assented. Then the bridegroom's father gave me what thou hast. Now you have a daughter, I have a son. Let us become ahmrah's."

To this Lakkam replied: "I have already given my word to others."

Pavu: What if you did give your word to another man? You also gave your word to me before witnesses. I will go to court with you.

After such preliminary negotiations, they proceed to the business negotiations concerning the bride price.

Bride price and dowry. In the Gilyak Shamanist of the bride price, payment for the bride, the term that the Gilyak call this institution is extremely characteristic. The term, I believe, throws light on the very origin of the institution.

In the Gilyak language bride price is expressed by the word gif, gif from mimgif, or-kaa-gif, or-kaa-gif, literally, gif means a present, a gift, which the family or the clan of the groom gives to the family or the clan of the bride. This term was not formed by chance it shows from two following. In other tribal clans where compensation for such relative is obligatory, for example, in the case of [illegible] — [illegible] said for an abducted woman, for a

J:Sternberg--412 E-3 (1890-1897, 1910)1933 RXG Gilyak RXG

/124 conf./

539 be advised on how to live in a strange land, and, if she is unhappy about the marriage, they try to persuade her in every way possible. During the farewell feast the groom's father introduces the bride, and both eat from one dish and smoke from the same pipe, but during that day they usually do not converse. In general, the groom is supposed to compact himself modestly the whole day, and not to converse. Late in the evening, when the feast is over, the bride's mother orders the bridegroom to lie down on the bride's bed, and the marriage act is consummated. On the next morning the newly married woman brings breakfast to her husband. The newly married woman calls her husband." On that very morning they depart. Before the departure there is a last [illegible] and at that time the parents of the bride exchange prayers of good wishes. Here is an example of such benedictions, taken down on the Amur.

"If god gives happiness, they will live out their time happily. If there is no happiness, they will live out their time badly. O god, make the life of our children happy ever."

After this the father or a clansman of the groom says /125/ the following prayer: "O god, make, may there be the time of our children, in order that we may live happily; to our life together give good fortune."

Saying their benedictions, they sprinkle vodka in the direction of the heavens and in all directions. Before actually carrying out they go through a ceremony which begins the wedding. The ceremony is called "the battle." It consists of the following. At the inner side of the threshold of the yurt there is placed a large Manchurian kettle with two little ears (for the feeding of dogs) from the bride price of the groom, and at the outer side a small kettle from the bride's parents. Upon going out of the yurt, the bride and the groom, each with the other, pour one ladle of the large kettle and the other four in the small kettle, not treading on the threshold. This ceremony establishes a friendship union of mutual nourishment and mutual friendship in the presence of the two female penates — the "old woman-mistress of the threshold" and the "mistress of the crossbeam over the door."

J:Sternberg--416 E-3 (1890-1897, 1910)1933 RXG Gilyak RXG

/126 conf./

539 They saw in their dreams that during the daytime when no one saw them an Amur Gilyak named Tyr, 22 years old and from the upper (or inner) side of the Amur, went to the Ulcha land (Tyrkhala) and married the Ulcha girl Ulchi Ulchi. The Ulcha girl Ulchi Ulchi, while the Amur Gilyak Tyr, 22 years old, was in the Ulcha land, married the Ulcha girl Ulchi Ulchi. The Amur Gilyak Tyr, 22 years old, and the Ulcha girl Ulchi Ulchi, married in the Ulcha land

/346 cont./

539 down; no one knew. They were sleeping; he dreamed (that the fish said to him: "This is your little boy, see to it that no one knows. Feed him well. If another Gilyak looks, the little boy will die. You will have many fish, in hunting you will have many sables and bears." Many days passed, and there were many fish. In autumn he went to set nooses; the god provided 50 sables; he looked for bears in the ridges and killed three bears. One more year passed, and the little boy grew rapidly, the little boy began to carry the dagger -- the ytk (father) became old -- and the god gave many fish to the little boy; then he went after the bears /346/ and killed many with the dagger, no weapons except the dagger; he killed 30 bears. On one occasion the largest bear came. The bear wanted to eat him, but he struck it in the head with the dagger, and the bear ran away alive; again the little boy went home and lay down to sleep. Again he had an uyngid. Pal-n'ivukh came with a hole in his head and blood and said: "Party! You constantly strike our head with your dagger; if you are strong, I shall not kill you, if I am strong I shall kill you. Now you will have ukhmund." The little boy again went to hunt for bear. The big bear himself came; the bear immediately grabbed the dagger that was hanging on his body and the little boy was not able to get at it. Then they entered into single combat; they wrestled for a long, long time, and both fell dead.

A bear argued with a chipmunk /burunduk/: "I am afraid only of dogs." And the chipmunk said: "And I am not at all afraid of dogs." The first: "I am afraid of arrows." The second: "And I am not afraid of arrows." The bear became angry and scratched the chipmunk with its paw. Hence, five spots (?--illegible. S. Sh.) on the back of the chipmunk.

A noose said to a trap: "Go ahead and catch by yourself, I shall not catch." The trap said: "You go yourself and catch," etc. As a result they did not catch anything.

/750 cont./

778 532 [126] Several neatly carved and interesting idols were also sold to me in the village of Patt. On one the back of the head had the shape of a heart; on another two human figures stood on a block which represented two hearts (Plate LV /p. 1255/, Fig. 5). /751/ The heart (ngif), by the way, is very often used on such carvings (see 13 /p. 1202/ above).

[825] Among the idols here there was one with the head of a tung or sea bear /fur seal/. The sea dog /harbor seal/ is also represented in idol form, but I did not obtain any (2 S.R. I, pp. 6-9).

22. Gilyak. A figure carved in wood which was found not far from Tschchyrkrach at the mouth of the Amur roughly represents a flying fish-man. The head is similar to the head of a fish, with iron teeth in the upper and lower jaws. The eyes are represented by blue glass-beads. The front and rear extremities are attached near the back of the neck. The former are evidently arms with hands on them, the latter legs with feet, similar to those of a human being. The former are stretched out toward the front, the latter toward the rear, approximately on a horizontal plane with the head, so that the figure seems to be represented in flight (Plate LXVI /p. 1266/, Fig. 1). C. v. Ditmar (who was in part instrumental in my obtaining the figure) told me that among the Gilyak of Patchá there is a legend which he was not disinclined to connect with it, since this village and the cape mentioned were not far apart.

778 532 539 "Once upon a time," the story goes, "the Gilyak of Patchá returned from fishing on two boats laden with fish. They were too tired to unload the fish at once and postponed the work until the next morning. The boats were merely pulled out and the fish covered with birch bark or the like. The next morning, when they wanted to set to work, they found the boats empty. All around, however, lay many scraps from the fish which clearly proved that someone had made a hearty meal of them. They therefore set out again to fish and again returned with a full load. But again they postponed the unloading, and the same thing happened to them as on the day before. They went fishing for the

G /751 cont./
778 third time and again brought back two full boats. But this time 532 they decided to keep watch during the night in order to detect 539 the destroyer of their catch. They succeeded and the culprit was caught. It was a strange shape with the head of a fish and human arms and legs. The monster was placed in a structure similar to the one erected for the bear and was fed with fish. It lived in this captivity for a year, and then it asked the Gilyak to free it. They took it to a cape on the Amur River between the village of Patchä and Cape Tschchyrkrach and tied it there to a well. But the monster bit the rope in two and disappeared, so that when the Gilyak returned it was no longer there."

G 778 764 I now asked among the Gilyak what the figure represented and what its purpose was. They replied unanimously that the figure was called wagn, and they explained to me that this designated the place where the corpse of a slain Gilyak was burned (Bm. I, pp. 50, 51.)

23. Gilyak. Standing in the brush near the village of Patt (on the right bank of the Amur) there was a wagn which was for a Gilyak who had been killed by an Amgunj /Amgun/ Nägda
G [126] /Negda/. The wagn was old and the eyes had fallen out, but the extremities were all there, only much less carefully /752/ worked than on the specimen acquired by me in Tschchyrkrach. The wagn reached from the ground up to my belt and was pointing with the head to where the murderer lived, that is, in the direction of the Amgunj. I do not wish to say, however, that such an arrangement was the rule among the Gilyak. (2 S. R. I, p. 8.)

G 778 825 764 [163] 24. Olcha. The Olcha assign an identical fate to those who die peacefully and those killed by human hand and erect no wagn for the latter, as do the Gilyak. According to the information of the Olcha Chossiambo the representation of the wagn is based on the bird kóro whose appearance in any village is disastrous for its entire population. For whoever sees it must die. Such a G 778 825 773 case had happened many years before in the village of Chala, opposite Kisi (Kidsi?). The kóro had come and perched on the tip of a larch tree (Olcha sissa, Gilyak koi), where the inhabitants of Chala saw it, and all who saw it died, and only a very few escaped

9. Hawes--116 L-3 (1901) 1903 Gilyak
116, 539, 766, 775, 825

"Wild swans occasionally flew across high overhead, and a woodpecker could be heard tap-tapping the trees. Our natives eagerly asked us to shoot the eagles which soared aloft or settled on the top of a high tree, only to fly away as we approached within gunshot. These were the white-tailed eagles (Haliëtus albicillus), prized by the natives for their tail-feathers, for which they declared the Chinese gave them three dollars (about 6s.). The Japanese (in Yezo) are said to use them to indicate the residence of a person of importance by placing them over his door; in any case, the Gilyaks themselves value the feathers, which they use for arrow-heads. The wings are also prized by them, being placed at the grave of a Gilyak who has been murdered or has committed suicide, to aid his soul in its flight to heaven."

116, 173, 183, 212, 539

"The Gilyaks have no written language, but they have a legend to account for the want of it. I learnt it from one of their number, Imdin by name, the only Sakhalin Gilyak known to have been brought up and educated by the Russians. He is an intelligent youth, and had been sent to a school at Vladivostok, where I met him in the charge of a political exile, to whom he owed nearly everything.

'The legend current among my tribe,' he said, with a smile, 'tells how a Gilyak and a Chinaman were talking together one day on the shore. The former was showing his books and letters (characters) to the latter, when most unfortunately a great wind arose, and blew away all the letters save five; and to complete this great catastrophe, when the Gilyak's back was turned the Chinaman meanly made off with the small remnant.'

The Ainus have a not dissimilar legend, in which, according to one version, their letters and records were stolen by their guest from Japan, while they were yet recovering from after-dinner effects."

CONTINUED ON NEXT FICHE

116, 527, 539, 756, 782

"The following, however, is the part played by
i. e. the medicine man immediately preceding t as given me by an observer on the island.

The cham, with a pine-twig in his hand, ami close to the bear and whispers in its ear—
'You have eaten many berries,
'You have caught many fish,
'You have frightened many people;
'Your ancestors and your comrades have 'brok
'Therefore you must die for it.
'But your "host" has fed you three whole years, (dried fish),
'He has given you the best water,
'He has taken you for walks,
'He has bathed you thrice a day (1) in the "sumn

1. I am afraid this is imposing on the bear's business getting him out of his cage; and th frequently, it was then autumn, than once a this functionary at this juncture, [LSS:

the sacrifice of the bear at the bear fête

d the deep silence of the spectators, goe en' many Gilyaks:

not stinting the delicious yukola ner year," memory. It is such a difficult ose I saw were not taken out more fortnight for a constitutional.

116, 527, 539, 756, 782

'And three "winter years" you have li
'He, your host, will not kill you:
'Therefore you must not complain ab ived in a nice warm lodging;

bout him to the great lord of the mounta

[A Legend about Pilavo] Amur

/294 cont./

539 generation has now all died out. They bore children and multiplied (Takhta -- two yurts, Kabachi -- two yurts, Chilma -- eight families, Khez' -- all Pilavyn. They bore children and multiplied and built a large isba -- about 15 sagenes (1) (three ordinary ones); he lived there. All the Pilavyn (inhabitants of Pilavo) lived in this crowded yurt, while the others lived in another yurt. They lived richly, made trips to Japan, Manchuria (Saysin), and Korsakovsk, they bought Chinese women, female slaves for them (beyond Saysin), and also Ainu women and male and female slaves (krǒgrys) for them; they lived very richly, they all had full wealth. Once there was a holiday. They boiled dog meat (formerly they ate dog meat). The children began to fight, the elders stepped in, and a fight broke out. It even came to knives. The old man Yuryng (from the Arkhong clan) came from Tebakh and reconciled them. After that, however, they would now and again get drunk on khan'shina and, once again, a fight. A full assembly was called (assembly -- vopud kymlydz), and /295/ the people began to divide things up. The workers had married, and their children were also slaves. First they divided the slaves, various things, and furs. One [103] brother, together with his slaves, set off up the Amur: "I shall look for a place like Khez' (formerly it was called Pilavo, in the Chinese books it was called Tajrá, and in Goldi daj gasá -- large village). Their nickname was hes'-pilavo from the word hes' -- gullet, because they fight over their gullet and not over serious things. He stopped near the Goldi settlement of Yky (the settlement of Sarapul'skoye). Yky was inhabited by the ancient Gilyak emigrants from the settlement of Pilavo on Sakhalin. They bore children and multiplied and now not many of them are left. They still burn their dead.

1. I.e., about 30 meters.

Amur

/297 cont./

614 796 but we have daughters and in-laws, and it is necessary that everybody know, and therefore necessary that we should celebrate a common bear festival." Each k:khal should buy one, or better, two-three-four bears. They agree. They buy a bear and prepare mos'. The bear is fattened as fat as possible; they feed it about two years; they prepare mos' and buy racing dogs. The time for the festival finally arrives: they play games, wrestle, then kill the bear. Before the killing of the bear, an old man is selected -- he does not have to be the bear's master; he is the nga khez'-ni'vukh; he cannot decline. He says the word to the bear: "Chi pilá pal' urgur p'ach adz: kukujá pkhylava:r chajpidugujá!" -- thou, big mountain (mountain man), shake off well our Gilyak dust. Turn around so that I can see you."

They killed it, cut up its meat (the bones must not be broken), brought it into an isba, and boiled the meat. They compete in a "race" -- vardz:. They call together both clans, men and women, and distribute the bear meat to all. As a rule, the elder consults with the master on how to divide the bear. The main bones are the two tibial bones -- tereng, and the two pelvic ones -- pyjkh. The tibial and the pelvic bones are given [688] to the most honored persons. It is a sin to give the head and the 614 kidneys to the young people, the kidneys are very important. The 796 khlaj n'ivukh then says: "K:khal m'ekh:r: ólagu k:khálgu 539 umguólagu umgugu-tokh itdz: furará; navat m'er: chuz'n'akhr: ngar: /298/ n'akh:r: munakhana. K:khal itdz: furará: "umgu n'i ó:la, utku n'i ó:la, umgu n'anak, n'i n'anak, n'i nanak'ar. Nafkhá-chi n'anak furará navát, chiagr. Ni ykyn furará n'an ch'ach'ek munakhana." Another representative answers: "Agitlá, pilymra siktumá mer: vará tyngyztá ching ag:yr: ningrota, ningagr vara chingrodá, n'ishak lyt k:khal, k:khal munakhanó." "To the children of the two clans, to the clans to the little girls and the women I say: 'Now we shall become common meat and common blood.'" The clan speaks thus (1): (Every) woman is my

1. Evidently, one representative of a clan to another.

Amur

/298 cont./

614 796 child (daughter), (every) man is my child (son), a woman -- 539 an elder sister (also aunt) is my sister (my aunt). Now thou, comrade, art called sister; thou, too. I am an elder brother, but I shall now also become your younger." "Of course. We all equally did great things together. You also helped us and we also helped you equally. Once we have formed a clan, we shall become a clan.

"Elder (i.e., the person chosen for the distribution of the meat; he may be young)! Think well; do not give the good to big girls, to big sisters (aunts), or to sons-in-law /zyat'ya/. Give much to the big people, less to the little girls, feed the kidneys to the big old man of the clan, serve the head; distribute the back fat equally, do not share unequally. Give the tibial bone to the elder sons-in-law, give the pelvic bone to the sons-in-law. "Pilynga urgur kymlyjá, umguolagu pilý, nanakagú pilý, ok:ongú-tokh urlý chus' ngokh ta rozgujá, pila n'ivukhdokh malg:ógur khet'ijá umguolagudokh khiskioguja! K:khalgu pila, hejmartokh, tafut jarjá k:orkh khet'ijá. Tereng pily okhomdokh khitirá, pyjkh n'yn'yv póradokh khet'ijá, mur:k ngokh vará rozjá ta rozgujá..."

614 796 After preliminary consultation, a certain person finally brings in the bear and hands it over to the important person, who then, in the presence of several urdla n'ivukh (good people), inquires: "Why?" The person who brought in the bear answers: "I want to enter into ceremonial brotherhood." "All right,"

Next k:khal are consulted without him. During the festival the new clansmen buy dogs and prepare food. During the eating [606] the son-in-law says analogous things, while the fathers-in-law call him father-in-law, brother-in-law, etc. At the end of the festival they give the adopted one their own flints -- tugur:, but they do not give him the real uig tuur (the tabooed fire). There are no more than two or three uig tuur in a village. They light the fire at a bear festival; on a hunt only the urdla n'ivukh takes it when he goes for bear.

/323 cont./

756 When shamans fight, the one who has more souls wins. The 794 killing of one shaman by another is accompanied by the acquisition 796 of the kekhn of the opponent. During his supposed death, the soul [578] of the shaman travels over islands of the sea (tol). On these islands, which are of various colors, the houses are of stone tol-kekhn. Sometimes his soul goes into the mountains to the abode of pal-kekhn. The shaman kekhn fears only Pal milk and Tol milk, but not the milk of sables, foxes, otters, and rats (1).

1. Concerning the rat, see Chapter VII, "Miscellanea." S. Sh.

Among the kekhn there are variously colored eared seals, iron trout, and tigers.

756 How the shaman Chomkx resurrected a woman (the settlement of ● 539 Rykovskoye). A husband and a wife were fishing. The wife fell sick and died before morning. The husband said: "All you shamans are deceiving me. Now my wife is dead. Well, make her live!" The shaman became angry and said: "I shall shamanize all night; if before morning she moves her left little finger, she will live." That is what happened.

756 A shaman stabbed himself and shot himself in the mouth, and "nothing."

756 A female shaman has more spirits than a male shaman.
841 She kills her shaman competitor, sending her kekhn to rub her 854 competitor's eyes with the menstrual blood of shankh-chokh. A [562] feature of this blood is that a drop in food makes a person waste [578] away. Copulation during the menstrual flow also leads to local [833] ataxia.

756 The kamlanie of a female shaman, who, according to her 796 own words, was milkternd (mad) after the birth of her first daughter.
[158] She first made inau and then rubbed her face, breast, and so forth with marsh tea, lighted it on the hearth, and warmed her tambourine... Then she bound her legs and arms with shavings and girdled herself with shavings.. She yawned. Moderate blows... The sounds grew stronger. She sighed loudly and whispered. She

/344 cont./

VIII.

Folklore (1)

114
● 539 1. The two tales printed below were found in Shternberg's archives without a Gilyak text. All the remaining folklore materials not included in Volume 1 of his Materialov po izucheniiu giliatskogo iazyka i fol'klora /Materials for the study of the Gilyak Language and Folklore/ are planned for separate publication. S. Sh.

539 Tale No. 1. Once upon a time two brothers, no mother, no sister, no one, lived alone quietly by themselves. In the spring they went to hunt a bear, one in one direction, the other in the other one. The elder brother sat down to s--t (in great need); a fishing rod from the sky caught (him) and took him into the sky. The younger brother searched for but did not find his brother. He returned home alone. At night, when he was asleep, he dreamed (tyjnd) that a Gilyak came and said that his brother was taken into the sky.

"Be careful, you, too, will be taken into the sky." He woke up and began to look for the Gilyak, no one!

He took a long leather rope and a pole and make a large shed. In the morning he went to s--t, the fishing rods descended, grabbed him, and picked him up. The chain broke and fell. He looked; the chain was all gold. With the chain there were four small bells -- (k:ongkh):, three large, one small. The Gilyak did not touch anything. There was a whole pile of chain.

The following night he was sleeping -- someone got the chain and the little bell, and the little bell rang. In the morning he did not find them; he looked in the storehouse -- bears' heads. He went fishing and caught a whole boatful of small, small fish. One small, beautiful fish /345/ was unfamiliar; he put it in the bow of his boat. Upon approaching a seal, he saw smoke from his yurt. He thought: "Where is that coming from, are we on fire?"

/345 cont./

● 539 And he was still sitting on the bank and thinking thus.

At this point a little boy came running toward him. He caught the beautiful fish and ran away home. He began to think, what sort of boy is this, he must look, find out. He went into the yurt, looked: two women, his elder brother, the little boy. Both women were the daughters of Tlyik Tol-n'ivukh, taken to the sky by Tly-n'ivukh.

The elder daughter loves the Sakhalin Gilyak very much; she lowered a fishing rod and dragged off the Gilyak. Then the younger sister lowered her fishing rod and it broke. The younger had a son from one of the Tly n'ivukh; she did not want him; it was impossible to catch anything with the fishing rod; they descended.

To lose a little bell -- means to lose one's reason. When they took the little bells, it seemed as if their reason returned. The younger brother took the younger sister; the little boy became the son of this brother. The wife began cleaning fish.

The elder brother said to the younger /fem./: "Here is your husband, and this fish will be yours, go, clean it and dry it." She took a knife and went. Her husband thought: "I shall do a little smoking and then go and dry the fish." He finished smoking, went outside, and his fish was already prepared. Then they lived richly. They put the little bells with their things, and they had (everything).

Tale No. 2. Tylgund (from Obona). The first Gilyak was born in Aleksandrovsk. He caught a fish, caught Tarmyk-cho; he could not kill it because it was umgu, and he threw it alive into the sea again; on the following day he again caught it -- "threw it into the sea, did not tell anybody." He did that many times. In the summer the fish gave birth to a little boy and cast him on the shore. The man saw: "Who is this little boy?" If he has a father, he will come and take him. The father found out, took the little boy, and made a balagan on the shore; by the side of the boy there was a big dagger, which his father took with him. The Gilyak gathered grass (kenkhong), made a bed, and they settled

Hawes--265-268 T-3 (1901) 1903
6, 539

On the End of Cape Siata h Wrinkled up
And featherless,
From his forehead mud ru

Oh unhappy I! I look round
I am sorry for myself,
The owlet
Sat on my knees, (1)

1. She is distressed because, in her mind's eye, beside her or on her knees.

Hooting and trembling;
He lifts up
His head (all) white.

In a boat I saw thee,
On a level with the edge,
But the boat was without p e sat

ns down.

myself,

she sees him come and sit row;

10: Coxwell--121-124 B-3 (no d 116, 539

"THE BRAVE GILYAK AN

2. L. Y. Sternberg, p. 201.

A father and his two sons went together on firewood, sacrificed to the Sea and the Moun made an [122] offering to the Fire. When the up the entrance. They were terrified, but, a dreamed that he approached the tiger, and s tinder? Speak! Have you come because you h various valuable things? I may not have then for you. Maybe, you require dogs of another require anything of you, but your son has be kill me; if I am the stronger, I will kill him.
your younger son.'

Afterwards, the old man got up and said,
Do not boast! I told you before, but you did n son and said, 'My boy, we will both go back;
'Father, why are you going without me? Oh,

D THE GRATEFUL TIGER (2)

a sable hunt. They reached their tent, cut tain, obtained water, entered the tent and ey had eaten, a great tiger came and filled fter awhile, the father fell asleep and aid, 'Have you come because you have no ave no flint? Speak! Perhaps you require n, but, if I go to my village, I will get them breed?' The tiger answered, 'I do not en boasting. If he is the stronger, let him Tell him of my command! and go home with

'Son, here is my order. Are you listening?
not obey.' Then he turned to his younger roll up your bedding.' The elder son said, wait for me. Will you not forgive me?' The

9: Hawes--265-268 T-3 (1901) 1903
116, 539

A long whip (lay) Across the bow,
I raised the whip
And cried,
'Owl bird,
Thy face is against the s Wrinkled
Is thy high forehead.'

I am sorry for myself,
But do not thou say of m That thou art sorry for

The meaning is not everywhere clear, and the t was intended is one that has to be resisted. There Her disappointed lover is described as featherle his forehead; and, again, as peevish in his cries In the third verse (the divisions are mine) she b cause his attentions make her miserable, and he whereupon she strikes a note of contempt in her e Another picture rises without warning before us sun, and therefore e

me. [268]
emptation to read more into it than is no doubt of her withering scorn. ess (bald), and with mud running down for 'various things.'
reaks into her plaint, apparently be-persists in sitting down beside her, pithet of 'owlet,' or fledgeling.
in the fourth verse. It is like a child's

9: Hawes--265-268 T-3 (1901) 1903
116, 539

story made up on the spur of the moment. She prow), and a whip, a long dog's whip the words
'Thy face is against the sun, and therefore wri tempted to see in them a warning to the suitor the night, aspiring to the sunlight of her counte that the maiden authoress, having kept up her into narrative, and drawn a picture from mem is in a boat, a canoe apparently (without s imply, lies on the prow. Then she cries, nkled is thy high forehead,' and one is that he looks too high—he, a denizen of enance. But I think it is more probable metaphor so long, has a t length slid off ory's portfolio."

10: Coxwell--121-124 B-3
116, 539

In the middle of the floor sat a v girl. The man said, 'Dear father a brought him in order to give him m replied to his son, 'Send for your y otter's flesh and bear's meat. Whe chattered and laughed. It seemed t who had been a tiger turned to then friend, out of gratitude, in order t you wish to give her, I am willing.
my village.'

The next day six men, heavily la the Gilyaks went to Manchuria, loa Manchurian Governor. The wife of the tigress woman?' 'Yes,' was th wife.' The Gilyak received the gif

In the autumn, when the elder sc accompany him. But the elder scol allowed the elder to depart, and th ery old man and woman and, before them, a young nd mother, out of gratitude to my friend, I have ny sister; that is why he is here.' The old man younger brother and explain to him.' They ate fish and n the sun set, people appeared behind the hut and o the Gilyak that eight people entered the hut. The man n and said, 'Younger Brother, I have brought my o give him our sister.' The younger man replied, 'If ' Then our Gilyak said, 'To-morrow, I will return to den, bore furs to the village. The following summer, ded three boats with the furs, and visited the the Manchurian Governor said, 'Gilyak, did you marry e reply. ' I send this pipe and this kerchief to your ts and returned to his village.

n was about to go hunting, the younger wished to ded him and forced him to remain. The younger en followed in his footsteps. After going a long way

CONTINUED FROM PRECEDING FICHE

9: Hawes--265-268
116, 539

"The song that follows the Gilyak maiden in c the song of a Gilyak gi summary and cruel re picturing him as an ov words—

i.e. admit that thou a

Coxwell--121-124 B-3 (no date) 1925 Gilyak 539 reaching a tent, he, the younger son, went into the forest, hewed wood, obtained er, then entered the tent and kindled a fire. Just at sunset the noise of a tiger's vements was heard. The elder brother said to the younger, 'These are my father's people, I am taking a wife from them. Do not fear them.' The tiger man's ends appeared behind the tent and talked; whereupon our Gilyak went out to them a d, 'Friends, will you not smoke tobacco?' The visitors laughed and talked, and ered and, taking places, sat down. Afterwards, one of them noticed the foot of the nger brother, who sat in a far corner so as not to frighten them; they were alarm r Gilyak said, 'There is no reason to be alarmed; this is my younger brother.' T er-man's party ate and slept soundly, rose the next day and departed, and the Gily nt with them. After they had gone far, they reached the tiger's hut. They entered nd [124] the wife was there. 'Friends,' the Gilyak said, 'I shall go home to-mor e following day, taking his wife, he returned to his village and they lived."

, which I give in the original, with an English translation, reveals uite another attitude. [LSS: See category 533, pp. 264-265 for rl rejected by her lover] This is no impassioned appeal, but a jection of her lover. She holds him up to ridicule in her song, vl. She will have none of his addresses, and finishes with the

'Do not thou say of me That thou art sorry for me.'
rt unworthy of me, and cease to say thou lovest me. [266] GILYAK MAIDEN'S SONG.
[LSS: The Gilyak text of this song has not been reproduced for the Files.] [267] (TRANSLATION.)
The owl bird
Sat on top of a barkless tree Hooting and trembling
And bending down.

The owl bird raises his head and cries,
For various things he asks;

l
-in-nd
e ned.
he yak
and row.'

1. L. Y. Sternberg,

Two women were dwelling togetl seals, they were well off; they liv the next day do something; they ha After collecting a quantity, they r entering a passage, they heard a r I heard, sister?' The elder replie young sister remarked, 'I am afr replied, 'Never mind, let us go in entered together and looked at the the dish and set on the seat. They 'what is this? I do not understand.
it.' Helping herself, the elder sis replied, 'I do not wish to eat; I ar I shall sleep.' They both slept.

10: Coxwell--120 [3] B-3 ( 116, 539

"Gilyak stories not included here, are who Married a Seal, ' 'The Gilyak who M who Married a Gilyak Woman. ' Clearly, look on animals as little below themselve

: 'The Woman who Married a Fox,' 'The Woman arried a Mountain-Woman', 'The Mountain-Man
, the Gilyaks are in the early stage when men es, and on Nature as animated."

10: Coxwell--121 B-3 (no da 116, 539

"THE GILYAK WHO OFFEN

1. L. Y. Sternberg, No. 38.

Five men went into the forest to set snares. sacrificial offerings and arranged snares. Bu for the animals often got the better of him. H In the evening, he prepared food and, seizing fire with a single cup and said, 'If the lord is he broke up the hearth, and all the party lay In the night, the head of the party dreamed set snares!' So when his companions departed in his tent. A strange man appeared and said, commanded to make you a present.' They wer which were many sables. A man with a banda and he gave the visitor twenty sables and said broken up the hearth at the beginning of a sab next year, with a bow and with arrows and a will kill you; if you are stronger, you will kil that!' In the summer this Gilyak perished dur

DED THE FIRE LORD(1)

. They erected tents, prepared food, made t the chief hunter of sables was unfortunate, e grew angry and collected all his snares.
an axe, placed it beside him; he fed the present, let him eat!' Next, lifting his axe, down to sleep.
that a man said to him, 'Remain here and to their homes, this hunter stayed alone
'Come with me to my house; I am nt away together and entered a house in ged wound upon his face was sitting there , 'If you come upon a Gilyak who has le-hunt, say to him, "Provide yourself, spear, and walk about; if I am stronger, I l me," when you meet such a man, tell him ing a hunting expedition."

father and the younger son tied up 'Step away and let us pass.' The away.

The tiger returned and occupie shirt and with his sleeves turned After the Gilyak had struck with h mighty effort, jumped into a larc lad's boot, tore it away and fell d die. The Gilyak let himself down, much effort, drew him away, so

The lad descended, took his sp He finished eating, and the tiger ready to discharge an arrow; the finished eating and threw himself they came to a clear place. Ther several tiger skins. The tiger ap for the tiger, he shook himself, Having lifted his [123] tiger-skin the hut!

o their beds, and the father, turning to the tiger, sai reupon the tiger moved aside and the two Gilyaks wer d the entrance. Then the Gilyak, attired only in his up, holding a little Chinese axe, approached his ener is axe, the tiger gave way. Then the lad, with a h tree. The tiger sprang after him, bit the heel of th own into a fork of the tree, where he was likely to seized the tiger by the back of the neck, and, with that the animal could depart.

ear, fetched water, cut wood and cooked some food.
came and looked. The Gilyak raised his bow and got the tiger retreated, but appeared again. The lad on the tiger's back; when they had gone some distanc e on a height stood a large hut, before which hung proached and crouched down. The Gilyak stood up; as hrew off his skin and, in a second, became a man.
and hung it on a pole, he said, 'Friend, let us enter 10: Coxwell--120-121 B-3 (no 116, 539.

"THE GILYAK WHO

2. From the Russian of L. Y of the Gilyak Language and F

Two brothers had a sister. The younger partook of its flesh, and gave to other peo to a neighbouring promontory, and there d bringing nothing, he returned home alone.
possessed of a devil, these words, 'She is take a tigress as his wife! Next summer, will collect various dogs and kill them; he sacrificial dish; he will visit his bride, an sister lost consciousness, but revived[121

The following summer the party went to dogs and many fish-skins; they killed all s Then the younger brother went to the mou told."

MATED WITH A TIGRESS(2)

. Sternberg, Materials for Study olk-lore, No. 23.

brother killed a bear and brought it home and ple; he then went in his boat across the water leposited the rest of the carcase. Later, Afterwards his sister sang, like a woman beloved by my younger brother; he intends to having set out for the coast of Saghalien, he will take all sorts of fish-skins and make a d we shall smoke tobacco together!' Then the
]
the coast of Saghalien; they took all sorts of orts of dogs, and made a sacrificial dish. ntain and took his wife, and they lived. It is

10: Coxwell--125-126 B-3 116, 539

hurled itself upon him, but when the y it proved useless as a weapon. The be man, but died; Son-of-the-Mother-of-

(no date) 1925 Gilyak-2

oung man sought to defend himself with the sable, ear and the man fought; the bear rose above the Water went down in the water and perished."

10: Coxwell--125-126 B-3 (no dat 116, 539

"SON-OF-THE-MOT

1. L. Y. Sternberg, No. 39.

A certain Gilyak, who lived alone, took as h called Mother-of-Water. A boy was born to the with him a sable, by aid of which, in the sprin cleft their skulls.

Once the old Gilyak set out upon the river's sat and ate frozen fish, said to him, 'Come wi together. When they entered the hut a big man head toward the entrance, and half of his head the-Mother-of-Water that I send him this mes the movement of the herrings, I will come dow himself with a spear and await my coming!' T message to Son-of-the-Mother-of-Water, and, Water frequently sharpened his sable's claws.

Next year, in the spring, the man with the b time when a whale was lying on the seashore.
an enormous bear. Son-of-the-Mother-of-Wate

THER-OF-WATER (1)

is wife a fish from the sea. She was em, who, when he grew up, used to carry g time, he frequently killed bears; he surface to get frozen fish. A man, who th me to my village.' They departed was lying on the boards, [126] with his bound up. This man said, 'Tell Son-of-sage: in the spring of next year, during n from the mountains; let him arm The old man went and delivered the in consequence, Son-of-the-Mother-ofandaged head came down to the sea, at a The man with the bandaged head became er arrived and jumped back as the bear

10: Coxwell--126-127 B-3 116, 539

"THE MOUNTAIN-D

1. L. Y. Sternberg, N

A party of three, consisting of a Having pitched their tent on a moun the Sea; then they cut some wood, g and took up his position before the t sleep, 'Has someone come because or because he has no tinder? Has h for valuables?' The answer sounde said, 'Please, do not touch him!' A the tiger, and the sister's son woke tiger bit one of them so that his blo tiger has killed our boy; get up!' T mother and younger brother may lo for you to go; if I tell the news, the let us go together!'

Each took a spear; the son had a

DEVIL IN THE FORM OF A TIGER (1)

No. 35.

father, his son and sister's son, went to set snares. tain, they sacrificed to Fire, to the Mountain and to got water, and entered the tent. But a tiger approached tent's entrance. The father said to himself, in his he possesses no steel? or because he has no flint? e come because he needs dogs? or because he wishes ed, ' I have come for your sister's son!' The old man After a time, the old man's son woke, but did not see but did not see the tiger; they both went out, and the od flowed. The other ran back and cried, 'Father, a he father got up. 'My son, ' said he, 'go home; your se their lives. ' The son replied, 'No, father, it is y [127] will not believe me!' 'My son, go!' 'Father, gun and the father had his bow and arrows and they

10: Coxwell--126-127 B-3 116, 539

started. They saw the tiger eating th son ran up and gave a thrust with his together they killed the tiger. Father his plait of hair, his buttons and his his body and that of his prey upon a s returned to the tent. They cut down w kettle and boiled some water. Sudden the fire and let us run away!' They w water! There is a devil!' 'Where did heard twice some barking, but it was us descend to the shore!' They enter hearth, kindled a fire and went away.
came up, but father and son aimed th

The pair went home and the father tiger has killed the boy! We are goin was late and father and son went to s approaching the tiger, raised him up, to their home. 'Old woman, prepare e youth. The tiger sprang upon the father, but the spear, and the father thrust with his spear; and son approached the boy's body and removed shirt. They stripped off the tiger's skin and placed caffold, for preservation from wild beasts, and ood and lit a fire, then got water and hung up the ly the dogs barked twice. 'Father, pour water on ent out, and the son said, 'Father, jump into the the noise come from?' replied the old man. 'I an illusion, there is nobody about.' 'Father, let ed the tent, broke up firewood, placed it on the After a noise of stamping and trampling, a tiger eir spears at him and he disappeared. called out, 'Old woman, collect the neighbours, a g in a dog-sleigh to fetch the body.' However, it eep. Next day they returned to the mountain and, and set him on the sleigh and carried him almost a sacrificial dish for the people; and son, go off

10: Coxwell--124-125 B-3 (no date) 1925 Gilyak-3 116, 539

Our woman ran off and, shutting the door, spat and pasted up the whole of it. The bear approached and attacked the door with its teeth; but the door was of iron, and he broke all his teeth. Our woman rushed back, and, arriving at the village, entered her hut; then she passed into the passage. Her elder sister was inside asleep. The younger sister cried, 'When did you arrive?' The elder sister replied, 'A bear took me, and carried me away; he ate all my body; only my head remained. You took my head and beat it on every side. I arose from the dead; somehow I came back and have here awaited you.' The younger sister said, 'The bear will no longer come to us now; you will die.' "

10: Coxwell--130 B-3 (no date) 1925 Gilyak 116, 539, 825

"SON-OF-THE-MOTHER-OF-WATER

[LSS: For the text of this tale, see category 539, pp. 125-126]

Sternberg remarks that the son of the Gilyak and of the Woman-Fish grew up and defeated many bears. The Lord of the Bears, being much offended because Son-of-the-Mother-of-Water fought with the aid of a sable, instead of with the traditional spear, challenged him to a duel, and both perished. As an instrument of the chase, a sable would be useless except for self-defence. Only a man of unusual physical strength would, thus armed, risk a contest with a bear. But the hero of a certain legend so fights and, at the last moment of the contest, stifles the bear in his embraces."

10: Coxwell--126-127 B-3 116, 539

with the dogs!' The son went in the took it from the shore, where the vi mountain; there they killed dogs, an body and returned home and lived, b

(no date) 1925 Gilyak-

dog-sleigh and brought home the boy's body. They llage was standing, and bore it some distance up d sacrificed to the mountain; then they buried the out remained incensed against the mountain-devil.

10: Coxwell--128 B-3 116, 224, 539, 688

"THE GILYAK W

[LSS: For the text of this tale, se

Sternberg says that after every s performed; part of the meat being e side. In our story, the hero carrie crime punishable by the gods. The extraordinary, namely his love for and he married her. The largeness importance of the tigress."

(no date) 1925 Gilyak

HO MATED WITH A TIGRESS
e category 539, pp. 120-121.]

uccessful bear hunt, a religious ceremony must be eaten and part carried to the relatives on the mother's s away meat to the forest; such an act being a great Gilyak was induced to behave thus by something the tigress, a creature more powerful than any bear; of the sacrifice in the story corresponds to the Coxwell--124-125 B-3 (no date) 1925

539

" A TALE OF A BEA

I. L. Y. Sternberg, No. 24.

Two women were dwelling together in a storehouse. als, they were well off; they lived comfortably. One next day do something; they had abundance. Once th ter collecting a quantity, they returned to their store tering a passage, they heard a noise within. The you eard, sister?' The elder replied, 'I do not know! I ung sister remarked, 'I am afraid, and will not ente plied, 'Never mind, let us go in! The younger agree tered together and looked at the middle seat; all the dish and set on the seat. They sat, each in her own hat is this? I do not understand.' The other answere
' Helping herself, the elder sister ate, and said to t plied, 'I do not wish to eat; I am afraid.' The elder hall sleep.' They both slept.

R (1)

Whenever they caught fish or day they would sit at home and ey set out together for berries.
house and went upstairs. But, nger said, 'What was that noise do not understand it.' The r on any account,' but the other
d. 'Yes, let us go in!' They meat had been cooked, and put on place. 'Sister,' said the younger, d, ' I do not know; but I shall eat he other, 'Eat!' The younger remarked, 'Now that I have eaten

10: Coxwell--124-125 B-3 (no date) 1925 Gilyak-2 116, 539

In the night the elder sister began to converse with someone, and the younger sister rose and looked. There was a light round about! The younger sister was frightened, and could not sleep, but the other conversed continually. The younger sister, at last, fell asleep, and heard nothing more; then she awoke and rose; it was already dawn, and had become light. She looked for her sister, who was not to be seen! Becoming anxious, she jumped up and dressed herself; then, running down, she went out and sought the mooring rope and the boat. One of the boats had gone, the other remained. Reaching it and pushing off, she began to row; when she landed she found the footprints of her elder sister, and looked; there were foot-[125]prints of a bear alone, of her sister alone, and next of a bear and her sister near one another. The bear and the elder sister had climbed a mountain together.

The younger sister ascended the mountain in their tracks; she ran uphill, and crept along after them. A hut stood alone, and the girl entered. Her elder sister's head lay in the middle of the plank bed. The younger sister said, 'So, you have been lovemaking? Not bad!' The elder sister's head answered, 'I thought it would be well.' The reply came, 'I told you, I told you how I feared those food delicacies! Why did you not obey me? You took and ate. Why did you not obey me?' The elder sister's head wept. The younger woman took her sister's head and beat it on all sides. A bear issued from a corner and opened its jaws.

10: Coxwell--128-129 B-3 (no date) 1925 Gilyak 116, 539, 839

"A TALE OF A BEAR

[LSS: For the text of this tale, see category 539, pp.124-125.]

This story of mating with a bear is one of several stories mentioned in the Note to the Kalmuck story, 'The Birdcage [129] Husband.' But in the present tale we have no mere allusion to the subject; on the contrary, as in 'The Gilyak who Mated with a Tigress,' the tale actually deals with a wooing, and the life of the characters concerned.

The majority of stories of men or women mating with animals were probably, even in the first place, amusing fiction and did not arise from abnormality and depravity of savages or barbarous races. Similarly, considerations of totem ancestry, while interesting from the standpoint of man's early evolution, seem too remote to have played an important part in origination of the mass of folk-tales, even of the most ancient, such as the Egyptian, Indian or Kalmuck. This is not to deny the possibility of such causes, but to lay stress on the greater influence of a story-telling faculty which has used striking ideas and situations in order to divert childish persons or to arrest the attention of dull minds. To the primeval hunter it doubtless appeared that the hunted are not very different from himself, for they lived in the same environment, and were influenced by similar considerations. He developed, but an inherited tendency to look on animals as his fellows persisted after notions of totem ancestry had vanished."

Coxwell--128[3] B-3 (no date) 1925
, 539, 776, 825

"THE BRAVE GILYAK AND THE
[LSS: For the text of this tale, see category 539, pp

The story of Androcles and the Lion will occur to th e East transmutation is into the larger animal forms a Kalmuck tale, a demon appears as a buffalo, as o olf of a Russian tale and into a yellow dog of a Mordv ansformed into a tiger by a curse, as in Western we e general Gilyak belief that there are special beings ving the appearance of Gilyaks, can assume the shap adowed forth. The absence of ceremony is noticeabl ger-man's sister."

GRATEFUL TIGER
. 121 -124.]

e reader. It is observable that in , thus here is a tiger-man and, pposed to the transmutation into a in tale. But the man has not been rewolf stories; on the contrary, in the mountains and forest who, e of wild beasts, seems here e when the Gilyak marries the 10: Coxwell--130 [2] B-3 (no date) 1925 16, 224, 539, 782

"THE MOUNTAIN-DEVIL IN THE FORM OF A

[LSS: For the text of this tale, see category 539, pp. 126-127]

It is noticeable that the hunting party, on setting out, sacrific out to the mountain and the sea. Later, the sacrifice of dogs to real relief in the power of the mountain spirit. In the Ostyak tal n the middle of a perilous adventure, bends his neck in worship sacrifice a reindeer at marriage; also deer to a river. The Tch foal, an ox or a cow to their gods, Keremet and Sheert.

The Eskimo have a tale of a mountain spirit that dug up the bo pretended to be dead in order to see what the mountain spirit wo spirit carried the man to its home and the man soon opened his captor, also the latter's children. The dead mountain spirit's w he escaped by telling hills to rise up and a stream to flow betwe pursuer. (3)

3. Rasmussen and Worster, p. 84."

Gilyak

A TIGER

ed not only to the fire, the mountain shows a e, 'Aspen-leaf,' the hero, of spirits. The Yukaghirs eremisses sacrifice a dy of a man, who had uld do. The mountain eyes and killed his ife pursued the man, but en himself and his

: Coxwell--128 [2] B-3 (no date) 192
, 372, 539, 776

"THE GILYAK WHO OFFENDED THE
LSS: For the text of this tale, see category 539, p

The Lord of Fire is considered by the Gilyaks to nd all the deities; and the hunter who sacrifices to ropitiates the Lord of the Forest, and secures suc tory, 'The Mountain-devil in the form of a Tiger, ire. In the Yakut tale, 'Al-Iot: the Spirit of Fire, ' he Fire. Among the Yukaghirs, a definite form of hen a new net is dedicated."

FIRE LORD

p. 121.]

be an intermediary between man fire considers that he thereby ccess in the chase. In the Gilyak a party of hunters sacrifices to a spoonful of all food is thrown to words is employed before a fire a way that every discussion of the fact is precluded. If the baby was born in the summer, the children are told that it was taken from under the roots of a tree or trunk; if a baby was born in winter, one pretends to have found it in the snow.

Twin births.

No tribe on Sakhalin Island has reported the birth of triplets to any woman at any time. That is why there are no legends about such an event either.

Not infrequently twin births take place among the natives. They contend that in each one of these cases both children are of the same sex. I personally came to know two living twins of the Gilyak tribe who were between forty and forty-five years old. In regions rather well known to me there occurred three twin births in a population of more than 300 persons within a decade, but all these twins died immediately after birth. When I left in 1905 there were five month old twins living in the family of a Gilyak friend of mine. Only in a single old Gilyak song which I wrote down are twins of different sex mentioned. The brother is in love with his sister and, in this song, asks her to take his heart into her hands, or else he will die.

The Gilyak are convinced that one of the twins is the son of the god of the woods and mountains, pal-ni-rookh (mountain man), a mighty deity now benevolent, now malevolent towards the poor, weak Gilyak. [761] (1) That is why the child of the pal-ni-

1. I was, however, given another explanation by a Gilyak: one of the twins is said to be an offspring of the mountains, the other one an offspring of the sea.

rookh, should be given back to his father right away. But, not being certain which of the children is not an offspring of human beings one prefers to treat them both equally.

It is a custom among the majority of the Gilyak to cremate dead bodies (2), but twins are not allowed to 796 in this the proof of entirely enough to a making the archer u bring him into the d torture that they im meant to be a symbo Even this conception one torment an expi enough by its innoce besides, does not th death give the impre overbubbling festive the traveller was un of the ceremonies d unable to explain the way their fathers an worrying any further Jakobsen's friends i him adequate explan fore, we need more than is available tod clearly.

115 Finally, a saga c 173 heard from a Russia 539 territory for a long time ago there appea a small vessel full o complexion. These them down, and, wit ate all the inhabitant the river, they actec Goldi till finally the terror, banded toget
the barbaric enemy, battle. All the cannil destroyed. From thi more foreign people up to the time when the river and took po eriousness or mourning; rather, it is sume that in this way they want to avoid nsteady by noisy behavior, and thus to nger of missing his mark. Or is the ose on the poor animal before its death l of the serious nature of this festival?

seems untenable to me, for why should tory sacrifice that already has to suffer nt death, as happens in this case; and, cruel treatment of the bear before its ssion of proceeding entirely from the joy of the celebrators? Unfortunately, able to give any hints as to the significance scribed, since the Gilyak were themselves
m. They celebrated [382] the festival the d forefathers had celebrated it, without about the meaning of the various actions.
n Nikolayevsk were equally unable to give ations on this subject. Probably, there-frequent and more detailed observation ay before we can see into the matter urrent among the Gilyak which Jakobsen n station master who had lived in their time. It goes as follows: A long, long red on the Amur coming from the east f enormously strong people of a dark vent ashore, attacked the villages, burned hout distinguishing age or sex, killed and s that they could lay hands on. Sailing up l in the same fashion in the land of the invaded tribes recovered from their her and moved in large hordes against whom they then defeated in a bitter bals were killed and their ship was s time on, the Gilyak always add, no came to the Amur River from the east he Russians appeared at the mouth of ssession of the land.

541

541 SPECTACLES -- patriotic celebrations; parades; fireworks displays; mil tary reviews; secular pageants; carnivals, circuses, and rodeos; anima racing and fighting (e.g., horse and dog races, bull baiting, cockfighting gladiatorial combats; public hangings; organization of spectacles; financ (e.g., by profits, voluntary contributions, subsidies); admissions (e.g., gratis, by ticket); specialists (e.g., organizers, performers); etc. See

Breeding of racehorses 232 Animal transport 492 Attendant gambling 525
Clowns 52
Religious spectacles . . . . . .

/705 cont./

*796 divided into approximately even halves. The path leading from Judin's house to this place of death for the bears was also marked out with a few whittled sticks.

*796 231 ●541 Meanwhile the dog-feeding was going on in the house in the same way as on the day before, except that those animals that were to participate in the races an hour hence did not get anything for the time being; they were also brought into the house, to be sure, but could only watch while the other dogs ate, their feeding being postponed until after the races in order to stimulate them to run faster. Everyone now set out for one end of the racecourse, which was laid out on the ice-cover of the river and consisted of a strip about two fathoms wide, on which the snow had been shoveled to the sides and the ice smoothed somewhat for a distance of about one and a half to two versts. Here stood two sleds, one harnessed to 14 dogs, the other to ten, of which the three front ones on the first sled were adorned with elegant Manchurian collars, the above-mentioned rüssk (1). In front of the sleds two other dogs were held on long straps. Many spectators had stationed themselves on the elevated embankments at both sides of the racecourse. First the two dogs not harnessed to the sleds were released; they pulled behind them at the end of their long straps only a fox tail and the tail of a black dog, respectively With this light burden they disappeared from the racecourse in an instant and ran up the hill to the house where they were caught by the women and children. They were particularly swift-footed animals, one of which was a so-called kylâ or kylâ-kan among the Gilyak, over the possession of which Judin was very proud, saying that in the whole Amur region there were only two or three animals of the same quality, and he could name their owners. It was not clear to me, however, what the special characteristics of the kylâ-kan are, aside from swift-footedness. The animals harnessed to the sleds did not get off so easily, for although the burden which they had to pull was

1. See p. 750 ff. above with the woodcut, and Plate XXXVI /p.1016/, Figs. 4 and 5.

/705 cont./

*796 231 ●541 hardly greater -- on each of the otherwise quite empty sleds lay only two brake-sticks stuck into the plaited work -- obstacles of another kind were put in their path. As soon as the dogs were racing along at top speed, a Gilyak standing on the embankment of the racecourse threw himself on the sled and tried to gain control of the dogs and their vehicle by using the brake-sticks, at which, of course, he was not immediately successful. If one failed, a second one did it, and a third: throwing himself upon the sled, he held on to it tightly, the sled overturned two or three times, but the man held on tightly and let himself be dragged along at the utmost speed until he succeeded in sitting astride and, with the two brake-sticks in his hands, driving up the

*796 541 534 hill in triumph. During the entire race the women drum with cudgels and sticks upon a /707/ beam suspended from a framework in front of the house. This is done with a certain regularity and requires some special knowledge, for there are various types and modes of drumming, depending on the occasion. Every woman is given two cudgels, or one cudgel and one stick, and beats with them on the beam two or three times, either simultaneously or alternately, then cudgel on cudgel or cudgel on stick, then again on the beam, etc., in different rhythms and tempos, as the mode

*796 541 231 [521] of the moment requires (see Plate XLVIII /p.1248/). As soon as all the dogs participating in the races have returned the longed-for meal is set before them in the house by the women. The men, however, indulge in a lively discussion of all the details occurring in connection with the races, in that one dog is to be praised and another criticized, but even more to laugh over the ineptitude of one of their countrymen and to marvel at the courage and agility of a second and third. For, as is to be seen from this description, the dog races among the Gilyak do not serve to test the quality of the dogs as much as to give the men an opportunity to show off their above-mentioned physical and moral virtues, just as is the case for other entertainments that are part of the bear festival.

*796 231 After this interlude, the leading of the bears which had been interrupted in the morning, was resumed, and everything was repeated as on the preceding days, for example, the large

2: Schrenck--1147 E-5 (1854-1856) 1881-1895 RX2 Gilyak RX2

/709 cont./

*796 574 beside the other hearth where the host and a few other guests sit. In this case, however, it is regarded as the bench of honor because it is closer to the bears and in full view of them. On it, therefore, [123] as Judin told us, there are even more ufitsch to be observed than elsewhere in the house, and when, for example, we wanted to make some notes in our journal about the bear festival and draw some sketches of it from there, he asked us with great politeness to sit on the longitudinal bench for that, because in the other place this could easily be seen by the bears and might be resented 516 by them. The guests sat down with their legs crossed under them in two rows on the bench: the older and more dignified ones immediately along the wall, the younger ones along the edge of the bench. Between the two rows sufficient space was left for a path on which the bowls traveled from one end of the bench to the other, in that they were put on the bench from the floor at the left end and came back again at the right end. When one bowl had moved along a bit, it was followed by a second, a third, etc. The number of the various dishes, however, was fewer than that of the bowls, for many a dish was repeated again after a couple of courses. It is strange that the host himself does not take part in [614] this meal, and similarly all the relatives on the paternal side, in other words, the so-called ngafk, are excluded from it with him, while the maternal /710/ relatives (amal or armal), as well as the friends and acquaintances, may participate in the meal, Judging by the quantity of foods and bowls that traveled back and forth, it was a very copious meal that Judin set before his guests. Nevertheless, most of his guests, after the end of the meal, went to another house in order to eat there, and this went on from house to house throughout the village, so that even the ngafk of a particular host probably do not come off badly.

Those Gilyak, however, who stayed in Judin's house, mostly younger people who had spent the night leading the bears around and therefore were probably tired, took advantage of the pause after the feast to renew their strength with a few hours of sleep.

*796 ●541 The quiet lasted but a short time, however, for soon the women began their routine morning activity, feeding the dogs, and then,

/710 cont./

*796 ●[541] amid the drumming of the women, some of the dog races of the day before were repeated; the best runners, each equipped with a fox tail or the tail of a black dog, were let loose down at the river [264] and were recaught above at the house. A short informal breakfast on the leftovers of the feast concluded this interlude, whereupon the important schedule for the day began.

*796 824 From all the houses of the village the people congregated around the place where the bears stood tied to their stakes. Three Gilyak carried in their hands insignia of a peculiar kind. They consisted of a straight young fir tree (Picea ajanensis) from which all the branches had been removed except the crown and the uppermost branches closest to it, which were pressed up around the crown and tied with a string. A boa (Gilyak tolp) made of [291] [239] squirrel tails, such as the Gilyak wear around their heads and necks or a fox tail was wound around the crown of the little tree twice in serpentine-fashion and then also fastened. Two of these peculiar banners were of the first type, the third was of the latter type. The three banner-bearers were joined by a fourth, who, as far as I could see, had only a plain long stick in his hand, but he carried it as erect as the others their banners. While everybody now stood assembled around the bear place, the three men with their insignia entered the enclosure, went directly around the bears several times, always returning to the path that led to it and there turning around again, and, finally, planted one of their insignia in front of each of the bears. This was, so to speak, the signal for the departure: the bears were freed from their stakes and led out of the kadhra.

*796 231 Before going any further, the neck and body bands on the bears had to be examined as to their strength. For the large bear this had been done the day before, and the animal had been provided with new auxiliary bands. Everything was likewise in order on the medium-sized bear. The especially bad-tempered and stubborn small bear, however, definitely seemed to need to have his fetters strengthened, and this is always a very dangerous experi- [156] ment. Chuzisin, Judin's only son, a young and strong man who evidently still had not had enough during the days of goading the

/718 cont./

*796 252 [784] [263] just as it would be extremely uitsch if one wanted to fry, not only bear meat, but any meat at the one or the other hearth, for the bear would hear the sizzling of the frying meat and would be shocked. When it was thought that the bear meat was done, the broth was scooped into the aforementioned bowls and drunk, but the meat was placed upon fir branches under the étagère and covered with the same. Not until evening was it put into the trough hanging in front of the bears' heads. Moreover, toward [782] evening, six of the largest sturgeon and hausen, one of which was about eight feet long, were brought into the house and placed in front of the bears; they were offered to them as a sacrifice and were intended for the forthcoming feast.

*796 [887] [251] In the morning of the following day (January 29) the old men resumed their work in front of the bear hearth. The young people were likewise busy, with some of them bringing in additional firewood, others going into the nearby mountain forest in order to bring from a storehouse for bilberries, which the women had erected there in the fall, the supply required for the festival.

*796 23 541 In the meantime the dogs were fed, except for those 14 animals which Judin had selected for a bravura ride on the river. They were decorated with the above-mentioned red-tasselled collars and harnessed to a small, prettily decorated sled which was driven by its owner himself. The drive, amid loud drumming by the women, proceeded at top speed, first down the steep bank to the river and then on a leveled course along the latter, and ended without a mishap amid the wild applause of the assembled throng. Only then were these dogs given their meal in the house, while the people enjoyed the bear-meat broth.

*796 252 In the afternoon, the old men began to cut the bear fat into long strips which, decorated with wood shavings (zach) and fir branches, they likewise hung in front of the bears' heads, and not until shortly before complete darkness did they take them down again to put them in a small trough decorated in the same way and placed on the floor in front of the bears. In the meantime, more life and commotion had entered into these preparations for the feast; some young men began to cut up the six

533 boats. However, there are some to be found among them
who are considered singers; they are improvisors of a sort
who entertain the others with their song.
535 The dance does not exist among the Gilyak, unless one in-201 cludes in this category the spontaneous leaps with which a 517 tipsy one occasionally cools off his exuberance. There is a 521 reason for the Gilyak's facial expression of which we spoke above. It is neither sullen nor sad, but also not unhappy or good natured; it is serious or indifferent. But I must hasten to add that this immobility and indifference only reaches to a certain point. The Gilyak's imagination and his sense of humor are not immediately apparent, but in reality he possesses both. The favorite pastime on winter evenings is listening to a story teller, and his voice is alternately interrupted by laughter and exclamations.
527 Holidays and festivals. There are no special rest days 787 which would, for instance, correspond to our Sundays.
483 The bear festival is the only one worthy of this name. It is celebrated once a year during our January, it lasts two weeks and is accompanied by various entertainments. Young bears which, as we said, are brought up for this festival,
are taken direct from their caves or they are bought from Sakhalin kinsmen. Occasionally 100 rubles are paid for a one-year-old. Young bruin is put into a hollowed-out tree trunk to which he is fastened with a chain, and thus he is transported by sled. The yurts where this traveler halts are considered particularly lucky. It has happened now and then that the bear, because of negligence on the part of the people
transporting him, has crushed a child to death, but such accidents are not mourned by the parents, who regard it as a good omen.
527 The bear is kept in a special enclosure in his new home.
231 An old woman is appointed to feed him and give him water.
The latter is offered him in a long wooden spoon which is inserted through a little opening. His chief food consists of dried fish, sometimes he also gets millet and various
scraps. [236]
Not all villages have bears, therefore people from different
villages usually assemble for the festival, even from those places that had their own bear festival and had already consumed their bear. Often Sakhalin-Gilyak come to the mainland at this time, although they themselves are well supplied with bears.
527 Besides feasts, various amusements take place at the 541 festival; for instance, dog races. A track is cleared on the 437 ice and staked off, and the trained dogs run for wagers.

527 Sometimes the dogs also draw sleds in these races.
541 Dog racing, besides being an amusement also has a prac-437 tical significance, for the good runners find immediate buyers. In fact, the bear festival is a sort of fair, where various things are bartered.
527 The chief figure of the festival, namely the bear, is well-825 fed throughout the whole period and is repeatedly led through the village, at which time he pays a call at each house and this is done in such a way that he has to go from one house to another at an angle, by way of the adjacent section of the river. This symbolic procedure assures the house of "an abundance of fish". He is always led by several men who put up the necessary number of chains and ropes on all sides. In the houses he is treated to fish, millet, and cranberries, and sometimes he is also teased. Some Gilyak also prostrate themselves before him. This is by no means worship, however, as some have assumed. Some do it for fun, some in earnest, calling on the spirit of the bear not to seek revenge on them after he is dead. Sometimes the bear is not given such expressions of veneration.
527 When the bear's immolation nears, he is tied to a stick 782 which has been driven in the ice, and then he is shot with 766 arrows. In this procedure the archers seek to outdo themselves. At last the unfortunate bruin is given a merciful blow with a lance. He usually dies in peace and majesty, with his fore-paws resting on his wounded chest. When this happens the woman who has had charge of him is often heard to weep loudly. Finally, funeral pyres are lit and the Gilyak seat themselves around them. Pieces of bear meat are passed around and before they are eaten they are lightly [237] roasted. Eating and tea-drinking are the main activity at a bear festival. The stick music which is here offered as entertainment has been described. Special music is produced 527 in the village of Kola. This village is the northern outpost 361 of the Gilyak settlement, on the coast of the Sea of Okhotsk, 534 about 200 versts from Nikolayevsk-na-Amure. (1) Here are

1. This distance is measured according to the curves in the coast line; in a straight line it would be much shorter.

to be found - and this has only recently been discovered - two old church bells bearing Slavonic inscriptions. They were supposed to have been taken from Fort Albasin when it was destroyed by the Chinese and since then to have belonged to 796 Elder who also determines how many and which bears are 622 to be killed by the consent of their owners, for it is not the 374 village as such but individuals in it who are the owners of the captured animals. Once an agreement has been reached 796 on this point the animals intended for slaughter are led from 777 house to house several weeks before the fixed date and must spend a night in each, in order to bring its inhabitants luck 796 by their stay. During this time the animals get only a little food, but at the end of it they are indemnified for their involuntary fast by being taken throughout the night from house to house and fed the choicest tidbits, namely, fresh and dried fish, berries and a thick gruel prepared from millet.

796 While making the rounds through the village, the bears are 563 irritated by being pricked, and they are enraged by a mock hunt staged on them with lances. The bears are ones that have been captured young in the woods or bought full-grown from the Chinese or Manchu who are also quite numerous in the 796 Gilyak territory. During the mock-hunt the Gilyak naturally take the precaution of tying the animals in such a way that they cannot easily get at their tormentors. Close behind the front legs they tie a strap around their body to which are attached rings through which are run iron chains. To these chains, in turn, they fasten thick belts of seal hide and of considerable length, in such a way that some go forward and others backward. A number of Gilyak take hold of these belts and in this way they are able to force the bear to stand completely still by alternately tightening the belts depending on whether the bear is turned frontwards or backwards when it wants to attack its leaders.
796 Outside the village there is a kind of fence made of sturdy 417 willow sticks, which has an opening for an avenue that is also fenced in on both sides with similar willow sticks. Inside this enclosure the bear, after it has finished its tour through 796 the village, is tied between two tree trunks. There it is left 541 to itself for a while, while the inhabitants of the village amuse 231 themselves with the dog race almost always held at these 437 celebrations. In the village visited by Jakobsen they also had a track especially constructed for this purpose, which, however, was not very long. After the dogs had been led to the track by their owners and placed next to each other, they were let loose at intervals of a few seconds, but they all arrived at the finish about the same time. There is, by the way, no idea of winning prizes at this race, since such do not even exist. Rather, it might be called a purchasing race since the race serves to place the good qualities of the dogs in the right light and thus to arouse a desire for buying. The sled race has the same purpose and is likewise held on this occasion. Here it does not matter either whether the draught dogs show outstanding speed. This is shown by the fact that only one sled races along the track at time; the test is, rather, how accurately the team and especially its leading dog run along the prescribed route. Such leader dogs, which show themselves to be particularly reliable, especially in understanding and following exactly the calls of the leaders, are very highly valued among the Gilyak who pay from 30 to 60 rubles for them. It was interesting to watch how, to take part in the race, some of the Gilyak who were standing by the track threw themselves on the sleds that travelled by them at a speed almost equal to that of an express train. Some Gilyak succeedes very well in this attempt; others, on the other hand, were thrown along some distance by the speeding sleds and sometimes suffered grave injuries, which they bore, however with the best good humor despite the pain and the ridicule of their luckier companions.

At the end of the race, the whole crowd, closely followed by the traveller, of course, went back to the enclosure mentioned above and released the bear from its prison. Then the entire male population of Vaida, together with the guests from outside—altogether more than 100 persons—led the bear down the hill on which the fence was erected, to the village. On the way, one half pulled the bear forward by the belts described above since it gave indications of no longer wanting to follow its tormentors willingly. The others steered the bear more or less by means of the belts attached to its back. During this, the company raised a terrible racket. Now both parties would shout methods of procedure at each other, now one or another would fall into the deep snow to the amusement of his companions, and those that came after him would kick and jostle him in the most merciless manner, without this, however, spoiling his good humor in any way. Then again, the bear would attempt to seize one of its tormentors with its teeth and claws and it always had to endure a resounding, scornful laughter if it did not succeed. In short, it was a highly agitated scene that presented itself here to the eyes of our traveller. When they arrived in the village, [381] they stopped first of all in front of the house in which the bear had enjoyed its last meal the evening before. He [illegible] a beam about three meters long had been attached to a stand in front of the door in such a manner that it hung down vertically about a meter above the ground. Beside this beam there stood six to eight girls and women who were provided with club-like sticks

543

543 EXHIBITIONS--international expositions; local and regional fairs; animal-judging contests (e.g., horse and dog shows); handicraft displays; automobile and flower shows; art exhibitions; special exhibits (e.g., by libraries and museums); offering of prizes and awards; organization of exhibitions; mode of finance (e.g., by sale of tickets, sale of articles on display, voluntary contributions); specialized organizers and dealers, etc. See also:

Libraries, art galleries, and museums	217	Markets	443
Zoological and botanical gardens	367	Sales promotion	446
Auctioning	427	Advertising	447

22: Knox T-2 (1866) 1870 Gilyak

150 A MOTLEY GROUP.

000 evidently on a trading expedition. He had a boat about twenty-five feet long by eight wide, with a single mast carrying a square sail. His boat was full of boxes and bales and had a crew of four men. A small skiff was towed astern and another alongside. These Manjour merchants are quite enterprising, and engage in traffic for small profits and large risks when better terms are not attainable. Before the Russian occupation all the trade of the lower Amoor was in Manjour hands. Boats annually descended from San-Sin and Igoon bringing supplies for native use. Sometimes a merchant would spend five or six months making his round journey.

437 The merchants visited the villages on the route and bar-● 543 gained their goods for furs. There was an annual fair at the Gilyak village of Pul, below Mariensk. and this was made the center of commerce. The fair lasted ten days, and during that time Pul was a miniature Nijne Novgorod. Manjour and Chinese merchants met Japanese from the island of Sakhalin, Tunguse from the coast of the Ohotsk Sea, and others from the head waters of the Zeya and Amgoon. There were Gilyaks from the lower Amoor and various tribes of natives from the coast of Manjouria.

A dozen languages were spoken, and traffic was conducted in a patois of all the dialects. Cloth, powder, lead, knives, and brandy were exchanged for skins and furs. A gentleman who attended one of these fairs told me that the scene was full of interest and abounded in amusing incidents. Of late years the navigation of the Amoor has discontinued the fair of Pul. The Manjour traders still descend the river, but they are not as numerous as of yore.

226 With a good glass from the deck of the steamer I watched the native process of catching salmon. The fishing stations are generally, though not always, near the villages. The natives use gill nets and seines in some localities, and scoop nets in others. Sometimes they build a fence at right angles to the shore, and extend it twenty or thirty yards into the

545

545 MUSICAL AND THEATRICAL PRODUCTIONS--public concerts; operatic productions; performances by dance troupes (e.g., ballets); burlesque and vaudeville; production of musical comedies and plays; stock companies, amateur musicals and theatricals; metropolitan show business (e.g., selection of a play, backers, producers, casting, try-outs, staging, rehearsals, promotion, advance sales, first nights, reviews, runs, motion picture rights, royalties, returns on investment, road companies); promotion of other musical and dramatic productions; etc. See also:

Fine arts	68	Theatrical supplies industry	948

/684 cont./

534 The gut string is fastened to the short end and from there runs over [192] a bridge set up on the fish skin (Gilyak twua, as in the case of the bow) to the other end of the stick, where there is a device for keeping the string taut. The fiddle bow (Gilyak tyngr-puntsch) is sharply curved and strung with horsehair (Gilyak kich). The string, of course, is played between the bridge and the long end of the [191] stick stuck through the cylinder-casing. The instrument seems to me, judging also by its name, to be of Olcha, Goldi, or at any rate Tungusic origin. I saw it and heard it played only in Kidsi, and the monotonous and melancholy melody was very similar to those of the Gilyak.

535 It is very characteristic of the serious, sober, and practical state of mind of the Gilyak that in the course of two years I never saw dancing either at their bear festivals or on any other occasion; apparently this type of social entertainment does not appeal to them at all. Middendorff encountered it, but it took place under quite extraordinary circumstances: it was in Burukan, a place which the Gilyak visit only for trade; the Tungus, presumably excited by alcohol, performed a wild demonic dance, into which the Gilyak, at first only spectators, finally let themselves be drawn (1).

1. Middendorff, Reise, etc., Vol. IV, p 1486.

Otherwise, they said, they did not do it, as Middendorff, too, remarks in his handwritten notes. And at the time their entire behavior revealed this. Whereas the Tungus in their short, tight-fitting fur-jackets moved nimbly and skillfully, the movements of the Gilyak, who kept on their long dog-fur coats reaching down to their calves, were bear-like and extremely stiff and awkward. Moreover, when they tried to imitate the former, the dance always soon ended in exhaustion and a loud burst of laughter, because they felt so childishly silly behaving in this, to them, completely strange and foreign manner.

● 545 It seemed no less surprising to me to find nothing among 171 the Gilyak that might suggest the performance of masquerades or

/684 cont./

● 545 theatrical presentations, no fantastic costumes, no masks, etc., 171 whereas other Paleo-Asiatic peoples, for instance, the Aleuts and the Northwest American Eskimo, have such a wealth of these and such great delight in these entertainments that there are complicated arrangements for setting up the stage, the entrance of /685/ the actors, etc. in the kashim for the most part erected [157] for the purpose (1). The Gilyak seem to have such a sober frame

1. Concerning the theatrical performances of the Aleuts see in particular: Veniaminov", Zap. ob" ostr. Unalashk. otd. /Notes on the Islands of the Unalaska Sector/. St. Petersburg. 1840. Part II. pp. 85. 93. With regard to the Eskimo, see above. pp. 492-498.

of mind that they are not capable of illusion.

527 Their social entertainments are principally of such a kind [526] as to offer the men an opportunity, in competitive tests, to parad their great skill, fearlessness, boldness, and strength, and afterward to enjoy an opulent, hearty meal, whereas the women, except for their very active participation in preparing the latter, play an almost entirely passive role at them and hardly have a 128 chance to enjoy the results of their own labor. In the next sectio devoted exclusively to the bear festival of the Gilyak and their immediate neighbors, I shall also discuss the entertainments on the program for it and in the order in which I myself became acquainted with them.

524 Mention might be made here, however, of one Gilyak gam 439 which does not belong there and which they owe to the Chinese; I mean playing with cards. They are the well-known, small, Chinese playing-cards, which Chinese traders bring from the Sungari and upper Ussuri down the Amur, through the territory of the Goldi and Olcha (2), and thus into the hands of the Gilyak.

[197] 2. Maack (Putesh. na Amur". p. 198) saw for example, these Chinese playing

177 Many Nivkhi with secondary schooling enter higher educational institu-648 tions. In 1953, 2 Nivkhi attended Leningrad State University, and 10 studied 873 at the A. I. Herzen Pedagogical Institute. At present, 16 Nivkhi are attending the institute. Among the students there are also women. In 1953, Liza Dekhal' of the village of Pad on the Amur graduated successfully from the [43] A. I. Herzen Institute in Leningrad. The Nivkhi Chuner Taksami of the village of Kal'ma is today doing graduate work at the Institute of Ethnography of the USSR Academy of Sciences. Nivkhi with special training are working today as captains, enginemen on cutters, teachers, librarians and club directors.

177 The political activity of Nivkhi workers has grown tremendously. Many 648 have risen to leading posts on collective farms and in various institutions;
many work as instructors with rayon Party committees and executive [47] committees.

[64] Wide educational work among the Nivkhi has been conducted and is conducted today by the cultural bases established on their territory. The first of these was founded in 1928-29 in the village of Nogliki, at the mouth of the Tym' River in Vostochno-Sakhalinskiy Rayon. The second cultural base of the peoples of the North was founded on Sakhalin in 1946, in the village of Yukovo. These bases have libraries, reading rooms, clubs, seven-year schools for Nivkhi and Evenk children, and also dormitories and boarding schools.

[52] At the amateur concerts on the collective farms, both men and women entertain, singing and performing native and Russian dances. Frequently the songs are created on the spot, impromptu. The collective-farm youth also participate in regional Olympic games.

● [545] Theatre arts are also developing among the Nivkhi. In the beginning, the Nivkhi, who had never seen a theatre before the Revolution, were merely spectators at performances organized by Russians. Soon, however, dramatic clubs were organized in the collective-farm clubhouses, and the Nivkhi began to present plays in their own language.

[526] The Nivkhi are great lovers of sports. In former times they did not know how to swim and feared the water. Today the Nivkhi young people enthusiastically engage in water sports. There are now special sports omorochki (canoes) with a single oar, in which young men and women hold speed races.

[182] The Nivkhi have also preserved native sports, such as rope-jumping.

The changed working, living and cultural conditions of Nivkhi life—the collectivization of their economy, their participation in industry, the unification in collective-farm villages of people who had formerly belonged to different clans, and the general rise in their cultural level—all these factors have completely destroyed the old ties and rules, based on the numerous remnants of clan relations which had survived until the Revolution. The old 177 religious ideas, holidays and rituals have lost all their meaning. The 648 greatest change has occurred in the position of women. In former times, the Nivkhi woman was timid and oppressed, and knew only the narrow circle of 561 her domestic duties. She could be bought and sold, or turned out of the house. When she met men, she had to cover her face and turn her back to them. During the early post-Revolutionary years, a great deal of effort had to be applied toward the elimination of survivals of the past. When they attempted to study, many young women and girls were ridiculed by their fr ers, husbands and mothers. Some were unable to withstand the pressure and discontinued their studies. It proved especially difficult to overcome the ancient custom of placing a woman in childbed in a special hut, built near the dwelling. This tent was usually cold and damp. The woman had to remain under these conditions for several days without any help,

548

548 ORGANIZED VICE--prostitutes and houses of prostitution; recruiting of prostitutes; business methods; auxiliary specialists (e.g., procurers, madams, pimps); organized homosexuality; illicit narcotics trade (e.g., drug peddlers, opium dens); underworld gambling establishments; illicit liquor business (e.g., rumrunning, bootlegging, speakeasies); organization of underworld activities; political protection and graft; racketeering; etc. See also:

Use of narcotics and liquor 27 Political corruption 66 Sex 83
Gambling 525
Crime 674
Public health 744
Religious prostitution 786

577 makes the comparison even more valuable. Unfortunately,
609 there have been cases where Gilyak have been wronged 177 by decent people, for example by soldiers who had before that behaved properly. The causes for that may be found in the peculiar manner in which the uncultivated individual regards strange peoples. He is to a certain extent inclined to regard foreigners as outlaws. However, this fact has in recent times been badly misused and misinterpreted by some philosophers. We have pointed out how the Gilyak themselves were able to put themselves in the place of strangers as well as fellow-tribesmen, and to sympathize with them. But one must remember that, where strangers are concerned, moral impulses such as compassion, the sharing of pleasures, the sense of justice, etc., more than ever make room for the egoistic impulses. Everything that tends to repress understanding and sympathy-greed, vindictiveness, etc.- breaks out more easily if one is 177 face to face with strangers. The Gilyak unfortunately 682 put their worst foot forward in their first acquaintance 627 with the civilized world. The French missionary, Le Brunière, who in the year 1848 came from China by way of the Amur and the Ussuri to the Gilyak was robbed and murdered out of pure lust for booty. But this case was and has remained an exception. The village of Vaida (32 versts from the present city of Nikolayevsk-na-Amure) still has about 200 inhabitants;
at that time it was larger by a third, and seven or eight men took part in the crime, of which none is living.

Actually murder seldom occurs. Most cases are caused by quarrels over the fair sex. The relatives of the murdered one formerly resorted to revenge;
now, however, they usually file complaints with the Russian administration. [226]

● 548 Prostitution in its real sense does not exist; however 837 passing amours are not too much forbidden. A Gilyak 684 woman whose husband is away probably lets herself be persuaded by a passer-by, and the husband himself is not too much offended, provided only that there are no consequences. In general, virginity and chastity have a certain value, but minor transgressions are not taken very seriously. However if a woman gives herself completely to a stranger she is persecuted.

● 548 On Sakhalin it happened that the Gilyak meant to kill such 837 a Helen who lived with a Russian soldier and bore him 684 a child.

Sodomy, onanism and similar perversions seem to be un-839 known among the Gilyak. Those whom I questioned about them regarded me with astonishment and did not know what I was talking about.

514 As for modesty, it varies according to the type referred 834 to. In sexual matters it is not very pronounced, as we have already pointed out. First of all, the crowded way in which people live together does not permit such delicacy; however the Gilyaks try to hide their love-making from strangers.
Their natural functions they do not exactly perform in the open, but they are not particularly ashamed in front of members of the opposite sex. Men as well as women squat in urinating. Women, at any rate younger women, guard against exposing their bodies before strange men. I had some difficulty in persuading them to do this when I was taking body measurements.

177 It is impossible to study the more subtle expressions of 437 modesty in all their forms, but it seems that the Gilyak are 183 most of all ashamed of being taken for thieves and cowards.
576 Their entire character and cycle of habits is such that fawning and self-degradation are foreign to them. They do not make much of genuflection, but do it largely when they are forced to. Thus those Gilyak who decide to travel up the Sungari to the Chinese with their fur must, as a matter of course, bow before the Chinese officials. And probably the Chinese are responsible for teaching them such humiliating expressions of veneration. [227]

735 Begging is practically non-existent among the Gilyak. The 273 only specimen one can see begging is the so-called Vanika-Gilyak, a degenerated half-idiot who goes begging along the streets of Nikolayevsk-na-Amure and who long since has deserted his countrymen. He is also the only one who can be seen in a drunken state, swaying and noisily roaming about.
In general drunkenness has not taken root to such an extent that there are professional alcoholics, and this is probably partly because Gilyak cannot have spirits whenever they want, for it necessitates a trip to the Russians. But they love liquor very much, and unfortunately it is to be foreseen that this habit will become wide-spread.

623 XII. Councils, Jurisdiction, Duels, Prosecution
681 of Criminals

Meetings and councils are seldom held. If they are, they 551

551 PERSONAL NAMES--proper names of individuals (e.g., number and va meanings, circumstances of use); sex and status differences, special n usages (e.g., nicknames, aliases, teknonymy); name taboos and avoida etc. See also:

Incorporeal property 426 Naming 553
Titles 884
Kinship terms . . . . . .
Names as souls . . . . . .

601 /31 cont./
191 periods in the evolution of marriage, and, although they could 104 have influenced one another, they basically belong, speaking in [595] the language of geology, to different formations. It is sufficient [835] to say that among the Tungus tribes sexual intercourse with wives of individuals of ascending generations is allowed, for example, with the wife of the father's younger brother, while among the Gilyak this is regarded as incest.

595 At first sight the Gilyak institution of marriage does not 581 seem to be anything special. A Gilyak will generally buy one or [583] rarely two or three wives, who come over into his clan and are regarded before the world as his personal wives and the mothers of his children. The children belong exclusively to the father and [851] succeed him after his death. When a Gilyak becomes a father, he 611 is no longer called by his former name, but is called the father [551] of the born child. The exclusive possession of his wives expresses [684] itself in the stern custom of blood vengeance against the disturber [614] of marital harmony. The clan is based on the principle of agna-[582] tion, and marriage is exogamous.

593 One can travel over the entire territory of the Gilyak, live 601 in their yurts, and observe their family life for a long time, and not notice anything peculiar in the structure of their family. In [592] large winter yurts the inhabitants occupy their plank beds by [352] families, each living in relation to its own particular interests. Complete harmony and tender relations prevail among husband, wife, and their children. That is not all. One may frequently [765] encounter instances of striking loyalty and love between spouses. When one of them dies, the other frequently lays hands on himself or dies from grief. In a word, to all appearances we are dealing with the type of family which is generally called patriarchal. Actually, however, it is not. First of all, one is struck by the strange kinship nomenclature. A whole group of women call a whole group of men their husbands (pu, ivn), and the latter call them their wives (an'gej). Likewise, a whole group of men call a group of women their mothers (ymk) and a group of men their fathers (ytk), and these call the former their children.

/130 cont./
58 agnates, the father or her brothers; she makes her permanent [591] residence in his home, follows him in his journeyings and emigrations, and before all the world is considered the personal wife of the Gilyak who purchased her and the mother of his 59 children. The children belong exclusively to the father and [85] succeed him after his death. After the birth of the first child, [551] husband and wife cease to call themselves by their former [555] names and begin to be called by the name of the newborn ("the father of so-and-so, the mother of so-and-so" -- teknonymy). The exclusive rights of the husband to his wives
[684] apparently are sanctioned by the right of retribution, even bloody retribution, upon the infringer on his conjugal rights.
[614] The clan is based on the principle of agnation, exogamous marriage. One can travel over the whole territory of the Gilyak, live in their yurts, long observe their family life, and note nothing extraordinary. In the large winter yurts, the inhabitants occupy their places by families, each living with regard to its own particular interests. Between husband and wife or wives and their children, harmony and tender /131/ relations prevail. Cases of a striking attachment between spouses are not infrequent; when one of them dies, the other sometimes lays hands on himself or dies of grief.

*601 In a word, to all appearances we are dealing here with a 121 type of individual family which is generally accepted as being 125 patriarchal and in any case not polyandrous. Such were my [59] own personal impressions at first. But my first inquiries in the realm of kinship nomenclature awoke serious doubts in me, and I therefore determined first of all to make a detailed study of this aspect of their relations. The study of the kinship nomenclature, it appeared to me, could be most successfully accomplished by a systematic census of the population. With [114] this objective, I undertook during the winter of 1891 my first census of the Gilyak villages on the western shore of northern Sakhalin, and as a result I discovered their complex classificatory system of kinship and their peculiar form of group marriage (1).

[113] 1. At the time the account of this was

428 order that he may not squander the property. On Sakhalin, 583 only the sons inherit the parents, and the daughters are married off. If after the death of the parents only one daughter is left behind, she usually gets part of the estate upon her marriage, the rest is kept by the relatives who took care of her. In any case, if the bride has a dowry, the man has no right to it; he can get hold of it only by going against the wishes of his wife.

428 In the matter of succession, it is true, the procedure is not everywhere and always [232] the same, but in general one can draw the following conclusions from what has been said: a) the children take precedence over other relatives; b) the brothers take precedence over their sisters, provided the latter marry and thus share the fortune of their husband; c) the joint usufruct of the estate on the part of the nearest relatives is very common; d) women may inherit and have their own property, but in general they are not left as much; however, they have the right to be supported; e) widows can demand their own share, but usually they become joint owners of the estate along with their children.

565 The Gilyak are all of one class. There are no privileged 551 classes or families. There are families, now and then, who 177 are held in great esteem because of wealth, courage, or because their ancestor was founder of the village, but they have no real privileges of any kind. Such families also have family names (which are handed down by the males); many Gilyak, however, have only one single name to which is added the name of their village, to distinguish them from outsiders. Some of them, whether they are baptized or not, are given this or that Russian name besides their Gilyak one, and by this name they are known even among their fellow-tribesmen. These "Petkas," "Mikitas", etc., are usually intelligent lads and understand Russian.

567 In like manner, there are no slaves, nor have there ever 554 been any among these people. Only personal qualities, 576 either bravery, wealth, age, or intelligence, give the individual a certain significance. Wealth may be regarded with a certain esteem, since it is usually acquired as a result of real superiority, - either courage, industry or judgment. Toward aristocrats of wealth a certain external ceremony is occasionally observed. If such a person comes for a visit, both he and the host bow after a fashion, whereupon he holds up his cheek to be kissed; he himself does not kiss the other.

845 who are descendents of the Ainu bury 766 their bodies in the earth.

be cremated after their death. If that were done all those present at the ceremony would be punished with the loss of their eyesight. Even the parents of twins have to be buried in the earth, because they too have become relatives of the god of the mountains. The children of twins, however, are considered to be ordinary members of the tribe, and at their funeral there is no deviation from the custom.

845 If twins stay alive and grow up they remain, for the 551 rest of their lives, the object of awe for all their 769 neighbors and friends although there may be enough proof that they lack every kind of supernatural power. At every meeting, either in friendship or in hostility, the others remind them of their unusual progenity and everybody attributes to them that mysterious innate power. Each of the twins bears the name he gave himself as a child. The custom of giving the child the name of a dead ancestor is not followed in the case of twins. The names of the twins are neither given to another child in the same family nor to another child in the tribe. Here too we see a deviation from the general custom of giving children the names of dead ancestors.

845 The greatest awe is felt for those twins who die in 766 childhood. The offspring of the spirits of the 782 mountains who, while living among ordinary human 775 beings for a short time, who did not get used to them and did not feel he was one of them, has especially the power to do harm to people; that is why they try hard to win his favor. The family who had harbored the unwelcome offspring of the mountains constructs a little model of a Gilyak yurt and puts it either on a little board inside the house or outside in the open. A little figure carved in wood which represents the dead child is put into that little hut. The members of the family consider it necessary to give some of the food they eat themselves to that little figure every day. This rule is strictly followed not only by the parents of the twins but also by the two following generations. Only the great-grandchildren, observing ceremonial rites, carry the little figure with its

552

552 NAMES OF ANIMALS AND THINGS--proper names of individual animals, houses, boats, and other objects; meanings; bestowal and use; etc. See also:
Names of sin groups 61
Place names 103
Vocabulary 192
/Property in names 494
/Names of supernatural beings 778

411 called əmləus and the sea-end is called əz-baχ-puks 225 'master's stone tie.' To this end, which is lowered into the 283 sea, is tied əz-bax 'master's stone' or 'master stone,' which, according to the Gilyaks, weighs two poods. This stone, the Gilyaks explained to me, forms the anchor of the seine. In place of plummets, stones are attached to the bottom of the seine. They are called tətr-paχ. Large wooden floats (vaŋ) are fastened to the upper cord of the seine. When the head of a sivuch gets caught in the net, the sivuch starts to flounder; at times so violently that it throws the lower edge of the seine together with the plummets over the upper cord and finds itself literally in a sack. Sometimes dolphins fall into the seine. The seals pəγi are shrewd and are seldom caught in the net.

In the past as well as at the present time the Gilyaks of the village Kul set the tola-k'e at Kivf-ŋalu, Ke-ŋalu, Vilk, Lo ri, and ət.

614 According to old man Virp, some clans in the village Kul 225 owned seal hunting places in the past.
423 Thus clan Qavjuŋ owned: 1. Lulvəχ-pər, 2. 'ayqej, 524 3. ət.
471 Lulvəχ-pər and 'ayreqej are names of rocks sticking out of the water. Seals crawl out of the water onto these rocks.
ət is a small island close to which there is another such rock.(1)

3. In a fog the hunters come alongside of the shore or of the small island ət. Then the young hunters amuse themselves and play. There are onət two laqr-paχ stones for a game: "who can lift it and who cannot." Close to the rocks there is a flat place where the Gilyaks compete. The competition consists in jumping on one foot (tenot ferd).

Clan Tnaunuŋ owned: 1. Mat-lonri, 2. Tpəri-yrə, 3. Zomi-vər.

The first two places form parts of the shore and are resting places for seals. The third is a rock.

Clan Kezoŋ owned the shore off Vilk, a resting place for seals and Hapəə-vər - a stone.

225 [84] Once at sea, the hunters take a number of measures 552 to ensure a successful hunt. Thus, in conversation, they 198 substitute prearranged names for the usual names of certain 825 objects. This prearranged language is an echo of a distant 789 past when hunters used it to keep their plans from animals

225 assumed to understand human speech. (1) 552

198 1. For details see the paper of D. K. Zelenin-"Tabu 825 slov u narodov Vostochnoĭ Ĭevropy i severnoĭ Azii" 789 [Taboos pertaining to Names as found among the Nations of Eastern Europe and Northern Asia]. Sbornik Muzeĭa Antropologii i Ĭtnografii v. VII; 1929. The work is interesting and contains an abundance of facts.

198 Thus, during the hunt instead of 225 Vo, 'village', the hunters say hiulaf.
mif, 'Land', they say otχ 'excrements.' If they are far from land, they say tevl otχta, if near - knemla-otχta.
mu 'boat' they say orq.
ker 'sun' they say am.
la urd 'good weather' - literally 'good wind,' they say am sodra.
t-lu 'fog' they say verq.
umgu 'woman' they say hiulaf.
umgu 'woman' they say hiuraq.
qan 'dog' they say aim.
to 'fish' they tomr 'leaf.'
loq 'flounder' they say pna-domr.
lo r 'trout' they say manm.
nemla 'linek' they say naχ-tomr.
va a 'lake-salmon' they say vəlik.
al o 'kunzha' they say doχti. (2)

177 2. The Gilyaks say that they borrowed the words manm and doχti from Tungus.

198 ti r 'fire wood' they say opa; tuin ops-ket tuγr-arguda 225 'having taken fire wood here, we will feed the fire.'
la r 'seal' they say vaad; mor-vaad 'two seals,' tor vaad 'three seals.'
la r pud 'the seal came to the surface' they say lərŋ.
i d 'to kill' they say ŋazd.
pət 'tomorrow' they say mandəa.
e r vida 'let us return' they say pəγtkuda.
saru-mu 'full boat' they say ulvəta-mu.
kər-ŋoqod 'hungry,' 'I want to eat' they say tava-ŋod 'tava hurts.'
kraəzd '(I, you, etc.) have had my fill' they say mat-toqq-tangad 'the little finger sticks out (?) or tot-ŋod 'the hand hurts.'

225 has hung something in front of the seal. The seals will also 825 tell of a theft in the village. If the wife at home has sexual 787 relations with another man while her husband is away on a 626 hunt, the seals on the floe will likewise engage in sexual inter-784 course. When they witness some such thing at sea, some of our Gilyaks will, after returning home, beat up their wives and later on find out from neighbors in the village what had really happened. Now, suppose you cook seal meat, eat it and pick your teeth with a little stick, then the seal in the sea will show how you picked your teeth with the little stick.

During the spring seal-hunt on floes, when the Gilyaks jump from floe to floe close to shore and kill seals with harpoons, those at home must not break any objects - say, plates or bowls, for otherwise the floe will break and the hunter, say, the father, brother or son, may drown. Therefore those at home must be very careful.

On the day when something goes wrong at home, the hunter will not get his seal. Then he returns home angry and tries to find out what deprived him and his friends of their quarry.

776 Roygin told me all this in order to prove to me the existence 825 of kəs, 'god'; a point on which I did not want to agree with him.
228 "How can a seal, 20 versts from home, know what is going on at home?" he told me. "Surely kəs must be telling him about it. That is why we say that kəs exists."

225 Incidentally, after my conversation with Roygin, Pletunka 784 told me that the mrolv-nivəvə 'ancient Gilyaks' observed the 874 following ui and "taboo," "sin" during a seal hunt: the guest must not touch the handle of a kettle or teapot. Only the master of the house (in the past as well as at the present time) could pour out tea or any other liquid food for the guest. If, even by mistake, the guest touched the handle of a kettle or teapot, he was obliged to tear a strip of material off his sleeve and put it in the (hearth). (1)

1. This word in my diary is illegible. As far as I can remember, Pletunka spoke of a hearth.

225 [86] During the spring hunt the Gilyaks of the village Kul 552 hunt different types of seals. They also catch an occasional 825 dolphin. They distinguish the following varieties and ages of seals:

Pila-lar 'Sivuch'

1. Nav-ŋa 'present-time animal,' i.e. a sivuch born in the given year.
2. Tje-ŋa literally: 'last year's animal', i.e. a two year old sivuch or one born in the previous year.

225 3. Pila-lanr 'sivuch', literally: 'a big seal.' 552 825

Pəγi

Among the seals of this kind the Gilyaks distinguish a few age groups: a seal belonging to a particular age group is named accordingly. For instance:

1. Qr-ŋr is the youngest of all pəγi.
2. Mat-ŋəγəl is the next to the youngest pəγi. For the time being this name is conditional. Its etymology can be given as follows: mat-ŋəski-kəld; mat - 'smal,' ŋəski 'back,' kəld 'long,' little long-back.
3. Tje-ŋəγəl last year's ŋəγəl.
4. At next in age to tje-ŋəγəl.
5. Siusui-a next in age to qat, i.e. the oldest pəγi.

Qoma.

1. Heqr-motk - the youngest qoma.
2. Ta a - a - next in age to heqrmotk.
3. Kr-ŋa - next in age to ta a, i.e. the oldest qoma.

Alχ.

Here the Gilyaks distinguish the olvarak - multicolored al and dalr - grey Alχ.

225 The sivuch is considered by the Gilyaks to be the most 237 valuable of all seals listed above. The toughest straps, dog harness and shoes (vamps and soles; tops are made out of the skin of other varieties of seals) are made out of sivuch skin.

If the quarry is big, the hunters prefer to take with them the extra hides with the fat and the heads of the seals, leaving the meat on the ice. They separate the head together with two jugular vertebrae (mat) and two upper ribs.

225 When the Gilyaks kill a seal or a dolphin at sea, they first 782 "feed" it the root of the plant piskər. (1) If not enough of this plant has grown, they feed the grass muzγi. When setting out on a hunt, the Gilyaks take along with them a sufficient supply of these plants. Having killed a seal, they open its mouth and through it they put the root of this plant in the nasal cavity. Gilyaks put the stalk of the plant next to the seal on the ice and leave the seal there. They also leave pər 'gall' of the seal on the ice and next to it they put piskər.

1. In villages further South they feed the root of the plant "orŋət."

553

553 NAMING--bestowal of names in infancy; name givers and namesakes; naming ceremonies; exchange of names; reciprocal relationships created by naming or name exchange; assumption of new names (e.g., occasions, ceremonial); posthumous assumption of names; reasons for name changing; bestowal and assumption of honorific names and titles; etc. See also:
Personal names . . . . . 551 Godparents and godchildren 60 Titles . . . . . 554 Ceremonies during infancy 28

/118 cont./

614 556 554 But who are these authoritative individuals who appear on the scene in special cases and either personally or together with the "village community" of their clansmen display, as those having the power, their initiative and energy? What role do they play in ordinary life?

They are the so-called yz' -- the "masters" (1), or otherwise

1. Up to the present, little attention has been focused on the role of such persons in the structure of primitive societies. Their role is obscured by their being classified only as representatives of wealth. Here is one of the most recent examples of such a relation. Separate classes of "nobles" and "commoners" do not exist in northwestern California, but in almost all affairs of life the rich man plays the most important role ("Types of Indian Culture in California," by A. L. Kroeber, University of California Publications, June, 1904, Vol. II). One should be grateful, however, that such facts have been noted at all.

[171] [13]

the urdlya-nivukhi -- the good, i.e., the rich, outstanding men (good and rich are synonomous among all primitive peoples). These are individuals who enjoy outstanding prosperity, thanks to their exceptional individual talents -- bravery, dexterity, strength, enterprise, and intelligence, which place them in an advantageous position in the business of obtaining the means of subsistence. Such an individual is a valuable man for all around him. For the narrow circle of his own family he is the natural head of the communal economy, which, thanks to his initiative and talents, is run more profitably than if it were conducted haphazardly. /119/ The huge family grouped around him is better provided with

/119 cont./

* 614 ● 554 556 not only in natural products, but also purchased ones, tobacco, rice, kumiss, etc., because his wealth and associations make it possible for him to undertake distant journeys for the barter of furs and the acquisition of goods at firsthand. He is the guardian of the common "shagund" of his closest kinsmen, and the possessor of his own rich collection of "shagund," which his clansmen may use in case of necessity.

For the whole clan he is not only a man whose home is always open, where one can always go to eat well, enjoy the delights of tobacco, and hear interesting things, but one who always comes to assist in time of need. Especially invaluable, however, is his help at times of common misfortune, such as war, conflicts arising from revenge, disputes with members of other clans. He has supplies of the best weapons and conveyances, his name strikes terror into the foe, who for that reason will more willingly consent to a reconciliation, and, finally, he has supplies of "shagund" when it becomes necessary to pay ransom. Moreover, such a person usually possesses exceptional intelligence, eloquence, rich experience, and knowledge of life and people. He is the natural orator, [539] "khlaj-nivukh," who plays such a weighty role in affairs of revenge and civil disputes; even neighboring clans resort to him when the intervention of intermediaries is necessary. Among these yz'i there are individuals who enjoy enormous fame and respect throughout all the territory settled by the Gilyak. In the image and likeness of these yz'i are fashioned [532] images of the gods, the "masters" of the mountains, seas, heavens, rivers, etc. Moreover, they do not simply display respect toward him, but also a feeling of religious adoration. From among such individuals, under favorable circumstances, are developed those elements of authority which we find in other tribes standing on a higher level of cultural conditions. In some cases, such yz'i will become the council of elders, [623] which before the clan assembly decides the affairs of the community in the name of the clan. Under other circum- [622] stances, when the tribe is compelled to conduct frequent wars,

* 614 ● 554 556 [622] /119 cont./ the most outstanding yz'i become leaders of the tribe for life, or hereditary tribal leaders, leaders of troops, vikings, or founders of dynasties.

But in the clan life of the Gilyak such individuals do not yet make claim to anything of this sort. Their role is still too insignificant and in any event incidental in comparison with the complex functions of the clan, whose mechanism and life are based on the value and initiative of the integrated personality of each individual. What is the /120/ yz' if not that integrated personality in its highest manifestation of individuality? The influence of the yz' is therefore purely factual, moral; between him and the poorest of his clansmen there is no abyss either in the intellectual or economic sense, while the higher fraternal bond of the religio-social union of the clan towers over and dominates all.

* 614 182 Such is the mechanism of clan life. Its real mainspring is the comprehensive development of the personality, together with an integrated religio-social world-view. Organized power is completely absent. Although invisible behind all this, and without any claims to power, elements of authority exist, these elements are without form; they appear on the scene in an elemental fashion, spontaneously, and not at all as constant elements of authority which would push the free manifestation of personality into the background, but these elements nevertheless do exist. There are three of them:

[623] Above all there is the khal', the clan, i.e., the whole totality of the adult clansmen, or at least all those who are present at a given moment, which, having no head or regular assemblies, ordinarily appears suddenly on the scene when some serious problem demands its interference and, once the problem is resolved, disappears from the scene as suddenly as it appeared.

/120 cont./

* 614 182 623 Then there are the hejmary, the elders, all of whose authority consists in the solution of moot problems of cult and kinship. They play a certain role at the time of the clan festivals, at which they are generally the principal managers; they are, after a fashion, the priests of the clan. They do not, however, wield any influence or possess any actual significance in the other important manifestations of the life of the clan.

* 614 182 Finally, the third element of authority is the yz'i.

● [556] [554] Under favorable conditions, there could develop out of these three elements those diverse forms of power which in various combinations (people's assemblies, the council of the elders, patriarchs, priest-kings and military leaders, dukes, vikings, kings, and so forth) we find among many semi-cultured peoples at the present time and at the dawn of the history of all nations which are civilized today. But among the Gilyak these elements are only embryonic, and it is hardly fated for them ever to receive an impetus toward further development.

/121/

VIII.

Interclan Relations

615 * 614 The clan, however, is not a self-sufficient institution, and a man's intimate ties are not bounded only by the clan to which he belongs by birth.

Each clan, by the basic principle of its matrimonial law, is bound by marriage ties with four other clans, the akhmal'k and ymgi clans. Between these clans is formed the bond of blood kinship, so important in the eyes of primitive man, the bond of common origin through the mother (the male ancestors of all four clans and the representatives of each of their generations are reciprocally first cousins through the mother), and to this are united those powerful ties of natural intimacy which are engendered by generations of women tying these clans together in an uninterrupted chain of marriage unions.

835 /179 cont./ By way of an exception, I observed several cases 818 where jealous men moved to an isolated place immediately 182 after the wedding, in order to avoid the competition of their 166 brothers. Thus, the settlement of Sakh-Kotan, the southern-[361] most Gilyak settlement on the western shore, was founded by such a jealous man; when I visited it in 1897, I found there only its founder with his numerous descendants, and my Gilyak companions made not a few jokes about him, but he was invulnerable -- his wife was of an age when women are well 835 beyond suspicion. But such cases are exceptional, and all the 578 more exceptional are cases of sharp clashes between brothers 834 on account of jealousy. In order to avoid them, only an observance of tact is demanded. Such cases are possible when an individual wife and a bachelor tuvn go beyond the bounds of decency and tact: when a woman begins to run after her sweetheart publicly, disappears from the home, and completely disregards her obligations to her individual husband. In such cases it is sometimes necessary for the sweetheart to move out of the house of his brother or even out of his village, [166] and the woman sometimes gets a scolding. I met such exiles a couple of times in northern Sakhalin. Usually, however, the 835 relations between tuvn are quite peaceful. If the older brother 578 gets a little angry, it is in silence and without any consequences. Any active reaction is considered a sin. It is considered a great sin to challenge one's brother to a duel out of jealousy. I personally never happened even to hear of such cases. I happened to find out about one such case from B. Piłsudski, but this was a completely /180/ exceptional instance. A certain Lokhmatka, a young Gilyak also very well known to me personally, a very poor lad, but one who enjoyed unusual success with the Gilyak women, allowed himself to live too openly with the wife of one of his tuvn. According to the [186] Gilyak custom, as I have already said, publicity in such cases [554] is not allowed. It is allowed in exceptional cases, when the [556] hero is an outstanding and rich man, esteemed by all. Lokhmatka, however, was a thriftless Gilyak, everlastingly in debt to everybody, lightheaded, and uncivilized by any

/189 cont./
602 speech, in the form of orders, business advice, and so forth, is always permitted between brothers, between daughter-in-law and the father and mother of her husband, even between a man and the wife of his younger brother, with the use of the vocative case. But ordinarily they seek to avoid direct address. If there is a person of a permitted category at hand, they transmit their wish to this person, addressing their message in such a manner that it is audible to the prohibited individual, 602 who, in turn, answers in the same manner. If not, the ad-195 dress is in the third person or in the impersonal form. For 193 example: "the daughter-in-law, the brother, etc., could do such a thing," instead of "daughter-in-law, do it!" Or, "thanks to my brother," instead of "thank you, brother" etc. Owing to this custom of getting around the prohibition on speech by the use of the third person, the Gilyak have formed the custom of frequently using the third person in general instead of the second, especially in reference to strangers, out of fear, apparently, that they may turn out to be persons of prohibited categories. Again and again, upon the entrance of an unknown Gilyak, one hears the phrase: "Where has the Gilyak come from?" (instead of "where have you come from?"). Perhaps there is concealed in this custom, brought about by the prohibition on conversation and not peculiar to the Gilyak alone, the reason for the origin of these strange forms of the third person in place of the second that we find in Italian, 602 Polish, Tatar, and other languages. Finally, the plural num-193 ber, which is commonly used in addressing old people and [278] honored persons or strangers, is most frequently used in ad-[554] dressing persons of forbidden categories. Thus, for example, in addressing the wife of an elder brother they commonly use the singular, chi, while in addressing the wives of the younger brothers, on the other hand, they use the plural, chin.

/269 cont./
584 my children and your children also be akhmalk'i. If you do 582 not give your daughter to my son, you will completely break the old law, that will be bad. Let us do everything according to law ('live pure')."

[583] After such a reminder, rarely does anyone refuse his duty, even though this obligation entails the loss of property, for in such cases they either do not give a bride price, or they give a very small one, if the akhmalk is not an ancient one.

Unorthodox forms of concluding marriage. The most varied 177 circumstances led to the destruction of orthodox marriages 178 in the clans of akhmalk'i. One of the causes was the depopu-614 lation of the clans from which they took wives, which com-433 pelled them to marry women of alien clans. Another cause, 556 perhaps the most important, was an economic one, brought [582] about by their contact with the cultured peoples of the Far East, a contact which gave impetus to the development of hunting pursuits for commercial exchange. Objects which formerly had no value, such as the skins of the sable and fox, became objects for which one might obtain not only objects of luxury, such as expensive cloth, valuable weapons, and ornaments, but also food and spices, such as rice, groats, and, finally, alcohol and tobacco. Even nowadays the Gilyak clearly remember the time when sables and foxes used to run around fearlessly in great numbers near the Gilyak dwellings, and no one /270/ killed them, since they preferred to dress themselves in dog hides. And all of a sudden in exchange for these beasts it became possible to obtain 177 the most desirable objects. A tremendous change inevitably 178 took place in the psychics of the Gilyak and in the relation-556 ships of the people among themselves. If formerly a man's 554 dream did not go beyond attaining the reputation of a good [582] person, urdla n'ivukh, i.e., an outstanding hunter who shared his catch with his tribesmen, now urdla n'ivukh became a synonym for "rich man," whose dream was to amass a quantity of luxury objects. Self-interest and boasting appeared upon the scene, as well as the desire to excel others

192 /270 cont./
584 orthodox marriage. For an agreement concerning an orthodox [197] /271/ marriage with a young girl there is even the special term tkhagund (eastern dialect tygnydz).

584 Persons participating in the betrothal. On the side of the groom 602 the representatives are: 1) father and mother; 2) brother of the [593] father; 3) elder brother of the groom; 4) husband of the sister of the father. The role of the latter individual is explained apparently by the norms of orthodox marriage. According to this last, the husband of the sister of the father is the father of the husband of the sister of the groom. Since by the norms of Gilyak marriage his daughter cannot marry the brother of his daughter-in-law, the husband of the sister of the father considers it his duty to promote the marriage of his closest akhmalk, the brother of his own daughter-in-law. If the father is dead, he is replaced by one of the urdla 584 n'ivukh (honored persons) among his clansmen. Since the 602 marriage is considered the affair of the clan, there frequently 614 participate, in addition to these persons, several honored clansmen. When the betrothal involves a very wealthy per-[556] son, the honored clansmen come in several boats, bringing [583] with them at once the articles of the bride price, and frequently, if the delegation plus the rich bride price makes the proper impression, they immediately take the maiden away with them upon the conclusion of the negotiations.

583 The bridegroom also attends the betrothal. If he is all 422 alone, or if, on the contrary, he is quite wealthy and re-554 nowned, he can become betrothed by himself. In one song the [559] maiden sings to her beloved: "Holding my hand, betroth me."

Matchmakers are unnecessary in the case of a married 595 man who wants to marry a second wife. Then he himself 584 usually goes to the clan of his first wife, but often the latter 614 herself goes to her own clan or to another one (if there are no suitable candidates in her own) for the selection and betrothal of a new girl-friend for her husband.

422 /278 cont./
583 iron, served as objects in the shagynd (1).
[194]

[773] 1. The following splendid legend gives evidence concerning this. In the central section of Sakhalin there is a mountain, Kryus" pal, and along side of it another, somewhat smaller mountain, the "wife" of the latter, who has run away from him and hidden her shagynd. Three riverside rocks represent the different objects of the shagynd. One bears the designation Wa-ul-s'if, meaning "place where the Japanese saber is buried," another Wyn-ul-af -- "place where the kettle is buried," and the third, Kys'okhty -- the butt of the ax.

583 These are objects which are unalienab[illegible], extra commer 422 Only in exceptional cases of extreme poverty or the absence o 556 clansmen is the alienation of objects of the shagynd category 735 allowed, and even then only a part of them. A poor widow in 554 settlement of Pilavo, who had sold her only daughter, answere my question as to what she was going to do with the shagynd in this way: "Part of it I shall sell, and the remainder will go with me to Mlyvo -- to the world beyond the grave." They are re served for only exceptional cases in the life of the owner -- the payment of blood money on account of a slaying, or wh one must marry off one's sons and pay a bride price or give a dowry to one's daughters, and, after the death of the owner -- to accompany him to the world beyond the grave. Only such objects figure in the bride price of rich persons. But among pers of lesser means, the bride price is made up of valuable utili objects -- boats, guns, dogs, and so forth.

583 Rich people, seeking a large bride price, are guided m 735 by ambition, for obtaining a rich bride price is the best evide [556] of one's own wealth. For a poor man the bride price is his o

/130 cont./

8 agnates, the father or her brothers; she makes her permanent 91] residence in his home, follows him in his journeyings and emi-grations, and before all the world is considered the personal wife of the Gilyak who purchased her and the mother of his children. The children belong exclusively to the father and 9 succeed him after his death. After the birth of the first child, 51] husband and wife cease to call themselves by their former 51] names and begin to be called by the name of the newborn 53] ("the father of so-and-so, the mother of so-and-so" -- teknonymy). The exclusive rights of the husband to his wives 84] apparently are sanctioned by the right of retribution, even bloody retribution, upon the infringer on his conjugal rights.
14] The clan is based on the principle of agnation, exogamous marriage. One can travel over the whole territory of the Gilyak, live in their yurts, long observe their family life, and note nothing extraordinary. In the large winter yurts, the inhabitants occupy their places by families, each living with regard to its own particular interests. Between husband and wife or wives and their children, harmony and tender /131/relations prevail. Cases of a striking attachment between spouses are not infrequent; when one of them dies, the other sometimes lays hands on himself or dies of grief.

In a word, to all appearances we are dealing here with a 601 type of individual family which is generally accepted as being 21 patriarchal and in any case not polyandrous. Such were my 125 own personal impressions at first. But my first inquiries in the 59] realm of kinship nomenclature awoke serious doubts in me, and I therefore determined first of all to make a detailed study of this aspect of their relations. The study of the kinship nomenclature, it appeared to me, could be most successfully accomplished by a systematic census of the population. With 14] this objective, I undertook during the winter of 1891 my first census of the Gilyak villages on the western shore of northern Sakhalin, and as a result I discovered their complex classificatory system of kinship and their peculiar form of group marriage (1).

13] 1. At the time the account of this was

/266 cont./

174 reverence with which they approached a settlement where, 611 according to them, one of their female ancestors had once 614 lived.
186

In several places to this day, to a question about origin, the Gilyak point to the places from where their mothers and wives came. For example, in the settlement of Nyyvo at the mouth of the Tym' river on the eastern coast of Sakhalin, they reply to the question about the origin of the inhabitants of that settlement, "We are Nyurskie," i.e., come from the settlement of Nyur, which is on the northernmost tip of Sakhalin, and, when I asked for an explanation of this strange answer, it was explained to me: "Because we take wives from Nyur."

Thus, these people reckoned their origin according to the place of the homeland of their mothers, for, as we saw above, the wives of the Gilyak are taken predominantly from the clan of the mother. I shall introduce still another interesting remnant.

• 553 Usually at the present time children are given names 184 according to the clansmen of the father. Such is the general 614 rule, but there are still places (for example, the settlement 611 of Nanivo on the west shore) where they give names according to the brothers and clansmen of the mother; thus, it is as though the children were members of the mother's clan.

602 All these are remnants which are entirely out of line with 611 the agnate organization of the contemporary Gilyak clan, 174 but they are remnants which are intimately bound up with the present-day psychology of the Gilyak. For the Gilyak them-[582] selves they are not remnants; this is made clear mainly by [614] the marriage norms, according to which spouses are cousins, the children of brother and sister, and the members of each clan preferably take wives from one and the same clan, so that the psychologies of paternity and of maternality cross each other, and in the main between male and female lines there does not exist that gulf which is present in those agnate organizations where the Gilyak norms of marriage are not in effect.

/336 cont./

854 A newborn baby is washed with his mother's milk for 15 days [844] and then with cold water from the mouth. For the first year the whole body is washed twice a day, and then only the face.

854 Protecting the child. A stick on which the cradle is hung -- 789 ekhl-chugir:(?). Sometimes a Japanese saber in birch bark is used instead of a stick for frightening away evil spirits. If a child dies, they preserve everything, along with the amulets, for the next child, whom they again serve; if another child is not born, they preserve them until their old age.

845 If a child dies during childbirth, the woman must not ride 784 along a stream or on the sea for a whole year; there would be no 854 fish. Chkhnaj -- weapons, a little ax, a knife, a bow and arrows, 755 are hung over the child's bedding on both sides. Over the head of 787 a little girl's bed is hung a piece of fish net. All this is hung up at the first sickness of the child.

842 /337/ If a woman does not have children, the wife of her husband's brother gives her her belt (chik) and, secretly -- a piece of her husband's belt.

• 553 Names. Names are given after the grandfather, but if there are too many grandsons, a new name is thought up. One must not take names from an alien khal; otherwise one must give the latter the names from his own.

845 Twins. Twins -- tongch: -- ekhlang (tongch: means "twins" and [776] the god who gives birth to twins). Tongch: may be from Pal-n'igyvyn, i.e., the master of the forest, and Tol-n'igyvyn -- the master of the sea.

845 When twins are born, chukh-chugynd must be arranged for 782 Pal-n'ivukh: mos', saranka, puchka, rare fish, etc., in small quantities; they first set them in place and then eat them themselves.

The place where the chukh-chugynd is made is called chauf. If twins die young, then they make chkhnaj -- two or one depending on how many died. A little balagan is made under the chkhnaj. Chukh-chgynd is made here also before setting out on a journey or a hunt, and also upon one's return and when the children are ill.

/642 cont./

553 Immediately, or at least very soon after its birth, the child 352 is given a name, usually toward evening of the same day or in the morning of the following day, depending on whether it was born in the daytime or during the night. This takes place without any ceremony: the father simply names the name desired by him or the mother, or /643/ a Gilyak who happens to be present may propose a name, and the father approves it and adopts it for his child. It must be expressly stressed that no shamanistic arts are 756] practiced either in connection with the birth or the name-giving. In most cases the birth of a child is not the occasion for a special 756] celebration. Well-to-do people, however, occasionally express their joy over the family increase by a feasts which they share with a few villagers and friends.

354 When the child has grown a bit, it is placed in a cradle 92] (Gilyak tschjakk). This has a very peculiar nature: it consists of 952] a canoe-shaped or fluted, hollowed-out piece of wood of such a length and width that the upper body of the child, up to its head, can be fitted into it comfortably. While its upper end, usually pointed, remains open, the lower end is closed with a crossboard which is provided with several grooves emptying into a central hole. The child, wrapped in blankets except for its naked buttocks, is set on this board so that the upper body rests in the hollow, whereupon a couple of straps are drawn from one edge of it to the other to prevent the child from falling out. A small basket half filled with moss or fine wood-shavings is fastened below the opening in the little seat-board, and then the cradle is hung on a crossbeam of the house, above the sleeping bench (cf. Pl.XII /see p. 992/). But in order to prevent the latter from being soiled by excrement that might seep through the basket, a longish board (Gilyak mu, Pl. XXXIV, Fig. 9 /see p. 1014/), provided with raised rims and several grooves lengthwise and crosswise, is put on it below the cradle. The long straps by which the cradle is suspended are so skillfully drawn and lashed that the latter can be put in a higher or lower, vertical, oblique, or horizontal position as desired. To quiet or to amuse the child, a bundle of various small objects (wood or metal) is hung on the back of the cradle and,

844 The mother delivers the child herself, and only if the mother is entirely too weak does the midwife help at the delivery.

The Gilyak do not know how to give obstetric help to a woman in labor. If a woman is not able to deliver the child she dies, and, in this case, the child will perish too. But that happens very rarely. During a more than ten years' stay in the region of the river Tym I heard only once that a woman died during the delivery.

Among the Gilyak the first childbirth is considered to be the hardest. It is especially hard and painful for very young women who are not fully developed physically.

845 Girls are strictly forbidden to laugh when people 784 talk of delivery or confinement, and they are supposed to stay serious during the act of birth. If they fail to do so, in the future they will go through very hard deliveries and suffer exceedingly great labor pains.

844 In order to speed up the discharge of the placenta chiplings of a certain wood (sambucus racemosa) are put into the mouth of the woman in labor. The bitter disgusting taste of the wood causes vomiting which, according to the belief of the Gilyak, should accelerate the discharge of the placenta (ehlaud cuind, that is: the child's food). But, if the placenta nevertheless is not discharged after a while the woman dies. This [758] happens rarely but does occur once in a while among the Gilyak. The placenta is wrapped in a towel and hung up on a tree in the wood not far from the house.

845 If a child is born with a caul which, however, 777 happens very rarely, the caul is not thrown away but is carefully dried and kept with other household articles. For the Gilyak believe that this caul which in the language of their tribe, is called ehlan ok (the suit of the child) brings luck to the whole family.

844 The newly born child is not simply called a boy or 553 a girl. If a girl was born it is, for the time being, called mukin ehlan, that is: tailless child (mukind usually is the name for a dog with a very short tail). But if a boy was born his relatives say: moi ivend panend, that is: one who has a penis was born.

554

554 STATUS, ROLE, AND PRESTIGE--relative prevalence of ascribed and achievable statuses; statuses adapted to particular personality types; general comments on the social ranking of statuses and roles; types of roles and achievable statuses which bring the largest rewards in prestige; individuals typifying the foregoing (e.g., celebrities, national heroes); symbolic tokens of the achievement of prestige (e.g., medals, titles, insignia, praise songs, special privileges); general statements on the various avenues of mobility (e.g., technological skill, wealth, shrewdness, valor, piety, wisdom); etc. See also:

Social stratification 56
Relation between individual roles and culturally defined statuses 156 Ethos 181
Occupational specialization 463
Ethical ideals 677
Military virtues and prestige 703

/33 cont./

835 171 who are affirmed to have the right to this by the great council of the tribe. With regard to this group, she is piruari, and vice versa. Thus we find identical institutions of marriage in tribes which are so different from one another! The famous punulua family of the Hawaiian Islands finds full rapprochement with the institution of Gilyak marriage.

835 684 The legitimacy of group sexual intercourse is clearly expressed in the fact that, while the violation of marital fidelity with a person not included in the group "pu" leads to blood vengeance against the seducer who has been caught in flagrante delicto, or, at best, to a cruel duel and ransom, for the persons of the permitted categories it leads to no retribution whatsoever, causing only some irritation, and in rare cases the moving of the seducer to another yurt. On the other hand, sexual intercourse between persons of forbidden categories is encountered as an extremely rare exception.

835 More than once I observed even cases of the regular cohabitation of brothers with a common wife, and full harmony prevailed [554] [722] between the brothers. My first teacher of the Gilyak language, a Gilyak from the village of Tangivo, Gibel'ka, the richest and most respected /34/ Gilyak on all Sakhalin, always lived in the same yurt with his younger brother, Pleun, and the relations between the latter and the wife of his elder brother were no secret to anybody. Her children regarded both fathers with identical tenderness and enjoyed equal tenderness from the latter, and, when Pleun died, all his property went to these children, publicly regarded as Gibel'ka's children. Pleun was very rich and could buy himself more than one wife, but he loved the wife of his elder brother, who in no way protested against the reciprocity on the part of his wife, who had cost him a good deal. When anyone hinted [593] about these relations to Gibel'ka, a momentary cloud of melancholy would pass across his intelligent, handsome face, but I never saw even a trace of bad relations between the brothers.

/54 cont./

825 [766] The Gilyak never directs his harpoon at a kosatka, and when its dead body is thrown up on the shore, they solemnly bury it in a balagan especially built for this and decorate it with "inau." It is not only these large beasts (the bear and the kosatka) that the Gilyak regards with a feeling of religion, however. Signs of the deepest respect are shown toward any animal that falls prey to the Gilyak. The heads of captured seals are decorated with "inau" and solemnly lowered into the sea. The heads of belugas are put out on poles on the seashore, and likewise the heads of other animals.

825 776 The animals whom the Gilyak worship, however, are not independent gods and not even deities in general; they are merely the subordinates of the real deities, the "masters" of this or that element, this or that animal. These "masters" in their form and likeness are those same Gilyak who, according to need, assume the form of this or that animal. These gods live in the forests, the mountains, and on the bottom of the seas and lead the same kind of life as the Gilyak themselves, have wives children, and clansmen. Like the Gilyak, they are mortal. For each of the elements one of these gods, "yz'" -- master, is in command. It is these masters who send the Gilyak all that he needs each season: sables, bears, salmon, 825 seals. The notions about these "masters" of each element, 776 however, should not be understood in a strictly monistic sense. 554 It is just the same among the Gilyak: in each locality there are simply rich people and among them one kind that is richest, just as, in addition to the great gods-masters, every territory, every stream, each has its own "master" who takes care of those Gilyak closest to him (see below on the clan gods). [614] The term "master" is strictly an everyday term. /55/ In each clan every man who is outstanding for his intelligence, courage, and cunning, and consequently richest, is called "yz'" (master), and the most outstanding of them is the leader of the clan.

/65 cont./

796 On this day, however, no one is allowed to taste the prepared 574 bear meat. This takes place on the next day, which is called the day of treating the narkh'i (narkh-arin-ku). The narkh'i seat themselves ceremoniously along the plank beds, while the host solemnly walks among the rows and distributes pieces of [576] bear meat. More gracious hosts feed their guests with their own hands, sticking into their mouths /66/ a huge piece of fat; the guest bites off a piece, leaving it to his neighbor to finish
[262] what he has started. Only the narkh'i are allowed to eat bear [614] meat; and his clan are denied this right; they are allowed to eat only a soup of rice or buda with the fat from the bears' carcasses. This soup is prepared and consumed in enormous quantities.

796 It is considered the greatest honor for the host to feed his 264 guests to satiety. His graciousness goes so far that when a 576 guest who has eaten too much of the fatty soup begins to vomit it, the host respectfully offers his mouth and drinks the vomit. It would be hard to imagine more refined graciousness. In intervals between feasting, dog races, games, fencing with sticks, and circle dancing are arranged.

796 All day the girls take turns playing music on the suspended 533 log and accompany their primitive music with humorous and at 273 times very frivolous songs. Not the least role in the feast is played by Russian vodka or Chinese grain vodka, which lifts
● [554] the gaiety of the feasters to its apogee. To make one's guests drunk is considered the greatest honor. "At my house yesterday the narkh'i got drunk two times," the master of a bear once boasted to me.

796 Finally the last day of the festival comes, the day of departure of the narkh'i. Carcasses of bear meat and all kinds of viands prepared for their families and clansmen are placed [782] on their sleds. At the last moment the narkh'i lead several dogs into the yurt and tie them around the plank bed of honor to the bear's skull. In addition, as a present, they put a spear, a thong, and other such items next to the head of the animal or stuck into it. Again, in farewell, the nark'i are lavishly

/103 cont./

*614 even to his own clear advantage, but he has, as we know, an 771 already tested expedient, with the help of which he pacifies the gods with full observance of his own interest; he resorts, as in other cases, to pious deception of the gods, which offers him the opportunity both to fulfill his religious duty and to derive material *614 gains from the conflict. Usually, this most important religious 628 procedure of the institution of blood money is completely ignored, 771 and indeed traces of religious ceremonies of reconciliation are not preserved among all peoples, among the Gilyak, as we shall recount later on, this is distinctly clear from the ritual of ransom, which demands a preliminary imitation of blood revenge in the form of a battle between representatives of the warring clans, the killing of dogs, and the feeding of the spirit of the dead man with their blood.

628 Now let us proceed to the practice of this institution.
539 The principal role in the procedure of reconciliation is played ● 554 by the so-called khlaj-nivukh'i (1).
*614 [192]
[197]

1. I use the term of the more widespread western dialect.

Khlaj-nivukh -- literally: the explaining man, /104/ eloquent, orator. Such a man enjoys special regard in the eyes of the Gilyak, for in his view the eloquent individual is the chosen one of a particular deity who constantly inspires him, dwells in him, and inspires in him beautiful, convincing speeches and an irresistible influence on his hearers. The very quickness of speech, the ability to speak fluently and rapidly for a prolonged time, even apart from the content of the speech, is already considered a talent of the highest order. "His tongue turns like the wings of a windmill," thus, with awe, does the Gilyak characterize outstanding orators. The latter, in turn, regard themselves as chosen [532] ones. On the continent they always carry a wooden rod, on the head of which is carved a human face, depicting, apparently, that deity which inspires them and helps them to convince others. At pathetic moments they wave these threateningly, swearing to break them in the event of the failure of their arguments and bring the wrath of the gods upon themselves and their intractable opponent.

/104 cont./

Most infrequently the khlaj-nivukh is a chosen one of the gods in other respects as well: he is a rich man, adept in hunting, worldly-wise, courageous, has a great natural wit, and enjoys authority among his fellow tribesmen.

Every clan, every settlement has its own small khlaj-nivukh, but there are celebrities who enjoy extensive fame among many nationalities of the region, and who, when necessary, are sought after, just as renowned lawyers are among us. They perform their functions rather honoris causa, because the customary honorarium -- a Chinese silk costume and a Japanese saber -- can hardly be a recompense to a rich man for the loss of his time and the burden of the obligation. The clothing and arms presented to them serve rather as their insignia magistratus, their official vestment, in which they carry out their obligations during the discussions.

And so, when the clan of the avengers has sufficiently worn itself out in its attempts at a bloody retaliation, or if from the first the slaying took place under conditions easily lending themselves to a reconciliation, then they begin to search for a khlaj-nivukh who would undertake the negotiations and be able to obtain the most profitable conditions. The khlaj-nivukh must necessarily be from a neutral clan. One may not send a clansman: in the first place, until the reconciliation, it is a sin to have anything whatever to do with the clan of the slayer; moreover, in view of the naturally inflamed feelings of the parties, negotiations through a clansman might end in another slaying. The other side, in turn, selects its "orator," who is /105/ obligated to defend its interests in the negotiations over the ransom. Ordinarily the offended side takes the initiative.

One fine day a company of the armed avengers, with their khlaj-nivukh at their head, appears at the settlement of the slayer. In the adjacent taiga or on the shore of a river the avengers light a fire and make camp, while the khlaj-nivukh in his regalia, with a spear in one hand, a kettle in the other, goes alone to the enemy settlement. Here, in one of the yurts, await the opponents with their khlaj-nivukh at their head... Leaning on his spear, or sitting down and lighting his pipe (only with "his own" fire) he says: "I was sent to tell you that you have killed our man, and

/105 cont./

*614 628 536 A procession of the avengers with the khlaj-nivukh at their head sets out toward the settlement of the foe, and out to meet them comes /106/ a similar procession of the clan of the slayer. At a distance of several dozen sagenes from each other, both sides stop, and out comes the closest kinsman with his khlaj-nivukh, and from the other side advances the slayer with his "intermediary," both armed with bows and spears. At a signal given by the khlaj-nivukh'i they begin to shoot arrows at each other or attack with their spears, adroitly dodging the arrows and blows. The duel, of course, is fictitious, although there have been instances where the opponents grew excited and the matter ended sadly. All this time the khlaj-nivukh'i pacify their clients [782] insisting on reconciliation. In the meantime the clansmen lead a dog apiece among their opponents and kill them with spears ("blood for blood"). Then the opponents hasten to embrace each other, and peace is concluded. The heart of the slain dog is sacrificed to the bird-avenger (see above), while the meat is eaten at the feast that follows.

*614 628 Then the representatives of both sides set off for the yurt of the slayer, where the objects constituting the tkhusind are placed -- kettles, spears, sabers, silken materials, and so forth. All the clansmen participate in the payment of the latter, each according to his wealth, considering it a great sin to evade his proportionate share. On the other hand, the acquired tkhusind becomes the common property of the clan of the slayer /sic/. In part it replaces those valuables which were needed for the dead man in the "settlement of the dead"; in part it becomes a fund for the family of the slain man and the clan requirements.

628 537 554 The negotiations over tkhusind for other causes, such as, for example, the abduction of a woman, the defilement of sacred things, and so on, are also conducted through the intervention of khlaj-nivukh'i, but without any particular ceremony. The intermediaries judge the moot points in the presence of the assembled people, hear the opinions of those present, and the decision is, as it were, the verdict of the whole gathering.

20: Bush--101-102 T-2 (1865) 1871 Gilyak 116, 554, 778, 797

"The Gilaks are a very superstitious, pagan people, worshiping idols of wood and stone as of old, though many of them have been baptized into the Greek Church, and wear small [102] metal crosses suspended about their necks. They have their priests, or 'shamans,' who conduct all their ceremonies and are the advisers of the communiti These shamans are supposed by them to be gifted with supernatural powers, and are held in great awe and reverence."

es.

555

555. TALENT MOBILITY--extent to which prestige can be gained by mastering or excelling in some complex or difficult cultural activity (e.g., religious ritual, fine arts, scholarship, war, technology, business); talents and skills most highly rewarded in prestige (e.g., directly rather than indirectly through the material remuneration they may bring); frequency with which such channels of mobility are chosen; desirable statuses achievable thereby; symbolic tokens of success; specific techniques (e.g., counting coup, writing a bestseller, making a scientific discovery, winning an Olympic race); etc. See also:

Education . . . . . 87 Preferment of war veterans . . . . . 72[illegible]

Occupational specialization 463

/378 cont./

chance to establish an independent economy. But there is another side to the coin -- it is almost impossible for a poor man to settle down with a family, and, consequently, an independent economy. But to a certain degree the rights of group marriage and the possibility of leading a common domestic life with his brothers come to his rescue. Everyone's dream, however, is to settle down with his own family. Usually the clan in the persons of the well-to-do clansmen comes to the rescue of the poor man. But not every clan has rich people, and, besides, there are persons whose clan has died out. The only solution then is to obtain a wife by work. Usually such a transaction is entered into by a family in which there are no offspring of the male sex, and it is as though the son-in-law were declared an adopted son, although, as a member of another clan, he cannot be an actual heir. Methods of lightening the payment of the bride price are practiced; a wife is purchased in small installments with yearly payments until her majority. But also in the purchase of an adult, /379/ installment payment is sometimes practiced, depending on the circumstances. A curious means of paying the bride price in the case of payment with the bride price of a future daughter. I know of such a case. The Gilyak Kanka married the sister of the young boy Pletunka. He did not pay a bride price, but he promised to support his widowed mother and to hand over to him the bride price of his own future daughter. And the agreement was fulfilled. Pletunka was about twenty years old when Kanka gave his own daughter in marriage, and he handed over the whole bride price to Pletunka.

As a matter of principle the bride price belongs to the clan. At a difficult moment of life, for example, if it becomes necessary to pay blood money, each clan-member takes part with his shagyrd. But usually the bride price is distributed among the brothers, although not proportionately; the youngest, as heir to the house, usually receives the smallest share. Besides this, the elder brother buys a wife for the younger brother before his own marriage, so that the younger brother does not need the shagyrd for bride price. Along with the distribution of the bride contract, are those sacred treasures which customarily lie untouched in the storehouse of their possessor. The creditor lays hands on these objects in those rare cases when he is compelled to recover his debt by force. The public or secret unhamessing of the dogs from the sled of the debtor is also one of the methods of collecting a debt. But what is most curious, what speaks in favor of the uprightness of the Gilyak and is most important at the trials of their lawsuits, is the fact that not a single debtor will ever repudiate his debt, no matter how ancient and unpleasant it may be in great generosity. The Gilyak is greatly astonished when you ask him, after he has any evidence for the debt. "Ask him (the debtor)" replies the puzzled creditor.

/380 cont./

Speaking of their economic and juridical relations, one cannot fail to mention the role of labor in these relations. Capital, as the basis for reward, hardly plays any role among them as yet. In their communal hunting, for example, in the hunting of seals and dolphins, when the Gilyak gather for this purpose, several men to a boat, the catch is divided equally among the participants. The master of the boat gets the same share as the youth who sits /381/ at the oars. Even the craft of the metalworker who makes the spear or the arrow does not constitute a basis for special reward. Moreover, on distant expeditions, for example, from the Amur to south Sakhalin, the one who obtains more than an equal share of the catch is not the master of the boat, but the one who performed the troublesome chores on the way, such as the preparation of the food and the collection of firewood. In joint fishing the master of the boat and the net obtains the same share as his have-not companion ("navikh"). True, I have seen an instance where the master of the boat and net obtained 2/3 of the catch, while his have-not comrade -- only 1/3, but to my question as to the reason for this inequality I received the reply: "And why should he have more? He is a bachelor, alone; he does not need any more." I encountered a status resembling to any degree that of a workman only two or three times, but even in these rare cases the status of the worker does not resemble one of our practices. The master will help his worker purchase a wife and will make him a sharer in the inheritance after his death.

/389 cont./ The reasons why the Gilyak have such a strong preference for dog fur for their own use may, in part, be the same ones that according to Steller (1), made the ancient

1. Steller, Beschreibung von dem Lande Kamtschatka /Description of the Country of Kamchatka/, Frankf. and Leipzig, 1774, p. 137.

Italmen on Kamchatka prefer to use dog fur for their clothing, even preferring it to fox and sable. Of course, in view of the conservate tendencies of every primitive people, the usage once customary, the custom handed down for generations, may also play an important role. Besides this, however, the advantages of this fur, learned from experience, come into consideration, its "warmth," durability, and the firmness of its hair, even if it has been exposed to wetness -- characteristics which must make it especially prized by the common man almost always exposed to the elements. And finally, in addition to all this, /390/ the fur still another circumstance -- and in this may lie the chief reason /390/ for the universal use of dog fur among the Gilyak -- it is the ease and cheapness of obtaining it, since the Gilyak keep dogs in great numbers as indispensable draft animals, and the fur cannot be used profitably in trade with either the Chinese, Japanese, or Russians.

Nevertheless fur coats made out of the fur of other animals are found among the Gilyak. They do not serve for use, however, but are carefully stored as valued and rare objects. A lynx coat (Gilyak tschlghi-okch) in particular plays such a role among them. A person who owns a lynx coat is regarded among the Gilyak as a rich and distinguished man, and at the time of my stay in the Amur region they could name for me only three of their countrymen and one Olcha who enjoyed such a possession. The Gilyak were: Nenjdan in the village of Allel on the Amur, Ungun in Pal', who is having one coat of this type, and Pawgun in Tamla-wo on Sakhalin, who had two of them, and the Olcha Todo in Tschiwi, who likewise had one such fur coat in his possession.

/390 cont./

Hence it is no wonder that, in accordance with the proverb, "Clothes make the man," which is especially apt among primitive peoples, the Gilyak who can occasionally parade around in a whole coat of lynx skins, and who can thus scorn the profit that would accrue to him from the sale of these skins, is surrounded with an aura of extraordinary distinction and wealth in the eyes of his countrymen.

But let us return to the ordinary winter-clothing of the Gilyak. Like the shirt, the fur coat, too, is always bordered by the Gilyak from left to right over the chest, sometimes with several metal buttons of Chinese or Russian origin, sometimes with a large wooden button of Gilyak workmanship (Pl. XXIX, Figs. 4, 5), and the skirts of the coats likewise overlap. To hold them together, however, the complete winter outfit includes, besides the belt, which will be discussed later, a special piece of clothing, the so-called konjiha, that is, a short apron-skirt of sealskin, which is tied around the body, which, by better fit at the waist and in order not to hinder the movement of the body, is provided, at the top with a wide edging of fish skin, through which run the straps for tying it (see Pl. XVIII and XIX). The konjiha seems to be an article of clothing that is peculiarly Gilyak in origin, though it may also be found among some of the Tungusic peoples neighboring the Gilyak and living as they do, the Olcha, Negda, etc. For /391/ the Gilyak always traveling about his low dog-sled, the konjiha gives the lower body excellent protection against the oncoming wind and snow or rain, and on many other occasions particularly conditioned by the practices of the Gilyak as we shall see below, it performs excellent service for him. To prevent wind and snow from entering the sleeves, they are wrapped in a washing fashion and tied at the wrists by means of a wide sleeve-band of of fabric or leather (Gilyak tokshas; see Pl. XXII, Figs. 4, 8). The hand covering (Gilyak wontschgi) are tied to the ends of the sleeves. As a rule, they are mittens lined with fox fur (Plate XX, Figs. 3, 4) and distinguished in cut by the fact that at the wrist, close to the thumb, there is a slit protected by a [illegible] (see Category 16, pp. 1005, 998, 999, 1002 and 1006 respectively -- Analyst).

/398 cont./

is given the character of an imitation of the whole animal. The inner lining of the lynx cap again consists of fox fur. Although with respect to elegance and distinction the lynx cap of the women is, so to speak, a counterpart of the lynx coat of the men, it is not just stored away, but is actually worn, thanks to feminine vanity and love of finery. On the occasion of a bear festival in Tebach I saw them on two women, and the above illustration was made from one of these specimens (1). The lynx cap,

1. And, to be sure, like the other two women's caps on the same plate, by my colleague, Maximowicz, during our stay of several days in this village.

however, always marks the wife of a rich Gilyak, who either already has a lynx coat or has a good chance of getting one.

A similar use of the head fur of an especially esteemed animal is also found among around the body, which, by better fit at the waist and in order not to hinder the movement of the body, is provided, at the top with a wide edging of fish skin, through which run the straps for tying it (see Pl. XVIII and XIX). The konjiha seems to be an article of clothing that is peculiarly Gilyak in origin, though it may also be found among some of the Tungusic peoples neighboring the Gilyak and living as they do, the Olcha, Negda, etc. For /399/ the Gilyak always traveling about his low dog-sled, the konjiha gives the lower body excellent protection against the oncoming wind and snow or rain, and on many other occasions particularly conditioned by the practices of the Gilyak as we shall see below, it performs excellent service for him. To prevent wind and snow from entering the sleeves, they are wrapped in a washing fashion and tied at the wrists by means of a wide sleeve-band of of fabric or leather (Gilyak tokshas; see Pl. XXII, Figs. 4, 8). The hand covering (Gilyak wontschgi) are tied to the ends of the sleeves. As a rule, they are mittens lined with fox fur (Plate XX, Figs. 3, 4) and distinguished in cut by the fact that at the wrist, close to the thumb, there is a slit protected by a [illegible] (see Category 16, pp. 1005, 998, 999, 1002 and 1006 respectively -- Analyst)

/418 cont./

however, is not done by the men, but by the women. As I myself have seen among the Gilyak and as is reported from other Gilyak peoples (Olcha, Manegir, Orochon) (3), the thumb ring

2. Maak", Putesh. na Amur", pp. 76, 207. Gerstfel'ch, "O pribrezhn. shit. Amura" (Vestn. Imp. Russk. Geogr. Obshch., Part 30, 1857, Sec. on Ret. and Mat., p. 296).

is used to draw the bow, to grasp the string better, and, in case of a strong pull on it, to protect the skin of the finger from injury as a result of severe abrasion (2). Aside from this practical

3. According to Anutschin /Anuchin/ (Lak" i Hriel', Arkheologo-etnograf. ocherk" /Bow and Arrow; an Archeological-ethnographic Essay/, Moscow, 1887, p. 38), this is the bow pull especially characteristic for the peoples of the Mongolian race, and, according to Moser, in his work, "Ancient and Modern Bows and Arrow-Release" (Bullet. of the Essex Instit.), the so-called "Mongolian" method of drawing the bow purpose, however, the thumb ring is also a special ornament, since it is regarded as a sign of manliness and is associated with skill with the bow and arrow. No halfway adult Gilyak therefore lacks the aam, and it is the same among the other peoples. Indeed, even where the bow has in large part already been pushed out by firearms, Chinese matchlock guns, or Russian-Yakut rifles, as among the Manegir and Orochon, the thumb ring is still generally worn (4). Here, then, apart from its use in an occasional fist-fight, it is gradually becoming a mere ornament. And this matters are quite different with respect to those vegetable foods that the region itself does not produce and which the Gilyak can obtain only by trade with the adjacent civilized peoples, the Chinese, Japanese, and Russians. These foods, a few cereals and legumes, are to be sure, much more nutritious but on the whole have less significance for them, and indeed to a certain extent may even be called luxury items because they are directly available only to those who are better off and not always to them, but rather to persons who are more or less certain of their daily life. They are used only rarely or hardly at all by the Gilyak. During the bear festivals, however, great quantities of them are consumed, and since these festivals are celebrated rather frequently in the region with the communistic spirit of the Gilyak, and are attended by numerous participants, the foods of this kind, stored up by an individual who becomes the host for the occasion, are always shared with a greater or lesser number of other and less prosperous men. On such occasions I have learned in detail the various foods of this kind that are customary among the Gilyak and the form in which they are eaten. As was said, there are not many of them. First come the cereals obtained from the Chinese, the most common and the most popular among the Gilyak is Chinese, or, as they always say, Manchurian millet, Setaria italica (Gilyak budi), and next Chinese barley (Gilyak mudi). Far rarer and less popular is Sorghum vulgare L. (Gilyak mjam) (2).

4. Gerstfeldt, loc. cit., and Maack, loc. cit.

/442 cont./

2. The first two have the same designation among the Olcha; the latter is called ugumu by them and by the Goldi.

Japanese rice, on the other hand, is highly esteemed by the Gilyak, though it is only rarely found among them. Judin, a very distinguished Gilyak, the host of a bear festival which I attended in the winter of 1868 in the village of Tebach, still had the remnants of a supply which he had acquired years ago from the Japanese (Siam) on Sakhalin, but there was not enough to set before the numerous guests. As soon as the Russians settled in the wooden piece. The lower piece, bow-shaped, runs into a small bowl-shaped head, which is turned upward. The upper piece, a quadrangular, is of metal (brass) only for a common man; every well-to-do Gilyak strives to imitate the Chinese and to procure for his pipe a stone mouthpiece made of jadeite or perhaps even of chalcedony, carnelian, or nephrite, such as are made in the Sungari region (?), especially in Tsitsihar and other places (4).

/468 cont./

3. Barabash", "Sungank. eisp." (Vosm. Sbornik, 1874, No. 2, p. 351).

4. The lower metallic piece, with the bowl, is called kott in Gilyak, the mouthpiece proper, the wooden middle piece connecting them twandairr.

The greatest correspondence prevails among all the peoples of the Amur region in the form of the pipe, since the Gilyak making it always copied it from the Sungari region, where they are factory made. Only the Ainu on Sakhalin have differently shaped pipes, because they get them from another source, from the Japanese. I saw pipes of two forms among them: one with a very small bowl, squared off at the top, into which the tip of the little finger scarcely fitted, and then also one with a larger, bowl-shaped bowl. In addition, however, they /469/ also make their own pipe heads from the wood of the Hydrangea paniculata Siebold et Zucc., which are used by the women in particular (1).

1. Fr. Schmidt, to whom I owe this information, adds that he saw these pipe heads in use even in Kununai and Mamiya, even though the Hydrangea paniculata occurs only in Aniwa Bay and on the west coast of Sakhalin south of Notoyama. See his "Reisen im Amurlande und auf der Insel Sachalin" (Mém. de l'Acad. Imp. des sc. de St. Pétersb., VII th. Series, Vol. XII, No. 2, p. 99).

/704 cont. /

Many of them were whittled with the knife on only one side, but most of them on two opposite sides, and some all around. Indeed from some of them very fine and graceful [illegible] Gilyak-things (the repeatedly mentioned so-called ŋach of the Gilyak) hung down from the upper end of the stick to the lower one. This symbol, which among the Gilyak accompanies all religious performances based on the fear of the influence of evil spirits, such as the giving of offerings to the river (2) conjuring away storms (3) etc.

2. See pp. 602-604 above.

3. See p. 1088 above.

/711 cont. /

[illegible] amused, permitted them to do. The choice of the archer who is to dispatch the fatal arrow toward the bear, however, is made by the owner himself and it regarded as an honorary token bestowed by the shaman himself or by someone else at the order of the shaman is hung around the patient's neck and must be worn by the sick person from then on to protect himself in the future. A stick man wears a single mipinch, a woman a double one. The mipinch are always carved out of wood, especially the wapmipinch. It is only on the snout-hand of the dead bear (see pp. 1156, 1162) that a single mipinch of birch bark may be found. The mipinch by the women are made of birch bark and hands, and gives him new life. As soon as the singing has died away, the shaman stands there, restored to life.

The shaman Gondemchach's Dzuchachach is less powerful, but he is only a boy, a matscherlaga-tscham. Nevertheless, he, too, does miraculous things. Thus the Gilyak say that he sits down in the yurt with his hands tied to his back, the fires are extinguished, and all the visitors begin a hide-and-seek game, in which the lŋan is called upon to come and to dance, and in fact, while the singing is still going on, a small lŋan hardly larger than a nail comes and dances on his arms. As soon as the singing ceases, the boy stands there restored to life.

Each shaman has his own songs; I could not find out what they mean and whether they are also sung on definite occasions. It seems certain that every shamanistic song serves for conjuring up a lŋan, which appears in the form of a little man, or a little bird, indicating a man on one side, a woman on the other. Finally, at the very front, on the forehead, the laiz beam a frog shape. This is striking, since the frog (dhal) is not regarded as unlucky, is not mapd. (ibm. II, pp. 44-46.)

30. Gilyak. Amazing, miraculous acts which the Gilyak shaman performs are chiefly the means by which he wins admiration and esteem among his countrymen. The more these acts deviate from the natural course of things, the greater is the reputation of the sorcerer. Such is enjoyed, for example, by the Gilyak

/754 cont. /

sick and dies, if he does not use the proper means to free himself of the mipinch. The only means that can help him, however, is a shaman. He conjures up a lŋan (a good god), who removes the mipinch from the sick person. At the same time a mipinch carved by the shaman himself or by someone else at the order of the shaman is hung around the patient's neck and must be worn by the sick person from then on to protect himself in the future. A stick man wears a single mipinch, a woman a double one. The mipinch are always carved out of wood, especially the wapmipinch. It is only on the snout-hand of the dead bear (see pp. 1156, 1162) that a single mipinch of birch bark may be found. The mipinch by the women are made of birch bark and hands, and gives him new life. As soon as the singing has died away, the shaman stands there, restored to life.

The shaman Gondemchach's Dzuchachach is less powerful, but he is only a boy, a matscherlaga-tscham. Nevertheless, he, too, does miraculous things. Thus the Gilyak say that he sits down in the yurt with his hands tied to his back, the fires are extinguished, and all the visitors begin a hide-and-seek game, in which the lŋan is called upon to come and to dance, and in fact, while the singing is still going on, a small lŋan hardly larger than a nail comes and dances on his arms. As soon as the singing ceases, the boy stands there restored to life.

Each shaman has his own songs; I could not find out what they mean and whether they are also sung on definite occasions. It seems certain that every shamanistic song serves for conjuring up a lŋan, which appears in the form of a little man, or a little bird, indicating a man on one side, a woman on the other. Finally, at the very front, on the forehead, the laiz beam a frog shape. This is striking, since the frog (dhal) is not regarded as unlucky, is not mapd. (ibm. II, pp. 44-46.)

30. Gilyak. Amazing, miraculous acts which the Gilyak shaman performs are chiefly the means by which he wins admiration and esteem among his countrymen. The more these acts deviate from the natural course of things, the greater is the reputation of the sorcerer. Such is enjoyed, for example, by the Gilyak

?: Kreinovich--5 E-5 (1931) 1934 Gilyak

225 During the hunt one must use the tinder box or the matches 742 of the pilar as light in campfire. No hunter has the right to 372 light a camp fire using his own implements for this purpose; 475 he has to use the implements of the pilar, instead.

4. To hunt the pilar rudder and to observe the rules and ice-225 floes. Young hunters with no experience in sea-faring rely 475 on this rule completely on the pilar. One Gilyak told me: 902 "If the pilar observes the wind and the floes, the young hunters are not worried."

5. To distribute the quarry among the hunters.

As can be seen, the pilar performs the most responsible functions in the hunters' organization. The pilar knows all anything goes wrong during the hunt the pilar is held responsible.

In the collective of hunters there must be not only organized hunt, but also expose the boat to smoke.

225 [81] Everything in the boat is organized from the beginning 475 to the end according to the rules. Each of the hunters occupies a 476 designated position at the oars. Each of the positions has its name.

The position at the first pair of oars, starting from the stern, is called ŋuivd, the second - ŋafpuf, the third - ŋkiŋ, the fourth - ŋkiŋ (literally "the same as the third"), the fifth - (ŋ)ele mi-pid (placed at the very bow). There are boats with six and even seven pairs of oars.

225 Starting from the stern, the first position, ŋuivd, is oc- 475 cupied by the oldest and strongest oarsman in the boat. At the 501 next pair of oars is a younger hunter. The position at the 361 oars at the bow is occupied by the youngest of the hunters in the boat.

When the ice fields are reached and the hunt begins, the position at the bow is occupied by the very best shot. Until that time he occupies the other oars. At the same time there are no seals in sight he rows like the others, occupying the position at the bow. Since he is the oldest of the hunters the pilar often turns out to be a better shot than the young hunters. In such cases he turns the rudder over to someone in the boat and sits in the bow to fire at the seals. Such cases, for instance, the Gilyak pilar. Norp sat during the hunt at the bow and fires at the seals. At the same time Gilyak at tended the rudder which the pilar had turned over to him. The Gilyak pilar Tayŋun was at the bow during the hunt. According to his information he had killed by himself 47 seals and missed one. We do not wish to imply that of the whole collective of hunters only one person shoots at the seals. Two, three or four hunters do the shooting

?: Kreinovich--5 E-5 (1931) 1934 Gilyak

225 but the better one among them sits at the bow. The hunters 475 must often get in the bow for it is not always convenient to get within shooting distance of the seals in a boat.

If there is an extra man in the boat, if, for instance, there 225 are five oarsmen, one pilar and one other man, then the pilar 476 -ŋ is the oldest man in the boat - sits at the stern without 501 doing anything, and his junior takes over the rudder. The 688 Gilyakes illustrated this point to me by the following example: if Aŋkun and Kaun are among the hunters in the boat and if both are older than the other hunters, then Aŋkun, as the oldest, would sit at the stern and do nothing except for giving orders and the pilar, Aŋkun's junior, would take over the rudder. If, on the other hand, Tuŋun, Aŋkun, Pil-ŋkuk and Kaun and younger hunters set out in a boat then Pil-ŋkuk and Kaun, who are younger than Tuŋun and Aŋkun, are at the stern, Aŋkun takes over the rudder and Tuŋun, as the oldest of them all, sits at the stern. Thus the pilar is not always the younger than the extra man in the boat. In such case the pilar tends the rudder and the extra man sits at the stern. I personally know of such a case. Pil-ŋkuk, the pilar, sat with him in the boat old man Oŋkan who sat at the stern and did nothing while pilar tended the rudder. Oŋkan was the best shot in the shooting at the seals and t. to whom Norp had turned over the steering oar, tended the rudder. Oŋkan again sat at the stern. Jesting about his worn-out boat, he met: "I was simply sitting without doing a thing, but I got my share." I found out from others that during the hunt he had built the campfire and prepare food. He also seems to have helped with some other things; which is why he was taken along. Unfortunately, I was unable to clarify this point to my great regret. I simply had no time in which to do that. It seems that Oŋkan performed a number of functions which are usually ascribed to the pilar, whereas, he made the rather heavy work of the hunters easier.

Incidentally, the facts given above illustrate with a sufficient 225 [82] As mentioned above the pilar performs mu-ŋi-d 774 the and t ŋa.

Mu-ŋi-d is performed at the stern of the boat. Two short 791 sticks, the thickness of a match are driven into the stern 792 board. The distance between them is approximately two fingers. Then they tie a thin thread made of nettle fibres around the sticks. The Gilyaks usually performed on heads of children. They believe that a thread made of hair or a dog and nettle fibre and tied around a child's hand protects the child from illness. The fact that the Gilyaks perform

?: Kreinovich--7 E-5 (1931) 1934 Gilyak

223 mu-ŋi-d on the boat supports the assumption that at one 789 time or another the Gilyaks, it seems, regarded a boat as a living thing. Moreover, the Gilyaks believe that it is convenient to get within shooting distance of the seals in a boat.

Uniformers.

782 Aside from mu-ŋi-d, t-ŋ is performed on the boat. T-ŋ 178 means 'image', 'figure', 'picture.' With shavings (tmaŋ) 782 a branch of rowan (ŋaŋ-ŋ-ŋa) the pilar makes two figurines. 225 One of the figurines is placed at the prow of the boat and the 780 other - at the stern. I saw such a figure on the neck of a representation of the bird ug-, placed by the Gilyaks at the bow of the boat. The figurine placed at the bow has its face turned to the pilar, the other - back to the bear trap elsewhere.

782 There is one other ceremony performed on the boat. Before 225 hunt, pour a handful of tobacco into the boat to smoke. 225 They light fires of spruce and boguinik on both sides of the boat and they try to build the fires so that the smoke hit the boat. They light the fires in the following way: one place where there are big stones lying on the shore, two stakes are driven into the bottom the river and between these is spread a sort of sail, behind which the hunters place themselves. The hunters light the fire (evil)-. Then the hunters push the boat past the fire into the open sea.

223 I watched Gilyak Xitkun who, having already returned from 225 hunt, put on a sail with the hunters a second time. Two 834 hunters were at the oars. Propelled by strong and simultaneous strokes of five pair of oars the boat took lightly and quickly to sea. Xitkun, firmly gripping the rudder, set the bow of the boat northward, towards the cape barely visible in the distance. The Gilyaks rowed calmly and quietly. They need fear nothing. At the stern of their boat sits an experienced pilar, tested in trips. At the bow are placed a representation of the bird ug- and the figurines t-ŋ. They will vigilantly look out for and protect their course.

When the boat became a tiny spot in the distance and its outlines blended with the water, the women who saw off the hunters left the shore for home.

225 After leaving the village the hunters turn northward. They 833 first go to Ul-ŋkŋ "sacred cape." (1) Once there, they pull 225 [83]

782 1. It seems that there are "tombstones" in memory of drowned men on the cape.

the boat out of the water. The pilar picks up a scoop containing the usual refreshments called for by the occasion and

13: Seeland--23 E-5 (no date) 1882 Gilyak

225 The seal (1) is caught in several ways. On the island 411

1. On the Amur it is found only way down at the mouth.

Sakhalin a lance about two to two and one-half fathoms long with a wooden shaft, the thickness of a man's arm, and a trough; on the thick end of the lance a 20-30 fathom long strap is fastened. In spring when the ice breaks up, the seal climbs onto land and the Gilyaks pursue it, often at risk of his life, on a boat or over floating ice fields. As soon as he is near enough to the seal, he places the trough with somewhat represents the barrel of a gun, with the lance inside it on the ground, sometimes he leans against it, holding the end of the strap with his left hand, so that the animal cannot get too far away.

225 Another method which is practiced, for instance, in the village of Charbabh, below Nikolayevsk-na-Amure is done in the following way: one place where there are big stones lying on the shore, two stakes are driven into the bottom the river and between these is spread a sort of sail, behind which the hunters place themselves. The hunters light the fire (evil)-. Then the hunters push the boat past the fire into the open sea.

223 I watched Gilyak Xitkun who, having already returned from 225 hunt, put on a sail with the hunters a second time. Two 834 hunters were at the oars. Propelled by strong and simultaneous strokes of five pair of oars the boat took lightly and quickly to sea. Xitkun, firmly gripping the rudder, set the bow of the boat northward, towards the cape barely visible in the distance. The Gilyaks rowed calmly and quietly. They need fear nothing. At the stern of their boat sits an experienced pilar, tested in trips. At the bow are placed a representation of the bird ug- and the figurines t-ŋ. They will vigilantly look out for and protect their course.

When the boat became a tiny spot in the distance and its outlines blended with the water, the women who saw off the hunters left the shore for home.

225 After leaving the village the hunters turn northward. They 833 first go to Ul-ŋkŋ "sacred cape." (1) Once there, they pull 225 [83]

782 1. It seems that there are "tombstones" in memory of drowned men on the cape.

the boat out of the water. The pilar picks up a scoop containing the usual refreshments called for by the occasion and 225 the musk deer and particularly the sable are hunted.

The bravest men conduct a hand-to-hand fight with the bear and thrust their lance into his breast when he stands up on his hind legs. In a place where a man carries away from such a battle bring him great honor and songs of praise. Most of the men conduct single combats and go after the animal in pairs, and [123] armed with rifles, sometimes the bow and arrow are also used; in any case, it is a dangerous hunt.

225 The seal (1) is caught in several ways. On the island 411

1. On the Amur it is found only way down at the mouth.

Sakhalin a lance about two to two and one-half fathoms long with a wooden shaft, the thickness of a man's arm, and a trough; on the thick end of the lance a 20-30 fathom long strap is fastened. In spring when the ice breaks up, the seal climbs onto land and the Gilyaks pursue it, often at risk of his life, on a boat or over floating ice fields. As soon as he is near enough to the seal, he places the trough with somewhat represents the barrel of a gun, with the lance inside it on the ground, sometimes he leans against it, holding the end of the strap with his left hand, so that the animal cannot get too far away.

225 Another method which is practiced, for instance, in the village of Charbabh, below Nikolayevsk-na-Amure is done in the following way: one place where there are big stones lying on the shore, two stakes are driven into the bottom the river and between these is spread a sort of sail, behind which the hunters place themselves. The hunters light the fire (evil)-. Then the hunters push the boat past the fire into the open sea.

223 I watched Gilyak Xitkun who, having already returned from 225 hunt, put on a sail with the hunters a second time. Two 834 hunters were at the oars. Propelled by strong and simultaneous strokes of five pair of oars the boat took lightly and quickly to sea. Xitkun, firmly gripping the rudder, set the bow of the boat northward, towards the cape barely visible in the distance. The Gilyaks rowed calmly and quietly. They need fear nothing. At the stern of their boat sits an experienced pilar, tested in trips. At the bow are placed a representation of the bird ug- and the figurines t-ŋ. They will vigilantly look out for and protect their course.

When the boat became a tiny spot in the distance and its outlines blended with the water, the women who saw off the hunters left the shore for home.

225 After leaving the village the hunters turn northward. They 833 first go to Ul-ŋkŋ "sacred cape." (1) Once there, they pull 225 [83]

782 1. It seems that there are "tombstones" in memory of drowned men on the cape.

428 order that he may not squander the property. On Sakhalin, 583 only the sons inherit the parents, and the daughters are married off. If after the death of the parents only one daughter is left behind, she usually gets part of the estate upon her marriage, the rest is kept by the relatives who took care of her. In any case, if the bride has a dowry, the man has no right to it; he can get hold of it only by going against the wishes of his wife.

428 In the matter of succession, it is true, the procedure is not everywhere and always [232] the same, but in general one can draw the following conclusions from what has been said: a) the children take precedence over other relatives;
b) the brothers take precedence over their sisters, provided the latter marry and thus share the fortune of their husband; c) the joint usufruct of the estate on the part of the nearest relatives is very common; d) women may inherit and have their own property, but in general they are not left as much; however, they have the right to be supported;
e) widows can demand their own share, but usually they become joint owners of the estate along with their children.

565 The Gilyak are all of one class. There are no privileged 551 classes or families. There are families, now and then, who 177 are held in great esteem because of wealth, courage, or because their ancestor was founder of the village, but they have no real privileges of any kind. Such families also have family names (which are handed down by the males);
many Gilyak, however, have only one single name to which is added the name of their village, to distinguish them from outsiders. Some of them, whether they are baptized or not, are given this or that Russian name besides their Gilyak one and by this name they are known even among their fellow-tribesmen. These "Petkas," "Mikitas", etc., are usually intelligent lads and understand Russian.

567 In like manner, there are no slaves, nor have there ever 554 been any among these people. Only personal qualities, 576 either bravery, wealth, age, or intelligence, give the individ ual a certain significance. Wealth may be regarded with a certain esteem, since it is usually acquired as a result of real superiority, - either courage, industry or judgment.
Toward aristocrats of wealth a certain external ceremony is occasionally observed. If such a person comes for a visit, both he and the host bow after a fashion, whereupon he holds up his cheek to be kissed; he himself does not kiss the other.

567 However, there are no forms or obligatory expressions of 554 esteem of any kind. In general, a kiss, bow, or hand-shake 576 are, as we said, not often used by Gilyak.

Beside the aged, the rich, and the brave, shamans are 756 especially esteemed, but here again we see reflected the 184 respect [233] which is paid a superior mind. The shamans do not form a separate, exclusive class but live like other people, but they draw an additional income from their craft. It frequently happens that the shaman is also the son of a shaman and has, in a manner of speaking inherited his "science". Some, however, become students of another shaman for a considerable sum, still others become impromptu shamans whenever the "power" descends on them. Women can also become shamans, as we have said. It is arranged so that large villages have their own shaman, whereas several smaller ones fall within the territory of one shaman.

The work of these priests is probably rooted partly in self-delusion, but in any case there is a considerable addition of intentional deception.

756 Fortunately they themselves, although smarter than the 576 rest, are not very superior, and can therefore not teach the 554 people anything very harmful, nor have they been able to make a privileged place for themselves. The shaman's advice is sought where every-day experience does not prove adequate, but the counsellor is not generally treated with great veneration. Most of the shamans are received without any kind of greeting, only famous ones are met with a bow; beyond Sofiyskoye there was even one before whom the whole house went on its knees when he appeared at the door in order to perform his magic. In general the shamans not only enjoy a certain esteem, but they are also feared. Nevertheless, there are cases where people refused to pay a shaman because of his false predictions and his ineptitude, and sometimes shamans are even flogged. Their magic practices will be considered later.

622 Finally, there are the "starosti" (1), that is, elders who 177

1. This is a Russian word.

are appointed by officials. They are, however, not actual mayors; they have nothing to say and are scarcely more than intermediaries through whom the official gives his orders to the community, for these starosti speak Russian well and are in general intelligent people. [234]

/114 cont./

Let us look more closely at these conditions, and first of all at the economic ones.

The predominant form of labor is individual labor or the simplest co-operation. The principal source of food is fishing. The sea and rivers are so rich in this product that with the most meager equipment under normal conditions everyone can secure his existence through his own efforts. In hunting sea animals, it is true, the co-operation of several men is necessary, but the whole business is so simple that there can be no talk here of masters and workmen, nor of any special organization; everyone performs that for which he is /115/ most qualified. Moreover, the artel is generally composed of kinsmen, and it never occurs to anyone to divide the catch in any way other than according to the number of workers. A share is also assigned to those who have not participated in the hunting, for do the clan gods give only to some and not all the members of the clan? The same is true of hunting for forest beasts, if carried on by a group, but ordinarily the hunter, like the fisherman, can get along perfectly well in his pursuits without the help of others. And, in fact, during the fishing season the Gilyak population disperses in all directions; each master departs to his favorite site. During the hunting season everyone sets off for his hunting balagan and from there keeps watch over his traps, sometimes not seeing a stranger for weeks.

Thus, the predominant form of labor is individual. Everyone must be able to do everything, master all the knowledge of his tribe, be an individual equal with all, comprehensively developed and prepared for life.

And since the gifts of nature are plentiful, free, and accessible to the efforts of all, the well-being of a man depends exclusively, in consequence, on his abilities and diligence. Inequality, which under more complex conditions is a source of dissension and social differences, does not show its thorns here. A wealthy man owes everything exclusively to his own personal talents and virtues. His accumulations cannot enslave or humiliate anyone. Moreover, the personal accomplishments of a man are a gift of the gods,

/115 cont./

555 556 156 and the chosen one cannot either evoke envy or pride himself on his advantages (1).

1. The following example can serve as a good illustration of the outlook of the Gilyak on the origin of personal wealth. On the western shore of Sakhalin the wealthiest man in my time was a certain Gibl' from the village of Tangivo. He had, in effect, a fine intelligence and was an able hunter and an energetic man. Moreover, he was aided by his acquaintance with the Russian officials, whom he served in the capacity of supplier of furs and collections. But the Gilyak logic saw the cause of his extraordinary wealth in a quite special circumstance: that he once found far away in the hills under a log a piece of some kind of substance, a magic talisman, sent to him by the gods.

[789]

614 156 His protectors, sending him the beasts of the taiga and the fish of the water, are the common genii of the clan. To hoard [454] one's wealth, not sharing it with one's clansmen, would be [183] equivalent to appropriating for oneself that which belongs to one jointly with all, and the highest ambition of such a man is to display his benevolence and generosity to those around him.

Such are the economic relations, producing a whole personality equal to others in preparation and knowledge, /116/ excluding the possibility of mutual slavery, and creating for each person a healthy atmosphere of consciousness of his own freedom and self-determination.

156 But the greatest wholeness is given to a person by his socio-771 religious world-outlook. The basic axiom of everyone is that all his existence and welfare are completely in the hands of the gods, in particular the clan gods, who shower their beneficence not on

556

556 ACCUMULATION OF WEALTH--extent to which prestige can be gained through amassing wealth; means used to accumulate wealth or degree of skill involved; principal objects of wealth (e.g., money, cattle, slaves, land); relative importance of sheer accumulation, of display, of generosity in distribution; prominence of wealth accumulation as a mobility mechanism; desirable statuses achievable thereby; symbolic tokens of success; specific techniques (e.g., conspicuous consumption, potlatching, endowing a college, buying a title); etc. See also:

Property 42
Potlatches 431
Saving and investment 484 Individual enterprise 473
Wealth in relation to social classes 566 Hospitality 574

/xxviii cont./

*114 582 595 The question of cousin marriage is developed particularly assiduously in these works. In this respect, Shternberg enriched the history of marriage with valuable material, very shrewdly analyzed by him. When Shternberg tries to extract cousin marriage from group marriage, however, he contradicts /xxix/ himself and takes an anti-Morgan and at the same time anti-Engels position. To accept the proposition that cousin marriage preceded group marriage logically leads to the conclusion that individual marriage preceded cousin marriage. The reasoning of Shternberg on the causes for the transition from marriage between sisters and brothers to cousin marriage is just as completely idealistic.

Shternberg revealed the clan character of the group marriage of the Gilyak with great thoroughness and, in addition, established the principles of the third- and fourth-clan phratry. Indisputably, the conclusions of Shternberg about the precedence of cross-cousin marriage to unilateral-cousin marriage are correct.

*114 602 595 Shternberg's discovery among the Gilyak of the institution of izbeganiya (avoidance), according to which people not having mutual sexual rights must avoid mutual glances, conversations, and so forth, also has extremely great importance for confirming [174] the existence of group marriage. He considers the survival of this institution among peoples who have already emerged from the stage of group marriage as extra proof of its previous existence.

*114 614 Further, the works of Shternberg give a vivid picture of the clan way of life of the Gilyak and of the basic norms of their common law. By the way, in speaking of the clan, one must stress the correctness of Shternberg's criticism of Kunov, who, in spite of Engels, rejected the existence of a clan structure among the Australians.

*114 614 556 Shternberg considers in some detail the khlai-ni-vukhakh and quite correctly explains that they are recruited from the yzi (wealthy men), but we wait in vain for an answer from him on the question of the reasons for the degeneration of the clan and the appearance of the yzi. At the same time it must be said that the fact of the existence of the wealthy men among contemporary, so-called primitive peoples, and especially their social role, has been treated with silence in ethnographic literature, and Shternberg was one of the few non-Marxist ethnographers who paid attention to it.

/29 cont./

93 person steering the sled sits astride it and keeps his feet, not on 92 the runners, but on ski which glide by the side of the sled. By moving his ski apart or by bringing them closer together, the Gilyak changes his center of gravity as required and thus gives stability to the sled. In places which are more or less steep so that the sled has to move obliquely, he holds it back by means of sticks with iron tips which are driven between the runners and the upper crosspiece. In rapid movement these same sticks serve as brakes. The dogs are led by their lead dog, usually a small, uncomely creature who obeys his own extraordinary senses as much as the commands of the driver. At a time of danger, in the middle of a raging snow storm, or in late spring in the midst of broken ice-floes on top of which water is already coming out, the driver can only depend on the remarkable instinct of his loyal 35] friend and slave. A good lead dog costs from 30 to 50 rubles, 56] ordinary draft dogs from three to eight rubles. Twelve to thirteen dogs are harnessed to the sled of a rich man; poor men are satisfied with three to five.

01 The native dugout of the Gilyak, a boat of poplar, is also built on the model of the sled. It is so light that a little boy of ten or twelve drags it by himself without difficulty a hundred steps or more to the bank. Its bottom has the same spherical and flattened surface as the dog sled, so that it does not sit deep and passes over the shallowest places. On encountering an obstacle in the form of a shoal or isthmus between the lagoons, the Gilyak easily carries it on his back and then lowers it into the water.

221 Means of transportation play an immense role in the life of our native. The Gilyak is in general a semisedentary person. In summer hs usually lives near a river or sea, while for the winter /30/ he migrates farther away to more protected places, to his warm, winter dwellings.

Even in summer, following the fish, he changes his place of residence along the course of the river two or three times. In addition to these regular changes of residence, the Gilyak has to resettle for a number of other reasons. At the end of winter, when his food runs out, he travels to distant places on his dog sled to

/84/

*614 Once the above-mentioned principle was created and became an immutable imperative of life, the natural consequence was the appearance of exogamy, and exogamy is the foundation of the clan.

But the exogamy of the Gilyak, as we have seen, is not the mere obligation to take wives from outside their clan. It gives a man a whole series of rights, which play an enormous role in his life.

We know that the acquisition of a wife is one of the most difficult problems of primitive man. There are ordinarily [583] fewer women than men. One must pay for a woman, and to [556] make matters worse each of the wealthy men snatch up many wives. For the poor man -- and such are in the majority -- acquiring a wife under such conditions is far from easy; frequently he must even resort to methods that risk his life.

The norms of Gilyak marriage give each Gilyak the right to the women of the akhmal'k clan, in particular to the daughters of the brothers of his mother; this is simultaneously [583] his religious obligation and right. The bride price in such cases, if not a formality, is a burden which each one always has a right to expect his clansmen, interested, like himself, in his marriage to a woman from a certain clan, the clan of his mother, to share. In the worst of cases, until a man succeeds in setting up his own family, the families of his older brothers, with whom he shares the right to the women of the akhmal'k clan, are his family, their wives are his wives, to [587] whom he has lawful conjugal rights. When a married Gilyak [768] dies, his wife passes without any bride price to one of his younger brothers determined by the choice of the clan.

*614 These are all advantages which play a role of the 587 first order in the eyes of primitive man. The crown of 768 these advantages is the social privilege of every clansman of not having to fear for the fate of his wife and his children after his death. His wife and children during his life are juridically, and frequently factually as well, the wife and children of his younger brothers; they will remain such after

/91 cont./

476 to do is to move to the yurt of a well-off clansman, or even *614 simply visit him two or three times a day, and they will [261] share with him without a murmur their last yukola, their last handful of tobacco.

/92/ With respect to luxury articles, such as valuable spears, sabers, fabrics, fur coats, etc., there is more individualism, introduced by more recent conditions of exchange, but in cases of real necessity, such as the purchase of a wife, the payment of blood money, funerals, and so on, everyone considers it his direct obligation to sacrifice his individual wealth for the objectives of the whole clan.

*614 This same principle of the communality of the ma-428 terial goods of the clansmen is the basis of the right of inheritance, the basic rule of which is -- the property of the clansman must not go out of the clan. In this respect, the well-known thesis of the Twelve Tables is literally in effect among the Gilyak: Si suos heredes non habet, gentiles familiam habento.[2] In the absence of members of the family, in which the "workers" are also classed, the property passes to the agnate clansmen, no matter how distant, excluding even the closest cognates. The latter, according to the will, can obtain only the so-called shagund (1), and only

[422]
[556]

1. "Treasures" -- a property sui generis, consisting of unused objects, designated only for exceptional cases: bride price, dowry, ransom, funerals. It is divided into 1) the iron "shagund" -- large cast-iron kettles, spears decorated with silver inlays, valuable Japanese sabers, coats of mail, and so forth, used chiefly for the bride price: 2) the fur, consisting chiefly of expensive fur coats, used principally for dowry; 3) the silk -- Chinese silk materials and garments, which are

[2] [i.e., "in the absence of close kinsmen, the clan is the heir", cf. translation on p.512. – Analyst]

*614 428 [422 556]

/92 cont./

worn on ceremonial occasions and in which the dead are garbed.

such as will inevitably find its way back to the clan of the testator, so that to the ymgi clan, i.e., the clan that takes its wives from the clan of the testator and consequently pays it bride price, can only be willed the so-called iron shagund, which in any case will return to the clan in the form of bride price, while to the akhmal'k clan, the clan of fathers-in-law, only fur shagund can be willed, since it will return to the clan in the form of the bride's dowry.

*614 796

4. One bear: the common obligation of the clansmen to share in the fattening of the bear and in the bear festivals, both on the occasion of the slaying of a domestic bear and the hunting of the forest beast. "Khal'-gu, ut-gu, narkh muve!": "Clansmen, men, be guests!" -- with this summons the youths go around to the yurts, summoning the clansmen to the eating of the sacred meal of the bear slain in the forest and the viands jointly prepared for the occasion by the whole clan.

The importance of common rights and obligations with respect to the bear festival, as the exclusive privilege of the clan, proceeds directly from what we said regarding this in the section on /93/ religion and the clan gods. As we saw, the bear festival is characterized by two basic features: first, by the honoring of the very person of the bear as a possible clansman of a "mountain" man and, consequently, a possible clansman of their own or his descendant, who had passed into the clan of the mountain masters; and, second, by the transmittal through him of various gifts to the mountain master and his clan and, consequently, to the god-clansman, their sustainer. Thus the bear festival has an incomparably greater significance for the welfare of the clan than other clan sacrifices and festivals, because the sacrifices go to the highest master of the mountains, to the chief disposer of

*614 796 782 [775]

/114 cont./

*614 433 461 476

Let us look more closely at these conditions, and first of all at the economic ones.

The predominant form of labor is individual labor or the simplest co-operation. The principal source of food is fishing. The sea and rivers are so rich in this product that with the most meager equipment under normal conditions everyone can secure his existence through his own efforts. In hunting sea animals, it is true, the co-operation of several men is necessary, but the whole business is so simple that there can be no talk here of masters and workmen, nor of any special organization; everyone performs that for which he is /115/ most qualified. Moreover, the artel is generally composed of kinsmen, and it never occurs to anyone to divide the catch in any way other than according to the number of workers. A share is also assigned to those who have not participated in the hunting, for do the clan gods give only to some and not all the members of the clan? The same is true of hunting for forest beasts, if carried on by a group, but ordinarily the hunter, like the fisherman, can get along perfectly well in his pursuits without the help of others. And, in fact, during the fishing season the Gilyak population disperses in all directions; each master departs to his favorite site. During the hunting season everyone sets off for his hunting balagan and from there keeps watch over his traps, sometimes not seeing a stranger for weeks.

156 555

Thus, the predominant form of labor is individual. Everyone must be able to do everything, master all the knowledge of his tribe, be an individual equal with all, comprehensively developed and prepared for life.

555 556 156

And since the gifts of nature are plentiful, free, and accessible to the efforts of all, the well-being of a man depends exclusively, in consequence, on his abilities and diligence. Inequality, which under more complex conditions is a source of dissension and social differences, does not show its thorns here. A wealthy man owes everything exclusively to his own personal talents and virtues. His accumulations cannot enslave or humiliate anyone. Moreover, the personal accomplishments of a man are a gift of the gods,

/115 cont./

555 556 156

and the chosen one cannot either evoke envy or pride himself on his advantages (1).

1. The following example can serve as a good illustration of the outlook of the Gilyak on the origin of personal wealth. On the western shore of Sakhalin the wealthiest man in my time was a certain Gibl' from the village of Tangivo. He had, in effect, a fine intelligence and was an able hunter and an energetic man. Moreover, he was aided by his acquaintance with the Russian officials, whom he served in the capacity of supplier of furs and collections. But the Gilyak logic saw the cause of his extraordinary wealth in a quite special circumstance: that he once found far away in the hills under a log a piece of some kind of substance, a magic talisman, sent to him by the gods.

[789]

*614 156 [454] [183]

His protectors, sending him the beasts of the taiga and the fish of the water, are the common genii of the clan. To hoard one's wealth, not sharing it with one's clansmen, would be equivalent to appropriating for oneself that which belongs to one jointly with all, and the highest ambition of such a man is to display his benevolence and generosity to those around him.

Such are the economic relations, producing a whole personality equal to others in preparation and knowledge, /116/ excluding the possibility of mutual slavery, and creating for each person a healthy atmosphere of consciousness of his own freedom and self-determination.

156 771

But the greatest wholeness is given to a person by his socio-religious world-outlook. The basic axiom of everyone is that all his existence and welfare are completely in the hands of the gods, in particular the clan gods, who shower their beneficence not on

/118 cont./

* 614 ● 556 554 But who are these authoritative individuals who appear on the scene in special cases and either personally or together with the "village community" of their clansmen display, as those having the power, their initiative and energy? What role do they play in ordinary life?

They are the so-called yz' -- the "masters" (1), or otherwise

> 1. Up to the present, little attention has been focused on the role of such persons in the structure of primitive societies. Their role is obscured by their being classified only as representatives of wealth. Here is one of the most recent examples of such a relation. Separate classes of "nobles" and "commoners" do not exist in northwestern California, but in almost all affairs of life the rich man plays the most important role ("Types of Indian Culture in California," by A. L. Kroeber, University of California Publications, June, 1904, Vol. II). One should be grateful, however, that such facts have been noted at all.

[171] [113]

the urdlya-nivukhi -- the good, i.e., the rich, outstanding men (good and rich are synonomous among all primitive peoples). These are individuals who enjoy outstanding prosperity, thanks to their exceptional individual talents -- bravery, dexterity, strength, enterprise, and intelligence, which place them in an advantageous position in the business of obtaining the means of subsistence. Such an individual is a valuable man for all around him. For the narrow circle of his own family he is the natural head of the communal economy, which, thanks to his initiative and talents, is run more profitably than if it were conducted haphazardly. /119/ The huge family grouped around him is better provided with

/119 cont./

* 614 554 ● 556 not only in natur rice, kumiss, etc it possible for hi of furs and the ac guardian of the c and the possessor which his clansm

For the whole ways open, wher delights of tobac always comes to however, is his h war, conflicts ar other clans. He veyances, his na reason will more finally, he has su sary to pay ranso exceptional intel [537] knowledge of life
"khlaj-nivukh," revenge and civi him when the int Among these yz'
fame and respect [532] Gilyak. In the i images of the go heavens, rivers, respect toward hi
From among such are developed th other tribes stand [623] In some cases, su which before the [622] community in th stances, when th

al products, but also purchased ones, tobacco,
.., because his wealth and associations make n to undertake distant journeys for the barter quisition of goods at firsthand. He is the ommon "shagund" of his closest kinsmen, of his own rich collection of "shagund," en may use in case of necessity.
clan he is not only a man whose home is ale one can always go to eat well, enjoy the co, and hear interesting things, but one who assist in time of need. Especially invaluable, elp at times of common misfortune, such as ising from revenge, disputes with members of has supplies of the best weapons and con-me strikes terror into the foe, who for that willingly consent to a reconciliation, and, pplies of "shagund" when it becomes neces-
m. Moreover, such a person usually possesses ligence, eloquence, rich experience, and and people. He is the natural orator, who plays such a weighty role in affairs of disputes; even neighboring clans resort to ervention of intermediaries is necessary.
there are individuals who enjoy enormous throughout all the territory settled by the mage and likeness of these yz'i are fashioned ds, the "masters" of the mountains, seas, etc. Moreover, they do not simply display m, but also a feeling of religious adoration.
individuals, under favorable circumstances, se elements of authority which we find in ing on a higher level of cultural conditions.
ch yz'i will become the council of elders, clan assembly decides the affairs of the name of the clan. Under other circum-tribe is compelled to conduct frequent wars,

/119 cont./

*614 554 556 [622] the most outstanding yz'i become leaders of the tribe for life, or hereditary tribal leaders, leaders of troops, vikings, or founders of dynasties.

But in the clan life of the Gilyak such individuals do not yet make claim to anything of this sort. Their role is still too insignificant and in any event incidental in comparison with the complex functions of the clan, whose mechanism and life are based on the value and initiative of the integrated personality of each individual. What is the /120/ yz' if not that integrated personality in its highest manifestation of individuality? The influence of the yz' is therefore purely factual, moral; between him and the poorest of his clansmen there is no abyss either in the intellectual or economic sense, while the higher fraternal bond of the religio-social union of the clan towers over and dominates all.

*614 182 Such is the mechanism of clan life. Its real mainspring is the comprehensive development of the personality, together with an integrated religio-social world-view. Organized power is completely absent. Although invisible behind all this, and without any claims to power, elements of authority exist, these elements are without form; they appear on the scene in an elemental fashion, spontaneously, and not at all as constant elements of authority which would push the free manifestation of personality into the background, but these elements nevertheless do exist. There are three of them:

[623] Above all there is the khal', the clan, i.e., the whole totality of the adult clansmen, or at least all those who are present at a given moment, which, having no head or regular assemblies, ordinarily appears suddenly on the scene when some serious problem demands its interference and, once the problem is resolved, disappears from the scene as suddenly as it appeared.

/120 cont./

*614 182 623 Then there are the hejmary, the elders, all of whose authority consists in the solution of moot problems of cult and kinship. They play a certain role at the time of the clan festivals, at which they are generally the principal managers; they are, after a fashion, the priests of the clan. They do not, however, wield any influence or possess any actual significance in the other important manifestations of the life of the clan.

*614 182 556 554 Finally, the third element of authority is the yz'i. Under favorable conditions, there could develop out of these three elements those diverse forms of power which in various combinations (people's assemblies, the council of the elders, patriarchs, priest-kings and military leaders, dukes, vikings, kings, and so forth) we find among many semi-cultured peoples at the present time and at the dawn of the history of all nations which are civilized today. But among the Gilyak these elements are only embryonic, and it is hardly fated for them ever to receive an impetus toward further development.

/121/ VIII.

Interclan Relations

615 *614 The clan, however, is not a self-sufficient institution, and a man's intimate ties are not bounded only by the clan to which he belongs by birth.

Each clan, by the basic principle of its matrimonial law, is bound by marriage ties with four other clans, the akhmal'k and ymgi clans. Between these clans is formed the bond of blood kinship, so important in the eyes of primitive man, the bond of common origin through the mother (the male ancestors of all four clans and the representatives of each of their generations are reciprocally first cousins through the mother), and to this are united those powerful ties of natural intimacy which are engendered by generations of women tying these clans together in an uninterrupted chain of marriage unions.

/165 cont./

582 584 Among the Gilyak, this type of marriage is imperative to such a great extent that such marriages are often performed soon after the birth of the future spouses, in order to avoid any possible chance circumstances that could interfere with this important matter. The first concern of a mother soon after the birth of a son is to do everything possible in order to 585 marry him to the daughter of one of her brothers. In the ritual of the wedding, the child-groom or his father ties up the little hand of the bride with a thread twisted from the hairs of dog fur and a nettle, the magical symbols of a common economy -- dog-breeding -- and fishing; they fashion [601] nets from the nettle. From this moment the marriage is concluded, and when the bride has grown up a little more, approximately to the age of four or five years, she usually moves to the house of her groom, where she grows up with him, and they call each other, however strange it may seem to us, by the pet names "my wife" and "my husband" (n'an g:ej, n'fu) up to the attainment of sexual maturity, at which time they become actual spouses, without any of the ritual or formalities which usually must be observed in concluding marriage with outsiders. This custom probably explains why the grown-up spouses are most often called "yr:kh" and "mam," i.e., old man and old woman, since at the age when most of us are only preparing to get married the young Gilyak spouses may already be celebrating their silver anniversary. This custom sometimes leads to abnormal marriage [582] unions. Now and then one finds in one yurt a pair who call themselves husband and wife, where the husband is a youth of about sixteen, while his wife is only four or five years old. The explanation for this is either that the older sister of the latter has died or that her mother is considerably younger than her own brother. One way or another, such cases still further emphasize the imperative nature of the aforementioned mar- [556] riages. It is characteristic that this case is particularly zealously carried out in the richest families, which usually are distinguished by their especially strict observance of all the ancient customs and rites.

/175 cont./

*835 837 wives for a time, the married men enjoy their group rights just as broadly as do the bachelors. And it must be said in general that the character of the relations between pu and an'g:ej is largely determined by the conditions of cohabitation.

*835 832 Under the conditions of living in different villages, the relations between them can naturally be only sporadic. Very often in such cases the group spouses know each other only by hearsay, but, upon meeting each other, they usually come quickly to an agreement and form fleeting attachments, for which they are quite eager, both the men and the women, not laying claim upon each other to any particular sympathy, love, or such. There is nothing easier than to come to an agreement with such a pu or an'g:ej whom one meets by chance; one need merely touch the breast of a woman in the passageway or out of doors, or make the stereotyped proposal, "Let's smoke a little together," in order to convince oneself of the strength of one's chances for lovemaking. Sometimes the matter is simply settled by means of winks alone.

*835 [593] In a place where the individual bachelor pu and their wives, an'g:ej, are in permanent residence, firm attachments are often established, accompanied not only by regular sexual relations, but often also by deep sympathies and /176/ affection, which nevertheless do not hinder the woman from properly fulfilling her conjugal obligations with regard to her individual husband at the same time, even feeling a real affection toward him. Such relations quite often create extremely interesting situations. Two, or more rarely three, brothers, notwithstanding their complete economic independence, giving each of them the opportunity to acquire his own individual wife, nevertheless live together, having one common wife. The official [595] spouse of this woman is considered to be only the oldest brother, who has actually acquired her with the rights of an individual spouse, but, with the tacit consent of the wife, she is in reality a common wife; this is well-known, not only to outsiders, but [184] also to the children of the brothers-spouses. One encounters [556] such situations also in the richest and most respected families.

*835 578 184 166 [361] /179 cont./ By way of an exception, I observed several cases where jealous men moved to an isolated place immediately after the wedding, in order to avoid the competition of their brothers. Thus, the settlement of Sakh-Kotan, the southernmost Gilyak settlement on the western shore, was founded by such a jealous man; when I visited it in 1897, I found there only its founder with his numerous descendants, and my Gilyak companions made not a few jokes about him, but he was invulnerable -- his wife was of an age when women are well *835 578 834 beyond suspicion. But such cases are exceptional, and all the more exceptional are cases of sharp clashes between brothers on account of jealousy. In order to avoid them, only an observance of tact is demanded. Such cases are possible when an individual wife and a bachelor tuvn go beyond the bounds of decency and tact: when a woman begins to run after her sweetheart publicly, disappears from the home, and completely disregards her obligations to her individual husband. In such cases it is sometimes necessary for the sweetheart to move out of the house of his brother or even out of his village, [166] and the woman sometimes gets a scolding. I met such exiles a couple of times in northern Sakhalin. Usually, however, the *835 578 relations between tuvn are quite peaceful. If the older brother gets a little angry, it is in silence and without any consequences. Any active reaction is considered a sin. It is considered a great sin to challenge one's brother to a duel out of jealousy. I personally never happened even to hear of such cases. I happened to find out about one such case from B. Pilsudski, but this was a completely /180/ exceptional instance. A certain Lokhmatka, a young Gilyak also very well known to me personally, a very poor lad, but one who enjoyed unusual success with the Gilyak women, allowed himself to live too openly with the wife of one of his tuvn. According to the [626] Gilyak custom, as I have already said, publicity in such cases [554] is not allowed. It is allowed in exceptional cases, when the [556] hero is an outstanding and rich man, esteemed by all. Lokhmatka, however, was a thriftless Gilyak, everlastingly in debt to everybody, lightheaded, and undistinguished by any

/202 cont./

* 174 177 As we have seen, the Gilyak were also furnished with wives by the Chinese; they, just like the Ainu, furnished them with slaves. Some influence was also exerted by [221] [439] seasonal trade and hunting expeditions to the territory of neighboring peoples. The Amur Gilyak often went into the [439] Ainu territory for years on hunting expeditions or for purposes of trade and frequently brought Ainu women back to their [563] homeland. Conversely, representatives of the Tungus peoples or Ainu settled among the Gilyak and entered into marital relations with them or carried off their women. And although these cases might be isolated, nevertheless they could not be without influence.

* 174 177 ● 556 A quite specific influence in the economic sphere has been exerted by communication with cultured peoples. Until the encounters with the Chinese and the Russians there was no stimulus for the accumulation of riches. Until then there were only objects of consumption. No one accumulated them, and the highest ambition of a more capable or success- [439] ful man was to share his acquisitions with others. Trade with the Chinese created the stimulus for accumulation. There appeared new valuables which it was impossible to consume, but which they began to value, which were profitable to accumulate. There appeared rich men, fortunate possessors of valuables, and others who did not have them and wished to possess them. In rich men there was born a consciousness of their wealth and their importance, and together with this the ambition to become related to their equals. Among the [583] poor people there arose the temptation to make the marrying of their daughters a source of the acquisition of valuables. The old form of the obligatory marriage, where the woman was given without a bride price, became unprofitable, and with the slightest loophole everyone /203/ tried to circumvent [581] the old imperative. Finally, the phenomenon of the insti- ooo tution of wealth strengthened the institution of individual marriage. The custom of brothers' living together with one

/269 cont./

584 582 my children and your children also be akhmalk'i. If you do not give your daughter to my son, you will completely break the old law, that will be bad. Let us do everything accord- ing to law ('live pure')."

[583] After such a reminder, rarely does anyone refuse his duty, even though this obligation entails the loss of property, for in such cases they either do not give a bride price, or they give a very small one, if the akhmalk is not an ancient one.

177 178 614 433 ● 556 [582] Unorthodox forms of concluding marriage. The most varied circumstances led to the destruction of orthodox marriages in the clans of akhmalk'i. One of the causes was the depopu- lation of the clans from which they took wives, which com- pelled them to marry women of alien clans. Another cause, perhaps the most important, was an economic one, brought about by their contact with the cultured peoples of the Far East, a contact which gave impetus to the development of hunting pursuits for commercial exchange. Objects which formerly had no value, such as the skins of the sable and fox, became objects for which one might obtain not only objects of luxury, such as expensive cloth, valuable weapons, and ornaments, but also food and spices, such as rice, groats, and, finally, alcohol and tobacco. Even nowadays the Gilyak clearly remember the time when sables and foxes used to run around fearlessly in great numbers near the Gilyak dwellings, and no one /270/ killed them, since they pre- ferred to dress themselves in dog hides. And all of a sudden in exchange for these beasts it became possible to obtain

177 178 556 582 584 [594] the most desirable objects. A tremendous change inevitably took place in the psychics of the Gilyak and in the relation- ships of the people among themselves. If formerly a man's dream did not go beyond attaining the reputation of a good person, urdla n'ivukh, i.e., an outstanding hunter who shared his catch with his tribesmen, now urdla n'ivukh became a synonym for "rich man," whose dream was to amass a quantity of luxury objects. Self-interest and boasting ap- peared upon the scene, as well as the desire to excel others

177 178 ● 556 582 584 [565] /270 cont./ in one's own wealth, although it only amounted to the possession of several pieces of silk material, Japanese sabers, and so forth. There appeared on the scene a tendency toward differentiation. The rich man desired to associate with and become related to only rich people. In the question of the choice of a wife there appeared new dictates. One demanded of a wife that she be from a family of equal wealth and, consequently, of an equally high social rank. And now, even in the ancient "tylgund" -- legends -- there is heard in matrimonial dealings the expression: "He (or she) is not my 178 556 58 614 equal." On the other hand, wealth allowed one to manifest a special fastidiousness in the choice of a wife, to seek women who were famous for their special qualities, who were outstanding for their beauty, their domestic talents, their artistry in sewing, and other feminine tasks. But once marriage came to be practiced between members of alien clans, the former simplicity of concluding marriage vanished. There appeared on the scene the new institution of bride price, which introduced into the institution of marriage the element of purchase-sale; besides this, marriage between persons of alien clans demanded preliminary negotiations and the pro- cedures of betrothal. We now turn to these institutions.

192 584 The terms of betrothal. The procedure of betrothal is ex- pressed by various terms, denoting literally, "to agree, to come to an agreement about the bride"; hence, the match- maker -- "the man who makes an agreement"; bride -- "future wife"; groom -- "future husband." For us, the terms for groom and bride are particularly interesting. With orthodox marriage there is no special term for groom and bride, for according to the right of birth the groom is called pu -- husband, and the bride -- an'g:ej. The term jokh, [174] which is used nowadays to designate the bride, is entirely inadmissible with orthodox marriage, for, as we have seen, with orthodox marriage jokh is a term of prohibition for sexual intercourse. Thus, the term itself shows that the procedure of betrothal arose after the weakening of the regime of orthodox marriage.

192 584 [199] /270 cont./ orthodox marriage. For an agreement concerning an orth /271/ marriage with a young girl there is even the specia term tkhagund (eastern dialect tygnydz).

584 602 [593] Persons participating in the betrothal. On the side of the the representatives are: 1) father and mother; 2) brother father; 3) elder brother of the groom; 4) husband of the of the father. The role of the latter individual is explain apparently by the norms of orthodox marriage. Accordin to this last, the husband of the sister of the father is the father of the husband of the sister of the groom. Since by the norms of Gilyak marriage his daughter cannot marry t brother of his daughter-in-law, the husband of the sister o the father considers it his duty to promote the marriage o his closest akhmalk, the brother of his own daughter-in-la

584 602 614 If the father is dead, he is replaced by one of the urdla n'ivukh (honored persons) among his clansmen. Since the marriage is considered the affair of the clan, there freque participate, in addition to these persons, several honored clansmen. When the betrothal involves a very wealthy pe

● [556] [583] son, the honored clansmen come in several boats, bringin with them at once the articles of the bride price, and fre- quently, if the delegation plus the rich bride price makes proper impression, they immediately take the maiden aw with them upon the conclusion of the negotiations.

584 554 556 [533] The bridegroom also attends the betrothal. If he is a alone, or if, on the contrary, he is quite wealthy and re- nowned, he can become betrothed by himself. In one so maiden sings to her beloved: "Holding my hand, betroth 595 584 614 Matchmakers are unnecessary in the case of a marrie man who wants to marry a second wife. Then he himself usually goes to the clan of his first wife, but often the lat herself goes to her own clan or to another one (if there are no suitable candidates in her own) for the selection and betrothal of a new girl-friend for her husband.

/278 cont./
son, served as objects in the shagred (1).

1. The following spindled legend gives evidence concerning this. In the central section of Sakhalin there is a mountain, Kryun' pal, and along side of it another, somewhat smaller mountain, the "wife" of the latter, who has run away from him and hidden her shagred. Three riverside rocks represent the different objects of the shagred. One bears the designation Ulkh-Ul'ka-Ul'ka, "place where the Japanese saber is buried," another bears ul -- "place where the kettle is hulled," and the third, Kyl'ckhty -- the butt of the ax.

583 There are objects which are unalienable, exist commercium. Only in exceptional cases of extreme poverty, or in the absence of a kinsmen is the alienation of objects of the shagred category allowed, and even then only a part of them. A poor widow in the settlement of Pilavo, who lived on the Tymovka River, explained my question as to what she was going to do with the shagred in this way: "Part of it I will sell, and the remainder will go with me to Milyo -- to the world beyond the grave." They are preserved for only exceptional cases in the life of the owner -- for the payment of blood money on account of a slaying, or when one must marry off one's sons and pay a bride price or give a dowry to one's daughters, and, after the death of the owner -- to accompany him to the world beyond the grave. Only such objects figure in the bride price of rich persons. But among persons of great means, the bride price is not always limited to such unalienable objects -- boats, guns, dogs, and so forth.

Rich people, wishing a large bride price, are guided mainly by ambition, for obtaining a rich bride price is the best evidence of one's own wealth. For a poor man the bride price is his only

/280 cont./
(2) Contract of maternality when the mother's brother played a privileged role: the contemporary institution of unilateral cousin marriage among the Gilyaks is perfectly explain on the ancient bilateral one when every maiden was obliged to marry the son of her mother's brother, and thus the custom which we are observing is a remnant of the ancient form of marriage.

583 I turn now to the other principal obligation, the companion to the institution of marriage -- the dowry.

For the dowry the Gilyak have the term jokh ûmdo, signifying literally -- "the thing which is brought by the bride, the woman." The dowry consists of the shagred, of clothing, and ornaments. The dowry of a rich bride consists of an assortment of valuable Japanese and Chinese goods, such as large kettles, expensive earrings, Chinese pipes, and also rich, carved, and decorated sledes, including an assortment of artistically decorated birch spoons. The mother usually gives her ornaments to her daughter, and sometimes also a bed, but for some reason one must not give away her bed, because, if one gives the dowry in the very earliest years and continue up until the marriage of the maiden. This is called jokh wakh -- "to get the bride ready." They lay away the dowry in good time in a room of them with the family valuables, among which, in a well-to-do family, the bride usually are stored away. The dowry should be proportional to the size of the bride price. When the grouping women talk about one or another wedding, they refer to the "bride" and a "poor dowry," or, "the bride price and the greatest price to provide the daughter with a male or female slave besides her things. In the clan of a Gilyak of my acquaintance, Yuskin, they gave to a maiden as part of her dowry a female slave (ash), whom they provided with a Japanese saber for clearing the wilds of her mistress boots. Especially anxious rich people set aside a separate house for their daughter-bride, and a slave, who is later given to her as dowry, and in the same lies the dowry, although it is compensation for the bride price, since it from the husband from great expenditures for the wife, it nevertheless can hardly a gift to the bride, but private property /281/ to which the husband has no right whatever.

/278 cont./
clansmen, even in those cases where the families are separately. And, conversely, it happens that in large families, keeping house together and eating together, individual members, such as, for example, the unrepatriated sons, are independent owners of dogs, boats, and other movable property. In this case, they are with their father obtain in good time property for their future independence or for the purchase of a wife with their own means. Such independent property of unseparated sons is either obtained as a present /279/ from the father, augmented by the fruits of success in hunting through the efforts of the children or as the result of employment in town. If an unseparated son kills a bear, the bear meat goes the general use, but he gets the skin. If he sells his fox and sable, he will purchase various articles for the family, but he will certainly obtain something especially for himself. The newly wedded husband and wife are independent in the matter of property of which he shall speak below, to his home. But such cases are rare. It does happen, when both the groom and the bride belong to families of rich means, that the bride price is therefore small, that it is brought at once, and the dowry of the bride amounts to a large sum of money, and the groom and the bride are so preparations whatever are demanded. Among rich families, the immediate removal of the bride occurs only when the groom gives very far away, when the given marriage is considered valued, either as a result of the high social standing of the parents of the bride or as a consequence of the groom's renown enjoyed by the bride ("a maiden famed throughout the entire land"), and they are afraid of any delay for fear of the agreement being broken if a richer competitor appears. Ordinarily, in cases they come at once in several boats with the whole bride price and in the company of their nobles clansmen, and after the bringing in of the bride price, a feast, and several short ceremonies, they carry the bride away along with her dowry. But, I repeat, such cases are rare. Usually in such cases the wedding is delayed. The delivery of the bride price is arranged by installments. At first only one object is given, as a token of settle, the remaining part is brought either directly before the removal of the bride, or, if the bride price is very large, part of it is even brought within a certain agreed-upon length of time after the removal of the bride.

/278 cont./
556 with a feeling that is strange for people with a primitive mode of life. There is fear and respect and even reverence in this feeling. Just as rich man feels respect and reverence for a dog, a poor man, for example, the unrepatriated sons, are independent owners of dogs, boats, and other movable property. In this case, they are with their father obtain in good time property for their future independence or for the purchase of a wife with their own means. Such independent property of unseparated sons is either obtained as a present /279/ from the father, augmented by the fruits of success in hunting through the efforts of the children or as the result of employment in town. If an unseparated son kills a bear, the bear meat goes the general use, but he gets the skin. If he sells his fox and sable, he will purchase various articles for the family, but he will certainly obtain something especially for himself. The newly wedded husband and wife are independent in the matter of property of which he shall speak below, to his home. But such cases are rare. It does happen, when both the groom and the bride belong to families of rich means, that the bride price is therefore small, that it is brought at once, and the dowry of the bride amounts to a large sum of money, and the groom and the bride are so preparations whatever are demanded. Among rich families, the immediate removal of the bride occurs only when the groom gives very far away, when the given marriage is considered valued, either as a result of the high social standing of the parents of the bride or as a consequence of the groom's renown enjoyed by the bride ("a maiden famed throughout the entire land"), and they are afraid of any delay for fear of the agreement being broken if a richer competitor appears. Ordinarily, in cases they come at once in several boats with the whole bride price and in the company of their nobles clansmen, and after the bringing in of the bride price, a feast, and several short ceremonies, they carry the bride away along with her dowry. But, I repeat, such cases are rare. Usually in such cases the wedding is delayed. The delivery of the bride price is arranged by installments. At first only one object is given, as a token of settle, the remaining part is brought either directly before the removal of the bride, or, if the bride price is very large, part of it is even brought within a certain agreed-upon length of time after the removal of the bride.

/361 cont./ Quick Strokes, Heavier.
are not used as a rule, but rather, carefully wrapped in birch bark, are stored away by the Gilyaks as a treasure of great value.

Bear pikes and lances are the weapon most commonly used by the Gilyak against elk, reindeer, bears, and the like. During the first period of my stay at the Amur, I was under the impression that, if it consisted only a few log houses erected at the edge of the small, completely uncleared forest, it happened almost in front of my eyes that an elk came running out of the forest toward the river, and, when it came upon a group of Gilyak camping there, tried to leap over the people and the Gilyak. The people immediately pursued it in their boat and stabbed it in the water with their lances, whereupon I expected the elk to be killed on the land. In winter when the all too deep snow greatly impedes movement for the elk and reindeer, the Gilyak pursue them on ski in order to kill them eventually with the aid of a lance. The Gilyak, however, at the reindeer, which is especially common on the unforested plains of northern Sakhalin, they pursue in winter with the aid of the Linnan, in the Amur other ways. When in early spring, under the influence of the midday sun and the nightly frosts, a thin crust of ice has formed on the snow and is strong enough to support the dogs, but breaks under the reindeer, they pursue it on a light sledge and harnessed to dogs until they can attack it with their pikes and lances.

Most frequently, however, they are on the hunt against the bear. Under the term the Gilyak, among other mythical beasts of ill great rarity, and the no /362/ less unfamiliar leopard, which, according to superstition fear, the Gilyak scarcely dare mention by name (1), the bear is the largest and most powerful beast of

1. I have already discussed this at great length in the first volume of this work (pp. 96-98) in speaking of the occurrence and distribution of these animals in the Amur region. I shall return in the following to the tiger and leopard idols alluded to there.

/362 cont./ Carefully in Sheets at the Beginning of the Journey
the Gilyak, and the tiger and leopard idols, which are the idols of the Amur, the Kilani, whom the Russian call "Kilaki."

Bear pikes and lances are used among them the least, and only in winter (2) -- a report which was given to little credence

2. Pp. Joh. v. Strahlenberg, Das Nord- und Oestliche Theil von Europa und Asia /The Northern and Eastern Parts of Europe and Asia/, Stockholm, 1730, p. 386.

by a later traveler, Gmelin, chiefly no doubt on account of the indeed very strange linking of the Kilaki with the Persian province of Gilan and the Caspian Sea. Yet, I am inclined to regard as question the very existence of such a people,(3). Gmelin thought that if there were a people there which are especially distinguished by its weapons-making, all of Siberia must be filled with them, and these weapons would long since have been available not from the people themselves, at least through the Chinese (4). Nevertheless, the report which came to Strahlenberg's

3. See p. 203 above.

4. J. G. Gmelin, Reise durch Sibirien, Göttingen, 1752, Vol. II, Preface.

attention more than one and a half centuries ago is now confirmed, for both the above-mentioned bows faced with buffalo horn and decorated with silver and the beautiful lances, spears, and knives with inlaid figures in copper, brass, and silver, which have to equal among any of the Siberian peoples, are of Gilyak workmanship. If, however, these beautiful weapons were unknown in Siberia Gmelin's time, and they were unknown among the people of the Amur region, the reason lies, on the one hand, in the small quantity of metal available to the Gilyak, and on the other hand, and even more, in the high value which they themselves put on to the property of the lower Amur region, but it does not seem to have been given the Gilyak on this route, while the peoples living farther downstream along the Amur and on Sakhalin, the Ainu, and the Japanese, who had already received a knowledge of the discovered above, from the Japanese. During the past decades, finally, the peoples of the lower Amur region have had the opportunity, in view of the increase acquainted with the Russian manner of forging iron.

/278 cont./

The coat of arms armor (Gilyak kâ-petrich) is entirely different in nature from the iron armor. It consists of a sleeveless cuirasse (Gilyak -- ûrt pal /1/), of a helmet (Gilyak -- ûrt ûl /2/), and of a pair of stiff, cylindric strands of textile -rain cord, such as is also used for fastening fish nets, and with individual strips of wholebone (Gilyak -- ûrt ûl /3/) and of a pair of wooden shoulder pieces with holes, long for and low and a large-bodied big buttoning in, otherwise, of a pair of wooden shoulder pieces with holes, long for and low, remain open in the front. The net armor is very heavy on account of the coarse plaiting containing a great quantity of material; the coat of arms armor is considerably lighter. Both helmets are made of birch bark, the helmet, is 2'-4" long, 1' 10" wide, and weighs 18 /#/ (the coat of arms armor is considerably lighter. Both helmets are made of birch bark, the helmet, is 2'-4" long, 1' 10" wide, and weighs 18 /#/ (the coat of arms armor is genuinely Gilyak. According to the Gilyak, the net armor was formerly used by them during major hunts, for example, the hunting of a muskrat, wolverine, and the like, and also took to the field against another one. In my time, it was nothing more than an indicator of importance for the Gilyak. In the summer of 1855, the Russian settlement of Michaïlovkhoye was founded directly beside it, indeed, almost at the same spot (2), which presumably later prompted the Gilyak to abandon their home there.

2. This appears on the map of the Amur region which is appended to the first volume of this work.

that even the ancient Matcha (Ayatschi), had pieces of armor and helmet, which, like the ones described above, consisted of iron lamellas placed over one another like scales and connected with one another by pin or fastened to a leather foundation. After the conquest, the Gilyak obtained the Matcha. The fate of the Matcha were also worn by the Chinese soldiers, officers, and by the 435 undoubtedly can be explained by their great quantity, by the 436 as yet still undiscussed wealth of animals in the lower Amur 437 region. Only the very best of fur considerably surpass all the others 438 with their high prices: the black fox and the lynx. The former 439 shows in high price, not only to the absolute beauty of its fur, 440 also recognized and highly appreciated by the Chinese, but 441 certainly also to its far greater rarity. The lynx fur, on the 442 other hand, as was pointed out above, has too high an imaginary 443 value in the eyes of the Gilyak themselves to be marketed in 444 great quantities.

445 1) Like the lynx fur, several other articles are distinguished 446 in the above table by their very high price, in no way corre-447 sponding to their real value. Among these in particular are the 448 old Manchurian iron armor and helmets discussed above at great 449 length and the Japanese kettles with three handles, which, un-450 fortunately, I did not see, but these could hardly so greatly 451 surpass in quality the kettles from there with two handles, or 452 otherwise somewhat different from them in form, as to justify 453 the great difference between them in price. The necessity for 454 special marks of wealth and distinction, present even among 455 the otherwise practical Gilyak, is expressed in these things.

456 2) The same motive, vanity, also explains the high value 457 of a live bear among the Gilyak. It brings in owner not only 458 no material /199/ advantage, but, on the contrary, even dis-459 advantages. For the killing and consumption of it can take place 460 only in a festive fashion which entails expense for the owner and 461 host, in return, however, it brings him the flattering reputation 462 of a rich and renowned man.

463 4) Among the various clothing materials which represent 464 the principal barter item of the Chinese in dealing with the 465 Gilyak, the latter most prize the colorful silk materials with 466 dragons and other Chinese patterns and often gold and silver 467 interwoven through them, but not because they themselves take 468 special pleasure in them and live in luxury with them -- instead, 469 one sees them used among them almost exclusively in small

1. (cont.)
583 1919
113

image, one horse, a cow, and an ox, 7-10 different pieces of clothing, a pood of flour, a pail of liquor, and some hope for the proprietor's sister, at which, aside from relatives, villagers and friends also /637/ take part. Similarly, a supply of various foods, fish, meat, berries, millet, etc., are given to the departing matched couple, so that the young wife, having reached the home of her husband, is also able to give a feast for the relatives, there, as well as members of the household and villagers.

As a rule the young couple moves to the place where the husband has been living, that is, where the groom's parents live.
And take up residence with one or the other of them, according to circumstances, since the Gilyak dwellings, as has been described above, are of the type that can accommodate several families. The house, however, is by no means always inhabited only by relatives, but often also by other villagers who perhaps helped in building it or have some other connection with its owner. The members of the household remain together until, through the increase in the families, the space becomes too cramped, and then one or more families leave the common home for themselves either in the same village or elsewhere. Besides the central room used by all the members of the household, with the hearth in the earth yurt or the dog table in the wooden yurt built in Chinese fashion, each family has its particular share of the sleeping benches running all around and each individual has his designated place on them. But these individual sections are never separated from one another in any way by screens, curtains, or in the one, and the whole interior of the house always gives the impression of a room used by everyone in common.

As little as such living together by all the members of the household in one room can be conducive to morality, generally speaking, I must nevertheless give the Gilyak a good rating in this respect. In fact, I do not hesitate to call them a morally mature people, in contrast to their neighbors, the Goldi, Orochi, Ainu, and even more the other Paleo-Asiatic peoples. There is 585 As soon as the bride price is paid, the marriage is regarded as merely another ceremony, which takes place in the bride's 556 house. This is often done without further ado. Weather people, however, usually arrange a feast to celebrate the wedding of their daughter or sister, at which, aside from relatives, villagers and friends also /637/ take part. Similarly, a supply of various foods, fish, meat, berries, millet, etc., are given to the departing matched couple, so that the young wife, having reached the home of her husband, is also able to give a feast for the relatives, there, as well as members of the household and villagers.

As a rule the young couple moves to the place where the husband has been living, that is, where the groom's parents live.
And take up residence with one or the other of them, according to circumstances, since the Gilyak dwellings, as has been described above, are of the type that can accommodate several families. The house, however, is by no means always inhabited only by relatives, but often also by other villagers who perhaps helped in building it or have some other connection with its owner. The members of the household remain together until,
through the increase in the families, the space becomes too
cramped, and then one or more families leave the common home for themselves either in the same village or elsewhere. Besides the central room used by all the members of the household, with the hearth in the earth yurt or the dog table in the wooden yurt
built in Chinese fashion, each family has its particular share of the sleeping benches running all around and each individual has his designated place on them. But these individual sections are never separated from one another in any way by screens, curtains,
or in the one, and the whole interior of the house always gives the impression of a room used by everyone in common.

As little as such living together by all the members of the household in one room can be conducive to morality, generally speaking, I must nevertheless give the Gilyak a good rating in this respect. In fact, I do not hesitate to call them a morally mature people, in contrast to their neighbors, the Goldi, Orochi, Ainu, and even more the other Paleo-Asiatic peoples. There is

553 Immediately, or at least very soon after its birth, the child 554 is given a name, usually towards evening of the same day or in the 555 morning of the following day, depending on whether it was born 556 in the daytime or during the night. This takes place without any 557 ceremony: the father simply names the name desired by him or 558 the mother, or /641/ a Gilyak who happens to be present may 559 propose a name. Or the father approved or said adopts it for his 560 child. It must be expressly stressed that no shamanistic arts are 561 practiced either in connection with the birth or the name-giving.
562 Thus, however, are by no means to be thought of a kind of special 563 celebration. Well-to-do people, however, occasionally express 564 their joy over the family increase by a feasts which they share 565 with the neighbors and kinsfolk.

566 When the child has grown a bit, it is placed in a cradle 567 made of wood and usually. This has a very peculiar construction of 568 a cone-shaped or flened, hollowed-out piece of wood of such a 569 length and width that the upper body of the child, up to its head, 570 can be fitted into it. Although, while its upper body is fixed, is strictly 571 pointed, remain open, the lower end is closed with a cronbaund 572 which is provided with several grooves emptying into a central 573 hole. The child, wrapped in blankets except for its naked buttocks, 574 is set on this board so that the upper body rests in the hollow, 575 whereupon a couple of straps are drawn from one edge of it to the 576 other to prevent the child from falling out. A small board is then 577 filled with moss or fine wood-shavings is fastened below the 578 opening in the little seat-board, and then the cradle is hung on 579 a cronbaum of the house, above the sleeping bench (cf. Pl. XIII /see 580 p. 992/). But in order to prevent the latter from being soiled by 581 excrement that might seep through the basket, a length board 582 (Gilyak ям, Pl. XXXIV, Fig. 9 /see p. 1014/), provided with 583 raised rim and several grooves lengthwise and crosswise, is put 584 on it below the cradle. The long straps by which the cradle is 585 suspended are so skillfully drawn and lashed that the latter can be 586 put in a higher or lower, vertical, oblique, or horizontal position 587 as desired. To quiet or to amuse the child, it bundle of various 588 small objects (wood or metal) is hung on the back of the cradle and,

553 Immediately, or at least very soon after its birth, the child 554 is given a name, usually towards evening of the same day or in the 555 morning of the following day, depending on whether it was born 556 in the daytime or during the night. This takes place without any 557 ceremony: the father simply names the name desired by him or 558 the mother, or /641/ a Gilyak who happens to be present may 559 propose a name. Or the father approved or said adopts it for his 560 child. It must be expressly stressed that no shamanistic arts are 561 practiced either in connection with the birth or the name-giving.
562 Thus, however, are by no means to be thought of a kind of special 563 celebration. Well-to-do people, however, occasionally express 564 their joy over the family increase by a feasts which they share 565 with the neighbors and kinsfolk.

566 When the child has grown a bit, it is placed in a cradle 567 made of wood and usually. This has a very peculiar construction of 568 a cone-shaped or flened, hollowed-out piece of wood of such a 569 length and width that the upper body of the child, up to its head, 570 can be fitted into it. Although, while its upper body is fixed, is strictly 571 pointed, remain open, the lower end is closed with a cronbaund 572 which is provided with several grooves emptying into a central 573 hole. The child, wrapped in blankets except for its naked buttocks, 574 is set on this board so that the upper body rests in the hollow, 575 whereupon a couple of straps are drawn from one edge of it to the 576 other to prevent the child from falling out. A small board is then 577 filled with moss or fine wood-shavings is fastened below the 578 opening in the little seat-board, and then the cradle is hung on 579 a cronbaum of the house, above the sleeping bench (cf. Pl. XIII /see 580 p. 992/). But in order to prevent the latter from being soiled by 581 excrement that might seep through the basket, a length board 582 (Gilyak ям, Pl. XXXIV, Fig. 9 /see p. 1014/), provided with 583 raised rim and several grooves lengthwise and crosswise, is put 584 on it below the cradle. The long straps by which the cradle is 585 suspended are so skillfully drawn and lashed that the latter can be 586 put in a higher or lower, vertical, oblique, or horizontal position 587 as desired. To quiet or to amuse the child, a bundle of various 588 small objects (wood or metal) is hung on the back of the cradle and, presence of several women around one man in the same house is not a common household in, in the long run, scarcely conceivable. Therefore very rich Gilyak who are impelled by the desire to display their wealth and indulge in the luxury of polygamy, frequently seize upon another means to lighten the lot of their wives and, without disturbing the peace, to be able to live one or another of them. This means is to keep slaves, usually of the female, but sometimes of the male sex, for the purpose of performing the heaviest work in the house.

These, however, are by no means to be thought of as local celebration. Well-to-do people, however, occasionally express their joy over the family increase by a feasts which they share with the neighbors and kinsfolk.

When the child has grown a bit, it is placed in a cradle made of wood and usually. This has a very peculiar construction of a cone-shaped or flened, hollowed-out piece of wood of such a length and width that the upper body of the child, up to its head, can be fitted into it. Although, while its upper body is fixed, is strictly pointed, remain open, the lower end is closed with a cronbaund
which is provided with several grooves emptying into a central hole. The child, wrapped in blankets except for its naked buttocks, is set on this board so that the upper body rests in the hollow, whereupon a couple of straps are drawn from one edge of it to the other to prevent the child from falling out. A small board is then filled with moss or fine wood-shavings is fastened below the opening in the little seat-board, and then the cradle is hung on a cronbaum of the house, above the sleeping bench (cf. Pl. XIII /see
p. 992/). But in order to prevent the latter from being soiled by excrement that might seep through the basket, a length board (Gilyak ям, Pl. XXXIV, Fig. 9 /see p. 1014/), provided with raised rim and several grooves lengthwise and crosswise, is put on it below the cradle. The long straps by which the cradle is suspended are so skillfully drawn and lashed that the latter can be put in a higher or lower, vertical, oblique, or horizontal position as desired. To quiet or to amuse the child, a bundle of various small objects (wood or metal) is hung on the back of the cradle and,

567 people who themselves are obliged to bear the heaviest yoke, 568 and, in fact, are the ones most involved in the work. Finally, 569 indicating that this deplorable custom of the Ainu and Goldi is 570 rooted in the moral degeneracy to which they have been brought 571 by the oppressive yoke of the Japanese and Chinese is the 572 the fact that the latter themselves sometimes negotiate the sale 573 of Ainu and Goldi women as slaves to the Gilyak, for which the 574 trading trips of the litter furnish them the opportunity. The 575 Gilyak, on the otherhand, who have been able to preserve 576 their freedom and independence with regard to these peoples, to 577 be sure buy slaves from the Ainu and Goldi and under certain con-578 ditions sell them again, but they must decidedly abhor keeping 579 any of their own people as slaves or sell them to the others.
580 In fact, they were to the opinion that if one of them tried to do 581 it, he /647/ would come such indignation among his countrymen 582 that it would be in outmost danger of his life.

583 On the whole, the number of male slaves, as well as that 584 of the female slaves who are always more common, is small 585 among the Gilyak. The principal reason for this is the high price 586 that they can both in direct trade with the Ainu or Goldi and in 587 exchange for their trade by the Gilyak: it is sometimes necessary 588 to acquire a slave intrade than to buy a wife. The Gilyak Stogin 589 in Kuik, for instance, paid for three for his slave, an Ainu woman 590 named Ainu-mamu. So Gilyak may marry a female slave, mentioned 591 above, he bought the latter for 150 in = 210 rubles, but the former 592 cost him 60 pieces o Chinese silk, which alone amounted to 593 300 in, or almost tworoubles, aside from other things. It appears 594 once she was far behind his two wives. As will be seen from 595 the following, however, this does not matter at all, in view of 596 the social position ofemale slaves among the Gilyak. Because 597 of the high price of ne female slaves, only very rich Gilyak can 598 afford to keep any, and whoever has one is usually very boastful 599 about it, as, for instance, Stogin was. Such a possession seems 600 to envious to them not in order to obtain it many a Gilyak does 601 not hesitate, to sell his daughter to a countryman as a wife in 602 exchange for a female slave and to pay the difference in the 603 Purchase Price in some other form.

560 high price in some other form. Slaves of the male sex are 561 cheaper, but also less desirable, chiefly because they are less 562 handy and strong, and therefore less useful in the house than 563 the female slave are, and in addition perhaps also because, in 564 spite of the inferior position assigned to them, they might give 565 cause for concern on the part of their wives and children.

566 The male and female slaves among the Gilyak, in relation 567 to their master, are in a situation of serfdom with absolutely no 568 rights. they are nothing more thin domestic animals in human 569 shape, whom one treats humanely only in order to keep them fit 570 and not to detract from his property, but also sells at will. Of 571 course, it is only with in the house, such as hauling and 572 splitting wood, fetching water, feeding the dogs, and whatever 573 else they are asked to do, falls to them, for they only to 574 obey and to work. Nowhere, however, does there is a slave in the 575 house, the housework is done almost exclusively by her, while 576 the wives of the head of house share themselves only in 577 handicrafts, the care of the children, and other activities as they 578 please. It is not the many and heavy tasks, however, that make 579 the lot of the slaves, and especially the female slaves, hard 580 among the Gilyak, but rather their complete lack of rights, as 581 well as the contempt which they encounter everywhere and which 582 is expressed, among other things, in the fact that they are 583 excluded on principle and consistently from any intercourse with 584 their social inferiors. So Gilyak may marry a female slave, mentioned 585 above, he bought the latter for 150 in = 210 rubles, but the former 586 cost him 60 pieces o Chinese silk, which alone amounted to 587 300 in, or almost tworoubles, aside from other things. It appears 588 once she was far behind his two wives. As will be seen from 589 the following, however, this does not matter at all, in view of 590 the social position ofemale slaves among the Gilyak. Because 591 of the high price of ne female slaves, only very rich Gilyak can 592 afford to keep any, and whoever has one is usually very boastful 593 about it, as, for instance, Stogin was. Such a possession seems 594 to envious to them not in order to obtain it many a Gilyak does 595 not hesitate, to sell his daughter to a countryman as a wife in 596 exchange for a female slave and to pay the difference in the 597 Purchase Price in some other form.

556 While there is no ranking of individuals as superior or in-557 ferior in a legal sense among the Gilyak, a social structure 558 determined by differences of wealth is very marked among them.
559 Among a people so generally and to such a high degree devoted 560 to trade as the Gilyak, it could not be otherwise but that wealth 561 would play a important role in social life and become one of the 562 for the reputation, moral power, and influence of the individual.
563 The rich man among them, who on trading trips to the Manchu 564 and the Sisiam provides himself with a stock of everything that 565 his countrymen regard as necessary and desirable, is an important 566 and indispensable person for the less well-to-do who are unable 567 to make such trips. at his place they can always dispose of the 568 precious furs, which they themselves have hunted, in exchange 569 for the clothing, or luxuries that they could not do so. In case 570 of necessity, can also count on help and receive some things 571 perhaps on credit, but other things, and the most essential ones, 572 are for nothing. Furthermore, charity is in high repute among 573 his extensive contacts, the rich Gilyak is as a rule superior to 574 his poorer countrymen in farsightedness, experience, discern-575 ment, and judgment and that has not only an economic, but 576 also a moral influence upon them. Finally, his means permit 577 him to put himself at the very center of the whole social life 578 of his village and to make his house the scene of its festivities, 579 especially the great bear festivals and the sumptuous feasts 580 associated with them, in which his poor fellow-villagers and 581 business associates may participate. Under these circumstances 582 there is among the Gilyak a quite spontaneous superiority or 583 inferiority of individuals in social relations, based on their 584 greater or lesser wealth. Thus if one enquires among them, 585 at Tolbut did, about this or that person, they will never fail to 586 indicate the part of all the financial position of the person con-587 cerned by briefly stating whether he is a tscholla nibelch, i.e., 588 a poor man, or a halla nibelch, a richer one, or mysinnin-589 halla nibelch, that is, a very rich man, with which in the same 590 time his social position and the respect that he enjoys among 591 them are generally indicated.

CONTINUED ON NEXT FICHE

9: Hawes--161-162 T-3 (1901) 1903
116, 556

"Ukavo was at the time of my visit a rich, or a basis of its affluence present, or to come, was township in Australia which, possessing 400 in and a collection of galvanized-iron roofed cabi soon to throw Ballarat into the shade! No min Gilyaks' calculation, but they possessed a far bears."

at least a potentially rich, village. The s even more assured than that of the new habitants, a town hall, a telephone union, ns of unvarying [162] pattern, promised es, gold or otherwise, entered into the more important asset in the shape of seven

9: Hawes--261 T-3 (1901) 190

116, 177, 422, 556

"The headman of Nivo was counted rich the weapons and produce of the chase. The arrows, bear-spears, strangely shaped kn baskets, though of a ruder make than those my special attention, one, a miniature of t double-barrelled fowling-piece mounted on used by these natives and the Tungus in the among the Gilyaks, his hut being littered with re were nets and snares, automatic bows and ives, seal-skins, dog-skins, as well as bark e of the Orochons. Two other objects attracte the Tsar Alexander III, and the other, an old a wooden biped, a cumbersome affair, but e winter hunts."

9: Hawes--277-278 T-3 116, 461, 556

"From Nivo a start was made the Tim. Both had been ostentat to pack I found Armunka averse Vanka all the work, save what li so going up to him I took him by only refrained from boxing his e tude of the dozen Gilyaks who w companion, explaining that he h There was, however, more than later that Armunka was, as we cratic family; and therefore his fused to do menial service! It w village of Irr Kirr, but in vain of this Gilyak peer. The hut was him justice, however, for there previous year he had killed thre and would gain him wealth."

with our river crew, Vanka and Armunka, to ascend iously pleased to welcome us back, but when we cam from helping. I remonstrated with him for leaving to ittle I and my interpreter were doing, but to no effect the shoulders and shook him. I was really angry, an ears at the request of Vanka, and from doubt of the at ere looking on. Vanka good naturedly apologized for ad been making merry and the effect had not yet worn this in it; and we were considerably amused to lear should say, of independent means, came of an aristo pride of ancestry at times asserted itself, and he re as several days later that we arrived at his home in looked around for the paternal acres, the vast estat s [278] comparatively small and rather bare. I must was no doubt of his being a great hunter. During the e bears and captured two, which had brought him hor

ONTINUED FROM PRECEDING FICHE

/665 cont./

556 Among the Gilyak the man who undertakes frequent journeys to the Manchu and Sáisam, carries on extensive trade with his countrymen and the neighboring tribes, and in general lives in evident prosperity is regarded as rich, kolla, and therefore esteemed. He is regarded as belonging to a higher level, however, as mykstschr-kolla nibach, a very rich and highly esteemed man, only if, in addition, he also meets the following conditions: 1) if he owns many of the above-mentioned (1)

1. See pp. 933-937 above.

objects which are especially valuable in the eyes of the Gilyak, such as a lynx-fur coat, old Manchurian iron-armor, bows with buffalo and rhinoceros horn mountings, three-handled Japanese cooking kettles, and the like, and then does not sell these inherently useless, but yet very costly articles, /666/ thus putting them to practical use, but keeps them only as dead capital and heirlooms for his sons, he proves his great wealth; 2) if from time to time he gives great bear festivals with opulent feasts and arranges for the invitation of many guests; or finally, 3) if he displays a particularly large household and has 3-5 wives besides several male and female slaves. It is not necessary that all three conditions be met by one person -- it is enough if one or another of them is satisfied as long as this is done to a particularly high degree. Ssogin in Kuñk-Mäo, for instance, owned a number of luxury items and also had two wives and a female slave, but he was nevertheless regarded as only a kolla nibach. On the other hand, Numkwin in Wair (1), Amin in Kaki, Ssondon and his son Libgun in Tschylm, Jondom in Kalm, Pysgun and Mesgun (2) in Patt, and, especially, Judin in Tebach were [104] 2. In all the Gilyak names mentioned here the s is pronounced soft, like the French z.

1. The same who was mentioned above (p. 575, note 1) as one of the murderers of de la Brunière.

/666 cont./

556 named for me as mykstschr-kolla. The latter in particular was especially esteemed and popular among his countrymen, aside from other reasons, on account of his lavish and much visited bear festivals, in one of which I, too, took part. They related that he was held in such esteem that even the Chinese in Ssansin and the Japanese on Sakhalin referred to him as Gilyak dshangin and treated him accordingly, which prompted some of them, too, to refer to him occasionally in this way, and yet, they said, he is no dshangin, of whom there are none among them, but only a mykstschr-kolla nibach. Thus do they cling, even with the great differences in means and, accordingly, also in social position, to their complete equality legally.

426 When I previously said that the poor Gilyak, in case of 935 necessity, count on the help of their richer countrymen and may expect to receive from them some things on credit, but others for nothing, this needs an explanation. One might accordingly [439] think that the latter treat the former in about the same way as the Chinese traders, who, in an emergency, give the Goldi, Orochi, and other natives of the region among whom they reside the things required, calculated at a very high price, on credit, in order that afterwards, by means of repeated and unchecked promissory notes, they will never be out of debt to them for the rest of their lives; in fact, the debts are even inherited by their children. This never happens among the Gilyak. As much as I was in contact with the rich and the poor among them, I never heard of anything that would permit one to conclude that there is any considerable debt relationship between the one and the other. Both are also probably too cautious and practical, too subtly and cleverly calculating, to enter into such relationships, disadvantageous for both, for the one injurious to his respect and popularity, for the other to his existence. Not that they do not have any debts among one another -- but these always seem to be only small advances within their means to one person or another, the casual repayment of which is taken for granted, but often, and probably usually in cases of unequal means, /667/ is not even claimed, 426 and not much is said about it. Perhaps related to this is the fact

/686 cont./

G1 556 But wealth does come into consideration to the extent that it does among the Gilyak, and those blessed with it do not enjoy nearly as much esteem, moral influence, and popularity as among the G1 [1697] latter. But the reason for this, too, in large part is again the greater industriousness and gain-seeking of the Gilyak. If one of them acquires a certain amount of wealth, he continues unceasingly to try to increase it by buying new furs in the neighborhood and on trade voyages, through which his name and reputa-G1 [1697] tion /687/ will become known far and wide in the country. The Olcha, on the other hand, are decidedly of a more indolent and G1 more easily satisfied nature in this respect.
G1 181 171

Another social trait that distinguishes the Olcha from the Gilyak is that their communism does not work merely within the boundaries of tribal affiliation nearly as much as is the case among the latter. And this is explained by the fact that, while, to be sure, they are most like the Gilyak in their way of life, their customs and practices, on the other hand they are surrounded by G1 closely related Tungusic tribes with whom they have many G1 935 character traits in common and whose dialects are readily intelligible to them. Thanks to this considerably lessened national consciousness, the individual man, to be sure, finds among them, in case of need, no such support by his more prosperous countrymen as among the Gilyak, but, on the other hand, a decidedly milder and more humane spirit than among the latter prevails over the whole.

G1 42 224 Evidence that the Olcha, and likewise the Goldi, Samagir, etc., do not limit their communism to such narrow tribal boundaries as the Gilyak is given by the hunting customs already discussed above (1). On the Gorin, for instance, the Olcha,

1. See p. 910.

Goldi, and Samagir have their hunting tents, but these stand open, with their household and hunting equipment, to all hunters, regardless of what nationality they are, with the tacit presupposition that no pilfering of the hunting booty or implements

/769 cont./

764 532 raff next to the kakk, is supposed to represent a dove (tútut) or a cuckoo (pyk). The former is for a man, the latter for a woman. The dove or the cuckoo is also involved with the small stick with the bowl, in which berries and the like are placed as food for the bird; hence the designation tútut-ngir and tútut-ngit or pyk-ngir and pyk-ngit, the dove or cuckoo bowl, for these sticks. The 764 representation is the same for both birds, for it only most crudely shows a bird's head by means of a couple of notches. The word pittyssj, on the other hand, designates another item in the raff. It is a small framework of little sticks (), on which hang berries,

 According to the appended, very cursory sketch, a triangle attached to a stick, on which various articles are hung.

tobacco, etc., the purpose of which remains unknown to me. On the tscham-ngar, Judin said, six feathers are placed for a deceased man and eight for a woman. Since these are supposed to [562] be a means for the more rapid journeying on of the soul, perhaps this takes into account the difference in physical strength and -- according to the Gilyak view of women -- also the difference in psychic energy of the two sexes. The tútut or pyk is supposed to have almost the same purpose as the tscham-ngar, which is very probable on the basis of the explanation given by Judin concerning these objects. (Bm. I, p. 87.)

764 184 56. Gilyak. Near the village of Tacht (on the right bank of the Amur) a newly erected raff stood very close to the bank and close to it a pittyssj, i.e., a storage chamber for the raff, which is therefore called raff-njo on Sakhalin. It consists of a small roof which rests on two poles, similar to a small dovecot. Its roof is higher than the raff. Under the roof of the pittyssj, berries, fish, and the like are hung for the deceased.

764 184 556 In Kalm (on the right bank of the Amur), I found an extremely elegant raff which a rich Gilyak, Kimrkan, had erected in memory of his wife, a daughter of Judin's, and his daughter. On the outside it was provided with carvings and arabesques of various kinds. The /770/ carvings, painted black, red, and white,

/770 cont./

764 184 556 represented various animals, bears, horses, hares, cocks, and ducks (Plate LXIX /p. 1269 /).

On the inside the raff was very opulently equipped. The usual articles in it, kakk, pyk-ngir, tcham-ngar, were so luxuriously made that they could hardly be recognized. The former wa completely covered with a multicolored cloth, which bore brass ornaments such as the Gilyak women have on their robes, corresponding to the purpose of the kakk, namely, to carry the clothing for the deceased. -- Do the rags on the kakk perhaps come from the garments of the deceased? Very probably, since these rags are called okch, fur. -- A small Manchurian bowl served as pyk-ngir. The floor of the raff was covered with a fine reed or straw mat. Aside from the articles mentioned, there also lay in the raff a great number of birch-bark bowls (with berries, etc.), neatly stacked up, a small box in which lay a tobacco pouch and a pipe, another pipe which was for Kimrkan's daughter, and the like, and, finally, the braids of the two deceased women, cut off at the roots and wrapped in birch bark were preserved here (*).

* See p. 615, where raff is to be read instead of rakk.

764 Kimrkan himself took out the articles and showed them to me, evidently, however, without thinking much about the dead. Moreover, he had now replaced his late wife with three of them. Near the raff there was the cremation site of a corpse and next to it stood the raff that went with it. The raff is never erected directly over the ashes of the deceased, but apart from them ().

[114]  The reports concerning this, collected by the author in various places, differ in part from one another, cf. 47 /p. 1227/, 48 /p. 1227/, 51 /p. 1233/.

Kimrkan's deceased, for example, were cremated far in the forest, and their ashes were there, while the raff stood here near

63 general precautions. Nevertheless, it happens that now 69 and then one of these unfortunates is shot down in the woods 77 by Gilyaks, even though the majority of them would not think of concerning themselves with such a disgraceful hunt.

81 XII Economic and Social Conditions.

71 Among Gilyak there is no question of a body of laws, to say nothing of written statutes. Nevertheless, common law which functions in place of fixed statutes is equitable and just. The shadow of a prerogative may be felt only where it is accompanied by real qualities. But even the preponderance of natural talents is very modest; the race consists of individuals among whom the capabilities as well as the assets which are given them by nature are pretty evenly distributed.

56 There are "rich" and "poor" Gilyak, but these terms must 95 be interpreted in a very limited sense. A wealthy man who is in a position to support three to four wives is a rare exception. The "rich" man, besides having a greater number of wives, possesses objects which have a certain value, such as "beautiful" clothes [230], many and good dogs, etc. and sometimes quite useless objects which are kept merely for effect, as, for instance, lengths of cloth of gold (which in Greek churches are used for various decorations). The above-mentioned clumsy lances belong to such luxury articles. There are many rich men who keep on hand a couple hundred silver rubles in a box.

5 Contrariwise, there are very few Gilyak who are not 8 capable of supporting a single wife or even themselves.
6 Such individuals are either sick or alcoholics, for there are 1 no actual reasons for external poverty: fish, game, wood, berries etc., are everywhere to be found, but of course one must obtain them with one's own efforts. A scarcity of fish is a rare exception among the Amur-Gilyak. It happens in those years in which the kita is scarce (this usually coincides with very high water). The Sakhalin-Gilyak often have reason to complain of a scarcity, for there the various species of salmon, even in ordinary years, do not come up the rivers in such numbers. On the other hand, they have more bears, and thus the island Gilyak are in a position to trade young bears for dried fish with their mainland kinsmen.

If there are not enough fish, the Gilyak eats cedar nuts, berries, game, etc. All these are of course only a poor substitute, but in any case we cannot speak of actual "famines" here.

557

557 MANIPULATIVE MOBILITY--extent to which desirable statuses and the prestige they bring can be achieved by opportunistic manipulation of social relationships (e.g., cultivation of persons in authority, political machinations, exploitation of friends and relatives, backslapping, marriages of convenience); prominence and relative effectiveness of manipulative techniques as compared with acquisition of skills and wealth; desirable statuses achievable thereby (e.g., political proferment); etc. See also:

Interpersonal relations	87	Traits of leadership	187
Political behavior	68

562 really a sort of purchase. Moreover, the widow is in a 587 manner of speaking inherited by the brother or other close relative of the deceased. But this inheritance is more a matter of habit; if the widow wishes to marry another, she may do so, but he must pay back the kalym. The woman also does not take part in the more important councils. On the other hand, she may occupy an independent and respected position; she can, for instance, become a shaman. She may have her own money and inherit, although usually less than her brothers. If a widow does not wish to marry at all any more, she is not only permitted to do as she wishes, but even wins respect thereby.

584 In the case of a girl given in marriage by her parents, 557 their wishes are usually the determining factor, and the wealthy 562 man is favored. But even though the girl's taste is not particularly considered, there are usually no unfavorable consequences, because, as we said, if a woman is ill-treated she lets herself be abducted by an admirer. In ordinary affairs, the woman shows subservience to the man; in her sphere she is entirely independent and in the family council her opinion counts for no less than that of her husband.

832 The forms of greeting and manifestations of affection be-576 tween man and [128] woman are very primitive and austere, as is 593 the case in general among the Gilyak. Kissing and handshaking are done only on special occasions, of which we shall speak later. Men and women very seldom kiss; even when the man takes leave or returns from a journey there is no embrace, no kiss, and no handshake, only good wishes are exchanged and even these are rather cool. However, there are other forms of caresses, which will hardly find approval. In tender moments, the woman looks for lice in the man's hair and cracks the game thus hunted between her teeth. Sometimes, the reverse occurs, and the man does it to his lady. Another expression of tenderness consists in washing each other's face with saliva.

578 The abduction of a woman always occurs with her full con-586 sent. During the absence of the husband, the admirer suddenly appears with some companions, the lady is set in the sled or in the boat, and the party disappears. However, some men do not so easily submit to their fate, they pursue the abducted woman and attempt to win possession of her once more by means of cunning or even force. Some men seek revenge, and the result is a struggle and even death, but this is unusual. Quarrels among the Gilyak usually stem from some such causes. If the run-away couple succeed in hiding

558

558 DOWNWARD MOBILITY--possibility and incidence of serious loss of prestige; extent to which such loss involves actual descent to less desirable statuses or merely a less favorable estimate of role enactment in the same statuses; major factors in downward mobility (e.g., loss of wealth, misalliance, cowardice, impiety, crime); special examples (e.g., losing face, losing caste); etc. See also:

Breaches of etiquette and ethics	57	Crime and sin	474
Social control	628	Poverty	738

/647 cont./

567 purchase price in some other form. Slaves of the male sex are 435 cheaper, but also less desirable, chiefly because they are less handy and are lazier and therefore less useful in the house than the female slaves are, and in addition perhaps also because, in spite of the inferior position assigned to them, they might give cause for jealousy on the part of the head of the house.

567 The male and female slaves among the Gilyak, in relation to their master, are in a situation of serfdom with absolutely no rights; they are nothing more than domestic animals in human shape, whom one treats humanely only in order to keep them fit and not to detract from his property, but also sells at will. Of course, all the heavy work in the house, such as felling and splitting wood, fetching water, feeding the dogs, and whatever else they are asked to do, falls to them, for they are only to obey and to serve. Therefore, where there is a slave in the house, the housework is done almost exclusively by her, while the wives of the head of the house devote themselves only to handicrafts, the care of the children, and other activities as they please. It is not the many and heavy tasks, however, that make the lot of the slaves, and especially the female slaves, so hard among the Gilyak, but rather their complete lack of rights, as well as the contempt which they encounter everywhere and which is expressed, among other things, in the fact that they remain excluded on principle and consistently from any intercourse with those around them. No Gilyak may marry a slave; indeed, he may not sell a slave to another Gilyak if the latter expresses an [595] intention to marry her. The use of a female slave as a concubine 558 is no less strictly forbidden among the Gilyak: if anyone did so, he would not only lose completely all the respect that the 556 possession of a slave /648/ as a sign of great wealth gave him, but would stir up a general storm of indignation among his countrymen. This is certainly another indication of the moral austerity of the Gilyak. On the other hand, it makes the female slaves very useful for the household, for in their position they cannot arouse the jealousy of the wife or wives of their owners and thus, for their part, do not bring any discord into the house, as happens all too frequently in the case of polygamy. Perhaps

9: Hawes--265 T-3 (1901) 1903
116, 533, 558, 562, 593

"All Gilyaks, it is said, know the old, old song lyrics it is otherwise, for they are very numerou are composed by the maidens of the tribe, who te again to the Gilyak world. It may not be known w considered a want of modesty. Sometimes one ma woman who made songs in her youth; [1] but it is no ménage. The Gilyak's notions of modesty are ver age of childhood brothers and sisters are not allo former attempted it, the latter would turn away i

An extraordinarily elaborate Gilyak tomb.

5: Schrenk--1289 E-5 (1854-1856) 1881-1895 RX2 Gilyak RX2

4:Ivanov et al. E-4 (no date) 1964 RX2 Gilyak RX2

439 with the Chinese. After the appearance of the Russians in the Amur region, 269 the Nivkhi began to use small quantities of bread, sugar and salt.
[863] The immemorial, and until recently the only, domestic animal of the 231 Nivkhi was the dog. It served as a draught animal and provided for fur clothing and meat for food; it was widely used as a medium of exchange and played an important part in religious ideas and rituals. The number
● [556] of dogs in a household was an index of wealth. As a rule, every household [420] kept 30-40 dogs, which demanded considerable care. They were fed chiefly fish and seal-fat; feed had to be stocked for the whole winter, when dogs were used most as draught animals.

493 The old sled of the Nivkhi, which was still found in use by Shrenk in [175] the middle of the last century, was so narrow that the driver sat astride it, resting his feet on small skis; sometimes he raised himself and ran in this position on skis. The runners of this sled were curved both in the back 492 and in front. The dogs were harnessed to the towing strap alternately on either side, rather than in pairs. The harness was a simple collar, so that the dog pulled with the neck.

492 Until quite recently, dog races were still a part of the bear festival; in 493 these, the Nivkhi used the old sled and the old type of harness. The harness 493 and the sled which appeared among the Nivkhi in the beginning of the 20th [562] century were considerably different from the old type. They were of the so-called Eastern Siberian type; the sled was of greater capacity and [171] equipped with a vertical shaft-bow and paired harness, not in collars but in yokes, which the dogs pulled with the chest.

179 The development of the carting trade brought with it a new type of sled.
492 Its greater size and stability permitted the transportation of up to 200 kg 493 of goods. It was usually drawn by 9 to 11 dogs. The best trained and most valuable dog was the leader. The driver—kayur—usually called out his directions to this dog. The dogs were stopped with a shouted order and a brake pole. Dogs were sometimes also harnessed to a boat on a longer tow strap.

492 The horse as a draught animal appeared among the Nivkhi relatively 179 recently.

In addition to dog transportation, winter travel on land was done by 281 skis—bare skis without fur lining, or skis lined with seal fur. The former were used for short trips; the latter, for distant expeditions during the fur-hunting season. The Nivkhi skis were distinguished by the wooden strips nailed over the fur.

Travel along the rivers (particularly in Sakhalin) was in light hollowed 50 boats made of poplar. These dugouts were so light that they were carried [824] by hand across barriers (shallows and isthmuses). They were propelled with oars or poles (usually employed for upstream travel). For long-[171] distance travel, the Nivkhi had a large boat similar to that of the Ul'chi, Nanays and Orochi. It was made of three wide cedar boards, of which [824] the bottom one was bent upward in front, projecting like a spade. It was rowed with 2 to 4 pairs of oars, by lifting alternately the right and the left ones.

361 The Nivkhi villages were usually situated near the mouths of spawning-rivers, and seldom exceeded 20 dwellings. Until recently, the dwellings of kinsmen were set side by side. Some 40 to 50 years ago, the 342 Sakhalin Nivkhi still widely used the dugout house. It was made by dig-175 ging a pit some 1.25 meters deep, over which a wooden framework was [354] built of thin logs, and covered on the outside with earth. The smoke vent [352] served as a window as well; the hearth was built in the center, and plank beds were set around the walls. At the end of the 19th century,

4:Ivanov et al. E-4 (no date) 1964 RX2 Gilyak RX2

614 parties to agree. When agreement was reached, the khlay-nivkh came to the 627 offending clan with men of the victim clan, fully armed, and a duel was enacted between the representatives of the two clans. Then each clan representative killed a dog, and peace was considered established. After that, the ransom was paid. It consisted of coats of mail, spears, silk materials and other valuable objects.

The Nivkhi had a classificatory system of kinship. But, in distinction to 601 the Tunguso-Manchurian system, the specific term of kinship among them applied always to persons of one, rather than different generations. As Shternberg showed, the classificatory system of the Nivkhi reflected even in his time the existing marriage norms. The Nivkhi retained until the end of [198] the 19th century some remnants of group marriage. These relations were [895] possible only for persons of the same generation, and were categorically forbidden among persons of different generations.

All the members of a clan were divided into four age groups: 1) grand-614 fathers and great-grandfather (atak); 2) fathers (ytyk), their brothers 561 (tuvng), the husbands of the mother's sisters and the brothers of the husbands of the mother's sisters; 3) brothers and sisters (tuvng); and 4) children (ola).

Trade ties with China and the transformation of fur-hunting, and later of 175 fishing, into economic activities directed to commercial ends stimulated 439 the disintegration of the clan order among the Nivkhi, which occurred 614 first among the Amur Nivkhi. The latter had early begun to trade with the Manchus. Nivkhi merchants sailed up the Sungari to San-hsing, and 184 bartered furs and beluga backbones for tea, tobacco, fabrics and metal 187 articles. They also bartered with the Ainu, the Japanese and with other neighbors. Members of the Tvaling clan, for instance, were for a long time ● [556] the middlemen between the Sakhalin Nivkhi and the Ainu. Thus, long before [595] Russian colonization, the Nivkhi began to be divided into rich and poor.
[567] The rich could have several wives and 3-5 slaves. The rich man's bride-price always included large quantities of imported valuables. But commodity relations developed slowly, since exchange was only in the medium of furs and, to a lesser extent, fish. The mass of the Nivkhi continued in a subsistence economy.

195 Slaves did only housework. They could set up their own households 567 and marry free women. The slave's descendants of the fifth generation were considered free. On the whole, slavery was not widespread among the Nivkhi and was of a patriarchal character.

At the end of the 17th and in the 18th centuries, the Manchus established 195 among the Nivkhi, as well as the Nanays, the posts of khalada— clan elders, 648 and gasyanda—village elders.
622 After the middle of the last century, the disintegration of the Nivkhi subsistence economy proceeded more rapidly. After the Nivkhi had finally 195 become a part of Russia, slavery disappeared; a new form of exploitation 198 appeared, in the institution of "half-shares." Nivkhi who lacked the imple-433 ments of production fell into the position of "half-sharers." The catch [567] was divided according to the number of participants, but those who used the implements of others had to yield half of their share to the owner.

Before the Revolution, the Nivkhi were officially considered Orthodox 77 Christians, but their views remained animistic. They thought of the island 776 of Sakhalin as an anthropomorphic creature; similar ideas were held about trees, mountains, rivers, water, earth and cliffs. The killer whale was in "bear thinking an yz'—a "master" of other animals. Almost every natural phenomenon had its yz'. The chief of these were Pal-yz'—the "master" of the mountains and the taiga, and Tayrnadz, or Tol'yz'—the "master" of

7: Kreinovich--4 E-5 (1931) 1934 Gilyak

225 the boat; just as in the Siberian salmon fishing season they 501 unite in a collective which centers around the seine or the 475 zayezdka.
422 466 When the hunting season opens, the owner of such a boat starts collecting his companions. If the owner happens to have 225 a son-in-law (ore) in the village, he asks him to join him in 516 the hunt. In general, however, the owner of the boat selects 476 hunters regardless of clan membership.
466 Thus, for instance, the boat owner, Gilyak Norp of the clan 555 Tf nu , was accompanied by hunters from the following clans: Otag from clan Hutevi , Potag from clan Neo. afl y t from clan a ramla , Onkan from clan Lez ran and Tesk from clan Tf nu .

A similar situation existed in collectives of hunters who went hunting in 1931.

The hunter collective centering around a boat is sometimes named after the owner of the boat. For instance, 1 tun-munim ('one boat of Gylkhtyun') Xitkun-mu-nim (one boat of Xitkun).

225 The owner of the boat is the organizer and leader of the 555 collective of hunters grouped around him. Those who travel 476 with him are his subordinates. The leader of such a collective 466 of hunters is called pila ('bolshak') (2) (from pila-d--'to

2. This is the name of the oldest in the clan and generally of any foreman in industry.

be big. - suffix used in forming verbal nouns.)

225 The duties of pila are many. A pila is supposed: 476 1. To look over the boat, the rowlocks and, if need be, 502 to effect repairs.

2. To prepare and to take along a strap, harpoon tips (tamra), harpoons shafts (ve l), his gun and the guns of his fellow-hunters, a kettle and a tea-pot (the hunters are obliged to take only cups with them), a tent, a sail, a tripod for the tea-pot and the kettle, and a compass. (3) Most of these items

3. Earlier they used to take to sea afq-va ("friend-stone" or "friendly stone"). See the remark in the supplement to "Seal Hunting."

are the property of the pila.

225 3. To perform a number of religious-magical ceremonies 782 before setting out for the hunt as well as during the hunt. In 372 this capacity the pila exposes the boat to smoke, performs 476 mu-zi -o and t ai ceremonies to be described in detail below.

Gilyak

s, the epics of their race, but with the s, and always being added to. These ll them to their girl friends, and they ho the authoress is, for that would be y be heard to say, 'There goes an old t 'good form.' Woman's mission is the y strict. After they have passed the wed to speak to one another. If the injured modesty."

9: Hawes--268 T-3 (1901) 1903 Gilyak
116, 558, 591

"A young man on marrying may make his home with his father; but if he be still in the single state and desire a hut of his own, he must marry, for it is more than infra dig. for him to do domestic work. For a Gilyak to take in his hand the woman's fish-knife (ungu-dzhakho) is considered a disgrace."

561

561 AGE STRATIFICATION--recognized age levels and their differentiation (e.g., age terms); generalized information on rites of passage from level to level; organized age-grades (e.g., composition, admission, advancement, symbols of membership, activities); relations between age levels and age groups; division of labor by age; etc. See also:

Status and activities of children 88
Status and activities of adolescents, adults, and the aged 88 Sodalities 576

1: Shternberg--172 E-5 (1890-1897, 1910)1933 RX2 Gilyak RX2

*614 /112 cont./
clan, and which we see even now, for example, among the Buryat, the Kirgiz, the Caucasian peoples, etc., is absolutely lacking among the Gilyak and in general among peoples on a level of development similar to theirs. It is not found even in [562] the family. True, a certain despotism is practiced with respect to the women, who are at first subordinate to their fathers and brothers and, after marriage, to their husbands, but this is a despotism that has nothing in common with the despotism of the Roman patria potestas. Instances of slaying wives and daughters or selling them into slavery are impossible.

562 True, there are not infrequent cases of girls forced to marry, 593 which is to a considerable degree tied up with the religiously sanctioned custom of marriage between the children of brothers and sisters, but in general the attitude toward daughters is one of the greatest tenderness, both before and after marriage. Between [606] the families of the father-in-law and son-in-law /zyat'/ there are established for their whole life, as we shall see, profound and intimate ties of hospitality and mutual aid, and in the rare cases of bad treatment of a married woman, the woman always receives real protection from her kinsmen. In general, however, the conjugal relationships are very gentle, women are consulted, and the older ones even participate in the councils and assemblies of the clansmen.

● 561 There is absolutely no trace of despotism with regard to the 855 representatives of the male sex. To be convinced on this point, it is enough to witness the attitude of the adults toward children. It is difficult for the civilized man even to imagine what a feeling of equality and respect prevails here with regard to the youth. Male children of ten to twelve feel themselves to be members of society with completely equal rights. The wisest and most honored oldsters listen with the most serious attention to their remarks and reply with the same seriousness and courtesy that they display toward their own /113/ contemporaries. No one feels any [86] difference of years or social status. True, the Gilyak male child of ten to twelve usually is already an accomplished gentleman. He has not only mastered all the techniques of his day-to-day

9: Hawes--271-272 T-3 (19

116, 301, 422, 435, 556

"Earrings (meskh) are in general use are large simple rings of silver, of o with an agate or two. These, with the shoes are regarded as family heirloo surplus 'wealth' of the Gilyak family, paper-money or a heap of silver piec sable-skin shuba or a piece of sky-bl Moreover, they are just as useful in to dealing in the concrete, knows exa and when he comes in his travels to a measure the value of his ruble notes.

, and mostly of Japanese and Chinese make. They ne and a half or more inches in [272] diameter, rare silk brocade, sable-skin hats, shubi, and ms. They are bought one after the other with the and represent the capital of the hut. A bundle of es have little attraction for the native, whereas a ue silk is a 'thing of beauty and a joy for ever.'
the business of exchange; and the native, long used ctly their value, whereas money is unfamiliar; Russian store, he has no standard by which to
"

"Four garments—short-skirted fro Only the best may be selected, and in cade, I have mentioned, will be used.
reason of the four garments is this.
each of the gods or lords in turn, To rivers); Pal ni vookh, the lord of the the judge of good and evil; and as her after the fire, so Tur ni vookh is her each one, and the road is long and di suffices for a journey, and she must course, if the family of the deceased delicacy; but woe to the light-minded four garments on their dead. She and in the next world will be poverty-stri condition, and her kindred will suffer whose majesty has been insulted."

cks—are placed upon the corpse of the woman.
case of a 'wealthy' Gilyak the rare Chinese bro-Over all the corpse is robed in a shuba. The The spirit of the dead woman must appear before ni vookh, the [243] lord of the water (sea and forest; Tur ni vookh, the lord of fire; and Kiskh, duty on earth was to keep the hearth, i. e. look most intimate deity. Since she must appear before fficult, four dresses are necessary, as one only not appear before the god in torn garments. Of is poor, the god will overlook that little want of members of a rich family, if they omit to place her kindred will indeed have a bad time; her life cken even as she has shown herself in miserable many misfortunes from the hands of those gods

3 general precautions. Nevertheless, it happens that now 9 and then one of these unfortunates is shot down in the woods by Gilyaks, even though the majority of them would not think of concerning themselves with such a disgraceful hunt.

XIII Economic and Social Conditions.

Among Gilyak there is no question of a body of laws, to say nothing of written statutes. Nevertheless, common law which functions in place of fixed statutes is equitable and just. The shadow of a prerogative may be felt only where it is accompanied by real qualities. But even the preponderance of natural talents is very modest; the race consists of individuals among whom the capabilities as well as the assets which are given them by nature are pretty evenly distributed.

There are "rich" and "poor" Gilyak, but these terms must be interpreted in a very limited sense. A wealthy man who is in a position to support three to four wives is a rare exception. The "rich" man, besides having a greater number of wives, possesses objects which have a certain value, such as "beautiful" clothes [230], many and good dogs, etc. and sometimes quite useless objects which are kept merely for effect, as, for instance, lengths of cloth of gold (which in Greek churches are used for various decorations). The above-mentioned clumsy lances belong to such luxury articles. There are many rich men who keep on hand a couple hundred silver rubles in a box.

Contrariwise, there are very few Gilyak who are not capable of supporting a single wife or even themselves. Such individuals are either sick or alcoholics, for there are no actual reasons for external poverty: fish, game, wood, berries etc., are everywhere to be found, but of course one must obtain them with one's own efforts. A scarcity of fish is a rare exception among the Amur-Gilyak. It happens in those years in which the kita is scarce (this usually coincides with very high water). The Sakhalin-Gilyak often have reason to complain of a scarcity, for there the various species of salmon, even in ordinary years, do not come up the rivers in such numbers. On the other hand, they have more bears, and thus the island Gilyak are in a position to trade young bears for dried fish with their mainland kinsmen.

If there are not enough fish, the Gilyak eats cedar nuts, berries, game, etc. All these are of course only a poor substitute, but in any case we cannot speak of actual "famines" here.

557

557 MANIPULATIVE MOBILITY--extent to which desirable statuses and the prestige they bring can be achieved by opportunistic manipulation of social relationships (e.g., cultivation of persons in authority, political machinations; exploitation of friends and relatives, backslapping, marriages of convenience); prominence and relative effectiveness of manipulative techniques as compared with acquisition of skills and wealth; desirable statuses achievable thereby (e.g., political preferment); etc. See also:

Interpersonal relations . . . . . 57 Traits of leadership 157
Political behavior 66

562 really a sort of purchase. Moreover, the widow is in a 587 manner of speaking inherited by the brother or other clo relative of the deceased. But this inheritance is more a matter of habit; if the widow wishes to marry another, s may do so, but he must pay back the kalym. The woman does not take part in the more important councils. On t other hand, she may occupy an independent and respecte position; she can, for instance, become a shaman. She have her own money and inherit, although usually less th her brothers. If a widow does not wish to marry at all a more, she is not only permitted to do as she wishes, bu even wins respect thereby.

584 In the case of a girl given in marriage by her parents, 557 their wishes are usually the determining factor, and the we 562 man is favored. But even though the girl's taste is not particularly considered, there are usually no unfavorabl consequences, because, as we said, if a woman is ill-tr she lets herself be abducted by an admirer. In ordinary affairs, the woman shows subservience to the man; in h sphere she is entirely independent and in the family cou her opinion counts for no less than that of her husband.

832 The forms of greeting and manifestations of affection 576 tween man and [128] woman are very primitive and austere, 593 the case in general among the Gilyak. Kissing and hand shaking are done only on special occasions, of which we speak later. Men and women very seldom kiss; even wh the man takes leave or returns from a journey there is embrace, no kiss, and no handshake, only good wishes exchanged and even these are rather cool. However, th are other forms of caresses, which will hardly find appr In tender moments, the woman looks for lice in the man hair and cracks the game thus hunted between her teeth.
Sometimes, the reverse occurs, and the man does it to lady. Another expression of tenderness consists in was each other's face with saliva.

578 The abduction of a woman always occurs with her full 586 sent. During the absence of the husband, the admirer s denly appears with some companions, the lady is set in sled or in the boat, and the party disappears. However, men do not so easily submit to their fate, they pursue t abducted woman and attempt to win possession of her on more by means of cunning or even force. Some men se revenge, and the result is a struggle and even death, bu is unusual. Quarrels among the Gilyak usually stem fro some such causes. If the run-away couple succeed in hi

558

558 DOWNWARD MOBILITY--possibility and incidence of serious loss of prestige; extent to which such loss involves actual descent to less desirable statuses or merely a less favorable estimate of role enactment in the same statuses; major factors in downward mobility (e.g., loss of wealth, misalliance, cowardice, impiety, crime); special examples (e.g., losing face, losing caste); etc. See also:

Breaches of etiquette and ethics 57 Social control 626
Crime and sin 674
Poverty 736

/647 cont./

567 purchase price in some other form. Slaves of the male sex are 435 cheaper, but also less desirable, chiefly because they are less handy and are lazier and therefore less useful in the house than the female slaves are, and in addition perhaps also because, in spite of the inferior position assigned to them, they might give cause for jealousy on the part of the head of the house.

567 The male and female slaves among the Gilyak, in relation to their master, are in a situation of serfdom with absolutely no rights: they are nothing more than domestic animals in human shape, whom one treats humanely only in order to keep them fit and not to detract from his property, but also sells at will. Of course, all the heavy work in the house, such as felling and splitting wood, fetching water, feeding the dogs, and whatever else they are asked to do, falls to them, for they are only to obey and to serve. Therefore, where there is a slave in the house, the housework is done almost exclusively by her, while the wives of the head of the house devote themselves only to handicrafts, the care of the children, and other activities as they please. It is not the many and heavy tasks, however, that make the lot of the slaves, and especially the female slaves, so hard among the Gilyak, but rather their complete lack of rights, as well as the contempt which they encounter everywhere and which is expressed, among other things, in the fact that they remain excluded on principle and consistently from any intercourse with those around them. No Gilyak may marry a slave; indeed, he may not sell a slave to another Gilyak if the latter expresses an intention to marry her. The use of a female slave as a concubine [595] is no less strictly forbidden among the Gilyak: if anyone did so, [558] he would not only lose completely all the respect that the [556] possession of a slave /648/ as a sign of great wealth gave him, but would stir up a general storm of indignation among his countrymen. This is certainly another indication of the moral austerity of the Gilyak. On the other hand, it makes the female slaves very useful for the household, for in their position they cannot arouse the jealousy of the wife or wives of their owners and thus, for their part, do not bring any discord into the house, as happens all too frequently in the case of polygamy. Perhaps

116, 533, 558, 562, 593

"All Gilyaks, it is said, know the old, lyrics it is otherwise, for they are very are composed by the maidens of the trib again to the Gilyak world. It may not be considered a want of modesty. Sometime woman who made songs in her youth; ' bu ménage. The Gilyak's notions of modest age of childhood brothers and sisters ar former attempted it, the latter would tur old songs, the epics of their race, but with the numerous, and always being added to. These e, who tell them to their girl friends, and they known who the authoress is, for that would be s one may be heard to say, 'There goes an old t it is not 'good form.' Woman's mission is the y are very strict. After they have passed the e not allowed to speak to one another. If the n away in injured modesty."

77 baptism a means of guarding against abduction of their 97 women. Those who are baptized live just like the unbaptized ones, their children are usually not baptized, and their corpses are cremated. Their fellow-tribesmen by no means persecute them. A baptized Gilyak is regarded by the others somewhat as though he had shared in some special acquaintance.

02 XVI. Intellectual Development, Time-Computation, 05 Legends.

The Gilyak count to quite a high number: 2000, 5000 and more, but of course they almost never use such high figures. The Gilyak year is half as long as the real one: winter which probably lasts half a year, is regarded as a whole year, the [245] remaining year being regarded as another one. Moreover, there are special names for the four seasons.

21 The Gilyak know how to find their way by the stars, and the Big Dipper and pole-star are their guides. They seem to have no particular assumptions with regard to the characteristics of the heavenly bodies. From some I heard that the sun and moon were inhabited by people. I could not learn anything definite about whether they might not be "the beyond". It can only be said that the other world is somewhere up above, not under the earth, as with the ancient Greeks.

05 The Gilyak do not count their years. Only of quite young 61 people one can hear it said approximately how old they are. Older people cannot remember their age and immediately say: "the Gilyak does not count his years". This means his own age, for with them there is no question of chronology or history.

3 The majority know nothing about their past. But from 1 several intelligent Gilyak I heard that once "a long time 21 ago", there was a war between the Amur-Gilyak and those of Sakhalin; that the latter came with a great many boats, but were defeated. There is also a tradition on Sakhalin which has it that three or four generations ago a long war raged, whose cause was the abduction of a woman. It is difficult to say whether this war is the same as the one of which the Amur-Gilyak tell. In any case, the long intervals between such wars testify to the peaceableness of this tribe. The Gilyak knew nothing of fighting with the first Russians who arrived.

In answer to the question whether they had always occupied their present settlements, most of them answered simply: "I do not know". However, I heard from one of 562 SEX STATUS--rights, privileges, powers, duties, and disabilities of each sex (e.g., legal, domestic, economic, political, ceremonial); special exceptions for each sex; general statements bearing upon the status inferiority or superiority of women; special elaborations (e.g., chivalry, notions of the uncleanness of women); explanations of sex differences; etc. See also:

562

Marriage 58
Status and activities of children 85
Division of labor by sex 462
Franchise 641
Cloistering of women 837
Transvestitism 838
Menstrual isolation 841

796 574
796 231
796 [562]
796 526

cont./

a, and beans, and, finally, all kinds of the ritual dish, e mos'," whose method of preparation I have already de- bed in the second chapter.

This is all placed in rows near the bear. The clan elder he master feeds the bear for the last time from a big spoon a long handle, giving it a taste of each dish, while asking it offer a "good spot" at the time of the killing. Finally he resses the bear with the following farewell words: "Good-by. n feeding you for the last time. Go quickly, go quickly to r master, and may your master greatly love you." Other nsmen also try to offer something to their old friend; even all children participate in this kindly affair. After the short ak all the people pour out of the yurt, with the exception he women, who are forbidden to be present at the killing he bear -- otherwise it will not offer a good spot -- and ar- ge themselves in fighting formation. The master of the r or the clan elder walks in front with a kettle and an ax in hands. Next to him is the elder of the narkh'i, also with a tle and an ax. Behind them are the remaining narkh'i, with vs and arrows, and, finally, all the participants in the festi- follow on ski on both sides in a picturesque, happy throng. thin a hundred paces of the place where the bear is tied, the ple stop, the master drives his ax into the snow and places the tle next to it; the narkh does the same with his kettle and The ax and the kettle bear the characteristic name of nich, ., mine -- thine. The master of the bear and the narkh er exchange these nich'i at the end of the festival as a sign eternal brotherhood. When the nich'i have been placed, the t to the last act of the tragedy begins: the preliminary com- itive archery. Once, when the bow played a more important e in the life of the Gilyak, this shooting /64/ no doubt had the racter of a great competition; now, however, it is reduced nost to a simple formality. The target is a board placed ind the bear. The narkh'i shoot first, and after them the nsmen of the master; the latter try not to embarrass the sts and make intentional misses. The crowd follows with

/70 cont./

796 slain bear, but the head is always respectfully divided among 825 the clansmen to whom the bear belongs. This eating must 261 be looked upon, not as a simple act of eating, but as taking [562] into one's body the mighty qualities of the bear. A woman, for instance, cannot partake of the heart of the bear, which imparts courage, a quality completely useless to her, and therefore such eating, as aimless, must be offensive to the bear.

796 Thus the religious significance of the bear festival amounts 825 to the following: 1) feeding the bear gives /71/ the settlement 182 security and protection from evil spirits -- a very important 775 matter if we take into account the views of the Gilyak with 774 regard to the origin of sickness and of death (see below); 2) eating the "deity" imparts strength; 3) the soul of the slain animal, pleased by the honors, may independently and through its "master" do good things for man; 4) it -- and this is of the utmost importance -- is an envoy, a transmitter of all kinds of gifts to the "master of the mountains," on whom 796 the welfare of the Gilyak depends. With regard to the last 825 point, it is important to remember what we said about clan 614 gods. Every clan has clansmen among the "mountain people," 775 i.e., clansmen who sometime in the past fell in a fight with a bear and were then taken into the clan of the "master of the bear." Every such clansman in turn becomes a small "master," a god-protector of his clan. Actually, every clan receives its catch, not directly from the "master of the mountains" himself but from this, his clan god, who specifically resides in the hunting territory of his clan. Thus, the presents sent through the bear are actually sent, not to the supreme "master," but to the nearest "master of the mountains" -- clansman.

796 That is why the celebration of the festival is purely a clan 614 affair. This also perhaps explains two extremely characteristic, but puzzling facts concerning the bear festival. In the first place, not only is no member of the clan arranging the festival allowed to kill the bear, but even the clansmen of women who are wives of the members of that clan are not allowed to, in a word, none of the agnates in either the male

/79 cont./

775 not know exactly where this place is); the soul need only 772 descend into this opening and it reaches its goal. There everything is as it is here: the same earth, the same sky, s rivers, and forests; only there the sun shines when we have night, and the moon when we have day. The dead come to life and continue to live there in the same settlements as on earth, fish, kill beasts, celebrate clan festivals, marry and procreate. Only the material status changes: the poor man becomes rich and the rich man poor. As you see, even amo the Gilyak the poor men find their consolation not in this be of all possible worlds. Even in the new world, however, sic ness and death await man. From there the soul must migrat into a third world, and so on until such time as the soul de generates and turns into ever smaller and smaller beings, a small bird, a gnat, and, finally, ashes. Sometimes souls are born again on our planet, completing again the infinite [562] series of transformations. For the most part, however, that is the lot of women.

764 /80/ Before entering mlyvo, the soul waits to be 775 equipped with everything necessary to go to the new land comfortably and richer. And so the deceased is dressed in his best garments and in silken robes. Everything that is put on the deceased must be new, fully embroidered, elegant, and durable. A man is dressed in one, three, or six pairs, generally a number of pairs divisible by three, and women in two, four, eight, etc. pairs.

The most expensive spears, rifles, bows, and nets ar taken from the storehouse -- and the souls of all these objec set off with the deceased on his journey.

764 While these preparations for a long journey are goin on, the deceased is constantly fed the most delicate dishes. Kettles boil from morning until late at night; people throng in the yurt. They eat and drink as during the bear festival, and a part of each dish is given to the deceased. When the smoke, they put their mouths to the lips of the deceased, and share with him this favorite of Gilyak pleasures. While the body of the deceased is in the house, custom dictates th

*614 /112 cont./

clan, and which we see even now, for example, among the Buryat, the Kirgiz, the Caucasian peoples, etc., is absolutely lacking among the Gilyak and in general among peoples on a level of development similar to theirs. It is not found even in [562] the family. True, a certain despotism is practiced with respect to the women, who are at first subordinate to their fathers and brothers and, after marriage, to their husbands, but this is a despotism that has nothing in common with the despotism of the Roman patria potestas. Instances of slaying wives and daughters or selling them into slavery are impossible.

562 593 True, there are not infrequent cases of girls forced to marry, which is to a considerable degree tied up with the religiously sanctioned custom of marriage between the children of brothers and sisters, but in general the attitude toward daughters is one of the greatest tenderness, both before and after marriage. Between [606] the families of the father-in-law and son-in-law /zyat'/ there are established for their whole life, as we shall see, profound and intimate ties of hospitality and mutual aid, and in the rare cases of bad treatment of a married woman, the woman always receives real protection from her kinsmen. In general, however, the conjugal relationships are very gentle, women are consulted, and the older ones even participate in the councils and assemblies of the clansmen.

● 561 855 There is absolutely no trace of despotism with regard to the representatives of the male sex. To be convinced on this point, it is enough to witness the attitude of the adults toward children. It is difficult for the civilized man even to imagine what a feeling of equality and respect prevails here with regard to the youth. Male children of ten to twelve feel themselves to be members of society with completely equal rights. The wisest and most honored oldsters listen with the most serious attention to their remarks and reply with the same seriousness and courtesy that they display toward their own /113/ contemporaries. No one feels any [86] difference of years or social status. True, the Gilyak male child of ten to twelve usually is already an accomplished gentleman. He has not only mastered all the techniques of his day-to-day

/113 cont./

● 561 855 86 labors, he is not only a skillful shot, fisherman, oarsman, etc., but he is already in fact a worker, like all the others. Moreover, to a considerable degree he has already mastered the whole sum of spiritual learning. He already knows from practice all the clan customs, all the religious rites, he remembers all the kinship appellations, he knows the legends, tales, and songs of his tribe, and, to top it all off, he has that knowledge of men and life that constant presence in the society of adults provides: on journeys, hunting, fishing, festivals, etc. Hence, also, his feeling of his own worth and weightiness of speech, and his ability to conduct himself in society.

561 596 855 All these qualities, however, would have no significance if the patriarchal principles existed. The youths of other peoples of low culture also attain self-reliance at an early age, but a special, almost religious veneration of their elders, who purposely train them in submission, is demanded of them. Among the Gilyak there is nothing of the sort. All the more absent is the despotism of the head of the family with respect to its adult members. The sons are completely free to separate from their father, obtaining from him their allotment in the form of implements, sleighs, and such, and when they assist him with a part of their catch, they do this quite freely, with absolutely no compulsion.

596 One encounters large families living in a communal economy, at the head of which stands the elder in the family, the grandfather, father, or one of the brothers, but this is a completely free associa- [422] tion, from which one may depart at will. And even though he is a [434] participant in such an economic union, every member can have his own individual economy in the form of sleds and dogs, arms, enjoying the right to individual earnings by means of his personal merits; and what each member shares with his own -- and there is extensive sharing, especially in food supplies, both natural and purchased -- is shared without any compulsion. They bring flour, rice, kumiss, and so on from the city, and all this is cooked in the common kettle for all. Communism and individualism are combined without any friction.

614 627 parties to agree. When agreement was reached, the khlay-nivkh came to the offending clan with men of the victim clan, fully armed, and a duel was enacted between the representatives of the two clans. Then each clan representative killed a dog, and peace was considered established. After that, the ransom was paid. It consisted of coats of mail, spears, silk materials and other valuable objects.

601 The Nivkhi had a classificatory system of kinship. But, in distinction to the Tunguso-Manchurian system, the specific term of kinship among them applied always to persons of one, rather than different generations. As Shternberg showed, the classificatory system of the Nivkhi reflected even in his time the existing marriage norms. The Nivkhi retained until the end of [198] the 19th century some remnants of group marriage. These relations were [595] possible only for persons of the same generation, and were categorically forbidden among persons of different generations.

614 ● 561 All the members of a clan were divided into four age groups: 1) grandfathers and great-grandfather (atak); 2) fathers (ytyk), their brothers (tuvng), the husbands of the mother's sisters and the brothers of the husbands of the mother's sisters; 3) brothers and sisters (tuvng); and 4) children (ola).

175 439 614 184 182 Trade ties with China and the transformation of fur-hunting, and later of fishing, into economic activities directed to commercial ends stimulated the disintegration of the clan order among the Nivkhi, which occurred first among the Amur Nivkhi. The latter had early begun to trade with the Manchus. Nivkhi merchants sailed up the Sungari to San-hsing, and bartered furs and beluga backbones for tea, tobacco, fabrics and metal articles. They also bartered with the Ainu, the Japanese and with other neighbors. Members of the Tvabing clan, for instance, were for a long time [556] the middlemen between the Sakhalin Nivkhi and the Ainu. Thus, long before [595] Russian colonization, the Nivkhi began to be divided into rich and poor. [567] The rich could have several wives and 3-5 slaves. The rich man's bride-price always included large quantities of imported valuables. But commodity relations developed slowly, since exchange was only in the medium of furs and, to a lesser extent, fish. The mass of the Nivkhi continued in a subsistence economy.

175 567 Slaves did only housework. They could set up their own households and marry free women. The slave's descendants of the fifth generation were considered free. On the whole, slavery was not widespread among the Nivkhi and was of a patriarchal character.

175 648 649 622 At the end of the 17th and in the 18th centuries, the Manchus established among the Nivkhi, as well as the Nanays, the posts of khalada— clan elders, and gasyanda—village elders.

175 178 433 [567] After the middle of the last century, the disintegration of the Nivkhi subsistence economy proceeded more rapidly. After the Nivkhi had finally become a part of Russia, slavery disappeared; a new form of exploitation appeared, in the institution of "half-shares." Nivkhi who lacked the implements of production fell into the position of "half-sharers." The catch was divided according to the number of participants, but those who used the implements of others had to yield half of their share to the owner.

771 776 Before the Revolution, the Nivkhi were officially considered Orthodox Christians, but their views remained animistic. They thought of the island of Sakhalin as an anthropomorphic creature; similar ideas were held about trees, mountains, rivers, water, earth and cliffs. The killer whale was in their thinking an yz'—a "master" of other animals. Almost every natural phenomenon had its yz'. The chief of these were Pal-yz'—the "master" of the mountains and the taiga, and Tayrnadz, or Tol'yz'—the "master" of 782 they keep for a long time. When some one is 225 drowned the Gilyaks arrange a boat race, fight, and 766 run. In this connection I wish to note that in the 415 valleys Chayvo, on the Okhotsk shore of the Sakhalin peninsula, where I studied the cult of drowned men in great detail, no felicitations are allowed when a man is drowned.

fed. (Mos for these troughs is prepared by men). Next, mos is emptied out of the tol-ŋir ('sea troughs') for which it is prepared, as in all other cases, by women. The offering completed, the troughs are turned around so that their "eyes" are directed to the houses instead of to the sea. (3) Next,

3. The troughs are in the form of animals. As I observed in the village of Chayvo, drops of mos meant to be "eyes" are put on one end of a tol-ŋir, which apparently no longer has animal form.

pebbles, picked up from the shore are put into the troughs. At home these pebbles are thrown into the fireplace.

782 The Gilyaks regale their kinsmen with whatever is left 262 over from the offering and also eat themselves. Mos from the 225 ui-ŋir is eaten only by old people. Women, children, and 561 young hunters must not taste this mos.

225 It is imperative that the "feeding of the sea" be completed 782 before the departure of the hunters. Once the hunters put out to sea, "feeding of the sea" is not allowed. At present this custom is not strictly observed, and if someone happens to be late, he "feeds the sea" late in the evening when it is reasonable to assume that the hunters at sea have gone ashore; although they sometimes spend the night on floes.

After the offering the Gilyaks begin preparations for putting out to sea on a hunt.

225 The essential prerequisite for seal-hunting at sea is a large 501 spacious, many-oared boat. Not every Gilyak is the owner of 476 [80] such a boat, suitable for long voyages. In the village Kul 322 there are no more than ten such boats. (1) In the seal-hunting 466

1. Unfortunately, it did not occur to me to count the number of these boats during my stay in the village Kul.

season the hunters unite in a collective which centers around

225 During the hunt one must use the tinder box or the matches 782 of the pilaŋ to light a campfire. No hunter has the right to 372 light a camp fire using his own implements for this purpose; 476 he has to use the implements of the pilaŋ instead.

4. To tend the rudder and to observe the wind and ice-225 floes. Young hunters with no experience in sea-faring rely 476 in this respect completely on the pilaŋ. One Gilyak told me: 502 "If the pilaŋ observes the wind and the floes, the young hunters are not worried."

5. To distribute the quarry among the hunters.

As can be seen, the pilaŋ performs the most responsible functions of a leader. I was told by the Gilyaks that if anything goes wrong during the hunt the pilaŋ is held responsible.

In the collective of hunters there must be not only organizers but also good oarsmen and a good shot.

225 [81] Everything in the boat is organized from the beginning 501 to the conclusion of the hunt. Each of the hunters occupies a 476 designated position at the oars. Each of the positions has its name.

The position at the first pair of oars, starting from the stern, is called ŋətivd, the second - tafpuf, the third - alχ-pid, the fourth - mayerq-pid ('sitting at the bow'), the fifth - lele mayerq-pid ('placed at the very bow'). There are boats with six and even seven pairs of oars.

225 Starting from the stern, the first position, ŋətivd, is oc-476 cupied by the oldest and strongest oarsman in the boat. At the 554 next pair of oars is a younger hunter. The position at the 561 oars at the bow is occupied by the youngest of the hunters in the boat.

When the ice fields are reached and the hunt begins, the position at the bow is occupied by the very best shot. Until that time he rows just like the others. As long as there are no seals in sight he rows like the others, occupying the position at the bow. Since he is the oldest of the hunters the pilaŋ often turns out to be a better shot than the young hunters. In such cases he turns the rudder over to someone in the boat and sits at the bow to fire at the seals. Thus, for instance, the Gilyak pilaŋ Norp sat during the hunt at the bow and fired at the seals. At the same time Gilak ət tended the rudder which the pilaŋ had turned over to him. The Gilyak pilaŋ Tavjun was at the bow during the hunt. According to his information he had killed by himself twenty seals and missed two. We do not wish to imply that of the whole collective of hunters only one person shoots at the seals. Two, three or four hunters do the shooting

225 but the better one among them sits at the bow. The hunters 476 must often get out on the floes for it is not always conven-554 ient to get within shooting distance of the seals in a boat.
561

If there is an extra man in the boat, if, for instance, there 225 are five oarsmen, one pilaŋ and one other man, then the pilaŋ 476 -if he is the oldest man in the boat - sits at the stern without 561 doing anything, and his junior takes over the rudder. The 885 Gilyaks illustrated this point to me by the following example: if Xitkun and Kaun are among the hunters in the boat and if both are older than the rest of the hunters, than Xitkun, as the oldest, would sit at the stern and do nothing except for giving orders and Kaun, who is Xitkun's junior, would take over the rudder. If, on the other hand, Tujun, Xitkun, Pləskuk and Kaun and younger hunters set out in a boat then Pləskuk and Kaun, who are younger than Tujun and Xitkun, are at the oars, Xitkun takes over the rudder and Tujun, as the oldest of them all sits at the stern. It happens that the pilaŋ is younger than the extra man in the boat. In that case the pilaŋ tends the rudder and the extra man sits at the stern. I personally know of such a case. Pilaŋ Norp took along with him in the boat old man Onkan who sat at the stern and did nothing while Norp tended the rudder. When Norp was at the bow shooting at the seals and ət, to whom Norp had turned over the steering oar, tended the rudder, Onkan again sat at the stern. Jesting about his work Onkan said to me: "I was simply sitting without doing a thing, but I got my share." I found out from others that during the hunt he helped build the campfire and prepare food. He also seems to have helped with some other things; which is why he was taken along. Unfortunately, I was unable to clarify this point to any great extent. I simply had no time in which to do that. It seems that Onkan performed a number of functions which did not tax his strength and, in this manner, he made the rather heavy work of the hunters easier.

Incidentally, the facts given above illustrate with a sufficient degree of clarity the role of older people among the Gilyaks.

225 [82] As mentioned above the pilaŋ performs mu-ziχəd 789 and tʼaj.

774 Mu-ziχəd is performed at the stern of the boat. Two short 751 sticks, the thickness of a match are driven into the stern board. The distance between them is approximately two fingers. Then they tie a thin thread made of nettle fibres around the sticks. The Gilyaks usually perform ziχəd on hands of children. They believe that a thread made of hair of a dog and nettle fibre and tied around a child's hand protects the child from illness. The fact that the Gilyaks perform of other obstacles in the path of the attackers. In hostile territory all hunting is dangerous (in many clans it is even prohibited, while some also forbid the use of water from the rivers and springs); the supplies brought from home do not last long, while an open, sudden attack -- bearing in mind arrowheads and the impotency of the women's sentry duty -- is not always possible. With long patience and severe deprivations they must await the favorable moment or elite in desperation resolve to take any risk.

/100 cont. /

Most frequently the defenders prefer to await the attack in their own settlement. Then, abandoning the female population, which enjoys inviolability, the men gather in a separate yurt, from which, at the guards' first signal of the approach of the foe, they scatter through secret passages and gather together beyond the yurts, ready to meet the foe. In accordance with interclan customs, the battle continues through one night or at most twenty-four hours, until, finally, fatalistic sorrow, after which the enemy departs, and the survivors count the number of fallen men on each side. If the defenders have lost a greater number than the opposite side, a new attack begins. The attackers must in any case consider themselves satisfied. But the affair does not always end with a few victims. Instances are known where a whole clan perished, and only women remained alive.

There have been cases, on the other hand, where, to avoid the destruction of a small clan incapable of a strong rebuff, the self-sacrifice of one man has expiated the general guilt. I know of one case where, at the very moment that news came of the approach of the foe, a youth responsible for the conflict prayed his clansmen who were gathered about him in the yurt to save themselves by flight, offering to save the clan from destruction by his own death. And when the clansmen, with downcast eyes, began to leave the yurt, he, quaffing a cup of seal fat at one draught for courage, flung himself headlong, brandishes his spear, To meet the maidens /121/ throng of avengers.

/101 cont. /

628 Now let us proceed to the institution of ransom, "itkuhnd," which has in part taken the place of revenge and in part coexists with "revenge," serving as its indispensable corrective.

The reasons that gave rise to the institution of ransom side by side with the imperative of blood retaliation, which was finally squeezed out completely by the former, remain completely unexplained in science to this day.

Among the Gilyak, we believe, it is easy to find at least the principal reason for this great transformation in social relations. It rests on that special form of exogamy about which we spoke in detail in its place.

/102/ Each clan is bound to a number of clans, at least four, by bonds of the most intimate character. It takes a wives from the akhmal'k clan or clans, and from these clans came its mothers; it gives in marriage its own women, daughters and sisters, to the ymgi clan or clans. These clans, in the natural order of things, are near to it; mothers, daughters, sisters bind it to them interpersonally.

The clan of the slayer can easily turn out to be the one that takes its women from it, in which are his sisters and daughters, or one which provides it with women. Hence the first great modification; the inviolability of women in conflicts of vengeance.

But the role of the women does not end here. If the slayer is from the akhmal'k clan, i.e., the clan which gives the mothers and wives of the avengers, it is not difficult to imagine that these women cannot be indifferent spectators of a war against their own brothers and fathers. If the slayer is from the ymgi clan, the wives of the latter likewise will not lightly reconcile themselves to the destruction of their husbands and sons at the hands of their own fathers and brothers. In both cases the intervention of the women is inevitable, and a few precedents of their pacifying influence suffice to turn the precedents into a lawful custom, at first coexisting with blood revenge and later squeezing it out.

Indirectly the influence of women in this respect must have found expression in still another way, purely mechanical, so to speak. Their inviolability factually hindered to a considerable degree the realization of blood retaliation itself. Their sentry duty, the

/102 cont. /

614 only one of its kind, must have worn out the foe and weakened his 628 spirit more than the most active resistance. Utilizing their habitual 562 corpus, day and night they go about the environs in perfect safety, looking into every bush, every blade of grass, in search of the enemy in ambush. And if the attackers do not possess an overwhelming number that makes it possible to fall openly upon the expectant enemy, they will never succeed in eluding the vigilance of the inviolable chain of sentries, and the patience of the attackers, worn out by boredom, the march, the torment of waiting, of necessity breaks on the passive resistance of the weaker sex, and the basis for peace has been established.

In order to appreciate fully the importance of the passive 614 participation of the women in the struggle of the clans, it must 562 be kept in mind that in many clans it is forbidden to light a fire on alien territory, /103/ use the water of its rivers and springs, hunt, etc., so that, like the Biblical Jewellers of Gibeon, the Gilyak find it necessary to set off on an expedition loaded down with skins filled with water and as much food supplies as a man can carry.
Under such conditions every extra day of waiting threatens death by famine, and thus the vigilance of the women necessarily conquers.

Here is one of the examples known to me. In 1851, 30 men 614 of the settlement of Tebakh set off overland to take vengeance on 628 one of the clans of the settlement of Ejal' for the slaying of a 562 clansman. After a long march, and a still longer and more fruitless 724 period of waiting as a result of the vigilance of the women, with polen in their hands, ceaselessly searching the locality, the water in their skins and their provisions by gave out, and the avengers had to depart with nothing and terminate the matter peacefully ... Thus small causes often lead to important consequences.

Tylor was right when he asserted that exogamy weakened the 614 relations between clans and introduced peace, although he pro-114 ceeded from the mistaken conjecture that the aspiration for peace brought to life the very institution of exogamy. It is true that primitive man is not sentimental, he is mainly too "god-fearing." That inviolability factually hindered to a considerable degree the realization of blood retaliation itself. Their sentry duty, the

/114 cont. /

clan, and which we see even now, for example, among the Buryat, the Tungus, the Yakut, Samoyed, etc., is absolutely lacking among the Gilyak and in general among peoples on a level of development similar to theirs. It is not found even in the family. True, a certain despotism is practiced with respect to the women, who are at first subordinate to their fathers and brothers and, after marriage, to their husbands, but this is a despotism that has nothing in common with the despotism of the Roman patria potestas. Instances of slaying wives and daughters or selling them are very rare among the Gilyak.

True, there are not infrequent cases of girls forced to marry, which is to a considerable degree tied up with the religiously sanctioned custom of marriage between the children of brothers and sisters, but in general the attitude toward daughters is one of the greatest tenderness, both before and after marriage. Between the families of the father-in-law and son-in-law /syat'/ there are established for their whole life, as a rule, well-proved and intimate ties of hospitality and mutual aid, and in the rare cases of bad treatment of a married woman, the woman always receives real protection from her kinsmen. In general, however, the conjugal relationships are very gentle, women are combined, and the older ones even participate in the councils and assemblies of the clansmen.

There is absolutely no trace of despotism with regard to the representatives of the male sex. To be convinced on this point, it is enough to witness the attitude of the adults toward children.
It is difficult for the civilized man even to imagine what a feeling of respect and respectfulness the Gilyak give their youth.
Male children of ten to twelve feel themselves to be members of society with completely equal rights. The wisest and most honored oldsters listen with the most serious attention to their remarks and reply with the same seriousness and courtesy that they display toward their own /113/ contemporaries. No one feels any difference of years or social status. True, the Gilyak make child of ten to twelve usually is already an accomplished gentleman. He has not only mastered all the techniques of his day-to-day

/149 cont. /

III.

The Classificatory System of Kinship and the Norms of Sexual Intercourse and Marriage

Now we shall see to what degree the aforementioned kinship system corresponds to the contemporary norms of sexual intercourse and marriage.

Among the Gilyak, at least at the present time, we cannot speak of any kind of general prohibitions against extramarital sexual relations.

Sexual relations with a woman in the eyes of a Gilyak is a completely nonchalant and natural act, like any other natural act, satisfying a certain natural need of man. Prohibitions and restrictions apply only to definite circles bound by agnate or cognate kinship. Outside of these circles there is no regulation or censure of sexual behavior, either on the part of public opinion or on the part of the elders. Outside of the prohibited circles, sexual relations out of wedlock have only one restriction: the reaction of the one or the other party concerned. Young men and girls have complete freedom in the women of a certain /150/ locality, may be aggressive at an alien usurper and soundly teach the stranger not to sneak into a territory not his own, which, by the way, happens very rarely. Adultery is much more serious affair if a married woman is involved. A stranger caught in flagrante delicto with a married woman is slain at the scene of the crime; such was the custom at least until the most recent times; only the fear of penal repression has begun to restrain some more impulsive slayings, which are beginning to be replaced by duels and ransom. The woman suffers less in such cases. They beat her thoroughly, but the affair never goes so far as killing her:
in the first place, because, at we shall see further on, a woman is always considered the cognate of her husband, and, in the second place, because she is an article of value, having been her husband dearly, and furthermore she is a necessary worker.
In any case, the matter is not settled without repression, bloody

/183 cont. /

83 group sexual cohabitation is legitimately practiced on a large 121 scale. When reproaches were sometimes directed by older 86 persons at younger ones for sexual excesses, it was only on account of economic considerations, since sexual diversions frequently distract youths from work at home. Reproaches were 83 also directed at pregnant maidens, but here the considerations 121 were of a special nature, about which we spoke above: 1) the danger of a connection with persons of the forbidden categories, and principally, 2) the anonymity of the father of the child. But ordinarily the adventures of the youth are no 83 secret and do not give rise to reproach. It is a perfectly 579 ordinary phenomenon for young men to set out for a visit of 583 several months' duration to the settlements of their "fathers-in-law," where there are so many an-ke; maidens at their disposal, and the older generation not only does not oppose this, but is very happy about it. As we have already said, an unmarried ymgi (son-in-law /syat'/) is a most desirable guest in the house. "One is obliged to feed an "ymgi" (son-in-law)" (see p. 109). Women and even maidens pay little to the men in laxness of attitude toward what we call sexual morals. It is only necessary for them to be more careful 83 (especially when the matter concerns persons who are not of 121 the clan) and for this reason they do not affect any appearance of the sternest inaccessibility, but in reality they are just as loose as the men. And yet, in view of all this, to say 83 that the Gilyak it devoid of a feeling of sexual morals would be 121 the greatest injustice. Actually the Gilyak give free rein to their instincts only within socially permitted limits. And, on the other hand, what the norms do not allow, for example, reactions of jealousy with respect to one's tum, and especially sexual intercourse with persons of forbidden categories, is observed with a very great rigeousness completely unknown to us, and this notwithstanding the fact that the prohibitions on sexual intercourse often have in their favor not only physiological, nor psychic, nor any other kind of reasonable basis, such as, for example, the prohibitions between the very distant agnate male and female cousins. During

/271 cont. /

584 The bride is customarily represented by the father and 121 mother, but the final decision the attendance of repre-584 sentatives of the clan is required. The latter, both those of the bride and of the groom, intervene in the negotiations, but their participation is rather passive. In resolving the question, aside from the consent of the father and mother, the wishes of the brothers play a part. Frequently the wishes of the latter are decisive. Here is a remnant of matriarchy.
583 In the epos the role of the brothers stands out in sharp relief.
584 Among the Gilyak it is more about a father, whom he sub-583 forms him of his intention to give his sister in marriage, replies: "Do thou but think upon it only after hearing the 584 counsel of your younger brothers!" It is noteworthy, also, 583 that the role of the mother, despite the fact that women generally /272/ do not participate in community affairs, is 584 so smaller in matrimonial affairs than that of the father.
"Pah, however, is the case only on Sakhalin; on the Amur the wishes of the bride are not considered, although the negotiations are conducted in the presence of the maiden, who sits silently in her accustomed place among the trunks with her dowry and awaits the decision concerning her fate.
Ordinarily her role begins when the matter has already been decided, and it only remains for her to submit. And if she does not have a lover to whom she has promised herself, and if the bridegroom is more or less attractive in appearance, she ordinarily tosses off the laconic phrase; "Since you wish this, is it for me to contradict" But it may happen that the maiden,
upon the appearance of the matchmakers with the bridegroom, immediately runs out and does not return until the departure of the matchmakers, and then the matter frequently ends in naught (1). The bride, however, appears on the scene at the /171/ 1. It is interesting to note that among the Negda, whose customs, as a result of ancient matrimonial ties, are as a rule similar to those of the Gilyak, considerable differences were noticed by me.

X1.

Miscellanea

823 The cliff Uj-pame, in the form of an isolated stone pillar, is between Khes' and Chil'mil. Formerly one could hear how the 782 master of the cliff beat on a tambourine. Those times (a year) they made sacrifices to him and addressed to him the request:
"Pâhys'kyr ururungid! -- do good for us with your risk!"

During a ptiâ-dakh (smallpox epidemic) they bring firewood and water to the sick, but do not themselves enter the house.

When they learn that it is all over in all the settlements (i.e., the epidemic is over), then the dead are taken out of their graves and burned; they are afraid of burning them earlier for they believe that smoke spreads infection. The only thing that is allowed is the smoking with marsh tea in the yurt.

The female Chariaht. Proverbs: 1) The female character is like a whirlwind, similar to the wind. 2) With just a tug you will change the female character. 3) A woman is like a fire started in a clear field; the wind blows and it is out.

Meryachen'e. In Charbakh two people suffer from the disease meryachen'e -- two women; this sickness is inherited in the female line. Those who suffer from meryachen'e repeat literally everything, even in a foreign language; they repeat even actions. The attacks come during a fright. The sick seem as then unconscious, but later she comes to. If attempts are made to compel her to repeat something many times, she is ready to attack with a knife. In their yeuth they did not suffer from meryachen'e.

There are other such sick people in Tymvo and Prongs.

/323 cont./

756 When shamani fight, the one who hat more souls wins. The 757 killing of one shaman by another is accompanied by the acquisition 758 of the pallet of the opponent. During his supposed death, the soul 759 (578) of the shaman travels over islands of the sea (tul). On these islands, which are of various colors, the houses are of stone tul-kekhin. Sometimes his soul goes into the mountains to the abode of pal-kekhin. The shaman kekhin feats only Pal milk and Tol milk, but not the milk of sables, foxes, otters, and rats (1).

1. Concerning the rat, see Chapter VII, "Miscellanea." S. Sh.

Among the kekhin there are variously colored eared seals, iron trout, and tigers.

762 They bring an shaman Chomkir resurrected a woman (the settlement of 763 (529) Bykovskoye). A husband and a wife were fishing. The wife fell sick and died before morning. The husband said: "All you shamans are deceiving me. Now my wife is dead. Well, make her live!" The shaman became angry and said: "I shall shamanize all night;
if before morning she moves her left little finger, she will live."
That is what happened.

756 A shaman stabbed himself and shot himself in the mouth, and "nothing."

A female shaman has more spirits than a male shaman.
764 She kills her shaman competitor, sending her kekhn to rub her 765 competitor's eyes with the menstrual blood of shankh-chokh. A 766 feature of this blood is that a drop in food makes a person waste 767 (530) away. Copulation during the menstrual flow also leads to local 768 (532) ataxia.

The kamlanie of a female shaman, who, according to her own words, was midwifed (mad) after the birth of her first daughter, 769 (158) consists in her taking off her dress, breast, and belt and so forth with marsh tea, lighted it on the hearth, and warmed her tambourine... Then she bound her legs and arms with shavings and girdled herself with shavings.. she yawned. Moderate blows...
The sounds grew stronger. She sighed loudly and whispered. She

/354 cont./

614 5. The members of the clan are bound together by common 615 (617) sacrifices and festivals. The "festival of the bear," known to everybody, is held, not by an individual settlement, but by the clan, even though /355/ guests from other clans are invited to take part. The bear is bought by someone in the clan, but all the expenditures in connection with the festival are covered by the clansmen. These expenses often reach a sum of several hundred rubles.
Clansmen assemble from all parts of the island, and as great numbers of specially invited guests from other clans, who have to be entertained and fed for many days, and not only they, but their numerous dogs as well, devour a great amount of food during the festival. The opinion that the bear festival has a religious character or that the bear is considered to be divine or a spirit by the Gilyak is completely unfounded. The bear festival is purely a (621) clan festival. Naturally, there were times when a successful attack on a bear, an attack conducted in those days collectively, by the whole clan, was a real triumph for the clan, which devoured the huge beast at a common feast. Since the attack on the bear was most conveniently made in winter when the sleeping animal was captured in his lair, the custom of celebrating this holiday in winter was perpetuated. The experience of centuries had led a full ritual for the festival, which, like everything old, assumes in the eyes of the barbarian the character of something sacred and inviolable.
(622) All the sacrifices during the festival are made, not to the bear, but to the "master" of the taiga, the master of the bear - "Pal'-nivukh."
It is also understandable that the bear itself has acquired a position of honor: Its meat cannot be thrown to the dogs, it cannot be eaten with seasonings, etc. "Pal'-nivukh" himself will exact revenge for such offenses, ordering other bears to bite especially (642) hard. To sum up, the bear festival is a clan festival, and, on this basis, women, as the nonpermanent element of the clan, are not present at the killing of the bear, although they participate in the eating of it. The fire in the stove in which the meat of the bear is cooked is started only by the clan (252) steel. A touching custom among the Gilyak is /355 cont./ A touching custom among the Gilyak S connected with the bear. When a clan is divided and part of it emigrates to another place, the elder in the clan (khal'-geymar) breaks off a half of the steel and hands it over to the elder among the departing clansmen. With this steel the settlers will light the fire on a new hearth at the bear festival, and it will be handed from clan to clan for the same purpose. Hence the expression "to break the fire" came to signify the separation of the clan. This custom reminds us of Greece, where those leaving their native land to found new colonies used to take with them the sacred fire of the home altar.

Another clan festival is held in the spring before the hunting of the seal. On this occasion, too, the sacrifice of the refreshments are borne by the /356/ clan. With the approach of even-(642) ing, when the moon rises, the entire male population of the clan (again the women are excluded) goes to the seashore. Here, in long rough lines, are placed all the choicest viands which, carefully prepared, had been left untouched for the moment of the sacrifice.
Then all those present squat down and each throws into the sea a handful from each trough as a sacrifice to the deity, pronouncing the customary formula of prayer: "Kur nionga-khlar" ("God, please!"), after which they gather in one yurt, where the refreshments begin, in which the women take part.

6. The khal' guarantees life and security to each of its members from encroachment on him by the individuals of another khal'. The means in clan vengeance.

The settling of Russians in the region, it is true, has weakened considerably the efficacy of this institution, but has not destroyed it. Every murder, intentional or unintentional, calls for clan vengeance. The closest clansmen of the murdered man -- his father, son, or brother, and in their absence his other clansmen -- must, in the figurative expression of the Gilyak, "raise up the kindred bones" (nyn'ro yeeynedeh). I.e., kill the murderer, or at least some person of the same sex of his khal'. And the wrath of vengeance is so great that not even newborn children are spared. I have heard that the unhappy mothers of such children, out of fear of the avenger, have resorted to every means to mask the sex of the newborn child. Only women are excluded from acts of vengeance. It is understandable that from the first moment of the murder there begins a painful, burdensome period for both clans. The clan of the murderer lives under a true sword of Damocles, awaiting a stroke from any corner, at any time, and in any place. The clan of the slain man feverishly tracks down its victim, who is on the lookout and in any case does not intend to give up his life cheaply. At the same time, in the first minutes immediately after the fateful murder, the clan of the murderer, from a neutral khal' becomes his wife, takes her back neutral; a clansman would be killed) to the clan of the murdered man with apologies and an offer of ransom. But not always, and in any case not speedily, is accord obtained; sometimes years pass until, by way of the unsuccessful hunt, the clan of the avenger consents to a reconciliation.

/356 cont./

I shall describe one of the many variants of the procedure for 614 reconciliation and ransom. Each of the hostile clans selects from 615 its members a special khlay-nivukh ("khlay-nivukh" -- literally: orator -- from the verb "khlayndzh" -- to speak, and 616 the noun "nivukh" -- man). These will be the intermediaries be-
(642) tween the parties. Each clan provides in khlay-nivukh with a silk lasso, a cup of the same material, a tobacco pouch, a spear, and sometimes a Japanese saber. This is, so to speak, the official uniform of the intermediaries. One fine day, an armed deputation of khal'-nivukhi (clansmen), with the avenger and the khlay-(642) nivukh at their head, appears near the quarters of the murderer. Then, somewhere in the nearby taiga or on the bank of some stream, the new arrivals light a fire and, so to speak, make their camp. From here the khlay-nivukh of the avengers sets out for the village of the murderer, where in one yurt his assembled clansmen khal'- nivukhi), with their orator at their head, await the emissary. The latter, having sat down and lighted his pipe (necessarily with his own flame), begins to set forth the demands for ransom. The role of the khlay-nivukh consists of stipulating as much as possible.
The clansmen of the murderer reply with excuses and with a plea for a reduction of the conditions of the ransom. But the khlay-nivukh

/374 cont./

583 in the event of the dissolution of the marriage, takes it back. It is inalienable during the life of the wife and is customarily burned with her on her funeral pyre. This form of the dowry confirms Ziber's (Sieber?) view of the dowry in primitive societies as a present to the bride.

585 Marriage is effected among the Gilyak without any ceremonies. A feast is held, of course, upon the departure of the bride and upon her arrival at the home of the bridegroom, but 583 nothing more. The marriage is as easily dissolved as it is con-583 cluded. The husband can, if disappointed in his wife, take her back to her father and gets his bride price back. Similarly, the father, dissatisfied with the position of his daughter in the new family or /376/ the incomplete fulfillment of the conditions of payment by the son-in-law, can take his daughter back, returning the bride price.
In general, the method for peacefully acquiring a wife among the Gilyak falls entirely under the "purchase-sale" agreement, with its accompanying "rectification," etc. I have seen how one 583 middle-aged Gilyak, a widow and disappointed in his third wife, sold her (with her consent) to another Gilyak for a small compensation.

But in spite of the character of this acquisition of a wife, (642) and despite the fact that the bridegroom, a young man, and 584 required, but is not even asked, nevertheless the position of women is in general not as bad as it may appear. It is required of her that she be industrious and thrifty. Much, in fact, is required of her.
The clansmen of her husband appear near the quarry of fish, which, somewhere in the nearby taiga or on the bank of some stream, the new arrivals light a fire and, so to speak, make their camp. From months thereafter she ties enormous nets, utilizing for this purpose every free minute. She sews clothes for the entire family, and on her lies the entire burden of the Gilyak kitchen and the feeding of the dogs. It is she who, for whole days on end, gathers saranu, berries and roots which constitute the daily diet of the Gilyak during the whole year. Finally, she has the whole burden and care of feeding the numerous guests who arrive and stay for weeks, while ooo her husband leaves to pay visits and enjoys his winter rest. Yet,

/373 cont./ YeT

/374 cont./

562 loaded down with work as she is, sometimes profoundly unfortunate, with an aged and blind husband, purchased and sold, she is 583 nevertheless not a slave. She is not shut up, as in the East; she 584 eats at the same table with her husband and children, she participates in the conversation, and she is treated with respect as a wife and mother. The children treat her with respect. They are ready (765) to exact vengeance for her. When she dies, they will cremate her with the same solemnity as her husband; as a sign of mourning they will undo their braids, not infrequently for life, and an occasional inconsolable husband will lay violent hands on himself out of grief for his wife. Although married, she does not sever her ties with her former family and clan. She, along with her (574) husband and children, visits them frequently, and in a year of misfortune she and her husband and children will find assistance and a hearty welcome there. If her husband should offend her without cause, she will find protection in the family of her father, and true protection: they will return the bride price and take her back.

515 Polygamy is found to a limited extent. The causes of polygamy lie in part in the above-mentioned complete equality (589) brothers. It is not by chance that there are so many bachelors among the Gilyak. /375/ frequently without special reasons, such as poverty, etc. Then, again, barren wives, as well as the desire to have a young healthy worker in his old age, impel the Gilyak to provide himself with two or three wives, whom he gradually acquires. It is noteworthy that in the settlements closest to the Aleksandrovsk post, even in such a large settlement as Arkyym, I did not encounter a single case of polygamy.

595 This is explained, of course, by the influence of the Rus-(597) sians. Polygamy often produces quarrels between wives, and the husband, of course, most frequently takes the side of the favorite wife, yet that division into lawful wives and concubines, as in the Eastern harems, does not exist among the Gilyak.

831 Two words concerning sexual morality. In their talk the Gilyak are not very irreproachable. Young maidens allow themselves to use words and expressions that are not tolerated by the

/633 cont./

583 It is to be seen in part from the preceding that the custom 584 of wife purchase has, on the whole, a beneficial influence upon a primitive people. Even though, to our minds, it involves an in-
(642) sulting disregard for human dignity and the personal rights of the woman, /634/ in that, in relation to the man, it makes her simply a commodity, nevertheless it exerts some moral pressure upon the men. For, above all, it forces them, through activity and industry, to acquire the means to buy a wife and to found a household of their own, and thus it puts an effective curb on premarital marriages, as we have seen, through the influence of material obstacles that it puts in the way of polygamy, it promotes monogamy. And, finally, it provides the wife with both a guarantee of good treatment on the part of her parents, for a well-fed and well-supported girl can be married off more easily and at a higher price, and, in particular, some protection against rough mistreatment on the part of the husband, for what is bought with difficulty and at some expense is as a rule, among primitive people in particular, more highly prized and better cared for than that which is attained without effort and for a low price or even as a gift. Thus, among primitive peoples, the bride price to (642) a certain extent constitutes a corrective for their lack of esteem and spiritual appreciation of the wife, and the higher it is, the greater its effect is bound to be, and the more favorable the prognosis for the marital and family relations of the people concerned. To what extent this may be true among the Gilyak, beyond our above-mentioned prevalence of monogamy among them, we shall have occasion to learn from the following observations.

583 On the other hand, it cannot be denied that the higher the bride price, the greater the temptation for poor but enterprising young men to avoid paying it and to gain possession of a wife by a ruse or force. Indeed, among the Gilyak the abduction of women is by no means rare. According to their own statements, it almost always takes place by prearrangement between the parties, the abductor and the one to be abducted. In order to carry it out, the man appears, as if by chance, in the house

/638 cont./

834 The moral austerity of the Gilyak also appears in the 834 altogether decent behavior of the two sexes toward each other and in their women and girls. Some women, in the modesty of them in their houses never sees indecent physical exposure, such as occurs so frequently among the Ainu (2), or any other (18)

2. N. Buse, Ostr. Sakhalin" i Eksped.
1853-54 gg. /Sakhalin Island and the Expedition of 1853-54/, St. Peterb., 1872, pp. 55, 56, 70.

537 shocking scenes. Violation of chastity, particularly among 837 unmarried persons, are, of course, not impossible, but are 837 most severely censured by the parents of the girl who has 844 been seduced and has given birth to a child. According to the Gilyak, in such a case the girl's mother metes out corporal punishment to her daughter, while the father tries to eliminate the scandal by killing the newborn child and (642) secretly doing away with it. This is always done if the child is a girl, whereas a boy is shown mercy in certain circumstances, and the girl's chances suffer less in this case.

837 Although contracted by purchase, and in part because 537 of this, and in clear contrast to what has been said, the relations
(583) of the Gilyak usually take a happy or at least a satisfactory (583) course. Marital fidelity is strictly observed. The husband jealously guards the fidelity of his wife, especially while he is young. It is considered a disgrace for a married woman her husband cause for mistrust and suspicion and arousing his 586 anger. One very salutary influence checking and curbing the passions on both sides is the circumstance that the husband if he casts out his wife for any reason and returns her to her parents does not by any means thereby gain any right to a refund of the articles paid for her, and that, on the other hand, he may claim such a refund if the wife leaves him on her own accord. In this case she may by no means count on a friendly reception by her parents. Therefore, simply for

/652 cont./

567 Thus, an attitude toward the slaves similar to that among the 171 Gilyak seems to exist among the Chukchee, and in this attitude, as in the motives for it, the more intense national consciousness and sense of freedom, there is a parallel between these two peoples similar to the one discussed above (p. 961) in their enterprising genius for trade and their extensive trade activity.

428 The law of inheritance existing among them gives us further insight into the family relations of the Gilyak. After
● 562 what has been said above about marriage, it is almost self-evident that it is concerned solely with the male members of the family, while the female members are not only left empty-handed, but even treated as objects of the estate. The first and, [601] if there are any, only heirs of a Gilyak are his sons, and, to be sure, the property of the father is inherited by them in equal shares, regardless of the order of seniority -- a custom which is all the more remarkable since the Gilyak language has a special term (ykkyn) for the oldest brother in contrast to the younger one (atschek). The wife and the daughters, whether married or unmarried, have no share in the inheritance. The former, if, be-[768] cause of her age, there is no chance of her remarrying, is taken [583] care of by her sons; the married daughters have entered other family circles, after they have increased their brother's inheritance by the bride price paid to their father for them, and the unmarried daughters become the property of their brothers and, if a suitor is found, must be purchased from them, and the bride price is shared equally among them. If one of the brothers dies unmarried, the other, surviving brothers inherit from him, again in equal shares. The same thing happens when from among several sons of a Gilyak, who have become independent, one dies unmarried while his father is still alive; the latter receives nothing, because under no circumstances may a father inherit from his son.

428 The law of inheritance is different if one of several brothers 587 dies and he was married and leaves behind a wife or perhaps wife and child, especially minor daughters and sons. If only a widow survives, she, along with all that she and her husband had, goes to the next brother of her deceased husband, and, to be sure, as a wife, regardless of whether the latter is still unmarried or already

/654 cont./

614 mentioned (1), and differently than among a number of other

1. See p. 1035, above.

peoples, members of one and the same kall may marry each other.
● 562 From the description of the Gilyak law of inheritance it became 428 evident how greatly the male sex is favored over the female sex among them and given preference over it. According to this description the woman not only has no right to an inheritance, but is herself inherited, first, as a girl, from the father to the brothers, and then, as a widow, to the next brother of her deceased husband, so that she can never make arrangements for [592] herself. The only thing left for her is to establish for herself, as a wife and mother and through the means and talents given her by nature, an influential and recognized position in the house, and among the Gilyak she succeeds in this to a not inconsiderable degree.

171 A law of inheritance very similar to the one among the 428 Gilyak is found in the case of another Paleo-Asiatic people, the nomadic Koryak, whose chief possessions consist of their reindeer herds. According to Ditmar (2), among them, too, only the sons inherit the property of the father, and, to be sure, in equal shares, but the daughters receive only those reindeer which have come from the animals presented to them when they were born. Furthermore, among them, too, upon the death of an unmarried brother, 171 the surviving brothers share equally what he left. But if the de-587 ceased was married and leaves a widow, she goes to his youngest 428 brother as a wife, if he is unmarried or a widower, and, if this is not the case, to the second youngest, the third youngest, and so forth, always under the same conditions. On the other hand, she may never become the wife of an older or already married brother of her deceased husband. Hence, if among her wooden bowls, or, more correctly, large plates (Gilyak aamngir) (1), were filled with a dish which consisted of cooked beans,

2. Bull. de la cl. hist.-phil. de l'Acad. Imp. des sc. de St. Pétersb., Vol. XIII, p. 125; Mél. russes tirés du Bull., Vol. III, p. 33.

/721 cont./

1. See p. 683 above.

a kind of groats, fish oil or seal oil, and chopped leeks, and the serving of which was done with the greatest formality. At each side of the étagère a man was busy lifting one plate after another from the floor and bringing it to the server of the food, who sat on a sled in the front part of the yurt. The latter, with a large hemispherical iron ladle (Plate XXXIII /p. 1013 /, Fig. 5), scooped the aforementioned mush from a trough and served it on the plates which were then immediately taken back again to their places. This was repeated three times with each plate, whereupon the server got up, stepped up to each plate, and added some mush and a piece of frozen sturgeon to the already huge portions. From each side two men now stepped forward to the row of plates, placed a decoratively carved spoon in each of them, and handed them to the guests, one plate to each one, beginning with the two sitting in the middle of the bench and going from there to the ends. What was left over from the superhuman portions was poured back into a trough. The women were totally excluded from the feast; indeed, none of them was even present during it. Everyone then rose from his seat, the plates were taken to the other house where the medium-sized bear was displayed, and an identical meal took place there. In both cases, however, this was only a meal in advance of the actual feast, for no bear meat or fat had yet been consumed, and this would not take place until the following day.

This day (January 31) began in much the same way as the previous ones, with the cutting up of the bear meat and fat in the presence of the bears' heads. Numerous guests had already appeared early in the forenoon. They were put on the bench of honor behind the bear rack without further ado and, strangely enough, were fed without all the ceremony that had been observed so strictly the day before: each guest was given a fir branch and

576 /721 cont./

*796 on it raw and cooked bear-meat and several strips of bear fat, as 574 well as a small heap of fine wood-shavings (zach). This was the 262 first bear meat that was eaten. The portions were very ample, and

[562] gradually everybody present in the house or newly arrived partici-

[855] pated in the meal; indeed, even the women and children re-

[415] ceived their share of it, in that a few young people walked among the diners with bowls of a special shape (Pl. L /p. 1250 /, Fig. 5, and Pl. LI /p. 1251 /, Fig. 1-- called ans-tymyk (2) in Gilyak)

[104] 2. The s in this word is to be pronounced soft, like the French z. The bowl is called ans-tymyk because of its similarity to a hand (tymyk).

and collected contributions to be divided among the women and children. The quantity of bear meat and fat consumed that day was therefore very great. What was left over of the portions /722/ that the guests had, they wrapped up in the fine wood-shavings and fir branches and took home -- a package that the Gilyak are said to call möps (1).

[114] 1. A designation which I myself did not hear.

The gnawed bones, on the other hand, were put back into the kettle from which the cooked meat had been distributed. As the meal came to a close, an old man with a fir branch in his hand stationed himself at the door of the house and, gently striking each one, drove out everyone passing through it who had eaten bear meat and fat -- an act which was supposed to be a sort of punishment for the misdeed committed against the bear. Once

[859] outside, however, those who came out were less gently treated,

[533] for here they were greeted with a cross fire of snowballs with which the boys pelted them, while the women drummed vigor-

[184] ously on the suspended beams. An identical meal with a similar aftermath also took place in the house where the owner of the third bear lived. Here, too, just as before, quantities of small individual heaps of food -- sturgeon, mossj, etc. -- were put out

/722 cont./

796 in the snow on either side of the path in front of the house for 574 departing guests, to be taken along by those driving by -- only

262 bear meat and fat were missing, for they had already received 576 in their möps as provisions for the trip.

*796 Because of the feast, the feeding of the dogs and the d

53 races did not take place until shortly before noon. In the after 562 however, for the first and only time the women actively partic

171 pated in the festive entertainments, in that they executed a da to the drum music which resounded in a very strange and wild rhythm. At any one time only one dancer was in motion, hold in her hands either fir branches or castanet-like wooden clappe and the dance actually consisted of only the craziest postures a contortions of the upper body in relation to the lower part. It vividly reminded Ditmar of the bear dance of the Kamchatka women, and even the music was similar, except that here it w drummed, likewise by women, on a swinging beam with cudge and sticks, whereas in Kamchatka the dancers and the spectato 796 jointly sing. Incidentally, I must note that such an outburst of 562 merriment among the Gilyak women is probably very rare, bec

157 in general they are even more serious and sedate than the men and are always much busier than the latter at all sorts of work

[203] activities. And it could by no means have been the result of h spirits induced by liquor, for this is, or was at the time of my among the Gilyak, absolutely prohibited during the bear festiv a measure, as has been mentioned (2), prompted by cool reaso

2. See p. 719 above.

796 and evidence of their great strength of character. Another fac

756 much more surprising and much more difficult to explain, nam that no shamanistic activities are permitted in a house where a bear festival is being celebrated. The reason for this may be t in the eyes of he Gilyak the uncanny art of the shaman would disturb the festive mood and, through the power that it exerts the spirit world as well as over the human spirit, would cause bewilderment and misfortune among the participants in the fes ring her own health and that of the child. The force of tradition was g that even in 1932 some of the women stubbornly refused to have bies in hospitals, despite the good care and the free clothing and which were given to the infants. It was only after wide medical- nal work that women began to turn to maternity hospitals. The new nding of the role and importance of medical institutions has also y Nivkhi women to go to work in them as attendants and later as educated at the medical school in Nikolayevsk-on-the-Amur.

y the Nivkhi woman manages her own life and does not enter into marriage. Polygamy, the levirate and remnants of the old group ge have become things of the past.

177 648 567

116, 372, 462, 562

"We have already seen how sacred the hearth is to the Gilyak, and in the rites adopted at the lying-in-state of a deceased woman, her intimate relation and duty towards Tur ni vookh, the god of fire. [LSS: See category 116, pp. 242ff.] Even as the fire is her rightful domain, so is the cauldron her special care, and [271] hers alone; not even her daughters may interfere in this her private and sacred sphere. She alone has the right of putting on the cauldron; this is her right as hostess. Whatever the putting of the feet into the cauldrons may symbolize, the fact that the bride does it to both the maternal and the new one evidently witnesses for the first time to her equality with her mother, her rightful position as a hausfrau and head of her own domestic establishment. Henceforth her status is also guaranteed among her husband's kindred."

13: Seeland--29 E-5 (no date) 1882 Gilyak

58 years in her parental home. At what time such married couples actually enter the marital state is difficult to say. Probably, however, it is determined by the awakening sex 582 impulse. The Gilyak believe that a 30-year-old man (which means a 15-year-old, because the Gilyak's year corresponds to our half year) can marry. However, this is also only an approximation, for they do not actually count their years. A merchant who for a long time associated with the Gilyak and who had a good memory and a gift of observation, told me that he knew of two married couples, the partners of which he had known since childhood. The woman of one of them had a child at the age of 15, the other woman was 20 years old and complained that her husband who was 14 was not yet a man. I, too, was shown 15-year-old boys with half child-like features and narrow shoulders and was told that they could marry if they found a bride. We may conclude that marriage is permissible during puberty, but actually this does not often occur. At least among men there are not infrequent examples of mature individuals (around 23 -25 years old) who are still unmarried. Cases where the woman is older are rare, but the opposite often occurs. In fact, some mature men take four or five-year-old girls and rear them until they reach womanhood.

As far as marriage between close relatives is concerned, it is known that cousins marry, but that the older generation does not favor this; thus these people must also have had experiences pertaining to the harmfulness of such marriages. An uncle may be permitted to marry his niece. [127]

586 Women are in general well treated by men, partly because 595 the Gilyak customs bear the mark of instinctive humanity, 562 party because divorce is very easy. The wife of a tyrannical husband will soon be abducted by an admirer who usually settles with the husband for the payment of kalym. It happens now and then that a well-to-do man has several wives, but only lives with his favorite one and keeps the others as workers. Soon, however, this leads to quarrels, and the neglected ones make an effort to get out of the situation. In all other respects, however, even such workers are well treated, especially because they are needed. As long as a woman can work, and particularly if she is skillful at needle work, she can always find a husband.

562 In general one may conclude that, theoretically, the Gilyak 587 woman seems to be regarded as somewhat inferior to the man, but actually this has no practical effects; on the contrary, the opposite is often the case. The inferiority of women is reflected in the payment of kalym, which is

13: Seeland--30 E-5 (no date) 1882 Gilyak

562 really a sort of purchase. Moreover, the widow is in a 587 manner of speaking inherited by the brother or other close relative of the deceased. But this inheritance is more a matter of habit; if the widow wishes to marry another, she may do so, but he must pay back the kalym. The woman also does not take part in the more important councils. On the other hand, she may occupy an independent and respected position; she can, for instance, become a shaman. She may have her own money and inherit, although usually less than her brothers. If a widow does not wish to marry at all any more, she is not only permitted to do as she wishes, but even wins respect thereby.

584 In the case of a girl given in marriage by her parents, 557 their wishes are usually the determining factor, and the wealthy 562 man is favored. But even though the girl's taste is not particularly considered, there are usually no unfavorable consequences, because, as we said, if a woman is ill-treated she lets herself be abducted by an admirer. In ordinary affairs, the woman shows subservience to the man; in her sphere she is entirely independent and in the family council her opinion counts for no less than that of her husband.

832 The forms of greeting and manifestations of affection be-576 tween man and [128] woman are very primitive and austere, as is 593 the case in general among the Gilyak. Kissing and handshaking are done only on special occasions, of which we shall speak later. Men and women very seldom kiss; even when the man takes leave or returns from a journey there is no embrace, no kiss, and no handshake, only good wishes are exchanged and even these are rather cool. However, there are other forms of caresses, which will hardly find approval. In tender moments, the woman looks for lice in the man's hair and cracks the game thus hunted between her teeth. Sometimes, the reverse occurs, and the man does it to his lady. Another expression of tenderness consists in washing each other's face with saliva.

578 The abduction of a woman always occurs with her full con-
586 sent. During the absence of the husband, the admirer suddenly appears with some companions, the lady is set in the sled or in the boat, and the party disappears. However, some men do not so easily submit to their fate, they pursue the abducted woman and attempt to win possession of her once more by means of cunning or even force. Some men seek revenge, and the result is a struggle and even death, but this is unusual. Quarrels among the Gilyak usually stem from some such causes. If the run-away couple succeed in hiding

Gilyak-1- 2

S: A small Russian steamer a convict) were making the ation of the poor is fishing, no lagocephalus) and shad n the fact that the prices fixed mon, [62] say eighteen pounds, f the natives and poor hich will not grow in attributed the leprosy among ccommodation for these led, but now there is a propolaevsk. So plentiful are the banks; but on the journey ed to be to build a wattle-surface of the water. At the owded as they hurried round vith its living freight, when nge, seine-nets were being ive village of Pronge is really t the mouth of the Amur, but

9: Hawes--61-63 T-3 (1901) 1903 Gilyak-2 116, 563

the temporary Russian fishing settlement is situated on the right or southern bank of the river just before one reaches the headland. Our little vessel threaded its way very gingerly between the sandbanks and shoals, past the batteries, and then by miles of forest-clad slopes, the home of the bear and reindeer, to the little settlement where the great river broadens out until it is eight miles wide from head to head.

A few log-huts, and a native shelter or two of pine-branches, and a wooden jetty in embryo, told of our arrival at the curing-station. Until then, I had thought our crew were a rough lot, but they were quiet and respectable compared with the ex-convicts on shore. Several boarded our vessel, and three of them burst into my cabin, but satisfied [63] themselves with staring long at me as though I were a strange new animal, and departed.

On shore we found them busily cutting up and cleaning the salmon before plunging them into the pickling vats. Most of this salted salmon goes to supply Eastern Siberia, the emigrant population, and the convicts, and some is exported to Japan in casks."

9: Hawes--76 [2] T-3 (1901) 1903
116, 563

"At De Castries, a beautiful natural harbour opens out to the v lets, Observatory Island and Basalt Island, reposing in the smoo was discovered and named by La Pérouse in 1787. There is a sm consisting of the dwellings of a telegraph chief, his assistants, a the cable to Sakhalin crosses from this point. (1)

1. This cable, which was broken in June, 1901, has now been and a fresh one laid between Capes Lazarev and Pogobi. The be maintained at De Castries, because it has communication with Vladivostok, and is the only safe haven for ships passing the Straits of Tartary."

15: Pilsudski--1 E-5 (1895-1905) 1910 Gilyak

844 Pregnancy, Childbirth and Miscarriage among the 753 Inhabitants of Sakhalin Island (Gilyak and Ainu).
343 by Bronislaw Pilsudski

I. The Gilyak

The house of birth.

Among the Gilyak the act of birth is considered unclean and therefore is never allowed to take place in the yurt, their home. That is why not only in summer, but even in winter during the worst periods of frost and snowstorms, the woman in labor is led to a hut built especially for her near the home. The choice of the place makes it clear that the Gilyak feel no respect for the act of birth, for the hut mentioned above is built in the bushes which serve as a privy for the 562 women. The location of these bushes is always 841 definitely fixed, and no man would ever walk in that 753 direction. The boys are strictly forbidden to run or to look around there, and they are warned that they will contract a disease called taremynd if they step into a trace of women's blood. The disease begins with a paralysis of the hands and feet, the afflicted person loses the ability to move, loses weight and finally dies, for the disease is incurable.

844 As soon as the labor pains start the woman is 183 brought into the lan-raf or the "house of birth". This "house of birth" is erected hurriedly at the very last moment. Built of wooden boards roughly put together and covered with old bark from fir trees, it looks more like a dog house than like the room destined to welcome a new inhabitant of the world longingly expected by his parents. In the eyes of the Gilyak there is no conflict between the affection and love of the parents for the newly born child and the severe, if not cruel welcome, it is given. The child will go through a hard, more than Spartan education, and its life will be full of worries and hardships in a neither opulent nor gentle nature. This is why no Gilyak even comes to think that the first entrance into the world might be easier and more wholesome for the little guest if it took place in the presence of other people under other and better circumstances.

Gilyak

iew with a couple of is-th water. This haven nall Russian post here, nd a few soldiers, for abandoned, post is to by telegraph through

563

563 ETHNIC STRATIFICATION--alien and immigrant subgroups; racial and national minorities; cultural differences between and characteristics of ethnic and minority groups; social and political status of ethnic subgroups; race prejudice and discrimination; assimilation and irredentism; extent of intermarriage; race crossing and amalgamation; racial hybrids and their status; etc. See also:

Racial affinities 144
Ethic composition of the population 162 Immigration 167
Acculturation 177
Degree of subcultural differentiation 184
Ethnocentrism 186
Ingroup antagonisms 578 Naturalization 641
Reservations 687
Religious persecutions 798
Race theories 829

1: Shternberg--209 E-5 (1890-1897, 1910)1933 RX2 Gilyak RX2

/139 cont./ Every Gilyak, man and woman, *601 uses one and the same term for "mother" (ymk and synonyms), [184] not only for his own mother, but also for the following groups of persons: 1) all the "sisters" /140/ (female tuvn) of his mother; 2) all the wives of the "brothers" of his father (1);

[199] 1. The sole exception that I found during [563] the time of the census in the settlement of Kol' was one case in which the wife of the older brother of the father is called by the Tungus term yvej, which is explained by the presence in the settlement of persons of Tungus origin.

3) all the wives of his father, i.e., his stepmothers; 4) outside the clan: all the "sisters" of persons of the akhmalk class (concerning this, see below).

[197] The class of "wives" within the clan. The designation most in [184] use for wife in both dialects is an'kh, an'g:ej. Within the clan [614] the Gilyak gives this name, not only to his official wife, but also to all her "sisters" (i.e., female tuvn), to the wives of all his elder "brothers" (i.e., aki), and, finally, to all the sisters of the wives of these last. To the wives of the class of younger "brothers" (as'kh) the Gilyak gives the name of jokho, jokh /see yokh, p. 76/, the same term which the father-in-law or mother-in-law applies to his or her daughter-in-law /nevestka, "daughter-in-law" or "sister-in-law" in Russian/. Only an insignificant [171] number of Gilyak on the Amur, due to their proximity to the Olcha, took from the latter the special designation ivy for the wives of all brothers without distinction (2).

2. Among the Olcha, a man calls the wife of his older brother yvy.

It is especially characteristic that "wives" of the tuvn class, no matter who they may be by origin, call one another "sister" (tuvn), and, depending on the age of their husbands, one calls

1: Shternberg--298 E-5 (1890-1897, 1910)1933 RX2 G

/202 cont./

*174 As we have seen, the Gilyak were also furnished 177 wives by the Chinese; they, just like the Ainu, furni [221] them with slaves. Some influence was also exerted b [437] seasonal trade and hunting expeditions to the territory [439] neighboring peoples. The Amur Gilyak often went in Ainu territory for years on hunting expeditions or for p of trade and frequently brought Ainu women back to t [563] homeland. Conversely, representatives of the Tungus or Ainu settled among the Gilyak and entered into ma relations with them or carried off their women. And these cases might be isolated, nevertheless they could be without influence.

*174 A quite specific influence in the economic sphere 177 been exerted by communication with cultured peoples 556 the encounters with the Chinese and the Russians there stimulus for the accumulation of riches. Until then th were only objects of consumption. No one accumula them, and the highest ambition of a more capable or [439] ful man was to share his acquisitions with others. Tra the Chinese created the stimulus for accumulation.
appeared new valuables which it was impossible to co but which they began to value, which were profitable accumulate. There appeared rich men, fortunate pos of valuables, and others who did not have them and w to possess them. In rich men there was born a conscio of their wealth and their importance, and together wi the ambition to become related to their equals. Amo [583] poor people there arose the temptation to make the m of their daughters a source of the acquisition of valuat
The old form of the obligatory marriage, where the w was given without a bride price, became unprofitable, with the slightest loophole everyone /203/ tried to cir [581] the old imperative. Finally, the phenomenon of the tution of wealth strengthened the institution of individ marriage. The custom of brothers' living together wit

9: Hawes--84-85 T-3 (1901) 1903 Gilyak-1-2 116, 563

"The town of Alexandrovsk, or rather Post Alexandrovskiy, as it is called, for it has no municipal authority, and comprises a population of only 6000, lies mainly in a hollow at the foot of the mountains, worn by the two streams, the Great and the Little Alexandrovka rivers, which here break the line of sea-cliff for about half a mile. Marshy land stretches between the town and the sea. Two principal streets cross at right angles in the centre of the town, one containing the church, the chief officials' houses and the post-office and leading to the bazar or market, and the other, beginning on the hill slopes, continues past the prison down to the jetty.

Though the former street is wide and planted in part with young trees, the log buildings give it a dingy and sombre look. These two streets boast plank 'street walks,' which the foot passenger does well to avoid at night, owing to the occasional absence of a plank. Outside of these two streets the rest are tracks, wide and grassy, as in all Russian villages, with ditches on either side. The laying out of the place resembles that of a poor far-west American township. Each hut, with its small windows, [85] looking as if it feared either robbers or the cold hand of Jack Frost, had a tiny yard fenced in with a shed forming two sides of the square. In late autumn this little court would be scantily roofed with pine-branches to catch the snow and form a warm covering.

The 6000 inhabitants of Alexandrovsk consist of convicts and ex-convicts, their wives and children, and officials and their families. Besides these there are probably not a dozen free-born individuals, whose business here is that of merchants' agents, etc.

Olcha

/722 cont./

It would therefore also be prohibited for the women, however, /723/ who are likewise able to practice this art, because they might easily misuse it simply out of revenge for their exclusion from the festive meals as a matter of principle.

The bear festivals have no definite duration: the feasting goes on, with a constant rotation of the participants, relatives, friends, villagers, and other guests as long as the quantity of bear meat and fat lasts. In Tebach, Judin told his guests, Ditmar and Brevern, that it would last for many days since three bears had been killed. When, therefore, on the following day (February 1/13) the proceedings of the festival in fact began to be repeated in exactly the same way, they left this village and returned to Nikolayevsk.

As was mentioned above, I had an opportunity in the previous year (1855) to witness this second part of the bear festival, concluding with the eating of the bear, among the Olcha in the village of Uda. My conjecture that their customs would not differ essentially from those of the Gilyak was in large part confirmed by Ditmar's report. As proof of this and at the same time as evidence of the adoption of Gilyak customs among the Olcha, I shall here insert a brief description of what I saw among them on this occasion, with reference to the above information about the Gilyak.

When I arrived in the village of Uda, located only five versts below Kidsi, on March 22 (April 3) at about 10 o'clock in the morning and stepped into one of its five houses, I found it decorated in the interior in the same manner as is done among the Gilyak for an imminent bear-festival feast. Here, however, opposite the étagère decorated with the bear's head and skin and with numerous fir branches and wood shavings (Gilyak zach = Olcha gjamssassá), a second rack quite similar to the first one but somewhat smaller stood at the other central-post of the house and on its shelves likewise held meat and pieces of the fat of the dismembered bear, along with all kinds of other articles. Moreover, the passageway between the bear rack and the bench of honor was blocked off by a pole laid across it, and by means of it this bench, as well as the whole yurt, was divided into halves. The floor throughout the

/769 cont./

764 raff next to the kakk, is supposed to represent a dove 532 cuckoo (pyk). The former is for a man, the latter fo
The dove or the cuckoo is also involved with the sma the bowl, in which berries and the like are placed as bird; hence the designation tutut-ngir and tutut-ngit and pyk-ngit, the dove or cuckoo bowl, for these stic representation is the same for both birds, for it only 764 shows a bird's head by means of a couple of notches. pittyssj, on the other hand, designates another item i It is a small framework of little sticks (), on which

 According to the appended, very cursor sketch, a triangle attached to a stick, on which various articles are hung.

tobacco, etc., the purpose of which remains unknow the tscham-ngar, Judin said, six feathers are placed ceased man and eight for a woman. Since these are •[562] be a means for the more rapid journeying on of the s this takes into account the difference in physical stre according to the Gilyak view of women -- also the d psychic energy of the two sexes. The tutut or pyk is have almost the same purpose as the tscham-ngar, w probable on the basis of the explanation given by Jud ing these objects. (Bm. I, p. 87.)

764 56. Gilyak. Near the village of Tacht (on the 184 of the Amur) a newly erected raff stood very close to close to it a pittyssj, i.e., a storage chamber for the is therefore called raff-njo on Sakhalin. It consists o roof which rests on two poles, similar to a small dove roof is higher than the raff. Under the roof of the pit fish, and the like are hung for the deceased.

764 In Kalm (on the right bank of the Amur), I fou 184 tremely elegant raff which a rich Gilyak, Kimrkan, in memory of his wife, a daughter of Judin's, and his 556 On the outside it was provided with carvings and arab various kinds. The /770/ carvings, painted black, r

177 648 873 Many Nivkhi with secondary schooling enter higher educational institutions. In 1953, 2 Nivkhi attended Leningrad State University, and 10 studied at the A. I. Herzen Pedagogical Institute. At present, 16 Nivkhi are attending the institute. Among the students there are also women. In 1953, Liza Dekhal' of the village of Pad on the Amur graduated successfully from the A. I. Herzen Institute in Leningrad. The Nivkhi Chuner Taksami of the [463] village of Kal'ma is today doing graduate work at the Institute of Ethnography of the USSR Academy of Sciences. Nivkhi with special training are working today as captains, enginemen on cutters, teachers, librarians and club directors.

177 648 474 The political activity of Nivkhi workers has grown tremendously. Many have risen to leading posts on collective farms and in various institutions; many work as instructors with rayon Party committees and executive committees.

[641] Wide educational work among the Nivkhi has been conducted and is conducted today by the cultural bases established on their territory. The first of these was founded in 1928-29 in the village of Nogliki, at the mouth of the Tym' River in Vostochno-Sakhalinskiy Rayon. The second cultural base of the peoples of the North was founded on Sakhalin in 1946, in the village of Yukovo. These bases have libraries, reading rooms, clubs, seven-year schools for Nivkhi and Evenk children, and also dormitories and boarding schools.

[52] At the amateur concerts on the collective farms, both men and women entertain, singing and performing native and Russian dances. Frequently the songs are created on the spot, impromptu. The collective-farm youth also participate in regional Olympic games.

[545] Theatre arts are also developing among the Nivkhi. In the beginning, the Nivkhi, who had never seen a theatre before the Revolution, were merely spectators at performances organized by Russians. Soon, however, dramatic clubs were organized in the collective-farm clubhouses, and the Nivkhi began to present plays in their own language.

[526] The Nivkhi are great lovers of sports. In former times they did not know how to swim and feared the water. Today the Nivkhi young people enthusiastically engage in water sports. There are now special sports omorochki (canoes) with a single oar, in which young men and women hold speed races. The Nivkhi have also preserved native sports, such as rope-jumping.

[182] The changed working, living and cultural conditions of Nivkhi life—the collectivization of their economy, their participation in industry, the unification in collective-farm villages of people who had formerly belonged to different clans, and the general rise in their cultural level—all these factors have completely destroyed the old ties and rules, based on the numerous remnants of clan relations which had survived until the Revolution. The old 177 religious ideas, holidays and rituals have lost all their meaning. The 648 greatest change has occurred in the position of women. In former times, the Nivkhi woman was timid and oppressed, and knew only the narrow circle of ● 562 her domestic duties. She could be bought and sold, or turned out of the house. When she met men, she had to cover her face and turn her back to them. During the early post-Revolutionary years, a great deal of effort had to be applied toward the elimination of survivals of the past. When they attempted to study, many young women and girls were ridiculed by their fathers, husbands and mothers. Some were unable to withstand the pressure and discontinued their studies. It proved especially difficult to overcome the ancient custom of placing a woman in childbed in a special hut, built near the dwelling. This tent was usually cold and damp. The woman had to remain under these conditions for several days without any help,

116, 165, 562, 595, 855

"The Gilyaks treat their children wealth, and will 'fetch a wedding pr fish-winner, is naturally of more a course, very high. In the villages o gives the births in 3 1/3 years as 13 88 deaths among the older persons), chief reason, however, of the decli A wife has to be bought, and she is unremunerative investment, but few expenditure."

remarkably well, and though a girl is potential ice,' the boy as an early bread-winner, or rather ccount. The death-rate among young children is, of n the west coast, north of Arkovo, Mr. Sternberg 0, out of which there were 34 deaths (in addition to i.e. an average of more than 26 per cent. The ne in polygamy is more probably growing poverty.
a moderately expensive article. Not that she is an Gilyaks are in a position to make the capital

533, 558, 562, 593

All Gilyaks, it is said, know the old, cs it is otherwise, for they are very composed by the maidens of the trib n to the Gilyak world. It may not be sidered a want of modesty. Sometim nan who made songs in her youth; ' b age. The Gilyak's notions of modest of childhood brothers and sisters ar ner attempted it, the latter would tu old songs, the epics of their race, but with t numerous, and always being added to. These e, who tell them to their girl friends, and the known who the authoress is, for that would b es one may be heard to say, 'There goes an ol ut it is not 'good form.' Woman's mission is t y are very strict. After they have passed the e not allowed to speak to one another. If the rn away in injured modesty."

452 and seals. They distribute the quarry. They play the leading 614 part in the economic, social and religious life of the clan and in no one of these areas do they permit women to play 614 a part equal to their own. Women play a subordinate part in 552 the productive activity of the clan; they collect plants, roots and berries. Woman cannot play any part in the social life of the clan for they do not belong to the clan from the very time they are born, and when they grow up they are given away, in fact sold, by the hunters to some other clan. The clan that takes the woman, i. e. the clan of the son-in-law (ore) become dependent upon the clan of the father-in-law (apak). Also, women play no part in the religious life of the clan.

527 Women are not permitted to be present during more im-562 portant moments of the "bear holiday", for the bear hunt is 784 a matter for men-hunters and not for women. Not once in their life are women permitted to eat the better cuts of bear meat.
They are only allowed to eat some meat of the poorer cuts.
Women must not be present at offerings to the spirits of the woods and of the sea which help the hunters, for hunting is a man's job. As mentioned above, a pregnant woman must not come to the sea shore while the men are hunting seals, otherwise the ice would disappear and the hunters would return home empty handed, etc., etc.

784 The taboos mentioned above are a religious-magical super-452 structure on the labor distribution according to sex. One 626 should look for explanations of these taboos in the relations 183 among different groups of people in primitive society rather than in religion.

In legitimatizing this distribution of labor, the taboos turn the female part of the clan into slaves of the male part - the men-hunters.

Without further dwelling on these problems we merely indicate that there is no mystical element behind the taboos. The mystical content is often added in order to befuddle and to enslave people and to keep from them the essence of germinating exploitative relations among men. This is illustrated by the example of the taj where the pilan attempt to assert his title to a sivuch is made covertly rather than openly, under the guise of a magical-religious ceremony.

However, we now revert to our topic.

225 Having killed a sufficient number of seals, the hunters, 422 loaded with their quarry, return to the village. On arrival 476 the pilan distributes the quarry. At this point it becomes apparent that the sivuch, which is the pilan's legal property and whose blood he used in feeding the taj, is included in

"Crying and loud taking fill the hut. The mo and all vie with each other in showing their ab eschewed, pipes are broken in pieces, and the

If the deceased be a man, similar ceremoni maintainer of the hearth, he [244] has to give only; and therefore his body requires only thr days. As with the woman, over the other garn have not yet gained that supernatural capacity raiment is necessary on their long journeys.

At the end of the lying-in-state, i.e. on the
for the man, the corpse is taken out of the hut team of dogs. The shuba is taken off, for alth ties, the journeys have been made, and it is n gained by purification."

urners loose their hair from the pigtails, andonment of pleasure. Luxuries are e tobacco is allowed to fall out.
es are gone through, but as he is not the an account of his doings to three gods ee garments, and lies in the hut but three nents is worn a shuba; for their spirits which defies the elements, and warm fifth day for the woman and on the fourth and laid on a narta, a sledge drawn by a ough the soul has not yet its divine faculo longer needed. These are now to be

2: Schrenck--1036 E-5 (1854-1856) 1881-1895 RX2 Gilyak RX2

/636 cont./

2. (cont.)
Chine mod. ou descr. de ce vaste Emp. d'après des docum. chinois, Part I, pp. 25, 275; Part II, p. 238. Iakinf", Kitai /China/, St. Petersb., 1840, p. 198.

a much distorted form, among the Goldi (3). Even a difference

3. A more detailed explanation of this will be given in the following.

Even a difference of nationality is by no means as decisive for the conclusion of the marriage of the Gilyak as one would expect from the radical difference of their language from those of all their neighbors. On the mainland there are frequent marriages between the Gilyak and their immediate neighbors on the Amur, the Olcha, and probably it is to this circumstance above all that the similarity in the customs and usages of the two peoples, or, in other words, the Gilyakization of the Olcha stressed several times already, is to be attributed. To a lesser degree the same thing also takes place with the Negda. Occasionally an Amur Gilyak will bring home from a trading trip to the Japanese a wife from the Ainu people (4).

4. The mother of the wealthy Gilyak Judin in Tebach, for instance, was an Ainu woman, as was mentioned above (p. 224 /untranslated/).

Conversely, however, it hardly ever happens that Amur-Gilyak women marry Ainu men, because the latter are not in the habit of leaving their island and, if this should happen as an exception, would not be in a position to pay the high bride price of the Gilyak. Where, however, as on Sakhalin, the two peoples live directly beside each other and the bride price is also lower, frequent marriages take place between them, as Mamia Rinsô reported (5), 5. Siebold, Nippon, VII, 195.

and the assimilation between the two tribes is considerable.

2: Schrenck--1054 E-5 (1854-1856) 1881-1895 RX2 Gilyak RX

/648 cont./

this is another reason why their possession seems so enviable to the Gilyak, and their purchase price is so high among them. A Gilyak, by the way, when asked how many wives (umgu) he has, will never fail to count in his female slave, and all the more because he has paid more for her than for his wife or any of his wives and she also contributes more to his prestige. This can easily lead to mistaken ideas about the extent of polygamy among them, and therefore the further questions, how many of the women are his wanch (wives) or dshangi-mutsch-umgu (lawful women or wives) and how many are merely kryghryss-umgu (female slaves), are always necessary in order to obtain a proper understanding of his marital situation.

As severely as the practice of sexual intercourse with a female slave is condemned by the Gilyak, nevertheless this is not always observed, especially by the younger and unmarried men. If a female slave gives birth to a child, a Gilyak will never under any circumstances admit that he is the father, and nobody, of course, will believe the words of the slave. The child, then, is regarded as belonging to the tribe of the mother and likewise, as kryghryss, becomes the property of her owner, who lets it grow up with the mother and, when it has grown up, sells it as kryghryss. If, on the other hand, the much rarer case happens, that a Gilyak girl has intercourse with a slave and brings a child into the world, the father is ignored, but the mother is punished, and the child, as illegitimate, is killed and done away with. On the other hand, the Gilyak not unhappily permits a marriage between his male and female kryghryss; in fact, if he has a female slave, he will probably also buy a male slave and have them marry, since any children they might have will be his kryghryss and, as such, can be turned to good account. Thus, the Gilyak has nothing against assimilation with the neighboring peoples through mixed marriages, but his national pride decidedly objects to such mixing with slaves coming from these peoples and the creation of such from his own ranks, and, on the other hand, strongly supported by covetousness, enjoys the possession and exploitation of slaves from the neighboring tribes.

: Hawes--116-117 T-3 (1901) 1903 Gilyak
16, 177, 563, 631

"The Russian occupation [LSS: of Sakhalin] is practically confined to the district enlosed in a radius of thirty miles from Alexandrovsk on the west coast, and another maller one around Korsakovsk in the south.

The island is divided into three administrative districts—the Alexandrovsk, Timovsk, nd Korsakovsk okrugi. Each of these is presided over by a chief of the district, or kruzhni nachalnik, over whom is the military Governor of the island. The latter has reat authority, but in his turn is subject to the Governor-general of the Pri-Amursky blast.

The biggest prison centre is at Alexandrovsk. The next is at Korsakovsk, and the imovsk dostroct has two, one at Derbensk and the other at Rikovsk, thirty-five and orty-four miles, respectively, by road inland from Alexandrovsk. [117]

Immediately around these centres clearings have been made, and beyond are a few illages dotted about in the forest, with a population varying from 200 to none at all."

9: Hawes--viii T-3 (1901) 1903 Gilyak
116, 177, 563

"Of the faulty state of the penal administration, and the unfortunate condition of the 'exile-settlers' described in these pages, it is devoutly to be hoped that in any future investigations no trace may be found. At the same time a word of warning is due, lest the reader should found a generalization for Siberia upon this particular settlement. Sakhalin is the colony to which all Russia's worst criminals are despatched, and the very name of the island is banned in St. Petersburg. Moreover, it is a far cry to the capital—the sign-post in front of the post-office at Alexandrovsk says 10,172 versts (6752 miles)—and the threads of control cannot be pulled tight. Since the publication of Mr. George Kennan's two volumes, (1) great improvements have been made in the con-

1. 'Siberia and the Exile System.'

ditions of prisoners, throughout Siberia, not excepting Sakhalin; but that island still lags, as ever, many years behind the average penal settlement on the mainland."

9: Hawes--121-123 T-3 (1901) 1903 Gilyak-1- 3 116, 563

"Turning inland at the Gilyak village, we passed through the Russian Arkovo, the first, for there are three hamlets of that name, where we had experienced the hospitality of the convict-farmer three days since. Our journey now took us beyond, by a road winding through a beautiful valley. If the little gardens, with their cabbages and potatoes, had astonished me before with their look of contentment, so did now the reverse side of the picture, [122] the miserably poor cereal crops standing in the little strips of clearings which fringed the road—crops that could not have yielded more than a two or threefold return on the sowings. Referring to the official records for the year 1898, I find that wheat and oats, which were the chief cereals sown in this village, yielded 3.7 and 4.4-fold harvests, against a 15-fold average in England. Potatoes showed better results with 6.7-fold crop. In the village of Slavo, which we reached the following day, the record was terrible, the wheat yield for the same year being eleven grains for every ten sown! And, as if to make more obvious the settlers' inability or culpable failure to grow enough corn to satisfy their needs, we overtook several telyegi (primitive springless carts), drawn by oxen and Siberian ponies, laden with sacks of American flour from Portland, Oregon. A political exile, writing in the official Sakhalin Kalendar of 1896, lays most of the blame for the unsatisfactory state of the outlying settlements at the officials' doors. He claims that the system, under which the 'exile-settlers' (1) are sent to found new

1. One whose sentence has expired, but who must remain on the island for six

9: Hawes--57-58 T-3 (1901) 1903
116, 563

"The town of Nikolaevsk, in which I now four was founded on August 6, 1850, by Captain Nev headquarters, for it was not until 1858 that the of the Amur, to Russia. I have already referre 1872, the naval base was transferred to Vladiv of the province was removed to Khabarovsk.

The town, which is perched on the rugged sl sists mainly of one broad street or road with o parallel green tracks. The main street contain tures, including the church, the Russo-Chines There are a few shops and residences of offici away into the scrub and forest, out of which th the foot is the collection of wooden wharves, w scene. An Amur steamboat is in, three or four etc., for the winter are lying in mid-stream, in England, are being tugged ashore, while a s higher up stream waiting for their annual load

Yet Nikolaevsk wears a triste look. The two bidding-looking stockades, frown upon you, an ıd myself stranded for an unknown period, elskoy, acting without instructions from Treaty of Aigun gave this, the left bank ed to the severe blow it received when, in ostok, and again when the administration ope of the northern bank of the Amur, conne offshoot down to the pristan, and a few s half [58] a dozen well-built wooden struc-e Bank, and some merchants' stores.

als, the rest are log-houses straggling e site of Nikolaevsk has been carved. At hich in the autumn present quite a busy steamers bringing provisions, tea, flour, huge lighters, which I am told were made mall fleet of schooners rides at anchor of fish for Japan.
prison buildings, with their dingy, ford the deserted old rambling wooden houses

9: Hawes--57-58 T-3 (1901) 1903
116, 563

of the admiral and military officials tell of its place, I could not resist the feeling of oppress were allowed their liberty—a very modified fo ance. What a contrast to merry, happy Japan, Japanese pride in their police and military! C besides officials there were scarcely fifty Rus fallen fortunes. As I wandered about the ion in the air. It was, as if the inhabitants rm of it—by the officials, only on suffer-and the gay village scenes there, and the

Of course, it should be remembered that ssians who were not ex-convicts."

9: Hawes--61-63 T-3
116, 563

"At the mouth of the Amur, the c traveling the Amur River] (the chie first attempt at salmon-canning in and in the month of August, at spaw swarm. Some idea of their abundan by the municipality at Nikolaevsk fo was six kopyeks (1 1/2d.). Salted, it Russians. To lack of variety, the a Nikolaevsk, and the unhealthy cond the Russians on the Amur. A few y lepers, and many suffered from wa erly constructed leper-house two fish that I have seen Russians spea from Khabarovsk down the Amur, t weir projecting into the stream, an mid-stream end was fixed a 'set' n the corner. A boatman sat waiting he hauled it up, and emptied the ca used, a good average haul of the ne in the Straits of Tartary, just roun owners of the vessel [LSS: A small Russian steamer f partner was the son of a convict) were making the Siberia. The chief occupation of the poor is fishing, vning-time, salmon (Salmo lagocephalus) and shad ce may be gathered from the fact that the prices fixed or a moderate-sized salmon, [62] say eighteen pounds, forms the staple food of the natives and poor bsence of vegetables, which will not grow in itions of living, must be attributed the leprosy among ears back there was no accommodation for these nt of food, or lay untended, but now there is a propor three miles from Nikolaevsk. So plentiful are the ring the salmon from the banks; but on the journey he usual method appeared to be to build a wattled just visible above the surface of the water. At the et, into which the fish crowded as they hurried round until the net was heavy with its living freight, when tch into his boat. At Pronge, seine-nets were being t yielding 3000. The native village of Pronge is really d the southern foreland at the mouth of the Amur, but

1: Sternberg--413 E-5 (1890-1897, 1910)1933 RX2 Gilyak RX2
Amur

/285 cont./

17 Settlement of Mayya. 1) The clan of Yngin. His clan is 14 also in Vayr -- they are the masters of Vayr, but it happened that 03 one brother killed his brother, and then they separated and divided the fire: "If friend kills friend, who will be born?" 2) The Beldy clan are former Goldi who came down three generation ago. 3) The Polmk clan. Gilyak from the river near Mikhaylovskiy. They have been living here for five years (1896).

Settlement of Mongol'. The Valdzu clan from the village of Val' Orosugbu -- from the same village where the wars were. Dz:aj from the village of Dzhay.

The Valdzu are four generations /kolena/ from Uval'-khotin on the Sungari -- Solodo. When they arrived here, they found only the Sigdyli (nami) clan, but these all died out (1896).

Settlement of Koyma on the upper Amur. 1) The Choril came from Tro -- one to Kol', a second here, a third somewhere else. 2) Bajal -- the Manchu or Solodo clan from Kozima. The Bajal seem to be the first who lived here; later on they were called to Kizi, and then they came back and they were given a starosta.

Settlement of Geri. Kern -- khal-Dea. Runaway Chinese [97] came here on a raft during a war and attached their raft by a [63] hook, formed a clan of their own, and then became Gilyakified. Later the Manchu came, confirmed the name of this clan, and appointed starostas. Dua-Tvanbfing (Pat) Ajumka from Tymi-fing.

17 /286/ Settlement of Puli. Samagil -- two generations from 03 the Gorin. The father of the informant raised reindeer. 2) Tumuli -- 73 from Dzhongli, near the Perm ones: Goldi.

Settlement of Ukhta. Tyvl-fing -- inhabitants of Tyvl' -- Ulcha clan (Ulcha khala). They left for Kol' and formed Tyvl-fing, but came back by way of Lake Chlya (a three-day trip) -- "six fathers since we came back," i.e., six generations ago. 2) Dea -- burn their dead; ancestors of the narni, went down to Kol' and came back as Gilyak. Dea -- Kern-khal. Dzhatala -- the settlement of Udyli.

2: Schrenck--254 E-5 (1854-1856) 1881-1895 RX2 Gilyak RX Feudal Japan A Sakhalin Island
Ainu AB6

F.J. /122 cont./
175 Sakhalin begins to the north of the Kitosi region still inhabited G by the Ainu (1). According to the pertinent map, however, 131 175 [361]
[563]

1. "Tô-tats ki ko" (Siebold, Nippon, VII, p. 191).

the latter, with its north end, extended to Porokotan (2), and this

F.J. [114]

2. On the map to which we refer (with the inscription "Mogami Tok'nai" 1786, see above, p. 248, note 1) there is written "Torokotan," evidently only the result of a printing error or confusion between p and t on the part of the Japanese, the adjoining map, inscribed "Mamia Rinso 1808," on which the same place is called "Porokotan," shows.

it, as we saw above (3), at the same time the Pilja-wo of the

3. See above, pp. 29, 30.

Gilyak, their last village to the south, where they already live A intermixed with the Ainu. At the present time a mixed popula-G tion of this kind is advancing to the north of Pilja-wo, as was 131 explained in detail above. This may not have been the case at 178 that time, or not to the same extent, and the two peoples con-563 cerned may have been much more distinctly separated, though 175 mixture through marriage has always taken place. If that is true, A then the entire change in the boundary situation between the [648] Gilyak and the Ainu that has taken place there from the time of Mamia Rinso's visit to these regions to mine is only that a somewhat more pronounced or more widespread mixture of the two has occurred, probably because even then some of the Ainu fled northward to the Gilyak out of fear of the Japanese, just as happened quite notoriously later when the Japanese colonization began to spread rapidly (4). There are no reports at all for evaluating a possible change in the boundaries of the Gilyak area on the east coast of Sakhalin, since that part of the island was visited neither by earlier travelers nor by the two Japanese mentioned above.

/122 cont./

4. See above, p. 154.

In summarizing everything that has been said about the Gilyak up to now, we are able to draw the conclusion that, so far as our historical information concerning this people extends, which does not cover a very great period of time, no considerable change or shift of their habitation sites has taken place. Whether and how such might have taken place in prehistoric times, however, can only be judged as a conjecture on the basis of other facts and phenomena, which we shall discuss later.

While we lack historical information on the Gilyak going back very far, this is by no means the case with respect to the Ainu. This is true, however, for only a part of this people, particularly those who are beyond the scope of this work. The farther they were to the south, the earlier the Ainu emerge from the darkness of the prehistoric period, according to the extent and as a consequence of their contacts with the Japanese: they were first observed on Nippon, then on Jesso /Yesso/, and, finally, on Sakhalin and the Kuriles. Since their whole area of distribution /123/ consists of islands which are separated by straits with rapid currents in part, and the Japanese only gradually spread northward from island to island, the oldest reports concerning the southern Ainu and those concerning the northern ones are far apart, and whereas the former are two and a half millenniums old, the latter go back only as many centuries. According to Siebold (1), at the time of the founding of Japan

1. Aardr. en volkenkund. toelicht. tot de ontdekk. van Maert. Gerr. Vries; benev. eene verhand. over de Aino-taal en de voortbrengs. der Aino-landen

/318 cont./

6. (cont.)
das südl. Sachalin /Statistical and Topographical Data on Southern Sakhalin/" (Beitr. zur Kenntn. des Russ. Reiches, Vol. XXV, p. 279). At the same time Pemb. Hodgson ("Account of four Excurs. in the Japanese Island of Jesso," in the Literary Gazette of March 16, 1861; cf. Petermann's Geogr. Mitthl., 1861, p. 241) gave the number of Ainu on Jesso as 80,000 (!).

These statements referring to Sakhalin are based upon a rather accurate knowledge of it obtained through many trips in the country. On the other hand, Collins's data, of greater interest to us, are very dubious. They are certainly not based upon counts; rather, they seem to have been obtained by questioning the Russians settled in the Amur region at that time, as /319/ is indicated by the typical Russian name "Manguntsen" for the Olcha. Trustworthy data could probably all the less likely be obtained by this method since, besides the lack of any counts, the territories of the peoples named, of the Olcha in particular, with reference to their northern and southern neighbors, were as a rule erroneously demarcated by the Russians (1). At that time, moreover, people did not realize that in almost every one of these territories there were isolated villages of other nationalities (2). For this reason alone, as well as the necessity for distinguishing summer and winter villages, little value can be put on the number of the villages of various nationalities given by Collins. Moreover,

1. For more details concerning this, see pp. 51 ff. above.

2. In the Gilyak territory, for instance, the Olcha villages, Tschylwi and Tyr; see above, p. 28.

116, 563

"At De Castries, a beautiful natural har lets, Observatory Island and Basalt Island was discovered and named by La Pérouse consisting of the dwellings of a telegraph c the cable to Sakhalin crosses from this poi

1. This cable, which was broken in Jun and a fresh one laid between Capes La be maintained at De Castries, because with Vladivostok, and is the only safe
the Straits of Tartary."

bour opens out to the view with a couple of is, reposing in the smooth water. This haven in 1787. There is a small Russian post here, chief, his assistants, and a few soldiers, for
int. (1)

ne, 1901, has now been abandoned, zarev and Pogobi. The post is to it has communication by telegraph haven for ships passing through "The town of Alexandrovsk, or rather Pos no municipal authority, and comprises a pop at the foot of the mountains, worn by the two Alexandrovka rivers, which here break the l land stretches between the town and the sea.

in the centre of the town, one containing the post-office and leading to the bazar or mark continues past the prison down to the jetty.

Though the former street is wide and plant give it a dingy and sombre look. These two the foot passenger does well to avoid at nigh plank. Outside of these two streets the rest Russian villages, with ditches on either side of a poor far-west American township. Eac as if it feared either robbers or the cold han with a shed forming two sides of the square.
scantily roofed with pine-branches to catch t

The 6000 inhabitants of Alexandrovsk cons and children, and officials and their families dozen free-born individuals, whose business

t Alexandrovskiy, as it is called, for it has ulation of only 6000, lies mainly in a hollow streams, the Great and the Little ine of sea-cliff for about half a mile. Marsh Two principal streets cross at right angles church, the chief officials' houses and the et, and the other, beginning on the hill slope ted in part with young trees, the log building streets boast plank 'street walks,' which t, owing to the occasional absence of a are tracks, wide and grassy, as in all . The laying out of the place resembles that h hut, with its small windows, [85] looking d of Jack Frost, had a tiny yard fenced in In late autumn this little court would be he snow and form a warm covering. ist of convicts and ex-convicts, their wives

s. Besides these there are probably not a here is that of merchants' agents, etc.

9: Hawes--121-123 T-3 (1901) 1903
116, 563

Sakhalin than his unwonted energy. In speaking tributed the small crops usually obtained to the

1. A peasant is an ex-convict who has comp settlership,' and now has the return of certa including those of the right to move from pla carelessness in sowing the seed, 'scattering he insufficiently.' "

of agriculture on the island, he at-laziness of the 'peasants' (1) and their leted his six years of 'exileain elementary civil rights, ace to place.

re,' as he said, 'in excess, and there

9: Hawes--141-145 T-3 (1901) 1903
116, 563

"The law provides that any female crimin than two years, may be sent from Russia to are placed altogether in the kamera at the s have often seen them-those of them that had for cleaning and sewing purposes, I say nom known; the others, chosen by 'exile-settlers are released from confinement within barra are still obliged to do their hard-labour tas

There is no marriage ceremony. The cho nachalnik of the okrug, their names are wri dwell together. A policy such as this, which the marriage tie, and directly encourages a light of an attempt on the part of the Govern vious scheme had been tried, and failed. In had been sent to the island, but they all ultin life.

By settling the exiles down with partners hoped to avoid the letting loose [142] of large mainland. . . . . .Brodyagi-passp wholesale across the border into Siberia, an al under forty, whose sentence is not less Sakhalin. On arrival at Alexandrovsk they outh-east corner of the prison buildings. I been retained by the officials, nominally inally, because the real purpose was openly s,' who are allowed thus to take a helpmate, cks, and live with their 'men' though they k.

ice being made with the sanction of the tten in a book, and henceforth the couple violates our notions of the sacredness of criminal breed, must be regarded in the ment to settle and colonize Sakhalin. A pre-1862, and again in 1869, a few free colonists nately left for a less lonely and arduous in life and families, the Government also numbers of ex-convicts of Sakhalin on the portless vagabonds—had been despatched d the country was over-run with escaping

9: Hawes--121-123 T-3 (1901) 1903
116, 563

more years without legal rights.

villages in the forests, is not given a fair tria are shipped off to these parts, because they a Furthermore, the 'exile-settlers' are often de have chosen, thus making, what was at best a Garnak, in the eighties, sent out to scientifica come to the conclusion that colonization was i administration.'

On the other hand, the ex-convicts do not m love have they for the island which is their pr industry and perseverance needed in a struggl from those who have sought in their days of fr

Some weeks later I met a Caucasian Kazak, nary run of Sakhalin criminals. Whatever his tion, he was very energetic, and most succes the interior, in the midst of forest which invo boured many a destructive enemy of his cattle cows, and sowed his 150 puds of corn. He clai if we make some allowance for exaggeration, l, and adds that it is the worst men who re as sores in the eyes of the officials. spatched to places that no sane man would hard life, an impossible one. Colonel lly explore the island, is said to have n a very bad state owing to the 'faulty ake the best of their circumstances. Small ison-land, and, even if reconciled to it the e with [123] nature are not forthcoming eedom to live by avoiding honest work.

who was a striking exception to the ordi-crime may have been, probably insurrecsful. Living at the village of Uskovo, in lved no little labour in clearing, and har-
, he owned, he told us, no less than fifty med to get a twelve-fold crop, which, even was really no less extraordinary for

9: Hawes--137-138 T-3
116, 361, 563, 624

sergeant, but his duties are as varie commissioner in India. Police, milit these and more come within his care thirty rubles (three guineas) a month important of his functions at Ado Tim when we arrived."

d as those of a prefect in France, or even a deputy-tary, the census, agriculture, and 'roads,' all s; and for this he is paid the magnificent sum of . Tracking escaped convicts was not the least n, and he was away down the river on this errand

9: Hawes--137-138 T-3
116, 361, 563, 624

"We were nearing Ado Tim, the last F interior. The native village of that nar settlement lay half a verst from the ri

We had no wish to arrest our progre and we would rather camp in the open, but the natives refused to take us furth ashore, hoping that time would settle On either side of the broad grass trac miserably poor, out-of-repair log-hut others with loose pieces of bark. Pigs clad were indiscriminately scattered

1. The East Siberian name for S a fire kindled beneath, and bunches of betokened tobacco drying. Women war in the scantiest of clothing, the latter simply in a frock and an extra bodice. autumn mornings and late afternoons

Each village has its overseer, who Russian penal settlement of all in the northern me was situated on the banks lower down, but the ver.

ess here, the settlement had a very bad reputation, or among the natives, from what we had heard;
ner except at a prohibitive price, and we went our difference.....[138]
k of the settlement was a row of higgledy-piggledy, s, with tiny windows, some roofed with boards,
, a foal or two, and a few children, miserably on the 'road.' Kita (1) hung curing in the smoke of almo lagocephalus.

withering green leaves by the hutside in the sun dered about barefooted, and they and the men were in a cotton shirt and trousers, and the former It was always a matter of wonder to me how in hey could stand the cold so miserably clothed. is a soldier. In rank he may be compared to a

9: Hawes--141-145 T-3 (1901) 190

116, 563

members of this fraternity. On this subject, says, '...on January 1, 1876, over 51,000 pe government of Tobolsk as penal colonists, a local administration. ... These figures, tog authorities, bear witness to the inefficiency of Tomsk and Yeniseisk, in 1883, there were not merely 'exile-settlers') registered in dif ing in the places assigned them; over 17,000 has improved with the advancing settlement reader think for a moment that the brodyaga day. Irkutsk which competes with Tomsk for London, attracts large numbers of that profe This is a misnomer for the Siberian member to delicate fingering, and the murder of thei the profession. It is said that two murders i outskirts, is the weekly average of Irkutsk.
either, for just previous to my visit two had [143] Security of life and property spell for t and this was another reason why the importu Hence it was that in 1888, Mr. Galkin Vrass

A. Leroy-Beaulieu, quoting official figures rsons were entered on the registers of the nd only 34,000 could be produced by the ether with the carelessness of the local of the system. ... In the 'governments'
, out of 20,000 exiles (all classes exiled, ferent communes, only 2600 actually residwere fugitives.' That this state of things of the country is true, though let not the fraternity fails to number its thousands to-the title of premier city of Siberia, like ssion generally dubbed the 'light-fingered.'
s. Hard life in the taiga does not conduce victim is a sine quâ non in the pursuit of the nucleus of the city, and fourteen in the And daylight or publicity are not shunned taken place in the high street in the daytime e Exchequer greater potential receipts, nities of the Siberians should be listened to.
y, afterwards head of the general prison

9: Hawes--88-89 T-3 (1901) 19
116, 563, 361

"Arrived at the Gilyak village of Arkovo for the salmon-fishing, ascending a river spawning season. We therefore pushed on piles, to the Russian settlement called Ark A stranger from Europe, suddenly dropp Sakhalin, the dreary isle of punishment, th wore a look of contentment, with its cosy potatoes and cabbages. Sunflowers I saw a perfumed the air in early summer; while a grand [89] purple mountains reminded me

, to my disappointment the natives had departed higher up the coast to take advantage of the inland, past the strange native huts built on kovo the First.
ped down here would certainly ask, 'Is this ne Hades of Russia?' Outwardly, this village log cottages and gardens, in which flourished also, and was told that wild roses (rosa rugosa) away in the distance, forest-clad heights and of some of the finer scenery of Japan."

9: Hawes--116-117 T-3 (1901) 1903
116, 177, 563, 631

"The Russian occupation [LSS: of Sakhalin] is p closed in a radius of thirty miles from Alexandro smaller one around Korsakovsk in the south.

The island is divided into three administrative and Korsakovsk okrugi. Each of these is presided okruzhni nachalnik, over whom is the military Go great authority, but in his turn is subject to the G oblast.

The biggest prison centre is at Alexandrovsk.
Timovsk dostroct has two, one at Derbensk and t forty-four miles, respectively, by road inland fr

Immediately around these centres clearings ha villages dotted about in the forest, with a populat ractically confined to the district envsk on the west coast, and another districts—the Alexandrovsk, Timovsk, l over by a chief of the district, or vernor of the island. The latter has Governor-general of the Pri-Amursky

The next is at Korsakovsk, and the he other at Rikovsk, thirty-five and om Alexandrovsk. [117] ve been made, and beyond are a few ion varying from 200 to none at all."

not stop here to tell of the place, for I was to exp rom an expedition to the north-east coast; suffice on of the island consists of convicts and officials.
engaged in hard labour—7080 (January 1, 1898)— 634 were women. The number of convicts and e 167, so that a moderate estimate would give 8000 perience much more of it on my e it to say, that the Russian Out of a total of the former the murderers numbered 2836, x-convicts at the same date of these as murderers."

9: Hawes--309-310 T-3 116, 563

"[LSS: Traveling from Ado Tin rather a poor attempt at a clearin some rough meadow-land, almos habitants, all men. The huts wer letting in the cold through the cre with a hole for chimney, offering a table, some boxes for a bed, a small paper-mended window. It w and indeed it was from such place grew potatoes, and in the larger two or three ponies. Potatoes had to be salted against the winter. S this, and, having borrowed in the Crown, sank, in company with th villages that are large enough to and the [310] money-lender. Then goods, if he has some petty spite the usual quantity of potatoes in e The poor 'exile-settler' is also n to Slavo] Once or twice we passed a clearing, or ng, where stood a settlement of a few log-huts and t in a virgin state. One of them contained only six in e about twelve by eighteen feet in size, the log walls vices; and the miserable roofs of loose pieces of ba poor protection against the rain. Inside one would fi nd a home-made stove; the whole faintly lighted by a was a mystery how these poor people managed to live es that the gangs of brodyagi were recruited. A few settlements a 'wealthy' settler will own some cows o d to be bartered for flour, tea, and rice; and for fish ome, even by much scraping, were unable to compas first place seed-potatoes or corn, etc., from the e lazy or hopeless, deeper and deeper into debt. In t have a store, the shopkeeper is generally the rich m e is then nobody to prevent him refusing to supply e to avenge, or compelling the 'peasant' to give twice exchange for flour, rice, or salt.

o at the mercy of any official who may choose to

9: Hawes--141-145 T-3 (1901) 1903
116, 563

convicts were, on January 1, 1898, respectivel round numbers in the proportion of 8 to 1. The presence of 1308 women who followed their con island. Only six men did this in the case of thei to Sakhalin as criminals.

event of their doing so they have a choice, miserab There is even a sadder aspect of this matter. It the wives of convicts who have joined them, but mo
All around them are openly vicious practices [145]
The very 'game' of concubinage is in vogue in the n traded with their daughters is to say little. I had gr succeeded, in convincing a highly educated prisone literature, that fathers did not stand in the streets for sale. His experience on Sakhalin only confirme retailed by Russian papers. It would be impossible —for me to mention the many terrible things I hear of Sakhalin, if any reform is to be brought about, t not have dared to make myself, but which comes fr y 19, 770, and 2397, or in ratio is reduced by the demned husbands to the r wives being despatched ble as that may be.

is the effect upon the free population, ore especially the free-born children.
and scenes of unblushing prostitution.
nixed schools. To say that fathers reat difficulty, I am not sure that I r of rank, familiar with English of London offering their daughters d some garbled reports of London life —and probably incredible to the reader rd, but I feel it only due to the children o quote a statement which I should rom one of unquestioned authority.

9: Hawes--187-188 T-3 (
116, 361, 563

"From the delta of the Tim we made acr cluster of huts on the inner side of the dun our light craft rocked, and the morning air villages of Nivo [188] (the first, for there a adorned with pine branches, stood our pro dogs, barking and splashing, stopped their of strangers. A verst or two beyond Kama and as we waded ashore we were accosted presence of a Russian police officer.

It was a strange, out-of-the-way place t stances accounted for his practical banishm oss the bay in a north-easterly direction to e. The wind was already making itself felt; struck cold on our damp clothes. The are two) and Kamavo, with their bear-cages minently on the sandy level, and a crowd of fishing to show resentment at the appearanc avo our boat was beached, where stood a ten by two or three Kazaks, who led us into the o be stationed at, and only exceptional circu nent to this far-away spot."

9: Hawes--155-156 T-3 (1901) 1903
116, 361, 563

"Though we had left behind the last Russian s shelters were passed in the course of the morni spawning season by a few Russian 'exile-settler salmon against the winter's needs. At a bend of shelters, and five men dragging a seine-net, ab one hundred or so of plunging and splashing kita housed a solitary Russian and some barrels of cuss our midday meal—a duck we had shot duri well, and though the keen edge of our distrust w to spending a night with them or to the prospect

Occasionally we came upon a Gilyak village, at each one hailed any visible member of the co men who would take us; but they all with one ac bodied were away fishing, [156] or the only pers canoe."

ettlement at Ado Tim, three or four rude ing, which were occupied during the s' for the catching and salting down of the river we came upon one of these out two hundred feet long, which containe . At another of these rude huts, which salt and dried grass, we stopped to disng the morning. Our men behaved very vas wearing off, we did not look forward of night watches.
consisting of half a dozen huts or so, and mmunity, inquiring if there were not ccord made excuses. Either the ableson available was ill or had no safe

9: Hawes--168 [2] T-3 (1901) 19
116, 563

"Bruin is very human in many of his ways peasant towards him is expressed in the p Petz. On the mainland one not infrequently seen them housed in a kennel in a yard, a wayside, where the bystander might be se ing a less amicable return. The Caucasian put them in a big box in his yard."

, and the brotherly feeling of the Russian et names they give him—Mishka and Master y comes across the cubs kept as pets. I have nd even tied up to the side of a shanty by the en trying to give a friendly pat before receivn farmer of Uskovo once caught three cubs and

Hawes--141-145 T-3 (1901) 1903
, 563

ministration, recommended that all brodyagi nd, but to the island of Sakhalin, where, escap rm at large in the taiga, while the sea and ice s tantamount to a declaration that in future Si lony, while the convicts must be more and mo licy has culminated in the ukaz of 1900, which nuary 1, 1902 (O.S.).
The attempt to settle free colonists on Sakhali the second method of 'civil marriage'? On the ould admit it to be a failure.
That the couples remain is true, but it is beca actically forced exiles; the majority, regardi more than is necessary to gain a bare existen s crushed, energyless majority long to put an e when, returning from Arkovo, where we had g rich' as the owner of three cows, I remarke ttler, such as he, who has been here fifteen ing well, very well as Sakhalin standards are
'Why!' he replied, 'he only asked me just now should be sent, not to the Siberian main-ping from control, they could do little would be effective prison walls. This beria was to be first and foremost a re confined to restricted areas. This nominally abolished deportation from in having failed, what has been the result e whole, even the officials, I think, ause they cannot get away, and are ng the land as their prison-island, strive nce. How those few bright exceptions to end to their exile, was brought home to supped with the farmer who was 'pass-d to my companion, 'I suppose an exile-years, has a wife and children, and is is quite content to live here?'

'Did I think there was any hope of his

9: Hawes--141-145 T-3 (1901) 1903
116, 563

getting away back home to Russia?' ' With t may not be so. [144]

There are other results that have to be tak the Government pause. In the first place, the as a mate, is, in the majority of cases, terr of such a union is convict by heredity and de

On this subject, Mr. Zhook, quoting Mr. of Russian Prisons from 1896, says, 'The so who are given to the settlers to help them, a households, consider themselves as having t and they leave their partners if the latter try Usually, however, this is not the case, as th
Mr. Zhook adds, 'Deprived of all civil rights family; but it is impossible to deprive her o co-habitation; and once she forsakes her 'ma to settle down with another one. This, indee women are subjected.' At the same time, it in the minority, (1) the power to leave their

1. The numbers of men and women on the he second generation, it is possible, this en into account, and which ought to give e moral effect on the woman who is chosen ible; and in the second place, the offspring noralized by environment.

P. A. Salomon, who was Director-in-Chief -called concubines, i. e. the exiled women nd for the mutual management of their he right freely to dispose of themselves; to prevent them admitting outside visitors.
e co-habitants share all their earnings.'
, she loses by law the right to have a the right to feel disgust towards the forced ster' there is no other way open to her but l, is that 'hard labour' to which criminal should be pointed out, that the women being men' has a restraining effect, and in the island who had been sent out as

: Hawes--141-145 T-3 (1901) 1903
16, 563

Vhat more awful charge against the officials han in these words, 'There is not a girl over irgin.' "

and the criminal population can be made nine years of age on the island who is a

9: Hawes--187-188 T-3
116, 361, 563

"From the delta of the Tim we mad cluster of huts on the inner side of th our light craft rocked, and the morni villages of Nivo [188] (the first, for t adorned with pine branches, stood ou dogs, barking and splashing, stopped ance of strangers. A verst or two be a tent, and as we waded ashore we w into the presence of a Russian police

It was a strange, out-of-the-way p cumstances accounted for his practic le across the bay in a north-easterly direction t e dune. The wind was already making itself felt ng air struck cold on our damp clothes. The here are two) and Kamavo, with their bear-cage t prominently on the sandy level, and a crowd o their fishing to show resentment at the appear-yond Kamavo our boat was beached, where stoo ere accosted by two or three Kazaks, who led u officer.

lace to be stationed at, and only exceptional cir al banishment to this far-away spot."

Hawes--309-310 T-3 (1901) 1903
6, 563

rannize over him, and unfortunately for thos selenie, or Chief of the exile department, wa

e in the Alexandrovsk okrug, the smotr as a man of very bad repute."

: Hawes--341-342 T-3 (1901) 1903
16, 563

"Compared with the criminal population the r nsignificant. According to the census of Janua nd eighty engaged in hard labour they numbere hough not so terrible as that of their friends in he Arctic Circle. The greatest hardship [342] rom their homeland, and the banishment from

Gilyak

umber of political exiles on Sakhalin is ry 1, 1898, out of a total of seven thousand ed seventy-six. Their fate is bad enough, such a place as Sredni Kolimsk, within that awaits them on Sakhalin is the exile anything like educated society."

9: Hawes--337-339 T-3 (1901) 1903
116, 563

"There is another class of prisoners besides the the so-called 'free-commands,' or ticket-of-leave —may be seen going to the prison to get their quota to the post [LSS: At Alexandrovsk] I often passed gr skirts and great top felt boots, long frieze khalati ( tell-tale patch of yellow cloth let in the back. These 'wives' of 'exile-settlers;' the others, retained by the prison, were kept in the building, where they co window to the right of the main entrance to the pris

The law provides that any criminal with a sentenc eight months; any woman, not exceeding forty years or over; and any political exile, at the discretion o to Sakhalin. The ukaz of 1900, in reference to exile put an immediate stop to their deportation; [338] bu labour are not contemplated in the proclamation, th political exiles continue to arrive on Sakhalin. The register the desire of the penal authorities; to indic reserving to themselves the right of dealing with sp realizing their scheme in their own time.

Criminals on their arrival are classified accordi soldier-gang and the overseer-gang, men, many of whom—men and women of work every morning. On my way roups of these, the women in short overcoats), with the diamond-shaped e were convicts who had become the the officials nominally for cleaning ould be seen through the bars of the on offices.

ce of not less than two years and s of age, with a sentence of two years f the Government, may be deported s, has generally been thought to have t exiles with a sentence of hard erefore it is that criminal and ukaz may be considered rather to cate the line they wish to take, while ecial cases in their own way, and ng to their sentence. Those with a

9: Hawes--337-339 T-3 (1901) 1903
116, 563

sentence of twelve years and upwards are put int These are mostly murderers, and, if they have chains are not struck off after the journey, but t called the kandalnaya turma (chained prison).

The 'reformatory' prison contains those with a those with less than four years are treated, afte This latter division includes brodyagi from Russ years, and the same class from Siberia, who ge

Promotion is from the 'testing' to the 'reform command' division, the length of time spent in e prisoner. Under the most favourable conditions 'testing' prison, whereas another may be confine one may say, that a third of the term is spent in Strictly speaking, 'free-command,' according the 'reformatory' gaol, as well as those outside, clearer.

The arrival of the free-born wife of a convict prison, and he may [339] forthwith live as a 'fre full term of hard labour to fulfil. On the part of comes from marriage—or, rather, her choice b o the worst gaol, the 'testing' prison.

proved themselves recalcitrant, their hey are confined to that portion of it a term of four to twelve years, while r a short sojourn, as 'free-commands.' ia, who are sentenced to one and a half t four years' hard labour.

atory' gaol, and from there to the 'freeach depending upon the behaviour of the a man may pass only four years in the ed for eight, or even more. As a whole, each section.
to Russian terminology, includes all in , but I have adopted this distinction as will gain even a murderer release from e-command;' but, of course, having his the female criminal a similar alleviation y an exile. This will free her from the

9: Hawes--337-339 T-3 (1901) 1903
116, 563

prison walls, and she may live, as we have seen hard labour duty is done.

On the other hand, many incur additional sente violence. A prisoner who escapes and is recaptu the plet, but may get an addition of anything fron sentence. In the year 1900 the prisoners on Sakha numbered 510, of whom 70 were women; but ther seem, had more than a life sentence. These wer yet to undergo a term of between 40 and 50 years one was a woman, had sentences between 30 and 30 years to their credit.

The expiration of a sentence does not bring wit Sakhalin, for the ex-convict regains his rights or he must remain on the island as an 'exile-settler which so few are—to get away, he may go as a ' another six years. Then only is he at liberty to r

, with her 'man' on condition that her ences by escape, theft, and deeds of red, not only receives a flogging with n a quarter to the whole of his original alin sentenced to hard labour for life e were those who, Irish as it may e already well advanced in life, and had

s. There were 13 such, while 51, of whom 40 years, and 240 had between 20 and th it the long-hoped-for farewell to nly by degrees. For six years more ; ' and then, if he is in a position—peasant' to the mainland ~~of~~ Siberia for eturn to Russia."

9: Hawes--401 T-3 (
116, 133, 563

"The morning after my departure It is a well-sheltered harbour, with thirty feet off Observatory Island, a officers set up their instruments on position. To the south of this is a sn east is Basalt Island. Near the south Kamp a fine lighthouse, then about t navigation. On the north-western sh Alexandrovsk post, consisting of a t assistants, and a tiny church and ba there. To the north and south stretc Oroktis. Around the bay the hills ris clothed with trees, save where the t lighted by the Russians. It is a lonel by ice from all navigation, it is only river Amur, which is itself served b in one respect was it at that time be cecting it with Vladivostok was intac and Steam Shipping Company had jus aw the Tsitsikar standing in for De Castries Bay.

a depth at entrance of fifty feet, diminishing to bold islet so named by La Pérouse, because his it, after a long interval, to determine their exact nall islet called Oyster Island, and to the north-nern head stands up on the promontory of Kloster o be deserted by the pilots with the cessation of ore of the bay, at the mouth of the river Somon, is elegraph-office, with the houses of the Chief and his rracks for the small company of soldiers stationed h forests, uninhabited save by a few roaming e to a height of 1100 and even to 1540 feet, thickly ell-tale brown slopes witnessed to fires carelessly y spot at any time, and especially in winter. Cut off accessible to the post by dog-sledges from the y relays of horse-sledges from distant parts. Only ter off than Alexandrovsk; the telegraph-wire cont. In this secluded spot the Chinese Eastern Railway t stationed an agent."

9: Hawes--335-336 T-3 (1901) 1903
116, 563

"In picturing Alexandrovsk, the reader must and factories. The chief feature, around which If there are three or four merchants' stores, a prisoners; if there are well-to-do-looking woo cials, they exist because of the prisoners, and small ethnological and natural history collectio political exiles. The Siberian traveller cannot to these banished ones. On the mainland at Mir much has been due to Mr. Kuznetsov, and wha these two excellent collections. To one of this perial Academy of Sciences is now no longer e museum at Alexandrovsk; . . . . . .[3

In addition to the buildings mentioned, there overlooking the market-place, or bazar, wher huddled together, are the Muhammadan mosqu the bridge the road to the jetty is bordered by and close to the pristan, facing the sea, are qu lazaret, where the maimed and the halt, who c rations. Outside of these, the chief buildings, huts where the ex-convicts, and in some cases not think of it as a town with busy shops the whole place centres, is the prison.

nd an iron foundry, these are for the den houses, the residences of the offilast, if there is a museum containing a on, that is a sign of the presence of be long ignorant of the debt science owes usinsk and at Chita every one knows how t worthy memorials he has raised in class, who, thanks to the Russian Imxiled from Europe, is practically due the 36]. . . . . . is the church in the main street, and e an ill-assorted collection of huts is e and the little Lutheran church. Beyond long store-houses, guarded by patrols, uarantine and bonded sheds, and the can still work, do a little to earn their is the great body of small cottages or married convicts, live."

623 usually concern abductions of women or major transgres-681 sions and crimes. Women do not take part in them. The opinions of the older generation usually are decisive. In cases of particular importance the Gilyaks of surrounding villages are drawn in. The penalties for crimes consist of fines in money for the plaintiffs, in banishment of the guilty one from the village, or in a sort of ostracism which results in a cessation of all intercourse with him. Occasionally, though rarely, the death penalty is pronounced, but this is of course kept a secret from the Russian administration. As for corporal punishment, the Gilyak are no adherents of the idea. It is sometimes applied, but there is evidence that formerly it was never used.

578 Quarrels between men sometimes lead to a duel. It is 411 conducted in the presence of witnesses. The weapon used is the kaur, but in this case they fight with the end which does not have the iron point. The challenger deals the first blow, the blows are parried as much as possible with the stick. The fight usually continues until blood is drawn or one of the fighters is stunned and reels. This fight seldom ends in death. Sometimes when two Gilyak get very angry- which, however, seldom happens- they reach for their knives and begin stabbing each other in disregard of any kind of rules. [228]

● 563 A sad spectacle are the man-hunts, i.e., persecution of 177 fleeing Russian criminals, which the Gilyak also sometimes carry on. Such refugees or so-called broydagi (i.e., loafers) are a common sight on all large highways in Siberia and the direction they take is always the same, that is, from east to west. Most of them are convicts who have escaped from forced labor. Since the island of Sakhalin was chosen as the chief deportation center for non-political criminals, these brodyagi also pass through the Amur region. Very few of them escape in order to go back to their homes, i.e., European Russia. Even though the thought of home, of their native villages and families may arouse warm, tender emotions in even the most hardened criminals, nevertheless, these refugees know too well the possibility of arrest to entertain great hopes. The usual practical goal which they hold up to themselves is-not to be recognized in case of arrest and thus to be put in the general class of brodyagi in which they would also be condemned to hard labor, but only for a few years, after which they could become Siberian citizens. Others, finally, escape without any particular

● 563 hopes, merely from an ungovernable yen for liberty and 177 diversion, although they know they will be only too easily recognized and will only earn a more severe punishment.

563 The hardships and dangers which these unfortunate ones 609 must sometimes endure, especially in winter, are hair-177 raising and some of the stories which they tell as though they were nothing unusual, sound like epics. A large number of them perish. One of the dangers which they must guard against in the Amur country and the Transbaykal is persecution at the hands of the natives, in which activity particularly those kinsmen of the Huns, the wild Buryats on Lake Baykal, distinguish themselves. To them, a brodyaga is as good as wild game, they aim at him wherever they meet him, and take whatever they find on the dead man. They do this with all assurance for they know that the deed will not be investigated. In recent times this bestial custom has also crept in among the Goldi and the Gilyak. The brodyagi themselves gave the impetus to these animosities. Most of them are perfectly docile, peaceable human beings who are glad if [229] they are left alone, and are therefore little feared by the Russians themselves; they are given a night's lodging, a hunk of bread, and no one thinks of notifying an official. Now among these "unfortunate ones" (1)

> 1. This is what they are called by the Siberians, some of whom are themselves descendants of exiles and have had experiences of their own which corroborate the words of Staël "tout savoir c'est tout pardonner".

there are sometimes real villains who cannot conceal their wolf-like nature. Furthermore, among deportees there are not infrequently to be found people who are simply pathological, suffering from homicidal mania, who belong anywhere but in a penal colony. Such ugly customers make trouble when they escape. There have been cases where entire Gilyak families were murdered even by those who were hospitably received by the natives. As a result, it is easy to imagine that the Gilyak also began playing a different tune. After such precedents, greed and rapacity may now and then also have arisen in the soul of the savage, even though such a refugee would not have been carrying much. Thus the brodyagi now avoid the native villages, and if they are forced to pass near-by, they go in bands and take

● 563 general precautions. Nevertheless, it happens that now 609 and then one of these unfortunates is shot down in the woods 177 by Gilyaks, even though the majority of them would not think of concealing themselves with such a disgraceful hunt.

181 XIII Economic and Social Conditions.

671 Among Gilyak there is no question of a body of laws, to say nothing of written statutes. Nevertheless, common law which functions in place of fixed statutes is equitable and just. The shadow of a prerogative may be felt only where it is accompanied by real qualities. But even the preponderance of natural talents is very modest; the race consists of individuals among whom the capabilities as well as the assets which are given them by nature are pretty evenly distributed.

556 There are "rich" and "poor" Gilyak, but these terms must 595 be interpreted in a very limited sense. A wealthy man who is in a position to support three to four wives is a rare exception. The "rich" man, besides having a greater number of wives, possesses objects which have a certain value, such as "beautiful" clothes [230], many and good dogs, etc. and sometimes quite useless objects which are kept merely for effect, as, for instance, lengths of cloth of gold (which in Greek churches are used for various decorations). The above-mentioned clumsy lances belong to such luxury articles. There are many rich men who keep on hand a couple hundred silver rubles in a box.

735 Contrariwise, there are very few Gilyak who are not 438 capable of supporting a single wife or even themselves.
556 Such individuals are either sick or alcoholics, for there are 261 no actual reasons for external poverty: fish, game, wood, berries etc., are everywhere to be found, but of course one must obtain them with one's own efforts. A scarcity of fish is a rare exception among the Amur-Gilyak. It happens in those years in which the kita is scarce (this usually coincides with very high water). The Sakhalin-Gilyak often have reason to complain of a scarcity, for there the various species of salmon, even in ordinary years, do not come up the rivers in such numbers. On the other hand, they have more bears, and thus the island Gilyak are in a position to trade young bears for dried fish with their mainland kinsmen.

If there are not enough fish, the Gilyak eats cedar nuts, berries, game, etc. All these are of course only a poor substitute, but in any case we cannot speak of actual "famines" here.

461 Under ordinary circumstances it takes little effort on the ● 563 part of the Gilyak to nourish himself and his family. It is 512 only during the salmon run that the Gilyak works hard, during the rest of the time only the women are industrious. The men often sleep at home during the day, and they get up after sunrise. In the evening, however, they often sit up a long time and chat. Well-to-do mainland Gilyak sometimes even hire Russian workmen. The men who work for gold-seekers are discharged in the autumn and could live quite well throughout the winter on their pay, but it never occurs to them to save; in a few weeks everything is spent and then they do not know what to do. Such hungry chaps often wander as far as the Gilyak villages and pledge themselves to cut wood and do odd jobs in exchange for board.

464 Gilyak hate monotonous work. In the vicinity of Nikolayevsk-426 na-Amure [231] they sometimes turn to haying in order to 567 earn something; but as for digging, wood cutting, sawing and similar work, they do not let themselves be enticed into it even for good wages. This, moreover, shows that they are ordinarily not in great straits. The Gilyak almost never trade on a commission basis.

Among themselves they are very punctual about paying. If a debtor dies or becomes incapable of working, his relatives endeavor to pay off his debts. They know nothing whatever of going into bondage or slavery because of debt.

428 The law of inheritance is very simple. The father's 587 property goes to the children if they no longer have a mother. If the children are under age, their uncle or some other close relative is their guardian and later returns their property if it has not been entirely used up. If a widow is left with children, the property remains intact in the family, and the mother is called "the elder" in possession. If the widow is childless she keeps a small part, about an eighth of the fortune, the rest belongs to the relatives of the deceased. If she wishes to enter a new marriage, the brother or some other close relative of the husband becomes, as we said, her second spouse, but if she already has children, they keep the estate of their father. If she is poor and does not wish to re-marry, she must be helped, and this help 428 she usually pays off in work as best she can. If a father 583 whose wife died earlier leaves a son or daughter, the estate is usually divided upon the daughter's marriage. In this case, the relatives of the bride look over the bridegroom. If they regard him as irreproachable, the bride gets half, but if he is not of the best sort, she gets less, probably in

13: Seeland--57 E-5 (no date) 1882 Gilyak

164 The Gilyaks are unfamiliar with scurvy, although the 563 Russians suffer from it more than in Europe. I have 342 spoken in another connection (1) of the fact that I believe 362

1. St. Petersburg Med., Wochenschrift, No. 2-3. 1882.

this illness can be traced to earth miasmas, and particularly to external ones rising up from the extensive marshes and bogs, as well as house miasmas. The fact that the natives are immune [248] may be attributed partly to habit, (for Europeans suffer most from it when they first arrive) and especially to the functional construction of the houses. Russian barracks and private houses stand on frame work which soon rots. Below the wood floor there is rotten wood and damp earth which does not freeze even in winter. The houses are badly ventilated and frequently have a definite odor of mould. The Gilyak house has a solid floor of pressed clay which does not let the earth miasmas penetrate; it is well ventilated and is often filled with smoke whose disinfectant qualities perhaps have an effect. Diet seems to be only a limited factor in this question.

164 Another endemic disease, chronic stomach and intestinal catarrh, occurs among the Gilyak, but relatively seldom and soon disappears. It is usually accompanied by unbearable colic. This catarrh is also of miasmatic origin.

In spite of the constant fish diet, the Gilyak seldom suffers from tape worm. Among Russians, too, it seems to come mainly from pork, but the Gilyak rarely get this meat.

Bronchial catarrh occurs frequently, and pneumonia seems the most frequent of the serious acute illnesses of the Gilyak. The children of the Gilyak villages also suffered from a whooping cough epidemic that was prevalent during my time in Nikolayevsk-na-Amure.

Eye diseases occur more seldom than one would expect, for in general, tribes that live in smoky houses frequently suffer from them and present many one-eyed and blind cases. The Gilyak houses are not always full of smoke, to be sure, but so frequently that the relative absence of these diseases must be attributed to a greater insensitivity of the eye nerves. Actually, everyone who has been inside a Gilyak house will be convinced that the natives can remain calmly seated in smoke clouds that would immediately drive 164 a European out. However, the Gilyak do not escape entirely 293 unpunished. One finds among them people with chronic

10: Gehest--2 U-2 (1884-85) 1887 Gilyak

101 edition), p. 390 and note 7. Venukov's 142 observation that the language of the Gilyak is radically different from that of the Tungus is completely confirmed by Jakobsen. That is the reason for the wording of the text.

differentiated from the neighboring Goldi with regard to language whereas in biological make-up they are only slightly different from them. According to photographs that the traveller acquired on the spot and has brought with him, the beard growth of the Gilyak seems to be somewhat heavier than that of the Goldi, without however, reaching the thick-101 ness of growth of the Ainu on Sakhalin Island. Originally they probably occupied the bank of the Amur up to the Gorin, while nowadays the southern boundary of their territory lies about 100 versts above Nikolayevsk and their former territory is now inhabited by the transitional people that we mentioned repeatedly in number 10 of this volume [see Goldi source 18: Genest--Analyst]. They occupy the northern part of Sakhalin Island but one will also encounter them among the Ainu in the southern part of the island where they probably came as laborers for the Japanese fishers (3) or

3. We will have more to say below about the Japanese fishers on Sakhalin Island. Jakobsen encountered Gilyak even on Aniva Bay.

361 for the purpose of hunting sable. Formerly their settle-563 ments were particularly numerous along the shallow shore 166 of the island across from the mouth of the Amur. But these 226 had [379] disappeared by the time Jakobsen passed along 231 this stretch of shore because the Gilyak who used to live 133 there had fled from the maltreatments of the convicts deported to Sakhalin Island. They had, however, established new settlements near their former residences, for the traveller observed a large number of boats the occupants of which were Gilyak engaged in fishing in the sound (1).

1. In all these boats there were also dogs which were set on land to pull the boats along whenever the wind was against the fishermen as well as whenever they were struggling against the strong north-south current that predominates in the Tatar Strait.

CONTINUED ON NEXT FICHE

CONTINUED FROM PRECEDING FICHE

796 elder who also det 622 to be killed by the 574 village as such but the captured anima 796 on this point the ar 777 house to house sev spend a night in ea 796 by their stay. Dur food, but at the en voluntary fast by b to house and fed th fish, berries and a 796 While making th 563 irritated by being hunt staged on ther been captured your the Chinese or Ma 796 Gilyak territory. I take the precautior they cannot easily front legs they tie attached rings thro chains, in turn, th considerable lengt others backward.
and in this way the pletely still by alte whether the bear i wants to attack its 796 Outside the villa 417 willow sticks, whi fenced in on both s this enclosure the 796 the village, is tie 541 to itself for a whil 231 themselves with th 437 celebrations. In th a track especially ever, was not very track by their own were let loose at i arrived at the fini way, no idea of wi not even exist. Ra since the race ser in the right light a ernines how many and which bears are consent of their owners, for it is not the individuals in it who are the owners of ls. Once an agreement has been reached imals intended for slaughter are led from eral weeks before the fixed date and must ch, in order to bring its inhabitants luck ng this time the animals get only a little d of it they are indemnified for their in-eing taken throughout the night from house e choicest tidbits, namely, fresh and dried thick gruel prepared from millet.

e rounds through the village, the bears are pricked, and they are enraged by a mock n with lances. The bears are ones that have g in the woods or bought full-grown from nchu who are also quite numerous in the During the mock-hunt the Gilyak naturally of tying the animals in such a way that get at their tormentors. Close behind the a strap around their body to which are ough which are run iron chains. To these ey fasten thick belts of seal hide and of h, in such a way that some go forward and A number of Gilyak take hold of these belts y are able to force the bear to stand com-ernately tightening the belts depending on s turned frontwards or backwards when it leaders.
ge there is a kind of fence made of sturdy ch has an opening for an avenue that is also ies with similar willow sticks. Inside bear, after it has finished its tour through between two tree trunks. There it is left e, while the inhabitants of the village amuse e dog race almost always held at these e village visited by Jakobsen they also had constructed for this purpose, which, how-long. After the dogs had been led to the ers and placed next to each other, they ntervals of a few seconds, but they all sh about the same time. There is, by the nning prizes at this race, since such do ther, it might be called a purchasing race ves to [illegible] the good qualities of the dogs nd thus to arouse a desire for buying. The 156 The shamans possess great power over their superstitious subjects, and their commands are rarely refused. I heard of an instance wherein a native caught a fine sable and preserved the skin as a trophy. Very soon a man in the village fell ill. The shaman after practicing his art announced that the spirit commanded the sable skin to be worn by the doctor himself. The valuable fur was given up without hesitation. A Russian traveler stopping one night in a Gilyak house discovered in the morning that his sledge was missing, and was gravely told that the spirit had taken it.

156 In 1814 the small pox raged in one of the tribes living on the Kolyma river, and the deaths from it were numerous.
164 The shamans practiced all their mysteries and invoked the spirits, but they could not stop the disease. Finally, after new invocations, they declared the evil spirits could not be appeased without the death of Kotschen, a chief of the tribe. This chief was so generally loved and respected that the people refused to obey the shamans. But as the malady made new progress, Kotschen magnanimously came forward and was stabbed by his own son.

156 In general the shamans are held in check by the belief that should they abuse their power they will be long and severely punished after death. This punishment is supposed to occur in a locality specially devoted to bad shamans. A good shaman who has performed wonderful cures receives after death a magnificent tomb to his memory.

797 The Russians think that with educated Gilyaks they can 563 succeed in winning the natives to Christianity, especially when the missionaries are skilled in the useful arts of civilized life. Hence the school in Mihalofski, and it has so far succeeded well in the instruction of the boys. Russian and Gilyak children were working in the gardens in perfect harmony, and there was every indication of good feeling between natives and settlers.

order that he may not squander the property. On Sakhalin, only the sons inherit the parents, and the daughters are married off. If after the death of the parents only one daughter is left behind, she usually gets part of the estate upon her marriage, the rest is kept by the relatives who took care of her. In any case, if the bride has a dowry, the man has no right to it; he can get hold of it only by going against the wishes of his wife.

In the matter of succession, it is true, the procedure is not everywhere and always [232] the same, but in general one can draw the following conclusions from what has been said: a) the children take precedence over other relatives; b) the brothers take precedence over their sisters, provided the latter marry and thus share the fortune of their husband; c) the joint usufruct of the estate on the part of the nearest relatives is very common; d) women may inherit and have their own property, but in general they are not left as much; however, they have the right to be supported; e) widows can demand their own share, but usually they become joint owners of the estate along with their children.

The Gilyak are all of one class. There are no privileged classes or families. There are families, now and then, who are held in great esteem because of wealth, courage, or because their ancestor was founder of the village, but they have no real privileges of any kind. Such families also have family names (which are handed down by the males); many Gilyak, however, have only one single name to which is added the name of their village, to distinguish them from outsiders. Some of them, whether they are baptized or not, are given this or that Russian name besides their Gilyak one, and by this name they are known even among their fellow-tribesmen. These "Petkas," "Mikias", etc., are usually intelligent lads and understand Russian.

In like manner, there are no slaves, nor have there ever been any among these people. Only personal qualities, either bravery, wealth, age, or intelligence, give the individual a certain significance. Wealth may be regarded with a certain esteem, since it is usually acquired as a result of real superiority, - either courage, industry or judgment. Toward aristocrats of wealth a certain external ceremony is occasionally observed. If such a person comes for a visit, both he and the host bow after a fashion, whereupon he holds up his cheek to be kissed; he himself does not kiss the other.

567

567 SLAVERY--presence or absence of a servile class of chattel slaves; number of slaves and proportion in the population; activities of slaves; methods of control; treatment; stigmata; rights and privileges of slaves (e.g., to hold property, to marry, to contract debts); rights, privileges, and powers of masters (e.g., to kill, to sell, to hire out); enslavement (e.g., of war captives, for debt, for crime); slave trade; permanency of servile status (e.g., hereditary, for life); redemption (e.g., manumission, adoption, purchase of freedom, escape, asylum); intermarriage between slaves and freemen; status of children of mixed marriages; etc.; See also:

Enlvement of criminals	681	Prisoners of war	727
Slave revolt	733

/280 cont./

583 It is a remnant of matemality when the mother's brother played 583 a privileged role; the contemporary institution of unilateral cousin 197 marriage among the Gilyak appeared to replace the more ancient bilateral one when every maiden was obliged to marry the son of her mother's brother, and thus the custom which we are observing is a remnant of a more ancient norm of marriage.

583 I turn now to the other principal obligation, the companion to the institution of marriage -- to the dowry.

583 For the dowry the Gilyak have the term jokh shond:, signi-556 fying literally -- "the thing which is brought by the bride, the woman." The dowry consists mainly of various types of clothing and ornaments. The dowry of a rich bride consists of an assortment of valuable fur-coats -- fox and sable -- and silver bracelets, expensive earrings, Chinese pipes, and also rich, carved, and decorated dishes, including an assortment of artistically decorated birch spoons. The mother usually gives her ornaments to her daughter, and sometimes also a bed, but for some reason one must not give away pillows. They begin to prepare the dowry in the very earliest years and continue up until the marriage of the maiden. This is called jokh wakh -- "to get the bride ready." They lay away the dowry in good time in sacred chests with the family valuables, among which, in a well-to-do family, the bride usually sits solemnly. The size of the dowry usually should be proportional to the size of the bride price. When the 556 gossiping women talk about one or another wedding, they refer ●567 to a "rich" and a "poor" dowry. It is considered a matter of the greatest pride to provide the daughter with a male or female slave besides her things. In the clan of a Gilyak of my acquaintance, Yuskin, they gave to a maiden as part of her dowry a female slave (aina) whom they had purchased with a Japanese sabre for cleaning the soles of her mistress' boots. Especially ambitious rich people set aside a separate house for their daughter-bride, and a slave, who is later given to her as dowry, is put in it to serve her.

583 The dowry, although it is compensation for the bride 422 price, since it frees the husband from great expenditures for the wife, is nevertheless exclusively a gift to the bride, her private property /281/ to which the husband has no rights whatsoever.

/298 cont./

614 A bear festival is held also for other reasons, /299/ for 614 instance, for reconciliation with one's son-in-law /kyat/, kishal 606 or alien. If a person offends his son-in-law, for example, in 609 making a purchase, he keeps silent, and the k:khal keeps silent, but they will continue to sulk until a bear festival is held by the offender for reconciliation (urla lytnydz).

796 A bowl, hyl, for the bread is necessary for each new bear 415 festival. The head of the bear is always placed in a new bowl, while the old one is used for meat and the like. Anyone can prepare a dish for the bear festival. The bowl for the meat is bound with the penis of the bear. A bowl from which the bear is fed for the last time in the yurt, and always on the side opposite the door, is called pukstov-n'ir.

796 When a brother gives his sister a bear as a gift, he himself 797 is not permitted to bring it; he must come after it with pomp.
[231] The bear is greeted with zadz-chadz music. When the master feeds his bear for the last time, he says to it: "U'nr humyjá! Wingan drur humyjá--live well! When you go, live well."

The gift giver does not shoot the bear and departs as soon as the festival is over, without even tasting (a morsel), while he must bring with him mos' and all kinds of dishes.

796 When a bear falls sick, then they hold pying-tvysk and prepare uig, mos', from all sorts of delicacies and all sorts of berries.
Luk: -- a dog which has been born specially for the uig.
[792] When a dog is sacrificed, its skin, head and bones are laid [184] on a wooden frame near the lenring where the bones of the bear are placed. Some clans hang bear heads on trees. This place is called k:ork ngangof.

V.

Slaves

●567 The son of a slave remains free to the nèck (i.e., his head [196] is free), his grandson -- to the belt, his great grandson -- to the feet; in the fourth generation -- the descendants are "pure."
[683] Then he is a k:khal, i.e., a kinsman of the master, and if anyone [614]

/299 cont./

●567 calls him a slave, he can bring suit against them, and therefore [683] when you ask the descendant of a slave what clan he is from, he [614] replies quietly: "Pilavon k:khal purarś hokhagirn ot' krygrys" (1).

1. Krygrys -- an Aimu slave; akh -- a Chinese one.

i.e., that he is from the Pilavo clan, by origin a slave ("root [195] slave"). When people swear, they say: "You are pure only to your neck, while there you are impure."

/300/ If a krygrys bought himself free and his master had to give him a wife, an economy, and part with him, he would still be considered a krygrys, impure. Every krygrys was considered a k:khal, and, until he passed to a free state, he was avenged, and he participated in the sacrifices. A good krygrys [692] is given a share of his earnings -- he has the right to half of the income and can claim it through the courts -- of the khlaj-n'ivukh; older women have the right to participate in a trial (they are invited and have the right to come themselves if they feel sympathy for the slave). It is permitted to complain about beatings/

A krygrys woman cannot demand a share in court, because she is married. Nor can a share be demanded for her by her husband.

A Chinese slave, akh, has the same rights as the krygrys.
[682] A free one is kistylygy n'ivukh ("pure"). The killing of a slave [614] is punished by the clan. When drunk, they revile the murderer: "If you are a brave man, we have an elder beast (pal pila kour -- big mountain bear, mer edr -- tiger), fight with him; it would have been better if you had killed a bear and treated us. We do not need brave men like you. You can only exhibit your courage in front of your wife." The women in particular attack him. Even at the present time, however, the descendants of the [162] krygrys are treated with condescension. In 1909 two yurts of former slaves still stood in Tashira.

Slaves were most frequently acquired through the purchase [580] of Amiu women, who received a male and a female slave as a

/300 cont./

●567 part of their dowry. In buying wives, the price corresponded to [582] the additional slaves. In 1896 a former slave, about whom we have the following information, lived there. A Nanti brought from Kizi-a Kugi (Aimu) maiden, and an illegitimate child was born. Khuzin's father bought the son of this Kugi (krygrys) in [435] Kizi. He was 25 years old; he was paid for with nine pieces of silk material (21 meters) at 75 rubles a piece.

This worker served him for five years. Eighteen years ago he ran away to Kizi-a, and then to Ayan (near Nizhneimbovskiy). The name of this krygrys was Kutr. His former master from Khez' summoned him to conduct shaman ceremonies, and he used this opportunity to run away. Now he is an old man and blind. One absolutely must take him back, though blind, feed him, and bury him with their own hands, and then his soul will follow him to the Pilavo (his father, dying, requested this of him).

Chinese girls were bought in a similar fashion. It was necessary to take along 100 sables, 100 foxes, 100 otters, 100 squirrels, 100 polecats, between 10 and 100 black-brown foxes, 100 seals, and 100 bears. The travelers to Sansin were met by a merchant who would take away all their merchandise and, without counting it, would transport it to his warehouse. The visitors would be feted for two days and /301/ questioned in Goldi or through an interpreter. The newcomers would tell their hosts about their wish to get married, then they would record how much each had brought, and they would be taken to the governor. He would provide carriages and food, and they would be transported to the major city (Peking). They would be introduced and accommodated in the palace, assigned servants, fed and looked after like "gentlemen," and taken around the city with an interpreter. Finally whole rows of women with covers over their faces would be lined up in front of them; behind each woman would stand a castrated slave. The old Gilyak would recommend: "A young male slave -- an old woman -- a risk." They would choose right there; they would each be led to a room. A slave would sweep and spread out the bedding, and that very night he would learn his fate. They were painted. He sticks his tongue in the mouth; there are no teeth.

/301 cont./

●567 They would journey back to Sansin with their wives and
slaves; there each was given a one -- or many-masted boat, which was loaded with provisions for ten years, with garments, silks, and so forth, for the entire family. Upon their return the purchased wives would already be pregnant. If a daughter was born, they gave her a slave for her dowry. Those who came to Sansin only to pay their yassak /tribute paid in fur/ (one sable) received two combs, a piece of drel', ten bottles of khanshin, and so forth. Aimu women were bought in this way: they went hunting, brought sables and so forth, and also Chinese goods, and bought wives on the way.

A woman who married into the Jusk'in clan received as a dowry from her father a female slave -- akh, who was provided with a Japanese sword for cleaning her mistress' soles. Then a Gilyak bought her in exchange for his own daughter. Poor fathers (generally) sold their daughters into slavery.

VI.

The Family and the Clan

595 Marriage norms and totemic clans. Clanmen-brothers may support one wife, but only one of them is regarded as the master, even though both together bought the wife; the second one enjoys marital rights only in the absence of the first.

If they have lived together for one year after another, a husband consults his elder wife as to whom else he should take. And she herself may travel to select a helper from her own khal or from an alien one, and the wives call each other sisters. A man sleeps separately, and each wife separately, or the man in the middle. The elder wife takes care of all the children. The younger cannot give orders to her, and she commands. It sometimes happens that they are jealous and fight. The following go to do the betrothing: 1) father and mother, 2) elder brother, 3) father's brother, 4) husband of father's sister.

/341 cont./

VII.

Miscellanea

148 The exploitation of the Sakhalin natives by the Russians (Sibel'ka's 199 story). The merchant Ivanov sorely abused the Gilyak, Ainu, Orochon, the Amur Gilyak; he ruined the Tymovsk Gilyak and others. He forced people to buy packages of tobacco and then took two or three sables per package. /345/ He collected debts by force, breaking into the storehouses, breaking trunks, holding in one hand a revolver and a dagger. He used to give some kind of cider to women (see above, p. 180, "Women, Childbirth, and Children"), and they slept with him. Then he became rich.

But the god did not forget all his deeds. Once his son went boating on the Amur and drowned. The Gilyak in Pronga recognized the cast-up body and informed the merchant. But when the arrived the body was gone; he saw only the tracks of a bear. By these footprints she reached the place where the bear dwelt with its prey. Only a gold ring was left at the scene of the death. The mother cried and cried and went back. Ivanov himself, not yet an old man, began to pine and to lose weight; no medicines helped. Finally he died. The Yakut Semenchuk was one of those who dug him a grave on the cemetery hill.
But the hole filled with water, and, no matter how they dug, the water level increasing. This was the fear of those people whom he had abused. These tears do not disappear. Alongside of it a grave was dug for another, a poor person, and it was without water.

567 A good father teaches his son not to abuse anybody, not to laugh at anybody.

567 Slaves -- krygyn (1896). In Kukiyash (?) a krygyn was exchanged for a woman. In Vayalakh -- a krygyn, Khyrumlu, a limping woman; she was beaten and beaten, everyone ordered her about,
"she did not have time to eat"; one could not sleep with her, for no one wanted to have krygyn children. There were krygyn also in Tymgik, Tevalih, Kutt. The nix (see p. 222,IV) of Sibel'ka had krygyn.

/346 cont./

595 pretence of several women around one man in the same room and in a common household it, in the long run, scarcely con-575 ceivable. Therefore very rich Gilyak who are impelled by 575 vanity to display their wealth and indulge in the luxury of 556 polygamy, frequently seize upon another means to lighten the work for their wives and, without disturbing the peace, to be able to favor one or another of them. This means is to keep slaves, usually of the female, but sometimes of the male sex,
for the purpose of performing the heaviest work in the house.
575 These, however, are by no means to be thought of as lone Gilyak 357 men or women who attach themselves to a family and, in exchange for free food and lodging, assume the obligation to perform the heavy work in the house, such as fetching water, felling and splitting firewood, etc. There are such domestic persons, who are hired, so to speak, among the Gilyak, but the situation 567 that they are in is entered into by them voluntarily, it can be dissolved at will, and it in no way deprives them of the esteem of their countrymen, nor does it injure their social position with equal rights among them.

The situation is entirely different, however, with regard to the slaves. The Gilyak have a special term for them: kryghysin, or, with a statement of the sex, kryghysyn-umgu -- female slave, and kr.-umgu -- slave of the male sex. It is to be 567 stressed, first of all, that they are never and under no circumstances Gilyak, but are always individuals bought from the neighboring tribes, Ainu or Goldi. The Ainu (Kughi) supply the most slaves, and especially female slaves, to the Gilyak, the Goldi supply them in smaller numbers, and, to be sure, the "Jani" as well as the "Tscholdoh," that is, the lower as well as the upper Goldi. The Gilyak were unable to name for me any other tribes furnishing them with slaves. Thus, significantly enough, the 567 shameful sale of girls and boys of their own tribe into slavery is practiced only by the two peoples of the Amur region who are the immediate neighbors of the two civilized peoples of East Asia, the Japanese and Chinese, and who are the most dominated and oppressed by them. It is certainly no mere accident that the

567 /646 cont./

(190) purchase price in some other form. Slaves of the male sex are
(648) cheaper, but also less desirable, chiefly because they are less (181) handy and are lazier and therefore less useful to the Gilyak than (439) the female slaves are, and in addition perhaps also because, in spite of the inferior position assigned to them, they might give cause for jealousy on the part of the head of the house.

567 The male and female slaves among the Gilyak, in relation to their master, are in a situation of serfdom with absolutely no rights: they are nothing more than domestic animals in human shape, whom one treats humanely only in order to keep them fit and not to detract from his property, but also sells at will. Of course, all the heavy work in the house, such as fetching water, splitting wood, fetching water, feeding the dogs, and whatever else they are asked to do, falls to them, for they are only to obey and to serve. Therefore, where there is a slave in the house, the housework is done almost exclusively by him, while the wives of the head of the house devote themselves only to handicrafts, the care of the children, and other activities as they please. It is not the many and heavy tasks, however, that make the lot of the slaves, especially the female slaves, so hard among the Gilyak, but rather their complete lack of rights, as well as the contempt which they encounter everywhere and which is expressed, among other things, in the fact that they remain
excluded on principle and consistently from any intercourse with those around them. No Gilyak may marry a slave; indeed, he may not sell a slave to another Gilyak if the latter expresses an intention to marry her. The use of a female slave as a concubine 595 is no less strictly forbidden among the Gilyak. If anyone did so, 575 558 he would not only lose completely all the respect that the 556 possession of a slave /649/ as a sign of great wealth gave him, but would risk up a general storm of indignation among his coun-567 trymen. This is certainly another indication of the moral austerity of the Gilyak. On the other hand, it makes the female slaves very useful for the household, for in their presence they cannot arouse the jealousy of the wife or wives of their owners and that, for their part, do not bring any discord into the house, as happens all too frequently in the case of polygamy. Perhaps

567 /648 cont./

114 It must be noted here that the Japanese traveler, Mamia 191 Rinso, either misunderstood the conditions just described, and 567 especially the position of the slaves among the Gilyak, or else 595 intentionally put them in a different light and thereby gave 192 rise to completely false conceptions concerning their domestic and marital situation. With reference to his stay among the Smerenkur (Gilyak) on Cape Noteito on the west coast /648/ of Sakhalin (1), he says that "there it is the custom of the country

1. Cape Noteito is not given on Mamia Rinso's map as reproduced by Siebold (op. cit., Pl. XXV), but on Mogami Tok'nai's map it is shown somewhat diagonally across from Taba Bay or the entrance into Taba-Kidai Straits (see above, p. 968).

that the women give orders to the men, treat them like servants, and have them perform all the work. He himself, it is said further, had to bend under the yoke of the mistress of the house, and he, like the rest, had his daily work imposed on him by her, but since the mistress of the house was particularly well disposed toward him, her other men became jealous, and he, who was well aware of this, was careful not to become involved in things which he would have had to conceal, but rather occupied himself solely with domestic work under the eyes of the other men, and, as a result of this conduct, he gained the confidence and esteem of the former, who presented him with meat and fish" (2).

2. Mamia Rinso, "Te-tarikiko," in Siebold's Nippon, VII, p. 169.

567 It is difficult to understand how Siebold (3), on the basis

3. Op. cit., p. 198.

/649 cont./

114 of this statement by Rinso, could express the conjecture that the 191 kojaschichi or kojachinchiri of the Kamchatkan women, 192 through Steller and Kraschenninikov (4), that is, men being used 567 4. Steller, op. cit., p. 351, note.

Kraschenninikov, op. cit., p. 40. See also p. 473, note 2, above.

in the place of women, were also to be found among the Gilyak.
Rather than to entertain the idea that Rinso, as far as I know, spent 114 longer than a few days among the Gilyak, as the Japanese 595 traveler in the Amur region ever encountered any trace of this 575 deplorable custom among the Gilyak, and that Siebold's con-114 jecture is therefore wholly unfounded. At first glance there 575 seems to be more reason in favor of his conclusion, drawn from the same statement by Rinso, that polyandry exists among the Smerenkur on Krafto (Gilyak of Sakhalin). "The northwest coast of Krafto," he adds, "would accordingly be the only land in the world where polyandry is practiced in accordance with law or custom at the present time." But, as may be seen from the above descriptions, this conclusion, too, is by no means accurate: nowhere, neither on Sakhalin nor on the mainland, does polyandry prevail among the Gilyak. But how then can the Japanese traveler's report quoted above, which speaks of the "rest" and the "other men" of the Gilyak "mistress of the house" in Noteito, be explained? The trustworthiness of Mamia Rinso, whom reviewed in these pages, does not permit simply rejecting the report under discussion as fiction. In his discussion of the domestic situation of the Gilyak which occupies us at the moment, he gives further proof of his credibility, in that he so accurately describes the peculiar cradle used by them (5), as

5. Op. cit., p. 191.

has also been done here (6). Yet I cannot but assume that in this

6. See p. 1046 above.

/649 cont./

114 case personal motives on the part of the Japanese traveler c 191 Rinso's report, and gave rise to the vague wording of the report, 114 can be interpreted in various ways. Forced to wait among 192 Smerenkur (Gilyak)at Cape Noteito for an opportune mom carry out his planned trip to Totats (on the opposite mainla 592 which had been unsuccessful the year before, /650/ and 592 any provisions, Mamia Rinso found himself, in order to stay alive, forced to do all kinds of work, such as cutting wood the like, in the house where he had taken refuge. For a tim higher, he entered into a definite agreement, as far as I know, 595 mestic service in exchange for food and lodging and had to 567 accommodate himself, like the "rest" and the "other" men a similar position, including the slaves, to act according to orders of the woman in charge of the house and to being tre
"like a servant" by her. This does not mean either polyand a dominant position of the woman over her husband. Pride vanity, and perhaps also fear of his government, probably 435 vented him from fully and openly confessing in his r port the undignified and humiliating position and treatment which had befallen him among the Smerenkur, and prompte to describe the situation in a more favorable light as the al 595 custom of the people. He also depicts the women of the Smerenkur in an ideal light, saying that "their face and sk extremely delicate and beautiful due to daily washing," wh actually the Gilyak women of Sakhalin look still dirtier tha those on the mainland as a consequence of staying in the co dark, and sooty earth huts.

Even though Mamia Rinso avoids speaking of slaves i ferring to his subservient position among the Smerenkur, he well aware of the existence of such among them. For he sa

1. Op. cit., pp. 186 and 187.

of the inhabitants of southern Krafto (Ainu) that in their trac with the Santanar, that is, Gilyak, Olcha, and Goldi, they "even frequently sell human beings, and, to be sure, wido

565

565 CLASSES--presence or absence of stratified groups between which mobility is to at least some extent possible; number and ranking of social classes; composition and distribution; basis of differentiation (e.g., wealth, occupation, ascribed status, conquest); class consciousness; degree of class organization; integration of cliques with classes; class prerogatives and disabilities; insignia and stigmata of classes; relations between classes; extent of intermarriage; status and affiliation of children of interclass marriages; special social classes (e.g., royalty, nobles and commoners, bourgeois and proletariat); etc. See also:

Mobility 55
Political statuses 62, 63, 64, 66
Occupational specialization 463
Standards of living 511 Cliques 573
Revolutionary movements 669
Poverty 735

/xxix cont./

000 to it. In spite of *114 Shternberg convi ● 565 tion among the G through the spect class differentiati nomic laws of ev
of their neighbor

*114 A signific 777 ligion of the Gily 614 about the master are unwound in a [776] who is a 'god.' b persons, wealthy cording to the ev
'masters' among Gilyak, also live the reflection of views of Shternb also deserves att totemism, i.e., animal, that cre thinking, but th [262] One cannot expl using the meat c of killing some

*114 Shternbe [777] advances his ow [825] mals (e.g., the protective relati

[756] In "Gilia opinion that the *114 "Obrazts 197 fol'klora" and M constitute the se Gilyak; include Fourteenth Cong

the fact, however, that the material presented by ncingly testifies to the rudiments of class differentia-Gilyak, he did not discover this, because he looked acles of the Populists and saw in the appearance of ion the manifestation, not of the immanent ecoery society, but merely the effect on the Gilyak s -- the Russians.
cant part of the monograph is devoted to the re-yak. /xxx/ Here the conceptions of Shternberg s, first stated by him in "Sakhalinskie giliaki," ll their breadth. "Each element has its 'master' ut, just as in each clan there are outstanding men, of whom one is the richest ('the master,' ac-eryday terminology of the Gilyak), so are there the spirits, who, according to the beliefs of the in clans. With this concept Shternberg stresses the social structure in the religious views. The erg on the relationship of totemism to clan society ention. According to Shternberg, "... it was not not belief in descent from one or another form of ated the clan gods, which is the accepted way of other way around: the clan gods created totemism.
ain the interdictions among the totemists against f totems in their food by anything except a fear kind of clansman turned into a totem animal." g contests the opinion that fear created god and understanding that the cult of a number of ani-bear and swallow) is caused by their seemingly onship to man.
ki" Shternberg also, for the first time, formed his shaman is divinely selected. materialof po izucheniiu giliatskogo yazyka i aterialy po izucheniiu giliatskogo iazyka i fol'klora cond group of Shternberg's works on the study of the here also is the summary of a paper at the ess of Americanists in Stuttgart, "Bemerkungen

177 /270 cont./
178 in one's own wealth, although it only amounted to the 556 possession of several pieces of silk material, Japanese sabers, 582 and so forth. There appeared on the scene a tendency toward 584 differentiation. The rich man desired to associate with and [565] become related to only rich people. In the question of the choice of a wife there appeared new dictates. One demanded of a wife that she be from a family of equal wealth and, consequently, of an equally high social rank. And now, even in the ancient "tylgund" -- legends -- there is heard in matrimonial dealings the expression: "He (or she) is not my 178 equal." On the other hand, wealth allowed one to manifest 556 a special fastidiousness in the choice of a wife, to seek 58 women who were famous for their special qualities, who 614 were outstanding for their beauty, their domestic talents, their artistry in sewing, and other feminine tasks. But once marriage came to be practiced between members of alien clans, the former simplicity of concluding marriage vanished.
There appeared on the scene the new institution of bride price, which introduced into the institution of marriage the element of purchase-sale; besides this, marriage between persons of alien clans demanded preliminary negotiations and the procedures of betrothal. We now turn to these institutions.
192 The terms of betrothal. The procedure of betrothal is ex-584 pressed by various terms, denoting literally, "to agree, to come to an agreement about the bride"; hence, the matchmaker -- "the man who makes an agreement"; bride -- "future wife"; groom -- "future husband." For us, the terms for groom and bride are particularly interesting. With orthodox marriage there is no special term for groom and bride, for according to the right of birth the groom is called pu -- husband, and the bride -- an'g:ej. The term jokh, [174] which is used nowadays to designate the bride, is entirely inadmissible with orthodox marriage, for, as we have seen, with orthodox marriage jokh is a term of prohibition for sexual intercourse. Thus, the term itself shows that the procedure of betrothal arose after the weakening of the regime of orthodox marriage.

9: Hawes--262 [3] T-3 (1901) 1903
116, 567, 595

"In olden times the Amur Gilyak bought slaves, w both these practices of polygamy and slavery the de harem as to have sufficient domestic help. In one his old age a young and strong assistant."

who were mostly Ainu women, but in esire was not so much to possess a case it was to give the loved wife of

/650 cont./
and widows, unmarried people, orphans, and the needy; 3-4, often 6-7 pieces of gold cloth are paid per head, but young and stupid persons, however, who cannot be used for any services, are exchanged for crude goods." According to him, even the Ainu from Jesso /Yesso/ and from the island of Risiri come over to Sakhalin in order to buy there human beings in the situations named. He adds: "This is why one finds tattooed women in the country of the Smerenkur" -- a perfectly correct conclusion, for, as has already been pointed out (2), tattooing is by no means customary among the Gilyak. Rinsô's observation concerning the slave trade of the Ainu correspond completely with ours above and substantially supplement them, but his latter remark leaves no doubt that not only the Gilyak on the mainland but also those of Sakhalin keep slaves, or at any rate female slaves, among them, whom the latter obtain probably exclusively from the Ainu. Besides purchase, however, the Santaner, as Rinsô reports, also get their slaves in another, more brutal manner by taking to their country as security the brothers, sisters, and children of those Ainu who owe them debts in trading and are unable to settle these debts in the following year when they return. Needless to say, they become slaves there. The Japanese government, which had absolute domination over southern Sakhalin and its main trade center, Ssiranussi, did not /651/ feel bound to check this scandalous practice, which ceased only after the island passed into Russian possession.

2. See pp. 631 ff. above.

Before I go further in describing the family relations of the Gilyak, I should like to insert some data concerning slavery among other Paleo-Asiatic peoples for comparison. As disgraceful as the Ainu practice of selling fellow tribesmen as slaves to the Gilyak and Olcha is, yet nothing is reported, either by Rinsô or by other travelers, to the effect that they keep persons from their own tribe as slaves. What kept them from it, whether it was their own kindheartedness and weakness or a prohibition of the Japanese acting as absolute rulers, may be left undecided.

/651 cont./

567 171 In this respect, the situation was, and, so it seems, is even now, worse among the Koreans. Following the accounts of Dutch prisone Witsen (1) reported that they keep many male and female slaves,

1. Noord en Oost Tartarye, Amsterdam, 1705, p. 59.

some masters several hundred, who all come from among their own people. According to Dallet (2), their number subsequently

2. Histoire de l'église de Corée précédée d'une introd. sur l'hist., les institut., la langue, les moeurs et cost. coréennes /History of the Church of Korea, preceded by an introduction on the history, the institutions, the language, Korean manners and customs/, Paris, 1874, Reviewed in Petermann's Geogr. Mittheil., 1875, p. 113.

gradually decreased, but the bad custom still exists, in that poor people sell themselves or their children as slaves, and children born to a slave, as well as abandoned children, fall to slave standing, and, finally, there are slaves belonging to the state. There can be no mistake here about the influence of immediately adjacent China, where, as is well known, the same thing goes on (3). Among the more northern Paleo-Asiatic

3. Cf., for instance, Neuhof, Die Gesantsch. der Ost-Indich. Geselsch. in den verein. Niederländen an dem Tartar. Cham /The Embassy of the East Indian Company in the Territories of the Netherlands to the Tartarian Khan/, etc., Amsterdam, 1666, p. 293. Du Halde, Descript. de l'Emp. de la Chine, Paris, 1735, Vol. III, p. 128. Iakinf", Kitai, St. Petersb., 1840, pp. 337, 338, and elsewhere.

/651 cont./
peoples slavery originated, as a rule, when prisoners of war, in other words, individuals from a foreign tribe, were made slaves and, in particular, women and girls were captured by the enemy to serve as wives and concubines. This was the case among the Italmen, Koryak (4), and Aleuts before they were

4. Steller, op. cit., p. 235.

subjugated by the Russians. The Aleuts in particular were distinguished by their cruelty to their slaves, in that on festive occasions they sometimes slaughtered a great number of them (5).

5. Veniaminov", Zap. ob" ostr. Unalashk. Otd. /Notes on the Islands of the Unalaska Sector/, Pt. II, pp. 83-89.

Wrangel (6) even reported of the Chukchee, who retained their independence and individuality the longest, that among them, and, to be sure, the nomadic as well as the sedentary ones on the sea coast, there is a kind of serfdom or slavery, in that since ancient times the well-to-do have owned whole serf families who are not permitted to move away, have no property, and are wholly subject to the whims of their masters, who use them for the heaviest services and labor and in return feed and clothe them. Wrangel was unable to find out anything definite about the origin of these slaves, but he thinks it probable that they are the descendants of former prisoners of war, and therefore from foreign tribes. The fact, however, that they have existed since ancient times and in whole families /652/ allows one to conclude that the Chukchee, too, keep from mixing with them and do not enter into either marriage or concubinage with their female slaves.

6. Putesh. po siev. ber. Sib. i pr. /Journey in the Region of the Northern Coast of Siberia/, Pt. II, pp. 339, 340.

/652 cont./
567 17 Thus, an attitude toward the slaves similar to that among the Gilyak seems to exist among the Chukchee, and in this attitude, as in the motives for it, the more intense national consciousness and sense of freedom, there is a parallel between these two peoples similar to the one discussed above (p. 961) in their enterprising genius for trade and their extensive trade activity.

428 562 The law of inheritance existing among them gives us further insight into the family relations of the Gilyak. After what has been said above about marriage, it is almost self-evident that it is concerned solely with the male members of the family, while the female members are not only left empty-handed, but even treated as objects of the estate. The first and, [601] if there are any, only heirs of a Gilyak are his sons, and, to be sure, the property of the father is inherited by them in equal shares, regardless of the order of seniority -- a custom which is all the more remarkable since the Gilyak language has a special term (ykkyn) for the oldest brother in contrast to the younger one (atschek). The wife and the daughters, whether married or unmarried, have no share in the inheritance. The former, if, because of her age, [768] there is no chance of her remarrying, is taken [583] care of by her sons; the married daughters have entered other family circles, after they have increased their brother's inheritance by the bride price paid to their father for them, and the unmarried daughters become the property of their brothers and, if a suitor is found, must be purchased from them, and the bride price is shared equally among them. If one of the brothers dies unmarried, the other, surviving brothers inherit from him, again in equal shares. The same thing happens when from among several sons of a Gilyak, who have become independent, one dies unmarried while his father is still alive; the latter receives nothing, because under no circumstances may a father inherit from his son.

428 587 The law of inheritance is different if one of several brothers dies and he was married and leaves behind a wife or perhaps wife and child, especially minor daughters and sons. If only a widow survives, she, along with all that she and her husband had, goes to the next brother of her deceased husband, and, to be sure, as a wife, regardless of whether the latter is still unmarried or already

648 /664 cont./ The following remarks pertain 128 only to this period, certainly a very favorable one for the study of their peculiarities.

621 Beyond the family and the paternal kin-group, the Gilyak 622 have no legal-administrative structure or organization for self-government: there are among them no individuals provided by them themselves with authoritative power, say, for preserving order, for settling disputes, and the like. And there seems to be no need for that among them. Since they wage no wars with their neighbors or among themselves, undertake no joint raiding expeditions into foreign territory, collect no tribute and do not have to deliver any, etc., they need no leaders, chiefs, elders, or the like. Order is maintained by observing the ancient usages and the traditional customs, and in case of disputes and conflicts, self-help enters in, supported by the rules of blood [567] revenge. Thus the Gilyak have no superiors or masters in their midst, but rather they are all legally equal, with, of course, the exception of the slaves, who, however, as has been said, are not Gilyak, but are foreigners in serfdom among them. For [177] the concept of "master," which they first learned from the Manchu-Chinese, they therefore, for both the latter and the Russians, use the Chinese expression dshangin (3). Only once did I hear a Gilyak designate himself as such: it was in the isolated yurt of Miwwach located at the end of the Tymy Valley on Sakhalin and occupied by a married couple, where the host introduced himself to me as the "dshangin of Miwwach," but evidently he merely wanted to indicate that he was the sole owner of the yurt.

3. Gerbillon (in Dukalde /Du Halde/, Descr. de l'Empire de la Chine, Vol. IV, p. 385) mentions the term "tschanghin" for a high official who enjoys the special confidence of the emperor.

614 parties to agree. When agreement was reached, the khlay-nivkh came to the 627 offending clan with men of the victim clan, fully armed, and a duel was enacted between the representatives of the two clans. Then each clan representative killed a dog, and peace was considered established. After that, the ransom was paid. It consisted of coats of mail, spears, silk materials and other valuable objects.

601 The Nivkhi had a classificatory system of kinship. But, in distinction to the Tunguso-Manchurian system, the specific term of kinship among them applied always to persons of one, rather than different generations. As Shternberg showed, the classificatory system of the Nivkhi reflected even in his time the existing marriage norms. The Nivkhi retained until the end of [108] the 19th century some remnants of group marriage. These relations were [595] possible only for persons of the same generation, and were categorically forbidden among persons of different generations.

614 All the members of a clan were divided into four age groups: 1) grand-561 fathers and great-grandfather (atak); 2) fathers (ytŷk), their brothers (tuvng), the husbands of the mother's sisters and the brothers of the husbands of the mother's sisters; 3) brothers and sisters (tuvng); and 4) children (ola).

175 Trade ties with China and the transformation of fur-hunting, and later of 439 fishing, into economic activities directed to commercial ends stimulated 614 the disintegration of the clan order among the Nivkhi, which occurred 184 first among the Amur Nivkhi. The latter had early begun to trade with 182 the Manchus. Nivkhi merchants sailed up the Sungari to San-hsing, and bartered furs and beluga backbones for tea, tobacco, fabrics and metal articles. They also bartered with the Ainu, the Japanese and with other neighbors. Members of the Tvabing clan, for instance, were for a long time [556] the middlemen between the Sakhalin Nivkhi and the Ainu. Thus, long before [595] Russian colonization, the Nivkhi began to be divided into rich and poor.
[567] The rich could have several wives and 3-5 slaves. The rich man's bride-price always included large quantities of imported valuables. But commodity relations developed slowly, since exchange was only in the medium of furs and, to a lesser extent, fish. The mass of the Nivkhi continued in a subsistence economy.

175 Slaves did only housework. They could set up their own households 567 and marry free women. The slave's descendants of the fifth generation were considered free. On the whole, slavery was not widespread among the Nivkhi and was of a patriarchal character.

175 At the end of the 17th and in the 18th centuries, the Manchus established 648 among the Nivkhi, as well as the Nanays, the posts of khalada— clan elders, 614 and gasyanda—village elders.
622 After the middle of the last century, the disintegration of the Nivkhi subsistence economy proceeded more rapidly. After the Nivkhi had finally 175 become a part of Russia, slavery disappeared; a new form of exploitation 178 appeared, in the institution of "half-shares." Nivkhi who lacked the imple-
433 ments of production fell into the position of "half-sharers." The catch [567] was divided according to the number of participants, but those who used the implements of others had to yield half of their share to the owner.

Before the Revolution, the Nivkhi were officially considered Orthodox 771 Christians, but their views remained animistic. They thought of the island 776 of Sakhalin as an anthropomorphic creature; similar ideas were held about trees, mountains, rivers, water, earth and cliffs. The killer whale was in their thinking an yz'—a "master" of other animals. Almost every natural phenomenon had its yz'. The chief of these were Pal-yz'—the "master" of the mountains and the taiga, and Tavrradz, or Tol'yz'—the "master" of

3 order that he may not squander the property. On Sakhalin, 3 only the sons inherit the parents, and the daughters are married off. If after the death of the parents only one daughter is left behind, she usually gets part of the estate
upon her marriage, the rest is kept by the relatives who took care of her. In any case, if the bride has a dowry, the man has no right to it; he can get hold of it only by going against the wishes of his wife.

3 In the matter of succession, it is true, the procedure is not everywhere and always [232] the same, but in general
one can draw the following conclusions from what has been
said: a) the children take precedence over other relatives;
b) the brothers take precedence over their sisters, provided the latter marry and thus share the fortune of their husband; c) the joint usufruct of the estate on the part of the nearest relatives is very common; d) women may inherit
and have their own property, but in general they are not left as much; however, they have the right to be supported;
e) widows can demand their own share, but usually they become joint owners of the estate along with their children.

The Gilyak are all of one class. There are no privileged classes or families. There are families, now and then, who are held in great esteem because of wealth, courage, or because their ancestor was founder of the village, but they have no real privileges of any kind. Such families also have family names (which are handed down by the males);
many Gilyak, however, have only one single name to which is added the name of their village, to distinguish them from outsiders. Some of them, whether they are baptized or not,
are given this or that Russian name besides their Gilyak one,
and by this name they are known even among their fellow-tribesmen. These "Petkas," "Mikitas", etc., are usually intelligent lads and understand Russian.

In like manner, there are no slaves, nor have there ever been any among these people. Only personal qualities,
either bravery, wealth, age, or intelligence, give the individual a certain significance. Wealth may be regarded with a certain esteem, since it is usually acquired as a result of real superiority, - either courage, industry or judgment.
Toward aristocrats of wealth a certain external ceremony is occasionally observed. If such a person comes for a visit, both he and the host bow after a fashion, whereupon he holds up his cheek to be kissed; he himself does not kiss the other.

567 However, there are no forms or obligatory expressions of 554 esteem of any kind. In general, a kiss, bow, or hand-shake 576 are, as we said, not often used by Gilyak.

Beside the aged, the rich, and the brave, shamans are 756 especially esteemed, but here again we see reflected the 184 respect [233] which is paid a superior mind. The shamans do not form a separate, exclusive class but live like other people, but they draw an additional income from their craft.
It frequently happens that the shaman is also the son of a shaman and has, in a manner of speaking inherited his "science". Some, however, become students of another shaman for a considerable sum, still others become impromptu shamans whenever the "power" descends on them. Women can also become shamans, as we have said.
It is arranged so that large villages have their own shaman, whereas several smaller ones fall within the territory of one shaman.

The work of these priests is probably rooted partly in self-delusion, but in any case there is a considerable addition of intentional deception.

756 Fortunately they themselves, although smarter than the 576 rest, are not very superior, and can therefore not teach the 554 people anything very harmful, nor have they been able to make a privileged place for themselves. The shaman's advice is sought where every-day experience does not prove adequate, but the counsellor is not generally treated with great veneration. Most of the shamans are received without any kind of greeting, only famous ones are met with a bow; beyond Sofiyskoye there was even one before whom the whole house went on its knees when he appeared at the door in order to perform his magic. In general the shamans not only enjoy a certain esteem, but they are also feared. Nevertheless, there are cases where people refused to pay a shaman because of his false predictions and his ineptitude, and sometimes shamans are even flogged. Their magic practices will be considered later.

622 Finally, there are the "starosti" (1), that is, elders who 177

1. This is a Russian word.

are appointed by officials. They are, however, not actual mayors; they have nothing to say and are scarcely more than intermediaries through whom the official gives his orders to the community for these starosti speak Russian.

5

572 FRIENDSHIPS--concept development; formal fri reciprocal obligations o Economic partnerships . . . .
Economic cooperation . . . .
Blood brotherhood and other art relationships . . . . . .

72 ualization of friendship; informal friendships and their endships (e.g., best friends, guest friendship);

f friends; etc. See also:

. . . . . 472 Relationships with nonrelatives 609
. 476
ficial kin
. 608

Sakhalin

/338 cont./ 752 789 thank you!" If they do not exchange them, then one of them will drown. After this they become friends. One must rescue an alien khal, and even good Russians (not the tramps), but a drowned person from another clan is not cremated, but is surrounded with sticks. [572] [614] [628] [766]

After the rescue and the shavynd procedure, the shaman must /339/ carry out his procedure: he sends his spirit kekhn to Tol for a small soul, which lies there on a small bed.

When a person who was drowning returns in a boat rescued from death, he and his wife must break the old chumashka and make a new one. If it is not broken, husband and wife will die.

A man who drowned or one who was eaten by a bear will be a god. 766 [775] [776]

A drowned person is placed in a boat; the kinsmen get into another boat and float without rowing; they let the first boat, with the deceased, go ahead, and the deceased is cremated where it carries him to the bank. Hooks are used for pulling the body onto the bank. Inau are placed near the place of cremation. When the Tymovsk Gilyak travel to Tro, upon seeing the inau they throw chukh-chugynd (sacrifices) into the stream.

A person who has been rescued from death by a bear sacrifices a dog to Pal-n'ivukh and makes chukh-chugynd. 752 782

574

574 VISITING AND HOSPITALITY--extent and occasions of visiting; social relationships characterized by reciprocal visiting; reception and entertainment of visitors; informal and formal hospitality; offering of food and drink; feasts and parties; etc. See also:

Drinking . . . . . 27 Travel 484 Recreation . . . . . 52 Banquet speeches 544 Eating . . . . . 264 Wedding feasts 585
Gift giving . . . . . 431 Mortuary feasts 765

/26 cont./

224 traps begin. This is perhaps the most interesting season in the manifold yearly activities of the Gilyak. He leaves his home for several weeks and betakes himself to his inherited sable stream to watch for the valuable little beasts. During the daytime he inspects his snares and traps, shooting birds and any kind of animal that he meets along the way; for the night he betakes himself to his little balagan. He must live through some difficult moments in this little balagan. Here, in the wild taiga, amidst the gloom of night, the silence of the wilderness, or the howl of a snowstorm, to the lonely savage, cooped up at his minuscule hearth or vainly trying to warm himself /27/ at the temperature of the freezing of mercury, each rustle, each strange sound, each snap of a tree, howl of the wind, moan of a night bird, and, finally, the hallucinations of his own frightened imagination depict in all their terrible reality all the horrors of the Gilyak demonology. The devils and ogres of all the elements in the imagry of the Gilyak appear to him, to cause his destruction. And the terrible exhaustion after his labors, the lack of food -- all this aggravates the horror of the situation, bringing sickness often even death. Sable hunting, however, promises more than just terrors and adversity. A successful catch, gay company, a triumphal return home with the catch, stories about experiences, all this fully rewards the hunter worn out with suffering. But, on the whole, the Gilyak is not a hunter. Hunting with dogs is unfamiliar to him, the risky pursuit of bears, of which the Tungus are so fond, [262] does not attract the Gilyak. By and large he is an ichthyophagist, and someone has very correctly said about him that he lives by frutti di mare /the fruits of the sea/.

221 The winter months are the gayest ones in the year. The supplies of fish have not yet been exhausted. On the earnings from the catch, tea, tobacco, rice, and buda were stored up, and the [574] Gilyak cares little about the future. Endless visiting begins, and [796] listening to the storytellers at night, and, beginning in February, [538] there are the bear festivals, the happiest days in the life of the [261] Gilyak. In March, however, the results of the winter extravagance [164] begin to tell, and there come the hard days of hunger and sometimes scurvy, which carries away dozens of flourishing lives. In

/27 cont./

22 In spring, with the seals and the first fish that travel in masses upstream to spawn, the koryushka, herring, the Gilyak is again revived, and in the course of the summer months in the expectation of the autumn catch he again begins to make visits and dolce far niente.

●574 252 In speaking of guests I cannot fail to mention a peculiar festive dish and the favorite food item to which Gilyak guests are treated -- the so-called mos'. It is prepared from a sticky broth of fish skins, seal fat, berries, rice, sometimes with the addition of small pieces of yukola. All this is mixed together and cooled. Sometimes, to add color and flavor, a solution of white clay is added to the mixture. Without any fastidiousness, the boiled fish skins are squeezed out into a trough by the dirty hands of the Gilyak women, and for more flavor the small pieces of yukola are first ground with the teeth and spat out with the saliva into the dish...

342 354 352 [177] The exterior living conditions of the Gilyak are very simple. Only in some places closest to the Amur have the Gilyak adopted the Manchu type of winter dwellings, which, by the way, are also very primitive. In form they are large sheds /28/ built with poles and spars, in which large pipes made of stone or wood and smeared with clay, and connected at the openings with the stove, are laid on the floor along each wall. Laid out over the pipes are plank beds, which are always heated by the warmth of the pipes. The smoke of the stove goes out through an underground passage into a high, vertical pipe which rises straight up from the surface of the ground. The role of this pipe, which resembles those on our factories, is played by a hollow tree. In the middle of a yurt there is a high rectangular scaffold on which the packs of dogs are let out when they are to be fed. A more primitive yurt is a dugout, which is half in the ground and covered with poles and spars smeared with clay or covered with earth. The entrance from the passageway is through a low door along several steps. The hearth is in the middle of the yurt and is surrounded by passages between the plank [132] beds; over the hearth is the smoke opening. In winter, even in the yurts of the first type, it is sometimes so cold that the mercury in the thermometer freezes, and with the least wind the yurt becomes 352 516 full of smoke. One sleeps on the plank beds with the head toward the hearth and on skins or quilted bedding; under the head there are

/30 cont./

221 purchase fish, while in many places (for example, on the Tym') the inhabitants set out in whole settlements to travel several hundred kilometers to the seashore for the spring seal-hunting, only to return half a year later for the fall run of fish in their native ●574 places. The Gilyak likes to travel, however, even without 517 serious reasons for it. To make visits, receive guests, arrange [484] celebrations, and live gregariously are the greatest pleasures of [157] the Gilyak. Gloomy and stern while alone, he is transformed in society and becomes playful, gay, and garrulous.

342 In the north, in winter, between 30 and 40 people live in 157 the big yurts of the Manchu type. It is here that sociableness, which is inherent anyway in the conditions of the social frame-128 work of the Gilyak, is cultivated. Now, however, we must leave the external aspect of the life of the Gilyak and pass to its internal structure, with whose unique peculiarities I intend mainly to acquaint my readers.

III.

601 171 174

Kinship System. Marriage Norms and Their Influence on the Family-Clan Structure.

Of all the peculiarities of the Gilyak way of life nothing so characteristically distinguishes them from the surrounding nationalities as their classificatory system of kinship and the rules that regulate their sexual relations and marriage. In this respect the Gilyak stand equally far from their southern neighbors, the Ainu, and from the Tungus tribes that surround them. The Ainu are the only nationality of the Priamur krai who have preserved features of [611] maternality /materniteta/. The Gilyak family and clan are purely [614] patriarchal institutions. As for the Tungus tribes, although the [595] classificatory system of kinship and certain characteristics of group marriage analogous to those discovered by me in 1891 among the Gilyak were discovered by me among them, a careful comparison of this institution among the Tungus tribes and among the Gilyak leads to the conclusion that they /31/ belong to quite different

/59 cont./

614 as well as of the cult of ancestors, but I shall confine myself 171 here, for the time being, to what has been said, all the more since the institution of totemism has not assumed the same sharply pronounced form among this tribe that it did among other, specifically totemistic tribes, for example, the Australians, the North American Indians, the ancient Egyptians, etc.

614 Sacrifices to the clan gods are offered periodically. All 782 sorts of delicacies of the Gilyak cuisine are prepared by each 796 family prior to the day of the festival, and they are placed in particular vessels reserved especially for this occasion. On the next day the entire male population of the clan sets out in boats or, in case of a disturbance on the sea, on foot in the taiga and stations itself on its clan plot of ground near its clan sign. The elder in the clan takes a handful from each dish and throws it, crying out at the same time, "chukh!" i.e., "This is for you!" After this the feasting, games, wrestling, and other such diversions begin. In the spring, with the appearance of the seals, the sacrifice for the "sea or river" man is arranged, consisting of the solemn throwing of viands into a hole in the ice. On the Amur these sacrifices are made from a boat immediately after the opening of the river; the boats are decorated with sacred shavings, and gay races in them are arranged.

796 The Gilyak have a great number of clan festivals, but 614 the most important of these is the so-called bear festival. This 628 festival plays a tremendous role in the social life of the Gilyak. In fact, it is not even a clan, but an interclan festival. The ●[574] clan arranging the festival takes on itself only the expenses and trouble of arranging the festival; the most important role is played by the outside clans invited to participate in it. Since a year does not pass without such festivals occurring in one place or another, assembling representatives of many clans for a number of days, these occasions play the same role in the social intercourse of the Gilyak tribe as the Olympics and other games once played in Greece. The winter bear-festival is called a game (chkhyf-lekhernd -- the bear game).

/61 cont./

796 The eve has finally arrived. This day is called Nau-vakhnku, 778 the day of the preparation of the inau, i.e., sticks with sharpened ends, which play an important religious role in the festival. These sticks, of various forms and sizes, represent orators-intercessors, which, together with the slain bear will set out to go to the master of the taiga and remind him of the needs of the Gilyak, and will be his talismans as well. Each kind of inau is made in pairs; each pair is spouses, so that they will be happier, and so that they will propagate and multiply. Some of the inau are hung as ornamentation on the posts of the 796 arena; some are attached to them at the bottom. While the •574 preparation of the inau takes place, the clan elder, together 614 with the master of the bear, and several clansmen ride out to greet the so-called narkh'i. These narkh'i are honored guests and play a very important role in the festival: the killing of the bear is left to them alone, to them /62/ alone is given all the meat of the killed beast and even the skin. The narkh'i are not arbitrarily chosen people, but of necessity representatives of that clan into which the daughters of the master of the bear, as well as the women of his clan in general, marry.
[606] Most often, therefore, a narkh is a son-in-law /zyat'/ of the master of the bear /see navkh, p. 82/. The narkh'i in turn take along their sons-in-law and decide among themselves which one of them is to kill the bear. If several bears are killed at the same time, narkh'i are invited from all the clans from which the clan arranging the festival has taken wives, so that sometimes up to ten clans participate in such a festival. It is these narkh'i whom the master of the bear must solemnly greet and lavishly entertain when he meets them, and transport them with honor to his village.

796 The following day is the day of the killing. It is called 231 Na-khan-ku (the day of the killing of the bear) or Chkhyf-aryn-ku (the day of the feeding of the bear). Early in the morning the bear is taken out of its cage in the same way as to take it for a walk. A large woven belt to which are tied bags full of assorted viands is put on it, and it is tied up near a yurt and given the opportunity to enjoy the last hours of life remaining to it in this

/62 cont./

796 231 semifreedom. Around noon it is untied and, held by thongs on both sides, is taken for a walk. This walk, however, gives the bear little pleasure, for from every side they tease it in every way and try to drive it beyond patience. The bear at first lets out some grumbling, but gradually becomes enraged, attempts to attack the people, and gets up on its hind legs, but it is held by dozens of hands, and all its rage is lost in fruitless thrashing. But now, seizing the moment, the master of the bear cautiously steals up, seizes it by the head, kisses it good-by, and, without waiting for a return kiss, speedily jumps away. Most often, however, the bear freely returns the good-by kiss to its protector, who considers himself quite lucky if the clumsy one limits itself to tearing off a good chunk of meat and does not get its teeth into, say, an eye or the throat arteries. A wound inflicted by a bear on such occasions, however, is considered an expression of good will on the part of the good-natured beast. The walk ends in leading the bear three times around the yurt of its master. Beforehand everything living, even suckling babies and animals, is removed from the yurt; only the clan elder stands in the passageway, and every time the bear comes around even with the entrance he teases it with a long pole with an uncut crown of coniferous needles at the end and speaks gentle words. /63/ At the end of this procedure the bear is led to the plot of ground and tied between the two trees which have been ritually decorated. The pole with which the bear was teased is fixed to the hearth, so that its spreading crown of coniferous needles rises high above the smoke opening. After that there is an intermission. The 796 bear is again left to itself, while the people assemble in a 594 dense throng in the yurt of the master of the bear, where lavish entertainment begins. They literally sit on one another's heads; nonetheless the gaiety is extraordinary; the loud talk, the laughter, and the jokes never cease. Only the narkh'i are serious: they bend their bows, sharpen their arrows, and prepare themselves for the crucial moment. Meanwhile all kinds of cold viands are carried in huge troughs on dog sleds to the sacred plot of ground; there are frozen fish of all kinds, rice,

796 Buda, and beans; and, finally, all kinds of the ritual dish 574 "the mos', " whose method of preparation I have already d scribed in the second chapter.

796 This is all placed in rows near the bear. The clan el 231 or the master feeds the bear for the last time from a big sp on a long handle, giving it a taste of each dish, while ask to offer a "good spot" at the time of the killing. Finally addresses the bear with the following farewell words: "Goo I am feeding you for the last time. Go quickly, go quick your master, and may your master greatly love you." Ot clansmen also try to offer something to their old friend; 796 small children participate in this kindly affair. After the [562] break all the people pour out of the yurt, with the except of the women, who are forbidden to be present at the killi of the bear -- otherwise it will not offer a good spot -- an range themselves in fighting formation. The master of th bear or the clan elder walks in front with a kettle and an his hands. Next to him is the elder of the narkh'i, also w kettle and an ax. Behind them are the remaining narkh'i bows and arrows, and, finally, all the participants in the val follow on ski on both sides in a picturesque, happy thr Within a hundred paces of the place where the bear is tied people stop, the master drives his ax into the snow and pl kettle next to it; the narkh does the same with his kettle ax. The ax and the kettle bear the characteristic name o i.e., mine -- thine. The master of the bear and the nar elder exchange these nich'i at the end of the festival as a 796 of eternal brotherhood. When the nich'i have been place 526 next to the last act of the tragedy begins: the preliminary petitive archery. Once, when the bow played a more im role in the life of the Gilyak, this shooting /64/ no doubt character of a great competition; now, however, it is re almost to a simple formality. The target is a board place behind the bear. The narkh'i shoot first, and after them clansmen of the master; the latter try not to embarrass the guests and make intentional misses. The crowd follows w ordinarily not in great stra de on a commission basis.

among themselves they are debtor dies or becomes inc atives endeavor to pay off hi tever of going into bondage
The law of inheritance is ver perty goes to the children i he children are under age, se relative is their guardian y if it has not been entirely h children, the property re the mother is called "the e ow is childless she keeps a he fortune, the rest belongs sed. If she wishes to enter some other close relative o d, her second spouse, but i y keep the estate of their fa wish to re-marry, she mus usually pays off in work as se wife died earlier leaves usually divided upon the dau e, the relatives of the bride its. The Gilyak almost never very punctual about paying.

capable of working, his is debts. They know nothing or slavery because of debt. y simple. The father's f they no longer have a mother.
their uncle or some other and later returns their prop-used up. If a widow is left mains intact in the family, lder" in possession. If the small part, about an eighth s to the relatives of the dea new marriage, the brother f the husband becomes, as we f she already has children, ther. If she is poor and does st be helped, and this help best she can. If a father a son or daughter, the estate ghter's marriage. In this e look over the bridegroom.

/83 conv./

On this day, however, no one is allowed to take the prepared boar meat. This happens the next day, which is called the day of treating the nerkh'i (nerkh-ain-ko). The nerkh'i are thoroughly commemorating along the plank beds, while the bad solemnly walks among the rows and distributes pieces of boar meat. More glorious hons feed their guests with their own hams, stocking into their mouths /83/ a huge piece of fat the guest bites off a piece, leaving it to his neighbor to finish off what he has started. Only the nerkh'i are allowed to eat bear meat; and his clan are denied this right: they are allowed to eat only a piece of rice or bugle with the fat from the boar's carcasses. This soup is prepared and consumed in enormous quantities.

It is considered the greatest honor for the host to feed his guests to satiety. His graciousness goes so far that when a guest who has eaten too much of the fatty soup begins to vomit it, the host respectfully offers his mouth and drinks the vomit. It would be hard to imagine more refined graciousness. In intervals between feasting, dog races, games, fencing with sticks, and circle dancing are arranged.

All day the girls take turns playing music on the suspended dog and accompany their primitive music with humorous and at times very frivolous songs. Special attention in the feast is played by Russian vodka or Chinese grain vodka, which lifts the gaiety of the feasters to its apogee. To make one's guests drunk is considered a virtue. Only young women, who yesterday the nerkh'i got drunk two times, ' the master of a bear once boasted to me.

Finally the last day of the festival comes. the day of departure of the nerkh'i. Carcasses of bear meat and all kinds of vasdy prepared for their journey, and clansmen are placed into their sleds. At the last moment the nerkh'i lead several dogs into the part and let them around the plank bed of bone to the bear's skull. In addition, as a present, they put a spear, a dung, and other such items next to the head of the animal or stuck into it. Again, in farewell, the nerkh'i are lavishly

/86 conv./

In the evening, the nobleman as the sacrifice to Gamsa's father-in-law, and the nobleman as the sacrifice to the Gilyak relative to the good in general. When a whole individual effort, during idleness, the Gilyak make a sacrifice. He will without fail continue his above clansmen even from star, so that they share the energy beneficial consequences of the sacrifice.

The principle of common clan defense, the nobleman of the clan, is the foundation of the generation of benefits and the most extensive fraternal mutual aid.

It should be evident to anyone acquainted with the institutions of primitive tribes, that the Gilyak are not ordinary man travelers description, that it must be based on observing more than more superficial and even ordinary sympathy for one's fellow creatures. The Gilyak at his own expense manifest the highest hospitality to even his enemy, exchanging with him gifts and entering into friendly and cordial relations — still, evidently, impelled by a more powerful force than simple sympathy, he sacrifices himself for others. And this must be taken the basis of the generation among the great primitive people, the Gilyak clansmen. The principle of obligation to extend hospitality not only to the tribesmen, but even to the actually hungry man, is also a very ancient, very deep, and very sacred law in the relations whether for displaying this feeling. See master Gamsa many times a day, I neither had spread at his hands the starter what time of day it be, the guest is immediately offered all the vittals in the possession of the host, not to mention the most tempting tasteful of rebaiche for his pipe.

If there is, in the tribe Gilyak, the best taken from with the guest in drinking a common pipe. These attitudes are most striking in the handling of rare, costly clubs and valuables. If, for example, the guest, the chief of the tribe would allow himself to drink it alone, he will merely put it up to it and then it goes around to all the dwellers in the village, and only after the course of three, [illegible] the pipe returns to the owner. In the meanwhile, he is obliged to [illegible] the pipe. The hospitable very great sin, one might die." It is a sin not to be hospitable, not to share eddies. And the reason is clear: the gods, as we have seen, are the ones that "feed" man, and principally the clan gods, who provide for our own, the best the whole clan, which brings them sacrifices and which is bound to them by clan ties. We see, therefore, without sharing with a clansman who is present and, in general, not to feed him, is a "sin" and a direct risk of losing the benevolence of the gods-ancestors. It is not by chance that in all the tale "beath" plays a great role. In the fire of the hearth lives the "master spirit of the fire," a clansman or even an ancestor, who does not sin. Man is single thing that takes place in the house. Man, we have seen, are the ordinary mediators between the clan and its clan gods, and there is nothing more natural than that the gods of the hearth should above all be the guardians of the hospitality of the house.

/86 conv./

But the ties of the clansmen, living by the favors of [illegible] gods-clansmen, are not distinctly reciprocal "regalia" alone, but by the real, most extensive principle of the community of earthly benefits. If that does not find expression in a purely commercial form, it is only because there is no necessity whatever for it. Life is so simple, the conditions of economic life so good and so easy, that there is no reason to be wisely and freely before each person, that there is no necessity for commercial transactions and exchanges. Yet the principle is in full force. In the communal hunting for sea animals, for example, in sea bear, it is the owner of the boat who is generally also the most skillful hunter, but he receives no more than the last adolescent rower, and, in addition, a part of the catch is distributed to those families whose members for one reason or another could not participate in the hunting. Dried fish, the principal food of the Gilyak, is regarded almost as communal property, and anyone whose supplies have run out takes some from his neighbor without any objections. At any rate, no one goes hungry as long as any clansman has provisions. All the hungry individual has

/116 conv./

Or, one or another family is temporarily impoverished. Of course, there is no question of any "poor relief" in this case: it is unnecessary, because the family will find hospitality and assistance in any house there, among the close, even of the most distant clansman, until the hard times change. And this is not offensive to anyone, for it is a rare thing for someone neither to enjoy hospitality or refuse it to someone else from time to time.

Suppose it is necessary to arrange a troublesome and expensive funeral. There are neither collections nor contributions organization for the reception of guests, and so on. Each family provides for the funeral of its own relatives, and, if necessary, each bears his share of the labor, and only the man who is a little richer than the others takes upon himself the trouble of the arrangements. Everyone takes to the preparation of vittals and purchases; they meet at his house to share in the preferential work. During the hard times, dozens of additional people can find a sensible from all sides. For several days it is necessary to feed not only the people, but also the relatives and, finally, of the whole tribe. True, by virtue of the unfavorable circumstances mentioned by us, such as the dispersion of a small tribe over an enormous territory and many other circumstances, this work could not take formal shape in such complexed organizations as the plantation and tribal. The gift of hospitality is very simple. Indians, but here also they created an atmosphere of social hospitality which led the clan to organize relations onto the path of interclan community and brotherhood.

/117/ Let us consider a little more closely the bonds which exist between the gens' clan, between each clan and those from which the Gilyak take his wives or to which he gives his women. These bonds are not limited to feelings alone; they are expressed in quite real forms.

First of all, there is the obligation of mutual assistance and hospitality. Each clan has its own [illegible] and [illegible] organization existing within the clan to the blood ness', the extension to them of fair treatment of the clan matter belong to them by right through the female line: "Tymgi, (non-in-law /yan'n/ must be fed" — such is the formula of this interclan obligation.

/122 conv./

This rule, however, does not find expression at all in obligation of the ashmak's to support his son-in-law /yan'r/ and his family permanently in his own home. It may be that at a very remote time, in the period of maternality when the husband went to live in the home of the wife, it was actually so, but at the present time, under agnatic principles, the wife goes to the home of the husband and customarily moves completely to the clan of her husband. Nevertheless, in-laws, the principle of "sustenance," as we shall see, plays a quite important role in the mutual relations of the clans.

It is consolidated in a special, extremely peculiar religious rite, which consists of the following. At the last summer before the hard times, the ashmak's, the son-in-law /yan'r/ there is placed just inside the threshold a large, four-handled yan-ion kettle. Into it the ashmak's and his family place a big bible price for the bride, and on the outside a small kettle hanging on the handle of the kettle. When going out, the bride and bridegroom must step with the foot first on the inner and then on the outer kettle; the former represents with the father-in-law, the outer kettle — the son-in-law /yan'r/ /yan'r/. In a year, when, according to custom, the couple pay a visit to the ashmak's, the same ceremony is repeated upon their departure; only this time on each side of the threshold there is placed a pot and a cup, which are again exchanged as in the first instance. It is characteristic that the exchanged objects bear the designation nach (mine-thine, a symbol of mutual sustenance), while the whole rite is called nach yvhyrgr (trampling of the nach). It is also called lymyr'n-ioni — trampling of the nach. The principal idea of the obligatory rite, in the rite, in which a role is played by the so-called lymyr'n-mang — an old woman, the mistress of the threshold, the woman-father, the guardian petion of the home, whose blood flows equally /123/ in the veins of both of the newlyweds, the children of brother and sister. Standing in close connection with this rite, the ashmak's presents the bridegroom at a festival, when, before the shooting at the mark, the master of the bear pre-ashmak's and his yvgi each one beside himself as an and a kettle, which are also called nach and which are also mutually exchanged. If the first rite symbolizes mutual sustenance, the second symbolizes reciprocal co-operation in hunting, which, as we shall soon see, has a quite real basis.

/122 conv./

The gens' clan bonds are expressed in periodic visits to the relatives of the wife, although they have some peculiarities. Generally, the ashmak's visits his son-in-law, in addition to the hospitality shown, give a valuable present to her yvgi, especially on the first visit after the marriage. The son-in-law, in turn, generously entertains the ashmak's, depending on the resources, one or several pairs of smart garments for the ashmak's and his family, between the ashmak's and his family there is placed just inside the threshold a large, four-handled yan-ion kettle. Into it the ashmak's and his family place a big bible price for the bride, and on the outside a small kettle hanging on the handle of the kettle. When going out, the bride and bridegroom must step with the foot first on the inner and then on the outer kettle; the former represents with the father-in-law, the outer kettle — the son-in-law /yan'r/ /yan'r/. In a year, when, according to custom, the couple pay a visit to the ashmak's, the same ceremony is repeated upon their departure; only this time on each side of the threshold there is placed a pot and a cup, which are again exchanged as in the first instance. It is characteristic that the exchanged objects bear the designation nach (mine-thine, a symbol of mutual sustenance), while the whole rite is called nach yvhyrgr (trampling of the nach). It is also called lymyr'n-ioni — trampling of the nach. The principal idea of the obligatory rite, in the rite, in which a role is played by the so-called lymyr'n-mang — an old woman, the mistress of the threshold, the woman-father, the guardian petion of the home, whose

/127 conv./

Bu yvan yin yvan ok in the same village in marriage with each other. In ignorance, when a clan involved in war proves weak, the nerkh'i assist it to the end. The nerkh'i are bound to protect their kinsfolk with the same settlement as they show toward their own clansmen. Only in the payment of tribunal may the nerkh'i not participate. Still more, sometimes, perhaps, are the mutual relations in the matter of the reconciliation of clans, especially when the hostile clans are nerkh'i to each other, as not infrequently happens, and we have already expressed in the section on revenge our opinion that the institution of blood money itself, in all probability, owes its origin to the beneficial influence of women and the religio-social bonds which tie together the matrimonial clans.

Such are the relations between the ashmak's and yvgi clans, relations which bear the features of the mutual aid of the clans and extend in sympathies to a whole series of foreign clans. This is the whole school of social training, a school of benevolence, hospitality, compassion, and, finally, social good-breeding. In this school are formed those social habits and feelings which are so characteristic of primitive man and tie and are transformed into sympathy for a whole tribe and finally for people and humanity. The same Gilyak ashmak's is partner dog, which, together with the dogs of the latter, will go to the master of the bear, the ashmak's, representing the clan; and at the last moment the yvgi performs the ceremony of the "sampling of the thimble" (see above). Such things are not formalities for primitive man, they strengthen the ties of kinship with the higher sanction of religious authority.

But these ties are not limited only to occasional "ceremonies" hospitality, invitations to hunt, and festivals.

They go still further, rising in their intensiveness to the power of a true clan bond. When a man has few clansmen, or he gets along badly with them, he leaves his native settlement and goes to live among the Tungus, the Dzhai, and the Ainu. This is why, by the way, there are so few settlements made up of inhabitants belonging to one clan. Nevertheless, /127/ clansmen are commingled with their yvgi or ashmak's /127/. But these ties prove of

/128 conv./

This rule is so strictly observed that the very text who has been slight in receiving and making presents to his yvgi is not even invited by the latter to festivals, but, on the other hand, he will be the honored guest of his own ashmak's. Thus there is formed an attitude of the yvgi, which is an entirely series of clash in their socio-religious festivals.

We have already said that the institution of blood money itself, in all probability, owes its origin to the beneficial influence of women and the religio-social bonds which tie together the matrimonial clans.

Such are the relations between the ashmak's and yvgi clans, relations which bear the features of the mutual aid of the clans and extend in sympathies to a whole series of foreign clans. This is the whole school of social training, a school of benevolence, hospitality, compassion, and, finally, social good-breeding. In this school are formed those social habits and feelings which are so characteristic of primitive man and tie and transformed into sympathy for a whole tribe and finally for people and humanity. The same Gilyak ashmak's is partner dog, which, together with the dogs of the latter, will go to the master of the bear, the ashmak's representing the clan; and at the last moment the yvgi performs the ceremony of the "sampling of the thimble" (see above). Such things are not formalities for primitive man, they strengthen the ties of kinship with the higher sanction of religious authority.

But these ties are not limited only to occasional "ceremonies" hospitality, invitations to hunt, and festivals.

They go still further, rising in their intensiveness to the power of a true clan bond. When a man has few clansmen, or he gets along badly with them, he leaves his native settlement and goes to live among the Tungus, the Dzhai, and the Ainu. This is why, by the way, there are so few settlements made up of inhabitants belonging to one clan. Nevertheless, /127/ clansmen are commingled with their yvgi or ashmak's /127/. But these ties prove of reception, and nonetheless only in the rarest cases will the Gilyak refuse to render his hospitality to the Russian who has wandered his way. Where the Gilyak have dealt cruelly with such fugitives (1), it was only in pursuance of clan vengeance

/127 cont./

1. The Gilyak regard Russian fugitives as one clan, the representative of which answer for one another. for clan clamence — just what they consider their duty to do with respect to /133/ their own Russian-minded, but isolated acts of clan not do so at all change their personal relations with members of other clans. Of course, among the Gilyak, as among civilized peoples, national prejudice, or, they are to be attributed entirely to ignorance, to lack of acquaintance with the Russian, sometimes giving a wide play to fantastic notions and fears. These prejudices exist among them even among those who otherwise live in more remote regions. That the Gilyak of the western shore of Sakhalin are wont to regard the Russian as the Ochook alone as little short of cannibals, at any rate as extremely evil and inclined to harm, is nothing in the person prejudice, the result of ignorance or generalizations from single cases. In the very same way after the first expedition of our Cossacks in the seventeenth century the Gilyak called the Russian nothing other than tigr (devil), but then the Cossacks gave abundant cause for it, not only by their strange outer appearance, their novel garments and arms, but by a whole string of senseless conduct and deeds, for example the "the fortize of fortize" of valuable for pelts. But now that the Gilyak have met peaceful Russian peasants, they recall their ancient "prejudice" as a funny anecdote and can conduct themselves with the humanity and tact of a civilized man.

But we have strayed somewhat from our main theme. We can now resume it.

By their touching tenderness, their devotion and selflessness. Toward an /134/ though only potential, the "father-in-law" sometimes behave better than toward their own children. "One must feed a son-in-law," runs the religious formula of relations between "father-in-law" and "son-in-law." In this dry formulation is hidden a rich content. Not only in times of poverty does a "father-in-law" sometimes with his huge family, move in to live with his father-in-law, getting a living from him without any payment for a period of months and even several years, but even in normal times the "son-in-law" (although such merely by designation) is the favorite guest in the house of his father-in-law.

For months at a time the Gilyak youth loudly and happily again their time in the mountains, hunting, fishing, and fishing in every yurt the most hearty welcome and the greatest delicacies, and where the hunting bounty, "son-in-law" is invariably a participant in the undertakings of his "father-in-law," and when he returns home, they always give him, in addition to /137/ the usual gifts, also his share of the catch. At solemn moments of life, for example, at the bear festival, the "son-in-law" is the most honored guest among the persons who have been invited, and it is considered the duty of killing the bear is performed by the "son-in-law." At such a time, the "father-in-law" are obliged to consult with other's and in case of ceremony.

In order to evaluate fully the religious background of these peculiar relations between "father-in-law" and "son-in-law," it is necessary to keep in mind the wide meaning that the Gilyak, with a poetic primitiveness, ascribe to the relations of their original taboos, have given to the term "father-in-law."

From the kinship terminology we know that the clan of the "father-in-law" is considered by the Gilyak as the clan from which a man's kinsmen usually take wives, but also all the other clans from which ever his kinsmen have taken wives in the past. Thus, each man can have several clans to take his wife. Thus, each man can have several clans kinship relationship. Among the Gilyak there are very few cases when opposite sex relations are allowed to other persons at younger ones for sexual excesses, it was only on account of economic considerations, since the bride-price is frequently distract profits from work at home. Reproaches were also directed at pregnant maidens, but here the considerations of a special nature, about which we will speak later. (1) the danger of a connection with persons of the forbidden categories, and principally, 2) the responsibility of the father of the child. For ordinarily the adventures of the youth are no secret and do not pass without a trace. There is a Gilyak saying of puberty and devote all their labors. All their thoughts, to the attention of the parents, in reference to the matter of marriage, shall see, flash is possible to marry. The bachelor youth is not content with the bride-price, have no time to think of anything material tribe. Here, so reports Shternberg, /141/ the Gilyak, the young man, the young man's kinsmen, the young man's clan, the young man's tribe, the young man's tribe, the young man's tribe

/140 cont./

0960
5944
516 3522
4170 415 3402

Bear festival. Displaying the bear's head along with the skin in the house and the festive meal (Gilyak).

2: Schrenck--1249 E-5 (1854-1856) 1881-1895 RX2 Gilyak RX2

225 has hung something in front of the seal. Th 825 tell of a theft in the village. If the wife at h 787 relations with another man while her husba 626 hunt, the seals on the floe will likewise en 784 course. When they witness some such thin our Gilyaks will, after returning home, be and later on find out from neighbors in the really happened. Now, suppose you cook s and pick your teeth with a little stick, then sea will show how you picked your teeth wi

During the spring seal-hunt on floes, wh jump from floe to floe close to shore and k poons, those at home must not break any o or bowls, for otherwise the floe will break say, the father, brother or son, may drow at home must be very careful.

On the day when something goes wrong will not get his seal. Then he returns hom to find out what deprived him and his frie 776 Roygin told me all this in order to prove 825 of kes, 'god'; a point on which I did not wa 225 "How can a seal, 20 versts from home, kn on at home?" he told me. "Surely kes mu about it. That is why we say that kes exist

225 Incidentally, after my conversation with 784 told me that the mrolv-nivev 'ancient Gil 574 following ui and "taboo," "sin" during a s must not touch the handle of a kettle or tea master of the house (in the past as well as could pour out tea or any other liquid food even by mistake, the guest touched the han teapot, he was obliged to tear a strip of m and put it in the (hearth). (1)

1. This word in my diary is illegibl remember, Pletunka spoke of a hea

225 [86] During the spring hunt the Gilyaks o 552 hunt different types of seals. They also ca 825 dolphin. They distinguish the following var seals: Pila-la r 'Sivuch'

1. Nav-na 'present-time animal', i.e. given year.

2. Tje-na literally: 'last year's animal' old sivuch or one born in the previous yea

/426 cont./

262 of these and on occasion many other fish is so inferior both quali-252 tatively and especially quantitatively to that obtained from the 825 two first-named kinds of salmon that it is not very important next to that one, and therefore by "ma" the Gilyak simply refer as a rule only to the former one and differentiate it, according to the kind of fish from which it comes, as lyghi-ma and tengi-ma 262 always giving preference to the former over the latter. Ma, then, is the chief food of the Gilyak, their bread, so to speak (3) --

[113]

3. Steller (Beschr. von dem Lande Kamtschatka /Description of the Country of Kamchatka/, p. 157) designated the jukola, and likewise chiefly the one obtained from Salmo lagocephalus, as the "true Kamchadal bread."

the basis /427/ of their households and the red thread running 574 through their entire dietary system. When a newly arrived Gilyak 264 enters a yurt and has taken a seat on one of the sleeping benches, 262 a small tray (Gilyak chach-tschitsch, Pl. XXXIV, Fig. 4)[1] with 412 several strips of ma and a bowl of fish oil (Gilyak tom), as well as a small wooden spoon (Pl. XXXIV, Fig. 7), is immediately given to him by one of the women. With the small tray on his lap, he cuts up the jukola on it with his belt-knife and eats it in such a way that he first dips each piece into the oil, or alternatively spoons up the latter, or he dips the end of the strip of jukola in the oil, seizes it with his teeth and cuts the bite off from below upward, immediately in front of the mouth, with his knife close to the lips and passing by the tip of the nose, as has been observed among so many other primitive peoples (1). When a Gilyak

264 171
113

1. Thus, for example, among the Eskimo (Cranz, Hist. von Grönland /History of Greenland/, Vol. I, 192; Parry, Sec. Voyage, etc., p. 506; Seemann, Reise um die Welt /Voyage around the World/, Vol. II, p. 66; Klutschak, Als Eskimo

[1] [See category 116, P. 1014--Analyst]

/427 cont./

264 171 113

1. (cont.)
unter den Eskimos /As an Eskimo among the Eskimo/, p. 232), the Buryat (Radde, "Ozero Baikal" /Lake Baikal/," Viestn. Geogr. Obshch., Part 21, 1857, Sec. on Res. and Mat., p. 140; Raev", "Buriaty /The Buryat/," Viestn. Geogr. Obshch., Pt. 24, 1858, Sec. on Res. and Mat., p. 10), the Ostyak (Pallas, Reise durch versch. Prov. des Russ. Reichs /Travels through Various Provinces of the Russian Empire/, Vol. III, p. 46), the Samoyed (A. G. Schrenck, Reise nach dem Nordost. des europ. Russlands /Travels to the Northeastern Part of European Russia/, Dorpat, 1848, Vol. I, p. 311; Islavin", Samoiedy /The Samoyed/, St. Petersburg, 1847, p. 35; Abramov", "Opis. Berezovsk. kraia /Description of the Berezov Region/," Zap. Russk. Geogr. Obshch., Pt. XII, 1857, p. 354; Middendorff, Reise, etc., Vol. IV, 1453), and others. The Tungusic tribes of the Amur region do the same thing. The Nertscha /Nercha/ Tungus call it "to eat from the knife" and maintain that meat so eaten is much tastier than if it is first cut in pieces (Usol-tsev", "Putesh. po dolinie rieki Nerchi /Journey along the Valley of the Nercha River/," Viestn. Imp. Russk. Geogr. Obshch., 1857, I, p. 76).

*262 484 594 when a Gilyak undertakes a long trip, though he can be sure of finding a hospitable reception for himself and his dogs in every village of his countrymen, he nevertheless takes along a bundle of jukola just in case bad weather should force him to spend the night under the open sky, in which case the ma, warmed or slightly roasted over the campfire, will serve him very well.

/469 cont./

1. (cont.)
de St. Pétersb., VIIth series, Vol. XII, No. 2, p. 99).

Among the Gilyak, the tobacco, chopped fine on a special board (Pl. XXXIV, Fig. 8) and, when dry, disintegrating almost to powder, is kept in a pouch, which, adopted everywhere in the Amur region, seems to be of one and the same Manchu-Chinese form: long and narrow and provided with a lateral slit close to the upper end, by means of which the pipe is stuck in, in order to be filled with tobacco inside the pouch. It is always carried in this position, together with the pouch, which as a rule is attached to one of the top buttons of the fur coat or the shirt and hangs down from there over the chest. Usually it is ordinarily made of fish skin, leather, or a piece of fur, bordered with Chinese cotton or silk along the edges, decorated at the top with some embroidered or painted arabesques, and occasionally made out of one of these fabrics.

The Gilyak likes to share the pleasure of smoking tobacco with others. This is never done, however, by passing the pipe around among all the persons sitting around the hearth or a fire burning outdoors. This is prohibited simply by the small size of the pipe, as well as by the social or moral differences usually existing between those present. As a rule, however, one uses the pipe go back and forth between two persons sitting side by side. In particular, if a newcomer appears in the yurt, the host, after he has taken a seat beside him, hands him his newly lighted pipe, which the latter, after he takes a puff from it, returns again to the former, receives it from him again, and so forth, until the pipe is finished, whereupon the guest pays him back in the same way. This is always a sign of friendly welcome and of good understanding, or of a certain esteem and equal footing. I often saw the Chinese merchants on the Amur do this with the natives who entered the yurt and approached them, which undoubtedly was for the purpose of winning them over by such advances, very flattering to them, and putting them in a more favorable mood for the business dealings.

(See category 116, p. 1014 - Analysis)

/639 cont./

462 Since the house, which has cooled off during the night, must be heated again in the morning, the fish broth cooked for the dogs, and the latter fed in order for them to be ready for possible excursions by the men. The storing of all food supplies and the preparation of food for the occupants of the house likewise fall, of course, entirely on the women. In the morning and during the day, however, the Gilyak usually eat only cold food. The main meal, for which hot foods, too, are to be prepared, does not take place until toward evening, for then is the time when the men return from their outside activities and when persons traveling through who have ties of hospitality with one of the occupants of the house and claim shelter for the night may arrive. Moreover, through the preparations for this meal the yurt is heated to the temperature which the Gilyak finds agreeable for the night.

Making the clothing for the whole family occupies the women even more than the preparation of food for the human beings and dogs. First of all, this involves procuring or putting into proper condition the materials used for it: to dress the animal pelts and skins; to clean, pound, and dry the fish skins, which, besides being used for clothing, also replace window glass; to prepare the twisting thread from nettle fibers or from animal and fish skins, and so forth. This is followed by the cutting, /640/ sewing, and quilting of the various articles of clothing, which, as we have seen, are sometimes done provided, in accordance with Gilyak taste, with sorts of colorful, intertwined embroidery and other decorations and embellishments. There are still other domestic duties, such as making household utensils, bowls, baskets, buckets of birch bark, sewing battlebeds and sleigh-boxes, and so forth out of cloth or animal pelts or skins for various uses, and the like.

Thus one literally never sees a Gilyak woman without work even for a moment, whereas the man, upon his return from hunting or fishing, spends much time in rest and idleness and at home he has nothing to do but to make the implements needed for his own activities. Since these are very numerous and complicated, in that, among other things, they include all the varied and in part artistic wrought-iron lances, knives, harpoons, and the like, one

/668 cont./

342 and thus in its utilization is to a certain extent subject to the 423 communistic principle, which is not at all the case with regard to the storehouse. On account of its size and complicated construction, the former cannot be built by a single person, as can the latter, putting it up requires the joint labor of many persons, whom the person undertaking the enterprise, if he cannot find them among his relatives, engages from the circle of his fellow-villagers or neighbors for a small payment. Though later on it belongs to the person or persons who undertook the construction and were able to persuade the others to help, it is never forgotten that it owes its origin to joint labor and, accordingly, it is always regarded to some extent as common property: shelter and protection in it may not be denied to any villager or other fellow-tribesman, and it would be absolutely contrary to the views and the practice of a Gilyak house-owner if he tried to collect a high rent from a person permanently domiciled with him, and, to be sure, in any form other than through the obligation of a tenant for the household. Hence the direct profit from a winter house, and similarly from a summer house, is very little.

The situation is different with regard to a storehouse, which is built by the owner himself. It belongs to him exclusively, and the richer Gilyak only have an interest in one insofar as they have provisions and other things and have no shelter for them. It is arranged in practice so that only a single wall, and, if this is not enough, a second and a third can be erected for storage, until the means to construct an entire storehouse are obtained (1).

1. Cf. the arrangement of a storehouse (p. 929) with its 11 wall pieces (f-g) and two spaces (c and d) in the middle.

Since more can be asked from a well-to-do Gilyak, a section of a wall, even reckoned at only one ja, will yield about 10 ja in direct income.

/668 cont./

685 cigar minting. I had even greater confidence in the latter.
123 Since I had to face the danger that a mechanical workshop [122] erected in the immediate neighborhood of my house prepared for me, in that it almost constantly threw sparks from its chimney over my house, which were covered only with tree bark and hence might easily go up in flames, I decided, since I had planned a trip, to take my manuscripts and collections to the village of Sakhalin for the summer and entrust them to the Gilyak Mradamn. The boxes were provided with a cover, tied crosswise by means of a rope, and put in the summer dwelling of the Gilyak. My trust was completely confirmed.

[574] Hospitality, too, is based on the national principle. At first it seemed that the Gilyak were inhospitable to me. They are too suspicious, too avaricious, /670/ too concerned about their own advantage to be easygoing. On Sakhalin, on the occasion of my first visit to the islands, they wanted to prevent me from using the fire in their yurt and even threatened me with a knife, so that I had to resort to grave threats with my pistol in order to have my way. I must say, however, that prior to my first journey to Sakhalin the rumor had spread among the Gilyak that the Russians wanted the island for themselves and therefore intended to kill all the Gilyak. After I had spent a winter in the Amur region, however, and had formed numerous connections, from which they could see that I meant well, I was always friendly toward them, they became friendly and hospitable toward me, so that a very good relationship developed, and I even enjoyed their confidence to some extent. But there was also a very great difference between the attitude of the Russian (lotscha) or a nibach (Gilyak) who was to be given lodgings: as soon as the cry "nibach! nibach!" rang out, the fire, stirred up by the women, crackled more vigorously, a saber-shaped piece of wood (Gilyak warwan) was used to scrape and beat the snow from the person entering, a bowl of fish oil and ma was offered as a welcome, and, no matter how late it was, a meal was prepared. Then the host and the guest sat down by the blazing fire, the events of the day were discussed, in which the women also

/670 cont./

[574] took part, and until far into the night one small pipe after another was smoked, passing from hand to hand, always in the same tranquil, deliberate manner. Hospitality also requires that the dogs be fed before they continue on their journey the following day.

484 The Gilyak thus travels only in short daily trips from village 574 to village. If, with greater distance between the villages or when bad weather taken him by surprise, he is forced to spend the night out-of-doors, and he reaches the next village after the regular dog-feeding has already taken place there, the fire under the kettles is rekindled without further ado, and a special meal is prepared for him, no matter how late it may be and how, moreover, he has to stay there for the night and does not continue his journey until the following morning after the dogs have again been fed.

In my case, however, the weather is first carefully checked, especially in the villages located along the seacoast, where strong winds and blizzards very often occur and put the traveler in danger. During the several days of bad weather which [114] I spent in the village of Tyk on the west coast of Sakhalin in February of 1855 and 56, I frequently witnessed the indecision which civilers generally the Gilyak when the weather is still rather doubtful and the question arises as to whether going on under such conditions would be too risky. In most instances the consultations ended in another day of rest, for haste is quite foreign to the Gilyak, and an almost excessive caution always guides them on land as well as on sea journeys. On the other hand, it is hardly to be assumed that if they really had gratitude in their hearts, they would not have a word for it and that it should simply have always eluded us.
[159] After all, we saw them in all kinds of situations when they received services or help and hospitality offered almost to excess. Is it possible that guests who have been sheltered, despite notoriously scanty means, for days as a result of storms setting in and who have been fed along with all their dogs, as the Gilyak do among one another, depart without having said a word of thanks? Is everything based only on national communism or on the [123] certainty of reciprocity in similar cases? With regard to me,

/671 cont./

others were to follow (3). This method was at least more pur-[82] poseful, for it increased the food supply of the people and saved [184] dog food, the lack of which was already making itself felt at [187] the time.

I never saw or heard of a Gilyak who, upon entering a 574 house, greeted the host, hostess, or any other acquaintance with a word or gesture, nor is it done upon his departure. As I gather [129] from Middendorff's handwritten notes, given to me to use, this [159] is also the case in the Russian settlements. Instead him, too, 574 With me they likewise constantly came and went without a salutation, or at most, later, with a "sdrâstwuĭ" and "poschtschâĭ" [159] learned from the Russians. Only in the presence of the Manchu [123] and Chinese do they imitate the /672/ Tungusic Amur peoples by dropping on one knee in front of them and bowing their heads, but this is done only in order to gain their favor and to avoid being punished by them, since the Manchu officials in Sanssin and other places strictly insist upon such a show of deference.

But what surprised me even more is the fact that the 574 word "thanks" seems to be missing entirely from their lexicon.
I never heard it used by them, either among themselves or to me. Middendorff and Glehn had the same experience. I should like to ascribe this to the incompleteness of our word list, which is in general very poor in expressions for abstract concepts and emotions. On the other hand, it is hardly to be assumed that if they really had gratitude in their hearts, they would not have a word for it and that it should simply have always eluded us. After all, we saw them in all kinds of situations when they received services or help and hospitality offered almost to excess. Is it possible that guests who have been sheltered, despite notoriously scanty means, for days as a result of storms setting in and who have been fed along with all their dogs, as the Gilyak do among one another, depart without having said a word of thanks? Is everything based only on national communism or on the [123] certainty of reciprocity in similar cases? With regard to me,

/697 cont./ From now on [122] it belongs, so speak, to the whole village, for all its members have to attend to its care and feeding and, accordingly, are entitled to participate in the forthcoming festival in its honor, ultimately ending in its death and the consumption of it. The bear festival, then, is a very important sense is a communal festival which unites all the individual members of one village community and therefore understandably represents the climax of the social and co-operative life of the Gilyak. The original owner of the bear is the man who bought it or who arranged for its capture, has only the right to determine the time when the festival is to take place and to direct it, always, of course, within the limits of traditional practice. Similarly, as the host, he must make the more or less opulent one by adding to the culinary delicacies other than the ones furnished by the bear and, accordingly, to invite to it relatives, friends, and acquaintances, even of a foreign tongue, living beyond his village. Finally, after the festival is over, the skin of the bear goes to him.

231 The feeding of the captive bear by all the inhabitants of the village takes place in accordance with a previously established order. The food given to it, through the little window in the prison consists exclusively of fish in a raw or dried state (jukola), mosaj, i.e., a mush made of ground fish-skins or cut-up jukola, fish or seal /698/ oil, and red bilberries or cowberries (1), and water, which in summer may be given to it in liquid form, but in winter only in the form of ice or snow. The long pipe (Gilyak: nichyr) illustrated on Plate LI /p.1259/, Fig. 2, is used for presenting the food, in particular the mosaj and the water. From time to time, but only rarely and chiefly, no doubt, for the purpose of cleaning the cage, the bear is taken out of it. For this procedure, however, which I witnessed in the village of Tschomi on the Amur-Liman, it must be partly bound again. This is done by carefully pushing apart a couple of the boards on top of the cage, throwing a noose round the neck of the bear still in the cage, and shackling in

1. Concerning its preparation, see p. 671 above.

/699 cont./

[796] After these preliminary and general remarks concerning the bear festival of the Gilyak, I shall turn now to a detailed description of it. At the beginning of 1856, I was visited /700/ at the [123] village of Tschomi by the oft-mentioned Gilyak, Iokin from Tebach, renowned among his countrymen as the organizer of great bear festivals. Since he was very favorably disposed toward me and even owed me a debt of gratitude, I asked him to give me an opportunity to attend one of these festivals from the beginning, whereupon I was told in reply that within the next few days such a festival was to take place at his house and that he had come to Tschorbach, as the Russian post was called by the Gilyak, primarily to purchase for the festival the necessary tobacco and brandy.
[114] I was with my friend and later colleague at the Academy, Czekanowiczwicz, who was a skilled draftsman and happened to be visiting me at the time, we set out for Tebach on January 9 (21). After spending the night in Allei, we entered Wasi about noon on the following day, where we saw traces of bear festivals that had already taken place. One of the houses was distinguished by a tall, slender little tree which stood in front of its entrance wall on either side and had most of the bark and all the branches removed up to the top, where a scanty crown towered over the gable of the house. A cord ran from one little tree to the other, slightly above the ridge of the roof, and from it [797] bundles of curled wood-shavings, the so-called zach of the Gilyak hung down to the roof. A stick stuck in the snow near the house door likewise bore on its tip a fir branch and a bundle of wood shavings. There was a bright full moon, which we saw rise before Iokin's house in Tebach, which was decorated just like the one in Wasi. As we were driving up the long, bank steeply sloping down to the river, on whose ridge the village of Tebach lies, we heard noisy cries of jubilation, and now we saw a crowd of Gilyak moving about in front of the house. They were young men from the village and other guests invited to the feast, who, in a gay mood, were playing various games that are always [574] associated with a bear festival. The games looked very similar

/708 cont. /

(2000) house alone. Hence it is quite understandable that during the *796 entire bear festival, but especially during the night preceding the (856) principal feast, the Gilyak women are fully occupied with the preparation of the dishes required for it, which, as has been men-(B34) tioned (2), is sometimes very complicated. /709/ They are always prepared on the hearth which is located on the transverse wall of the house in a line with the bears arranged in the centre area and is thus exposed to their gaze in particular. I shall therefore call it the bear hearth. In it, and in it alone, quite large quanti-*796 ties of fresh fir branches (from the fir Picea jezoensis, Gilyak twin)

2. See p. 676 above.

(824) are burned by the women from time to time, not only during this last night, but throughout, for the entire duration of the bear festival, which may be one of the attestations of homage which are given to the bears or one of the offerings which are presented to them.
Thus a bear festival is proclaimed by the prevailing fragrance of burned pine-needles in the houses and to some extent even outside.

On January 13 at about 6 o'clock in the morning, the *796 leading of the bears finally commenced. After they had made their (23) last rounds through the village, the animals were led to the place of execution prepared for them, the so-called kadhra of the Gilyak, and arranged side by side in front of their hearth, the stakes standing in a row in the middle of it. The order of the bears was again the same so that the small bear was closest to the building in the back of the kadhra, the ilagu, the large one in the middle, and the medium-sized one next to the entrance. Then everybody *796 went into Judin's house, where in the meantime the women had set out the foods prepared for the feast, in wooden troughs, round wooden bowls, and square bowls of birch bark, on the floor in the central area of the house, where the bears had previously stood.
The guests invited to the feast took their places on the bench *B04 along the transverse wall opposite the bear hearth, which on such an occasion is regarded as the bench of honor, though as a rule, it is probably less warm and often less light than longitudinal bench

/709 cont. /

*796 beside the other hearth where the host and a few other guests sit.
*S74 In this case, however, it is regarded as the bench of honor because it is closer to the bears and in full view of them. On the floor, (123) as Judin told us, there are even more of such to be observed than elsewhere in the house, and when, for example, we wanted to make some notes in our journal about the bear festival and draw some sketches of it from there, he asked us why we gave politeness to sit on the longitudinal bench for that, because in the other place this could easily be seen by the bears and might be resented *B16 by them. The guests sat down with their legs crossed under them in two rows on the bench: the older and more dignified ones immediately along the wall, the younger ones along the edge of the bench. Between the two rows sufficient space was left for a path on which the women moved from one end of the bench to the other, in that they were put on the bench from the floor at the left end and came back again at the right end. When one bowl had moved along a bit, it was followed by a second, a third, etc.
The number of the various dishes, however, was fewer than that of the bowls, for many a dish was repeated again after a couple of courses. It is strange that the host himself does not take part in (619) this meal, and similarly all the relatives on the paternal side, in other words, the so-called ngafk, are excluded from it with him, while the maternal /710/ relatives (amal or armal), as well as the friends and acquaintances, participate in the meal, judging *796 by the quantity of food and bowls that traveled back and forth, it (B4) was a very copious meal that Judin set before his guests. Nevertheless, most of his guests, after the end of the meal, went to another house in order to eat more. Thus we visited one house throughout the village, so that even the ngafk of a particular host probably do not come off badly.

Those Gilyak, however, who stayed in Judin's house, mostly younger people who had spent the night leading the bears around and therefore were probably tired, took advantage of the pause after the feast to renew their strength with a few hours of sleep.
*796 The quiet lasted but a short time, however, for soon the women S41 began their routine morning activity, feeding the dogs, and then,

/720 cont. /

Bears' head-bands with figure of toad and agate ball.

*796 conceivable that they are trying to imitate this Buddhist forehead (177) swelling (illewise on the head of the bear venerated by them in (177) superstitious fear and likewise regarded to some extent as divine, (B4) and that they do this with the agate balls which are furnished (B4) them for this purpose by the Chinese themselves. Thus, accord-*796 ing to Gilyak ideas, the bear is to some extent moved up among (B4) the divinities and therefore a formal bear-cult is practiced.

With the putting on of the snout and head bands, or the *796 (B4) toad and agate-ball bands, all the honors imaginable have been (B42) shown to the bear and now, in the awareness of their complete (B4) innocence, the Gilyak may, with a clear conscience, give themselves up to the pleasures of the table. A great number of wooden bowls were immediately brought into the house on a sled and arranged on the floor around the bears, while the participants in the feast took their places, sitting cross-legged, on the bench *796 (B42) of honor. First, a sti, which probably was one of the sacred (B4) utensils since it /721/ had been propped up against the ilagu the whole time, was used to present pieces of frozen sturgeon to the guests. While they were eating it simple circular

/721 cont. /

*796 wooden bowls, or, more correctly, large plates (Gilyak aam-(574) ngir) (1), were filled with a dish which consisted of cooked beans, (574)

1. See p. 683 above.

a kind of groats, fish oil or seal oil, and chopped leeks, and the serving of which was done with the greatest formality. At each *796 side of the ilagu a man was busy lifting one plate after another (574) from the floor and bringing it to the server of the food, who sat on a sled in the front part of the yurt. The latter, with a large hemispherical iron ladle (Plate XXXII /p. 1013 /, Fig. 5), scooped the aforementioned groats into a trough and served it on the plates which were then immediately taken back again to their places.
This was repeated three times with each plate, whereupon the server got up, stepped up to each plate, and added some mush and a piece of frozen sturgeon to the already huge portions. From each side two men now stepped forward to the row of plates, placed a decoratively carved spoon in each of them, and handed them to the guests, one plate to each one, beginning with the two sitting in the middle of the bench and going from there to the ends. What was left over from the superhuman portions was poured back into a trough. The women were totally excluded from the feast. Indeed, none of them was even present during it. Everyone then rose from his seat, the plates were taken to the other house where the medium-sized bear was displayed, and an identical (142) meal took place there. In both cases, however, this was only a meal in advance of the actual feast, for no bear meat or fat had yet been consumed, and this would not take place until the following day.

This day (January 31) began in much the same way as the previous ones, with the cutting up of the bear meat and fat in the presence of the bears' heads. Numerous guests had already appeared early in the forenoon. They were put on the bench of (187) honor behind the bear rack without further ado and, strangely (533) enough, were fed without all the ceremony that had been observed so strictly the day before: each guest was given a fir branch and

/722 cont. /

*796 in the snow on either side of the path in front of the house for the (574) departing guests, to be taken along by them during by -- only (574) bear meat and fat were missing, for they had already received this in their mops as provisions for the trip.

Because of the feast, the feeding of the dogs and the dog *796 races did not take place until shortly before noon. In the afternoon, (53) however, for the first and only time the women actively partici-
(53) pated in the festive entertainments, in that they executed a dance
(171) to the drum music which resounded in a very strange and wild rhythm. At any one time only one dancer was in motion, holding in her hands either fir branches or castanet-like wooden clappers, and the dance actually consisted of only the craziest postures and contortions of the body, in relation to the lower part. It vividly reminded Dittmar of the bear dance of the Kamchatka women, and even the music was similar, except that here it was drumming instead of singing. Dittmar was also reminded of the and niche, whereas in Kamchatka the dancers and the spectators (B4) jointly sing. Incidentally, I must note that such an outburst of *796 merriment among the Gilyak women is probably very rare, because (B4) the Gilyak are very serious and sedate than the men and are always much busier than the latter at all sorts of work and (B02) activities. And it could by no means have been the result of high spirits induced by liquor, for this it, or was at the time of my visit among the Gilyak, absolutely prohibited during the bear festivals, a measure, as has been mentioned (2), prompted by cool reasoning

2. See p. 719 above.

*796 and evidence of their great strength of character. Another fact is (B4) much more surprising and much more difficult to explain, namely, that no shamanistic activities are permitted in a house where a bear festival is being celebrated. The reason for this may be that in the eyes of the Gilyak the shamans are of the shaman would disturb the festive mood and, through the power that it exerts over the spirit world as well as over the human spirit, would cause bewilderment and misfortune among the participants in the festival.

/722 cont. /

It would therefore also be prohibited for the women, however, /723/who are likewise able to practice this art, because they might easily mistake it simply out of revenge for their exclusion from the festive meals as a matter of principle.

The bear festivals have no definite duration: the feasting *796 goes on, with a constant rotation of the participants, relatives, (114) friends, villagers, and other guests as long as the quantity of bear meat and fat lasts; in Tebach, Judin told his guests, Dittmar and I were told, it would last for many days since three bears had been killed. When, therefore, on the following day (February 1/13) the proceedings of the festival in fact began to be repeated in exactly the same way, they left this village and returned to Nikolaievsk.

As was mentioned above, I had an opportunity in the previous year (1886) to witness this second part of the bear festival, con-*796 (114) ducted in a similar way with the usual ceremonies, in the village of Uda. My conjecture that their customs would not differ essentially from those of the Gilyak was in large part confirmed by Dittmar's report. As proof of this and at the same time as evidence of the adoption of Gilyak customs among the Olcha, I shall here insert a brief description of what I saw among them on this occasion, with reference to the above information about the Gilyak.

When I arrived in the village of Uda, located only five *796 (114) versts below Kidsi, on March 22 (April 3) at about 10 o'clock in the morning and stepped into one of its five houses, I found it decorated in the interior in the same manner as is done among the Gilyak for an international bear festival. There, however, (B78) opposite the ilagdre decorated with the bear's head and skin and with numerous fir branches and wood shavings (Gilyak zach = Olcha jarmanati), a second rack quite similar to the first one but somewhat smaller stood at the other central-post of the house and on its thelves likewise held meat and pieces of the fat of the dismembered bear, along with all kinds of other articles. Moreover, the passage-way between the bear rack and the bench of honor was blocked off by a pole laid across it, and by means of it this bench, as well as the whole yurt, was divided into halves. The floor throughout the

/734 cont. /

I was present at the bear festival in Tyk when the meat of *796 the animal was already being eaten, that is, toward the end of the (114) second act. Parts of the dismembered animal were still lying on the bear rack, and among them the skull already cleaned of the muscle meat, which I tried to buy, in vain, of course, from the owner of the animal. Several Gilyak busily eating their portion still sat on the benches, others were either crowding around them or in the passageways between the hearth and the benches, each one trying to snatch a piece of meat here or there with his knife. One of the members of the household was collecting contributions from the diner: in a little trough in order to give them to the women and children, and similar troughs with pieces of bear meat were carried to the other yurts of the village. Even among the Amur Gilyak, when this time comes during the feast, formalities usually cease, and here not a trace of them remained -- everybody milled around informally in the passageway. In the village of Mamchu-Chinese products, cereals and legumes, such as is customarily served to guests in the Amur villages in lavish amounts, seemed not to have preceded the feast, as is the case in Tebach and Tyk, and the bear and bear evidently was not one of the well-to-do and only a little of these products reach Sakhalin, and that only through the Amur Gilyak and Olcha. Under these circumstances it was understandable that in Dui, where soon thereafter a bear festival was celebrated amid a great conflux of participants, a subsequent celebration took place immediately afterward for the gratification of the latter, at which lacking other food, dog were eaten, as has already been mentioned above (1) in connection with the discussion

1. See pp. 661 and 662.

*796 of cynophagy among the Gilyak.
(114) It struck me that on Sakhalin there was nothing to be seen of any of the collateral entertainments, such as dog races, all kinds of games for young and old, etc., which customarily accompany the bear festival among the Amur Gilyak. In summing up, one may conclude that among the Sakhalin Gilyak, especially in the region with early yurts exclusively, that is, along the

9: Hawes--258-259 T-3 (1901) 1903 Gilyak
116, 574, 577, 888

"The Gilyak expects and finds a welcome almost everywhere, since he has relations, members of his khal, at every other village. Hospitality is not a virtue, but an obligation, and few there are who take unfair advantage of it. The guest of to-day may be the host of to-morrow. Those who are too aged to hunt are supported by the exertions of the younger generation, and even they can slice and [259] clean fish in the season. There was one notable exception to these old people, who did travel, and who having no relations nearer than the mainland went about begging. Of him the Gilyaks were very much ashamed, and I feel almost guilty of a breach of confidence in making public this skeleton in their cupboard. His proper name was Poeikan, but he can no longer be called by that, for he has disgraced it, and so he goes by the title Pillanütsich, or the 'Grand Old Beggar.' "

171 among the Goldi, are in use throughout the Gilyak people 751 and are essentially the same as those discussed earlier 301 (Number XIII, p. 207) [see Goldi source 18: Genest--Analyst]. The Gilyak on Sakhalin Island whose houses 372 Jakobsen entered were likewise highly indignant whenever 462 he left the house with a lighted pipe or when his companions 776 extinguished the fire burning in a hut by pouring water on it. For in their opinion such things tended to conjure up destruction not only over the inhabitants of the one hut but over the whole tribe. The inhabitants of one house in the village of Varki below Nikolayevsk predicted the same result when Jakobsen was about to light a fire for making the tea, and they forced him to wait till the house-wife saw to this task, since, in their opinion, this was a job only to be performed by her. Plainly this conduct has its basis in the sacred position of fire. [380] Though this no longer leads to a personification of a fire god among the Goldi and the Gilyak, it no doubt existed among them at one time as it still does today among the Buryat.

776 The system of gods of the Gilyak is in no way behind that 171 of the Goldi in variety. Human and animal figures in color-825 ful diversity serve as representations of celestial beings.
796 Here, too, there is a great similarity to the religious conceptions of the Goldi; the most important difference seems to me the one that was touched upon earlier (XIV, p. 223), [see Goldi source 18: Genest--Analyst] the fact that the Goldi pay zealous homage to the tiger while the Gilyak do honor to 796 the bear. It is true, though, that this homage is disastrous 415 to the bears since it means keeping a number of these 531 animals imprisoned in the cages in every village and killing
231 them at a bear festival. Before the festival the bears are fed plentifully for an extended time by means of large wooden spoons prepared especially for the purpose and decorated 796 with ingenious carvings. These bear festivals are usually held late in autumn and in winter and they are affairs of the greatest importance to their celebrators. I will now give the description of the festival that Jakobsen had the opportunity of observing in person.

796 On the 7th of February, 1885, the traveller arrived in 622 the early morning at the Gilyak village Vaida about 30 versts
574 above Nikolayevsk, where, as he had been informed, a festival was to take place on that day. From several other villages, some of which were considerable distances away large numbers of guests had come in already, and the whole place was astir in anticipation of the festival at hand. The opening of the bear festival is in the hands of the village

796 elder who also deternines how many and which bears are 622 to be killed by the consent of their owners, for it is not the 574 village as such but individuals in it who are the owners of the captured animals. Once an agreement has been reached 796 on this point the animals intended for slaughter are led from 777 house to house several weeks before the fixed date and must spend a night in each, in order to bring its inhabitants luck 796 by their stay. During this time the animals get only a little food, but at the end of it they are indemnified for their involuntary fast by being taken throughout the night from house to house and fed the choicest tidbits, namely, fresh and dried fish, berries and a thick gruel prepared from millet.

796 While making the rounds through the village, the bears are 563 irritated by being pricked, and they are enraged by a mock hunt staged on them with lances. The bears are ones that have been captured young in the woods or bought full-grown from the Chinese or Manchu who are also quite numerous in the 796 Gilyak territory. During the mock-hunt the Gilyak naturally take the precaution of tying the animals in such a way that they cannot easily get at their tormentors. Close behind the front legs they tie a strap around their body to which are attached rings through which are run iron chains. To these chains, in turn, they fasten thick belts of seal hide and of considerable length, in such a way that some go forward and others backward. A number of Gilyak take hold of these belts and in this way they are able to force the bear to stand completely still by alternately tightening the belts depending on whether the bear is turned frontwards or backwards when it wants to attack its leaders.

796 Outside the village there is a kind of fence made of sturdy 417 willow sticks, which has an opening for an avenue that is also fenced in on both sides with similar willow sticks. Inside this enclosure the bear, after it has finished its tour through 796 the village, is tied between two tree trunks. There it is left 541 to itself for a while, while the inhabitants of the village amuse 231 themselves with the dog race almost always held at these 437 celebrations. In the village visited by Jakobsen they also had a track especially constructed for this purpose, which, however, was not very long. After the dogs had been led to the track by their owners and placed next to each other, they were let loose at intervals of a few seconds, but they all arrived at the finish about the same time. There is, by the way, no idea of winning prizes at this race, since such do not even exist. Rather, it might be called a purchasing race since the race serves to place the good qualities of the dogs in the right light and thus to arouse a desire for buying. The ll, 501, 574

s just in time [252] to take a snapshot of a fami ternoon call, in other words, to borrow some s See Visual File category 501] On the gunwale o rs to be an outrigger, but is really a Y-piece f cham-gash, which is the name the Gilyaks giv pulated from a canoe."

ly leaving in their canoe to make eal-oil and take a cup of (brick) tea.
of the canoe will be noticed what for resting the seal harpoon in. e the harpoon, is used on the ice or

Amoor line is closed up, the telegraph circuit around the globe will be complete.

The telegraph is operated on the Morse system with instruments of Prussian manufacture. Compared to our American instruments the Prussian ones are quite clumsy, though they did not appear so in the hands of the operators. The signal key was at least four times as large as ours, and could endure any amount of rough handling. The other machinery was on a corresponding scale.

A merchant who knew Mr. Borasdine invited us to his house, where he brought a lunch of bread, cheese, butter, and milk for our entertainment. Salted cucumbers were added, and the repast ended with tea. In the principal room there was a Connecticut clock in one corner. and the windows were filled with flowers, among which were the morning glory, aster, and verbena. Several engravings adorned the walls, most of them printed at Berlin. We purchased a loaf of sugar, and were shown a bear-skin seven feet long without ears and tail. The original and first legitimate owner of the skin was killed within a mile of town.

In addition to his commerce and farming, this merchant was superintendent of a school where several Gilyak boys were educated. It was then vacation, and the boys were engaged in catching their winter supply of fish. At the merchant's invitation we visited the school buildings.

The study room was much like a backwoods schoolroom in America, having rude benches and desks, but with everything clean and well made. The copy-books exhibited fair specimens of penmanship. On a desk lay a well worn reading book containing a dozen of Æsop's fables translated into Russian and profusely illustrated. It corresponded to an American 'Second Reader.'

There was a dormitory containing eight beds, and there was a wash-room, a dining-room, and a kitchen, the latter separate from the main building. Close at hand was a forge where the boys learned to work in iron, and a carpenter shop with a full set of tools and a turning lathe. The superinten-

576

576 ETIQUETTE--greetings and salutations; obeisances; compliments; concept of courtesy; general patterns of etiquette in eating, drinking, smoking, visiting, and travel; deference to status superiors; noblesse oblige; breaches of etiquette and the resulting social sanctions; etc. See also:

Drinking etiquette	27	Intentional impoliteness	578
Patterned behavior toward kinsmen	60	Informal social control	626
Sexual etiquette	83	Court etiquette	644
Table manners	264	Diplomacy	648
Postures	516	Propitiation	782
Polite conversation	521	Religious ritual	788
Sportsmanship	526	Training of children in etiquette	867
Chivalry	562	Treatment of the aged	888

/35 cont./

83 577 825 The views of the Gilyak in this regard are so strict that he transfers them into the animal world; dogs caught in an incestuous act are killed, being considered werewolves.

602 [829] The Gilyak speak of the Russian women who sell themselves for money with the greatest contempt. This strict loyalty with regard to persons of prohibited categories created a system of prohibitions against conversation and joking with whole classes of people. It is even difficult for us Europeans to imagine that the Gilyak man or the Gilyak woman does not have the right, not only to joke, but even to talk with his own brothers and sisters, or even with brothers and sisters of the most distant degrees of kinship, i.e., with the whole class of tuvn, because, on the one hand, familiar relations may lead to sexual intercourse in forbidden degrees and, on the other hand, to light quarrels out of jealousy in cases of permitted intercourse. On the same grounds, among the Sakhalin Gilyak, one is allowed to talk to, but not to joke with, wives of the younger brothers, because sexual intercourse with them is forbidden, and, conversely, one can both talk to and joke with wives of elder brothers, and generally with the group of an'gej (wives).

•[576] Because of the prohibition against conversation with categories of close kinsmen among the Gilyak, the custom of saying hello and good-by upon arrival and departure is absent.

174 601 835 So far, I have cited only facts. But where did these strange facts come from? How can we explain these complex and confusing norms of sexual cohabitation, and the no less strange kinship nomenclature? Even if we can to some extent explain the mutual rights of brothers to their wives, the right of a person to the married sisters of his own wife or the married sisters of the wives of his brothers is completely incomprehensible. Why is it that a woman calls not only her own sister, but also her husband's brothers' wives sister? Why does a man /36/ call the sister of his father-in-law his mother? Why, for instance, is it enough that a person from clan A, let us say, takes a wife from a completely alien clan for all the women of clan A to become forbidden to the representatives of the latter. The complex and confusing chain of these facts must doubtless be the result of the single, very simple basic fact of an original type of family and clan organization, a type which,

174 601 835 614

/65 cont./

796 504 On this day, however, no one is allowed to taste the prepared bear meat. This takes place on the next day, which is called the day of treating the narkh'i (narkh-arin-ku). The narkh'i seat themselves ceremoniously along the plank beds, while th host solemnly walks among the rows and distributes pieces of

•[576] bear meat. More gracious hosts feed their guests with their own hands, sticking into their mouths /66/ a huge piece of fa the guest bites off a piece, leaving it to his neighbor to finish

[262] [614] what he has started. Only the narkh'i are allowed to eat bea meat; and his clan are denied this right; they are allowed to eat only a soup of rice or buda with the fat from the bears' carcasses. This soup is prepared and consumed in enormous quantities.

796 264 576 It is considered the greatest honor for the host to feed his guests to satiety. His graciousness goes so far that when a guest who has eaten too much of the fatty soup begins to vom it, the host respectfully offers his mouth and drinks the vomit It would be hard to imagine more refined graciousness. In intervals between feasting, dog races, games, fencing with sticks, and circle dancing are arranged.

796 533 273 All day the girls take turns playing music on the suspende log and accompany their primitive music with humorous and times very frivolous songs. Not the least role in the feast is played by Russian vodka or Chinese grain vodka, which lifts

[554] the gaiety of the feasters to its apogee. To make one's guest drunk is considered the greatest honor. "At my house yesterd the narkh'i got drunk two times," the master of a bear once boasted to me.

796 Finally the last day of the festival comes, the day of departure of the narkh'i. Carcasses of bear meat and all kinds of viands prepared for their families and clansmen are placed

[782] on their sleds. At the last moment the narkh'i lead several dogs into the yurt and tie them around the plank bed of honor to the bear's skull. In addition, as a present, they put a spear, a thong, and other such items next to the head of the animal or stuck into it. Again, in farewell, the nark'i are lavishly

/105 cont./

*614 628 537 [436] what a man! His right arm was worth so many "syalakhr" (1);

1. The syalakhr is a monetary unit which the Gilyak for some reason translate into Russian by the word "tselkovi" /one ruble/ and value in our money at three rubles, -- apparently the Chinese customs duty. It is in these units that the Gilyak evaluate their exchange values -- the shagund (see above).

if he were living, would he be content to take that much? His left arm was worth so much, etc." Then all the other parts of the body are listed, and the amount of the blood money is computed. If the opposing side agrees, it lays in the kettle of the orator as many pieces of wood as it has agreed to pay "tselkovi." But agreement is never reached at once. The orator of the opposing side seeks to find excuses for the slayer and offers a minimum ransom. This angers his opponent, and he wrathfully departs, threatening to break off negotiations. His colleague hastens after him, urging him to make concessions. They sit down, each one lights up a pipe, always with his own fire, they quarrel, again one of them flies into a passion and hastens off, again they come together and return to the settlement... [576] Etiquette demands that an agreement should not be reached at once, but only after stubborn opposition; therefore sometimes two and three days pass in endless meetings and separations. Some khlaj-nivukh on the Amur resort at the [171] [789] last moment, after the manner of the Tungus tribes, to the aid of their magic rods, which they threaten to break and thereby bring the wrath of the gods upon themselves and their stubborn opponents.

*614 628 536 When an agreement has been reached, the religious feature that I mentioned above enters in, the procedure of an imitation of a bloody battle, which is supposed to conceal from the soul of the slain man and the clan gods the peaceful solution of the conflict.

/189 cont./

602 speech, in the form of orders, business advice, and so forth, is always permitted between brothers, between daughter-in-law and the father and mother of her husband, even between a man and the wife of his younger brother, with the use of the vocative case. But ordinarily they seek to avoid direct address. If there is a person of a permitted category at hand, they transmit their wish to this person, addressing their message in such a manner that it is audible to the prohibited individual, 602 who, in turn, answers in the same manner. If not, the ad- 195 dress is in the third person or in the impersonal form. For 193 example: "the daughter-in-law, the brother, etc., could do such a thing," instead of "daughter-in-law, do it!" Or, "thanks to my brother," instead of "thank you, brother" etc. Owing to this custom of getting around the prohibition on speech by the use of the third person, the Gilyak have formed the custom of frequently using the third person in general instead of the second, especially in reference to strangers, out of fear, apparently, that they may turn out to be persons of prohibited categories. Again and again, upon the entrance of an unknown Gilyak, one hears the phrase: "Where has the Gilyak come from?" (instead of "where have you come from?"). Perhaps there is concealed in this custom, brought about by the prohibition on conversation and not peculiar to the Gilyak alone, the reason for the origin of these strange forms of the third person in place of the second that we find in Italian, 602 Polish, Tatar, and other languages. Finally, the plural num- 193 ber, which is commonly used in addressing old people and [576] [554] honored persons or strangers, is most frequently used in addressing persons of forbidden categories. Thus, for example, in addressing the wife of an elder brother they commonly use the singular, chi, while in addressing the wives of the younger brothers, on the other hand, they use the plural, chin.

/189 cont./

G 602 576 171 The prohibitions on speech have had another curious result. The Gilyak have no salutation for greeting or saying farewell. It may seem strange that the Gilyak, returning to his home after a long absence or leaving his family for the long months of hunting and of danger, utters no salutation. Yet the Gilyak are very ceremonious and /190/ always greet and escort their departing guests with solemn forms of address and expressions of good wishes. The neighbors of the Gilyak, the Olcha and Goldi, as well as the Ainu, have salutations for meeting and parting. Their absence among the Gilyak arises precisely from the fact that in the home and settlement of every Gilyak there is a mass of persons with whom speech is a sin, and therefore the customary greetings could easily lead to frequent involuntary violations of the psychic taboos. Prohibitions on conversation, as is well-known, are practiced among many peoples. We shall recall, for the sake of an example, one of the American peoples, the Arapaho, among whom conversations between brothers are forbidden. The prohibitions among the Yukagir are of special interest to us. Of the prohibitions which they have in common with the Gilyak, we find among the Yukagir prohibitions between "brothers" and "sisters," between the husband's father and mother and their daughter-in-law, between older brothers and the wives of younger brothers; and, as among the Gilyak, in cases of necessity, they address each other either in the third person, or in the impersonal form, or in the plural (1).

1. Iokhel'son, Materialy /Materials/, 240.

G 602 171 8 602 582 174 335 The Buryat present examples of an interesting analogy with the Gilyak prohibitions. Among them at the present time marriage is exclusively individual, and "brothers" have no sexual rights whatever to each other's wives. Nevertheless, prohibitions with regard to the so-called khadym clearly reveal an earlier stage of group marriage. As a result of this

/273 cont./

584 675 Even without invitations, however, there are always witnesses, for the arrival of countrymen immediately becomes known and the yurt is filled with outsiders. Repudiation of [686] one's word is a serious matter, for which one is summoned to court, and this results in a large fine.

584 576 But even if the matchmakers do not wish to or cannot conceal the purpose of their coming, etiquette does not permit them to come immediately to the point.

At first they speak about the most unrelated things, not giving any hint of the purpose of their coming. During the conversation, drinks are passed around. Having conversed enough concerning "news, events," they gradually come to the point, but they are obliged to approach it through circumlocutions and hints, attempting to discover how favorable the chances are. If the father of the bride disapproves from the start, he immediately cuts off the matchmakers with a categorical rejection. But this rarely happens, for no one goes to make a match without a chance for an agreement. [203] Usually they come, as the Gilyak say, as "equals to equals," for all the Gilyak, no matter how far they live from one another, know everything about one another, down to the minutest details, even who killed how many sables during the last season. The question is merely one of not assenting quickly, in order to bargain as much as possible. Etiquette requires the father to pretend for a long time that he does not know why the matchmakers have come, and, when it is no longer possible to pretend, he must think up all possible excuses and obstacles. Ordinarily he resorts to deprecatory opinions about his daughter, asserting that she is very ugly in appearance, understands nothing about the care of the house, that she is quarrelsome, etc. But the guests are quite prepared for these evasions and have answers prepared in advance. "We," they say, "are not chasing after loveliness; and as for the care of the house, she is still quite young, she will learn, and anyway we have enough women experts without her; as for her ill-temper, that is no misfortune, the years will teach her how to live with people." Or they interrupt

/273 cont./

584 576 him curtly: "That is not your business. We will take care of that. If she is bad, we will teach her!" This unconditional approval of the bride is all the host needs; after that he will know how to set the most advantageous conditions, to which the matchmakers are compelled to agree (1).

[114] [171]

1. This is exactly the way the Gilyak explain the motives for the father's deprecatory opinions of his daughter. I think, therefore, that Iokhel'son was wrong in explaining this custom among the Koryak as a preventive against possible future complaints (The Koryak, 739).

/274/ But it may happen that the father will not give any sign that he is gratified by the attitude of the matchmakers toward the inadequacies of his daughter. When all the objections are exhausted, he suddenly fires the phrase which the Gilyak commonly utters when he wants to cut short a disagreeable conversation: "I know nothing," he says through the pipe clenched in his teeth. And after a short pause he angrily declares: "Ask my wife what she wants, it is not my business." Then they begin to regale the mother of the bride, who, after long excuses, in turn finishes with the laconic phrase: "Why do you ask me? Let the men decide!" Finally, the negotiations move to the business basis of the bride price and dowry. In this connection the customs are different on Sakhalin and the Amur. On the Amur, where the people are more mercantile, the bride's side unashamedly enumerates down to the slightest detail the objects of the bride price.

583 584 184

On Sakhalin they are more modest; at first they name only two or three objects, the most valuable ones of the expected bride price, and after that they only haggle over secondary valuables. But in both places the procedure of the negotiations is carried on in an elevated atmosphere.

/274 cont./

584 583 At this stage the viscosity of the negotiations reaches its apogee, and "tayoray" /spelled with Russian letters; see below/ begins to play a quite exceptional role. I happened to be present when in the settlement of Pil'vo on Sakhalin a Gilyak whom I knew, a certain Isayka, betrothed his little boy to the 15-year-old daughter of an old widow. The old woman had no kin in the settlement, neither any of her own nor any on the side of her deceased husband. At her request, therefore, all the honorable persons of the settlement assembled. On the bridegroom's side there appeared, besides his father, his clansman, Sofronka. At first, it seemed that the business would quickly end, for the old woman was very needy and had pushed forward her own proposal herself. But when they came to a discussion of the bride price, Sofronka argued with her the whole day. In vain did he employ all his eloquence and ask those present to help him convince the old woman of the acceptability of the conditions. She invariably reiterated one thing: "tajoraj /spelled with Latin letters/!" Finally, after a whole day of tormenting negotiations, when the old woman found that she had sufficiently maintained her character and completely fulfilled all the demands of etiquette, she offered the conditions with which the other side had been in agreement from the very beginning, namely, that the bride price should be paid at once in its entirety.

[126] To indicate the character of the ceremony of negotiations, I shall cite the introductory dialogue of a matchmaker with the father of the bride that I wrote down /275/ on the Amur. The matchmaker, the father of the groom, Pevn by name, is asking for the daughter of Lakkan. Both are well-to-do men, old acquaintances.

584 583 539 [203] [576] After the customary exchange of news, after drinking some vodka, Pevn says (I translate literally): We both have been for a long time as an elder brother with a younger (like brothers), great friends have we been. Now I have come through need, it was necessary to come to thee. It is a matter, a big matter, when the need came, do thou come

/281 cont./

583 584 The wedding may be delayed also on account of the dowry. Although they begin to prepare the dowry in childhood, nevertheless, depending on the bride price which is brought, it may become necessary to prepare a new one. The last item in the negotiations is the date of the wedding. This is considered very important, for on the day of the groom's arrival the dowry must be ready, and likewise the numerous viands, not only for the wedding feast, but also those viands of all kinds which the bride will take away with her as a present to the groom's family.

584 614 /282/ The agreement which has been concluded between the two families is considered an agreement between two clans, and the bride herself from this moment on is regarded as belonging [686] to the clan. In case of refusal on her part or on the part of her parents, the clan will demand her by force.

584 686 The agreement is also binding for the other side, but here no sanction is demanded, for in case of refusal it loses the part of the bride price which has been brought (usually half). It happens, however, but quite rarely, that the groom will ask for, instead of one sister, another sister. But this is absolutely forbidden. In such cases they answer him:

"If you do not like her, then you do not like both (both the one and the other). When the matter concerns dogs, you want a good one, and I give you (a good one); if one does not suit you, then both will not suit you. When we give you something to eat, if you eat up the first dish, then I shall give you the second."

[595] In other words, one may ask for two daughters, but to ask for one instead of the other is not permitted.

585 When, finally, the day agreed upon arrives, the groom, together with his parents, comes in boats in the summertime, on sleds in the winter, bringing with them the part of the bride price [576] agreed upon and refreshments. Etiquette forbids that they come on foot, although the bride may live very close by. At this time the family of the bride hangs out the objects of the bride price for the public inspection of the clansmen, and refreshments are spread for the elder representatives of both clans. The women look after the bride in all kinds of ways; they comfort her, give

/671 cont./

82 782 789 others were to follow (3). This method was at least more purposeful, for it increased the food supply of the people and saved dog food, the lack of which was already making itself felt at the time.

3. Concerning this, see p. 662 above.

576 [574] [127] I never saw or heard of a Gilyak who, upon entering a house, greeted the host, hostess, or any other acquaintance with a word or gesture, nor is it done upon his departure. As I gather from Middendorff's handwritten notes, given to me to use, this coming and going without any salutation surprised him, too.

576 177 648 [123] With me they likewise constantly came and went without a salutation, or at most, later, with a "sdrástwui" and "proschtschâi" learned from the Russians. Only in the presence of the Manchu and Chinese do they imitate the /672/ Tungusic Amur peoples by dropping on one knee in front of them and bowing their heads, but this is done only in order to gain their favor and to avoid being punished by them, since the Manchu officials in Ssanssin and other places strictly insist upon such a show of deference.

576 574 But what surprised me even more is the fact that the word "thanks" seems to be missing entirely from their lexicon. I never heard it used by them, either among themselves or to me. Middendorff and Glehn had the same experience. I should like to ascribe this to the incompleteness of our word list, which is in general very poor in expressions for abstract concepts and emotions. On the other hand, it is hardly to be assumed that if they really had gratitude in their hearts, they would not have a word for it and that it should simply have always eluded us. After all, we saw them in all kinds of situations when they received services or help and hospitality offered almost to excess. Is it possible that guests who have been sheltered, despite notoriously scanty means, for days as a result of storms setting in and who have been fed along with all their dogs, as the Gilyak do among one another, depart without having said a word of thanks? Is everything based only on national communism or on the certainty of reciprocity in similar cases? With regard to me,

/672 cont./ with regard to me,
however, neither the one nor the other would apply, and yet I, too, never received any thanks from the Gilyak. I am not thinking now of the gifts given in response to begging, which in Gilyak houses can become very annoying to the traveler and for which mainly children are urged forward. They may never have learned to say thanks or may have forgotten it in their inquisitive amazement at the traveler. But I have often enough shown the Gilyak greater services. For instance, they always found a hospitable reception at my house, where the safety of their possessions, their dogs, and all the rest of their outfit were attended to so that they could calmly go about their business in the village. Among other things, I once saw to it, thanks to the strict sense of justice of the then governor, Rear Admiral Sawoiko, that an investigation was made about the theft of a whole vehicle laden with all kinds of wares, which had happened to the Gilyak Judin; the culprit was convicted, and Judin was paid a sizable sum in compensation. Even in this case I was not thanked, though I was dealing with the best and most respected Gilyak.

On the other hand, it is customary for the Gilyak to exchange small gifts as a sign that they wish to enter into closer, perhaps even business relations with each other. When I received such a gift for the first time, I asked the price of it, but was told that the word pai, that is, gratis or free, went with it and that I was informed by the Gilyak Jutschin, whom I already knew, that, in accordance with their custom, I would now have to give a gift in return, while repeating the same word /673/ pai. If the latter were not done, the objects offered in return would be rejected, and the word pai would be stressed once more. Sometimes I was even told in what form the return gift should be, for example, that it might consist of several tobacco leaves, some bread, several buttons, or the like. Custom requires, however, that, upon acceptance of the return gift, the number of items is not to be closely examined, and in praise of the Gilyak I must admit they never deviated from this custom and that they were always satisfied with the return present, whatever it turned out to be. But this did not by any means prevent them in accordance with their greedy natures, from demanding very high prices in trading later. This the traveler and puts a low table and a basin with glowing embers (jachalacco) beside it; indeed, he may even light his pipe at the embers and offer it to the guest in the hope that the latter will do likewise -- clearly customs borrowed from the Manchu and Chinese. In the meantime, the women have taken the baggage of the traveler from the sled and have brought it into the house.

/688 cont./

In the houses of the Olcha, Goldi, and Samagir one is very pleasantly impressed by the lighter atmosphere so much freer of superstitious restraints. Despite many contacts with them, I never heard any Olcha or Goldi expression for the Gilyak uïtsch, and none expressed in reiterated shouts from all sides of the yurt as a sign of general displeasure, such as happened to me so often among the Gilyak (1). They are much too modest and reserved

1. On the basis of the many uïtsch in the Gilyak yurts I likewise made the observance of three uïtsch mandatory for the Gilyak who frequented my house in the Nikolayev post. Namely, they could not: 1) sit on my bed, 2) spit in the middle of the floor, and 3) smoke their own tobacco, but only mine -- an uïtsch that they accepted gladly.

they are much too modest and reserved for that. Finally, I must note a sign of more humane feeling or at least more civil formality among the Olcha and Goldi: the expression of gratitude, which appears so utterly alien to the Gilyak, I think I heard repeatedly among the former in the expression fodomonero.

In my time, the situation among the Goldi in politico-administrative respects was different than among the Gilyak and Olcha. Even after the abandonment of the trading center of Deren, the Goldi, like the Samagir and the Orochi, remained tributary to the Manchu-Chinese government, a situation which did not come to an end until 1858, after the conclusion of the Treaty of Aigun between Russia and China and the subsequent conceivable that they are trying to imitate this Buddhist forehea swelling likewise on the head of the bear venera by them in superstitious fear and likewise regarded to some extent as divin and that they do this with the agate balls which are furnished them for this purpose by the Chinese themselves. Thus, accord ing to Gilyak ideas, the bear is to some extent moved up amon the divinities and therefore a formal bear-cult is practiced.

/720 cont./

Bears' head-bands with figure of toad and agate balls.

With the putting on of the snout and head bands, or the toad and agate-ball bands, all the honors imaginable have bee shown to the bear and now, in the awareness of their complete innocence, the Gilyak may, with a clear conscience, give the selves up to the pleasures of the table. A great number of woo bowls were immediately brought into the house on a sled and arranged on the floor around the bears, while the participants in the feast took their places, sitting cross-legged, on the benc of honor. First, a ski, which probably was one of the sacred utensils since it /721/ had been propped up against the étagère the whole time, was used to present pieces of frozen sturgeon to the guests. While they were still eating it, simple circular

/721 cont./

796 wooden bowls, or, more correctly, large plates (Gilyak aam-574 ngir) (1), were filled with a dish which consisted of cooked beans, 262 415 576

1. See p. 683 above.

a kind of groats, fish oil or seal oil, and chopped leeks, and the serving of which was done with the greatest formality. At each 796 side of the étagère a man was busy lifting one plate after another 574 from the floor and bringing it to the server of the food, who sat
576 on a sled in the front part of the yurt. The latter, with a large hemispherical iron ladle (Plate XXXIII /p. 1013 /, Fig. 5), scooped the aforementioned mush from a trough and served it on the plates which were then immediately taken back again to their places. This was repeated three times with each plate, whereupon the server got up, stepped up to each plate, and added some mush and a piece of frozen sturgeon to the already huge portions. From each side two men now stepped forward to the row of plates, placed a decoratively carved spoon in each of them, and handed them to the guests, one plate to each one, beginning with the two sitting in the middle of the bench and going from there to the ends. What was left over from the superhuman portions was poured 562 back into a trough. The women were totally excluded from the feast, indeed, none of them was even present during it. Everyone then rose from his seat, the plates were taken to the other house where the medium-sized bear was displayed, and an identical meal took place there. In both cases, however, this was only a 262 meal in advance of the actual feast, for no bear meat or fat had yet been consumed, and this would not take place until the following day.

796 This day (January 31) began in much the same way as the 574 previous ones, with the cutting up of the bear meat and fat in the 262 presence of the bears' heads. Numerous guests had already ap-576 peared early in the forenoon. They were put on the bench of honor behind the bear rack without further ado and, strangely enough, were fed without all the ceremony that had been observed so strictly the day before: each guest was given a fir branch and

● 576 /721 cont./
* 796 on it raw and cooked bear-me 574 well as a small heap of fine w 262 first bear meat that was eaten [562] gradually everybody present i [855] pated in the meal, indeed, e [415] ceived their share of it, in th the diners with bowls of a spe and Pl. LI /p. 1251 /, Fig. 1

[104] 2. The s in this like the French z because of its sim and collected contributions to children. The quantity of be therefore very great. What w that the guests had, they wra fir branches and took home - to call möps (1).

[114] 1. A designation

The gnawed bones, o the kettle from which the co the meal came to a close, a hand stationed himself at the each one, drove out everyon bear meat and fat -- an act [859] punishment for the misdeed outside, however, those who [533] for here they were greeted w which the boys pelted them, [184] ously on the suspended beam aftermath also took place in third bear lived. Here, too, individual heaps of food -- s eat and several strips of bear fat, as wood-shavings (zach). This was the

. The portions were very ample, and n the house or newly arrived partici-even the women and children re-at a few young people walked among cial shape (Pl. L /p. 1250 /, Fig. 5, -- called ans-tymyk (2) in Gilyak) word is to be pronounced soft,

. The bowl is called ans-tymyk nilarity to a hand (tymyk).

be divided among the women and ear meat and fat consumed that day was as left over of the portions /722/pped up in the fine wood-shavings and
- a package that the Gilyak are said which I myself did not hear.

n the other hand, were put back into oked meat had been distributed. As old man with a fir branch in his door of the house and, gently striking passing through it who had eaten which was supposed to be a sort of ommitted against the bear. Once came out were less gently treated, th a cross fire of snowballs with while the women drummed vigor-. An identical meal with a similar the house where the owner of the just as before, quantities of small urgeon, mossj, etc. -- were put out

/722 cont./
796 574 262 576 in the snow on either side of the path in front of the house for the departing guests, to be taken along by those driving by -- only bear meat and fat were missing, for they had already received this in their mops as provisions for the trip.

796 53 562 171 Because of the feast, the feeding of the dogs and the dog races did not take place until shortly before noon. In the afternoon, however, for the first and only time the women actively participated in the festive entertainments, in that they executed a dance to the drum music which resounded in a very strange and wild rhythm. At any one time only one dancer was in motion, holding in her hands either fir branches or castanet-like wooden clappers, and the dance actually consisted of only the craziest postures and contortions of the upper body in relation to the lower part. It vividly reminded Ditmar of the bear dance of the Kamchatka women, and even the music was similar, except that here it was drummed, likewise by women, on a swinging beam with cudgels and sticks, whereas in Kamchatka the dancers and the spectators jointly sing. Incidentally, I must note that such an outburst of 796 562 157 merriment among the Gilyak women is probably very rare, because in general they are even more serious and sedate than the men and are always much busier than the latter at all sorts of work and [293] activities. And it could by no means have been the result of high spirits induced by liquor, for this is, or was at the time of my visit among the Gilyak, absolutely prohibited during the bear festivals, a measure, as has been mentioned (2), prompted by cool reasoning

2. See p. 719 above.

796 756 and evidence of their great strength of character. Another fact is much more surprising and much more difficult to explain, namely, that no shamanistic activities are permitted in a house where a bear festival is being celebrated. The reason for this may be that in the eyes of he Gilyak the uncanny art of the shaman would disturb the festive mood and, through the power that it exerts over the spirit world as well as over the human spirit, would cause bewilderment and misfortune among the participants in the festival.

/35 cont./

833 The views of the Gilyak in this regard are so strict that he 777 transfers them into the animal world; dogs caught in an incestuous 425 act are killed, being considered werewolves.

The Gilyak speak of the Russian women who sell themselves 602 for money with the greatest contempt. This strict loyalty with 829 regard to persons of prohibited categories created a system of prohibitions against conversation and joking with whole classes of people. It is even difficult for us Europeans to imagine that the Gilyak man or the Gilyak woman does not have the right, not only to joke, but even to talk with his own brothers and sisters, or even with brothers and sisters of the most distant degrees of kinship, i.e., with the whole class of tuvn, because, on the one hand, familiar relations may lead to sexual intercourse in forbidden degrees and, on the other hand, to light quarrels out of jealousy in cases of permitted intercourse. On the same grounds, among the Sakhalin Gilyak, one is allowed to talk to, but not to joke with, wives of the younger brothers, because sexual intercourse with them is forbidden, and, conversely, one can both talk to and joke with wives of elder brothers, and generally with the group of an'gej (wives).

[576] Because of the prohibition against conversation with categories of close kinsmen among the Gilyak, the custom of saying hello and good-by upon arrival and departure is absent.

194 So far, I have cited only facts. But where did these strange 601 facts come from? How can we explain these complex and con-835 fusing norms of sexual cohabitation, and the no less strange kinship nomenclature? Even if we can to some extent explain the mutual rights of brothers to their wives, the right of a person to the married sisters of his own wife or the married sisters of the wives of his brothers is completely incomprehensible. Why is it that a woman calls not only her own sister, but also her husband's brothers' wives sister? Why does a man /36/ call the sister of his father-in-law 194 his mother? Why, for instance, is it enough that a person from 601 clan A, let us say, takes a wife from a completely alien clan for 835 all the women of clan A to become forbidden to the representatives 614 of the latter. The complex and confusing chain of these facts must doubtless be the result of the single, very simple basic fact of an original type of family and clan organization, a type which.

/249 cont./

831 It is difficult to depict in general terms the picture of the 839 sexual morals among the Gilyak. First of all, one must • 579 differentiate between the married ones and the bachelors. The former, when at home in their own settlements, are more concerned with guarding their wives from alien intruders than with undertaking extramarital flirtations. Only when journeying or when visiting in other settlements do they avidly give free play to their sexual instincts. On the other hand, the married women are surrounded with so many temptations from their group husbands and strangers that they violate conjugal fidelity at every convenient opportunity, the more so since far from all marry for love or persons of their own age, and they eagerly make up for this with extramarital flirtations. From the Gilyak point of view on decorum, however, these flirtations do not represent anything abnormal, since for the most part they take place between group husbands and wives. One way or another, the palm of primacy, as concerns excesses among married people, must go to the women. "Among men," say the Gilyak, "you will find a good person 'one-one,' among the women you will not find a single one."

Genuine excesses of licentiousness take place among 836 the /250/ unmarried youth. Here are possible such extrava-831 gances as the instance I recounted above of the Gilyak woman, 538 Pigunajka, who before her marriage was having affairs with 14 lovers at one time, including her future husband. Or another example, which I borrow from the Gilyak epos. The hero comes to the home of a certain oldster to seek his daughter in marriage. His future father-in-law says to him: "Thy wife lives over there in a little yurt. People used to come to see her, they all copulated with her, after that she lost her legs." And the bridegroom does not become upset at all. "All right," he says, "I'll go ahead and carry her off," apparently seeing nothing remarkable in this.

/254 cont./

832 It is noteworthy that they do not evaluate beauty only 826 from their own racial viewpoint. Men and women both 609 liked /255/ Russian women. Of male Europeans, the Gilyak women even liked types unfamiliar to them, such as redheads or blonds. Thus, for example, my friend Bronislaw Pilsudski, reddish-blond, enjoyed great admiration among the Gilyak, not only because of his sympathetic attitude toward them, but in particular on account of his attractice appearance. They referred to him only as poch urakhra -- "handsome man," literally -- "beautiful in face," and when he left Sakhalin, the Gilyak women as a farewell present dictated to him songs of declarations of love.

In their love songs they sing not only about beauty, but 832 also about "white skin, like the bark of a birch tree," 826 luxuriant hair (a braid reaching to the waist, hair made sleek), 533 gracefulness of gait ("with her head inclined to the side, smiling she walks," "with a six-foot stride he walks"), physical strength or size (his trunk is an arm-spread, "his legs go into the ground up to the shin").

Of course, elegance in clothing also plays no minor 832 role in the aesthetic appreciation of one's sweetheart. In 291 their love songs they sing about women's clothing embroidered 533 with finery, about a great number of copper rattles sewn on, and so forth; they sing about men's black dog-skin fur coats, shirts made out of variegated sealskins, rich headbands of fine squirrel skins, etc. Women's summer clothing that is black in color is considered the most beautiful; men play the dandy in shirts that are sewed half of red and half of white or dark blue material. But along with outward beauty, moral qualities are also valued.

Women like in men the traits of manliness and reliability 832 ("thy voice is like the voice of an urdla n'ivukh'a, i.e., re-• 577 spected man"), or the talents of a conversationalist -- jester, singer. Aside from outer beauty, men admire in women the [869] traits of femininity, which Gilyak women possess to a great degree both by nature and also due to early training; from

/255 cont./

832 childhood a little girl is taught to speak with a soft melodic
• 577 quality and to give her face a dreamy coquettish appearance.
867 A woman not infrequently succeeds through her talent for 832 singing. In their songs the women are capable, not only of 533 expressing their love with great delicacy, but also of ridiculing
626 unwanted suitors most maliciously. In her sarcasm the woman does not stop at any hyperbole. In one song the nose of the undesired one is compared to open patches of water in a frozen surface, to an open door, and his clothing, his dogs, his harness, etc. are described in similar tones.

839 /256/ Sexual Abnormalities and Perversions. I asked the Gilyak many times if such sexual perversions as pederasty and bestiality were practiced among them. No one, apparently, had ever heard of any cases of pederasty. As for [158] bestiality, only in one village on the Tym' was I told, and then with disgust, of one psychically sick Gilyak who had 839 copulated with a dog. The attitude of the Gilyak to these 539 perversions is made clear by the following legend, which I wrote down on the Amur. The tiger, the panther, and even the lion (?) were once men. Once, by chance, the god Kur saw that they were copulating through the rear orifice. Then in indignation he said: "Well, since you copulate like beasts, henceforth be ye beasts forever." Thus, in the view of the Gilyak, the above-mentioned perversions are acts which make a man like a beast.

The Gilyak have an extremely simple attitude toward 143 hermaphrodites (miskunj in the eastern dialect, miskij -- 826 in the western dialect), in whose peculiarities they apparently see a plain anomaly, but feel no abhorrence for them and are glad to have sexual intercourse with them. Marriages of [588] hermaphrodites are a common event.

/367 cont./

000 suffering. He does not understand religious ecstasy. Shamanism, 756 with its ecstasy, seems to me to be a borrowed phenomenon. It 777 does not fit in with the religious beliefs of the Gilyak. It is true [054] that he believes the shaman, trusts him to cure the sick, superstitiously fears him, believes in his predictions and in the power of his magic, believes, for instance, that the shaman can kill any man no matter how far away from him this last may be (thus they say that the Rykovo shaman killed the Nikolayevsk one by shooting a bird that was flying past); shamanism, however, is not typical 756 of Gilyak religious views. It is perhaps appropriate to mention at this point that shamans do a great deal of harm to their worshipers.
[754] In the case of the unsuccessful outcome of their treatments, they often pass the blame onto quite innocent people, whom they subject to physical violence and to cruel persecutions if the patient [158] dies. Also, by suggesting to their patients that their illness is the result of possession by devils, they cause serious psychic disturb-[782] ances in people whose nervous state is healthy. The prayers of the Gilyak are quite characteristic, simple and clear like their beliefs. "Kur, piongukhia!" (Oh, God, please!) -- the Gilyak limits himself to this when he asks for something from his god.

776 The Gilyak have a hazy conception, or better a feeling, about 577 a supreme deity, the father of all men and of all that exists, but for him it is just a vague feeling for which he does not have a clear formulation. The gods have a relation, not only to the material • 579 life of man, but also to his moral life. Moral principles of com-773 munal living, helping one's neighbors, and respect for the life [776] and property of another enjoy divine sanction. Violating them leads to punishment in this life (sickness, premature death) and in the future life. I happened to hear such a statement from a Gilyak: "If a rich man abuses a poor man, it is a great sin, but if a poor man abuses a rich one (in the material sense, if he borrows and does not repay, deceives him, etc.), that is not a sin!" This statement sounded all the stranger to me, because the Gilyak who made it was a very rich man himself, a big kulak, who did not hesitate to oppress the poor in any way. I do not venture to judge how much this extremely altruistic belief is really the belief of the Gilyak, or whether it is the result of Russian influence, or mere hypocrisy.

/367 cont./

577 783 673 688 In any case, it is characteristic. The Gilyak therefore have a clear conception of sin ("umgysh"). It goes without saying /368/ that such things as stealing and murder are a sin but, to be sure, there are a great number of acts, indifferent from our point of view, that are considered sins by the Gilyak, for instance: to heat seal fat on a fire and not in the sun is a sin, and, in general, to deviate from the old ways is a sin. It is curious that in many cases a sin, even when it consists in insulting a deity, is atoned for by a fine paid to one or another person; for example, for the slightest harm to the fence of the hearth, the one who caused it must pay a dog, a cup and saucer, and a few other small things to the master of the yurt; otherwise, one of the two will become ill. Even this small episode illustrates the idea of the necessity to [682] atone for a sin. The damages paid for a murder are provided by the clan of the murderer not by necessity (such necessity does not always exist), but as an atonement for the sin before an angered deity. On the other hand, the gods do not allow an evil deed (sin) of people to go unpunished. They send storms and rains, a scarcity of fish and fowl, send down diseases and various other [821] [829] misfortunes. The Gilyak think that thunderstorms and lightning have become more frequent since the arrival of the Russians; this is because the god has been angered by the sins of the Russians.

771 775 Imagining his gods as mortal, the Gilyak merely expresses his extremely anthropomorphic view of them. In fact, human existence, according to his belief, does not end with this life. There, beyond the flame of the fire, is another world, another land where a Gilyak lives again, with the same needs and the same ideas; only there the poor man will be rich and the rich man poor. After death a Gilyak receives a different name, and it is a sin to call a deceased person by his old name. They also believe in the transmigration of souls, or, more exactly, in many rebirths. Thus, there is a legend which tells that after the death of a Gilyak who had on his face distinctive scars from wounds received in a fight [764] [764] with a bear, a boy was born to another Gilyak with the very scars on his face as the deceased had. It is well-known that the Sakhalin Gilyak burn their dead. There is, however, one case when this

/562 cont./

224 prey in their region and at the same time the animal that most pleases their palates and that, because of the festivities connected with eating it, also plays an especially important role in their social life. Striving, above all, to capture the animal alive, they eagerly search in the fallen snow for where a bear might have its winter quarters. When this has been discovered, a number of courageous and strong men band together, in order, equipped with the required paraphernalia of rope, chains, pikes, etc., to surprise the sleeper in its lair, disturb its rest, fetter it, [579] and lead it into captivity. Needless to say, this cannot be done without a fight, and however skilled the usually experienced bear-catchers may be, more or less serious wounds not infrequently result, which, however, are borne more easily than others by the Gilyak, because they are regarded as especially honorable and lend the one concerned an aura of manly fortitude. 224 Nevertheless, the frequency of the bears kept in captivity among 231 the Gilyak indicates that the outcome of the battle is usually or often successful; there is scarcely a village of any size in which on a trip through the region, one would not see one or several such animals. If the place where the bear was lifted from its lair and fettered is not far from the village to which its captors belong, it is simply taken to it in its fetters by ropes and put in the prison kept ready for it. For greater distances, however, the sleds on which the hunters came also serve to take their booty home. The fettered bear is put on one or, if the route permits, even on two sleds put side by side and tied together, and is brought to its new domicile in a triumphal procession amid the loud cheers of the sled drivers and the barking of the many, passionately excited dogs. The nature of the bear's prison and the treatment of the captured animal will be discussed later in speaking of the bear festivals of the Gilyak, but at the moment 224 it is primarily only a question of its capture. The battle with a bear disturbed from its rest does not always end in its being fettered. It often defends itself so tenaciously and vigorously and is so dangerous for its adversaries that they find it necessary to put an end to it with their pikes and lances. In fact, the latter happens

/636 cont./

585 As soon as the bride price is paid, the marriage is regarded as concluded, and the man may take his wife and lead her to his home. This is often done without further ado. Wealthier [556] people, however, usually arrange a feast to celebrate the wedding of their daughter or sister, at which, aside from relatives, villagers and friends also /637/ take part. Similarly, a supply of various foods, fish, mossj, berries, millet, etc., are given to the departing married couple, so that the young wife, having reached the home of her husband, is also able to give a feast for the relatives, there, as well as members of the household and village.

591 592 As a rule the young couple moves to the place where the husband has his home, that is, where his parents or brothers live, and take up residence with one or the other of them, according to circumstances, since the Gilyak dwellings, as has been described above, are of the type that can accommodate several families. The house, however, is by no means always inhabited only by relatives, but often also by other villagers who perhaps helped in building it or have some other connection with its owner. The members of the household remain together until, through the increase in the families, the space becomes too crowded and some of them have the means to build another house for themselves either in the same village or elsewhere. Besides 592 the central room used by all the members of the household, with 342 the hearth in the earth yurt or the dog table in the winter house 35 built in Chinese fashion, each family has its particular share of the sleeping benches running all around and each individual has his designated place on them. But these individual sections are never separated from one another in any way by screens, curtains, or the like, and the whole interior of the house always gives the impression of a room used by everyone in common.

577 171 As little as such living together by all the members of the household in one room can be conducive to morality, generally speaking, I must nevertheless give the Gilyak a good rating in this respect. In fact, I do not hesitate to call them a morally austere people, in contrast to their neighbors, the Goldi, Orochi, 577 Ainu, and even more the other Paleo-Asiatic peoples. There is

/637 cont./

577 no doubt that the greater moral austerity of the Gilyak is tied up with character traits in which they excel beyond these tribes, namely, their greater energy, self-control, and moderation, which, as has been pointed out (1), they also show in their

1. See above, p. 719.

577 drinking of liquor. On the other hand, however, in comparison 177 with the other Amur peoples, the Gilyak were always in a more 648 favorable situation with regard to morality inasmuch as their dwelling sites were the farthest from the two civilized peoples of East Asia, the Chinese and Japanese, and the latter do not have any settlements in Gilyak territory. How demoralizing an effect they have upon the natives is evident from the fact that the Japanese and Chinese always come, the former to Sakhalin and the latter into the Ussuri and lower Amur region, without their wives and, supplied with liquor and other tempting commodities, try to acquire concubines among the women and daughters of the Ainu, or the Orochi, Goldi, and Olcha. It was therefore to the advantage of the Gilyak, not merely with regard to trade, but also in connection with morality, that they refused the Chinese traders entry into their territory, just as it was also evidence of their /638/ farsighted shrewdness and energy (1).

1. See above, pp. 145 and 948.

With the occupation of the Amur region by the Russians in the fifties, conditions changed, much to the disadvantage of the Gilyak, for this occupation began precisely in their territory and they were the first and the most drawn into close contact with the new civilized peoples approaching them from the north, a contact which, with regard to morality, could only be detrimental to them, as it always is to a primitive people in such instances, and as subsequent reports from there abundantly prove. But I shall return to the conditions and situations which I myself witnessed.

/638 cont./

834 The moral austerity of the Gilyak also appears in the 577 altogether decent behavior of the two sexes toward each and in the modesty of their women and girls. One living them in their houses never sees indecent physical exposu such as occurs so frequently among the Ainu (2), or any

[113] 2. N. Busse, Ostr. Sakhalin" i Eksped. 1853-54 gg. /Sakhalin Island and the Expedition of 1853-54/, St. Petersb., 1872, pp. 55, 56, 70.

577 shocking scenes. Violations of chastity, particularly am 836 unmarried persons, are, of course, not impossible, but a 848 most severely censured by the parents of the girl who has 849 been seduced and has given birth to a child. According the Gilyak, in such a case the girl's mother metes out corporal punishment to her daughter, while the father tri to eliminate the scandal by killing the newborn child an [562] secretly doing away with it. This is always done if the c is a girl, whereas a boy is shown mercy in certain circum stances, and the girl's chances suffer less in this case.

839 Although contracted by purchase, and in part becau 593 of this, as is clear from what has been said, the marriag [587] of the Gilyak usually take a happy or at least a satisfacto course. Marital fidelity is strictly observed. The husba jealously guards the fidelity of his wife, especially while she is young, and the latter is on her guard against givin her husband cause for mistrust and suspicion and arousing 586 anger. One very salutary influence checking and curbin the passions on both sides is the circumstance that the hu if he casts out his wife for any reason and returns her to parents does not by any means thereby gain any right to fund of the articles paid for her, and that, on the other he may claim such a refund if the wife leaves him on he own accord. In this case she may by no means count on friendly reception by her parents. Therefore, simply for

562 really a sort of purchase. Moreover, the widow is in a 587 manner of speaking inherited by the brother or other close relative of the deceased. But this inheritance is more a matter of habit; if the widow wishes to marry another, she may do so, but he must pay back the kalym. The woman also does not take part in the more important councils. On the other hand, she may occupy an independent and respected position; she can, for instance, become a shaman. She may have her own money and inherit, although usually less than her brothers. If a widow does not wish to marry at all any more, she is not only permitted to do as she wishes, but even wins respect thereby.

584 In the case of a girl given in marriage by her parents, 557 their wishes are usually the determining factor, and the wealthy 562 man is favored. But even though the girl's taste is not particularly considered, there are usually no unfavorable consequences, because, as we said, if a woman is ill-treated she lets herself be abducted by an admirer. In ordinary affairs, the woman shows subservience to the man; in her sphere she is entirely independent and in the family council her opinion counts for no less than that of her husband.

832 The forms of greeting and manifestations of affection be-576 tween man and [128] woman are very primitive and austere, as is 593 the case in general among the Gilyak. Kissing and handshaking are done only on special occasions, of which we shall speak later. Men and women very seldom kiss; even when the man takes leave or returns from a journey there is no embrace, no kiss, and no handshake, only good wishes are exchanged and even these are rather cool. However, there are other forms of caresses, which will hardly find approval. In tender moments, the woman looks for lice in the man's hair and cracks the game thus hunted between her teeth. Sometimes, the reverse occurs, and the man does it to his lady. Another expression of tenderness consists in washing each other's face with saliva.

578 The abduction of a woman always occurs with her full con-
586 sent. During the absence of the husband, the admirer suddenly appears with some companions, the lady is set in the sled or in the boat, and the party disappears. However, some men do not so easily submit to their fate, they pursue the abducted woman and attempt to win possession of her once more by means of cunning or even force. Some men seek revenge, and the result is a struggle and even death, but this is unusual. Quarrels among the Gilyak usually stem from some such causes. If the run-away couple succeed in hiding

548 On Sakhalin it happened that the Gilyak meant to kill such 837 a Helen who lived with a Russian soldier and bore him 684 a child.

Sodomy, onanism and similar perversions seem to be un-839 known among the Gilyak. Those whom I questioned about them regarded me with astonishment and did not know what I was talking about.

514 As for modesty, it varies according to the type referred 834 to. In sexual matters it is not very pronounced, as we have already pointed out. First of all, the crowded way in which people live together does not permit such delicacy; however the Gilyaks try to hide their love-making from strangers. Their natural functions they do not exactly perform in the open, but they are not particularly ashamed in front of members of the opposite sex. Men as well as women squat in urinating. Women, at any rate younger women, guard against exposing their bodies before strange men. I had some difficulty in persuading them to do this when I was taking body measurements.

177 It is impossible to study the more subtle expressions of 437 modesty in all their forms, but it seems that the Gilyak are 183 most of all ashamed of being taken for thieves and cowards.
576 Their entire character and cycle of habits is such that fawning and self-degradation are foreign to them. They do not make much of genuflection, but do it largely when they are forced to. Thus those Gilyak who decide to travel up the Sungari to the Chinese with their fur must, as a matter of course, bow before the Chinese officials. And probably the Chinese are responsible for teaching them such humiliating expressions of veneration. [227]

735 Begging is practically non-existent among the Gilyak. The 273 only specimen one can see begging is the so-called Vanika-Gilyak, a degenerated half-idiot who goes begging along the streets of Nikolayevsk-na-Amure and who long since has deserted his countrymen. He is also the only one who can be seen in a drunken state, swaying and noisily roaming about. In general drunkenness has not taken root to such an extent that there are professional alcoholics, and this is probably partly because Gilyak cannot have spirits whenever they want, for it necessitates a trip to the Russians. But they love liquor very much, and unfortunately it is to be foreseen that this habit will become wide-spread.

623 XII. Councils, Jurisdiction, Duels, Prosecution
681 of Criminals

Meetings and councils are seldom held. If they are, they

r that he may not squander the property. On Sakhalin, the sons inherit the parents, and the daughters are ried off. If after the death of the parents only one ghter is left behind, she usually gets part of the estate her marriage, the rest is kept by the relatives who care of her. In any case, if the bride has a dowry, man has no right to it; he can get hold of it only by g against the wishes of his wife.

the matter of succession, it is true, the procedure is everywhere and always [232] the same, but in general can draw the following conclusions from what has been : a) the children take precedence over other relatives; e brothers take precedence over their sisters, pro- d the latter marry and thus share the fortune of their and; c) the joint usufruct of the estate on the part of the est relatives is very common; d) women may inherit have their own property, but in general they are not as much; however, they have the right to be supported; idows can demand their own share, but usually they be- e joint owners of the estate along with their children.

e Gilyak are all of one class. There are no privileged ses or families. There are families, now and then, who held in great esteem because of wealth, courage, or use their ancestor was founder of the village, but they no real privileges of any kind. Such families also family names (which are handed down by the males); Gilyak, however, have only one single name to which ded the name of their village, to distinguish them from ders. Some of them, whether they are baptized or not, given this or that Russian name besides their Gilyak one, by this name they are known even among their fellow- smen. These "Petkas," "Mikitas", etc., are usually ligent lads and understand Russian.

like manner, there are no slaves, nor have there ever any among these people. Only personal qualities, r bravery, wealth, age, or intelligence, give the individ- certain significance. Wealth may be regarded with a in esteem, since it is usually acquired as a result of superiority, - either courage, industry or judgment. rd aristocrats of wealth a certain external ceremony is sionally observed. If such a person comes for a visit, he and the host bow after a fashion, whereupon he holds s cheek to be kissed; he himself does not kiss the other.

567 However, there are no forms or obligatory expressions of 554 esteem of any kind. In general, a kiss, bow, or hand-shake 576 are, as we said, not often used by Gilyak.

Beside the aged, the rich, and the brave, shamans are 756 especially esteemed, but here again we see reflected the 184 respect [233] which is paid a superior mind. The shamans do not form a separate, exclusive class but live like other people, but they draw an additional income from their craft. It frequently happens that the shaman is also the son of a shaman and has, in a manner of speaking inherited his "science". Some, however, become students of another shaman for a considerable sum, still others become impromptu shamans whenever the "power" descends on them. Women can also become shamans, as we have said. It is arranged so that large villages have their own shaman, whereas several smaller ones fall within the territory of one shaman.

The work of these priests is probably rooted partly in self-delusion, but in any case there is a considerable addition of intentional deception.

756 Fortunately they themselves, although smarter than the 576 rest, are not very superior, and can therefore not teach the 554 people anything very harmful, nor have they been able to make a privileged place for themselves. The shaman's advice is sought where every-day experience does not prove adequate, but the counsellor is not generally treated with great veneration. Most of the shamans are received without any kind of greeting, only famous ones are met with a bow; beyond Sofiyskoye there was even one before whom the whole house went on its knees when he appeared at the door in order to perform his magic. In general the shamans not only enjoy a certain esteem, but they are also feared. Nevertheless, there are cases where people refused to pay a shaman because of his false predictions and his ineptitude, and sometimes shamans are even flogged. Their magic practices will be considered later.

622 Finally, there are the "starosti" (1), that is, elders who 177

1. This is a Russian word.

are appointed by officials. They are, however, not actual mayors; they have nothing to say and are scarcely more than intermediaries through whom the official gives his orders to the community, for these starosti speak Russian well and are in general intelligent people. [234]

577

577 ETHICS--abstract ethical ideals (e.g., truth, righteousness, justice); ideals of individual virtue (e.g., honesty, loyalty, industry, courage, temperance, tolerance, filial piety); notions of right and wrong; conception of conscience and character; incidence and causes of, and attitudes toward breaches of ethics (e.g., lying, cowardice, flouting of kinship obligations); conflicts between ideal values and practical considerations; etc. See also:

Personality	15	Punishment of social offenses	689
Law	67	Military virtues	703
Ethos	161	Professional ethics	693, 759
Industry and sloth	461	Philosophical systems of ethics	812
Esthetic ideals	517	Ethnopsychological concepts of character	828
Organized vice	546	Chastity	831
Informal social control	626	Sexual modesty	834
Civic virtues	641	Inculcation of ethics	867
Crime and sin	673

"We halted at Vanka's native village, Kherivo, whe him. There was apparently no outward sign of affe undemonstrative, and as I have already said, does re his mother came down to greet ction between them, but the race is not salute."

/34 cont./

835 The Gilya 829 earnestly asked brothers of their them. and asked among the Russi with the wife of answer. they wo that is a very ba one another.

835 Human na 152 the Gilyak has a permitted categ
of acute measur will insist that h

83 Legitimate eral light-minde course. very diff lating his recipro value chastity. a parents to look a

[848] Playing a role he [847] volved with a ma status. and. besi given clan and s

83 Apart from
• 577 prohibition again greatest injustice prevails and sexu understand an ob given society. th morality. for. wi sexual relationshi
The most frivolou intercourse with a category of her p husband and she l

k youths were often perplexed about why I so about these relations between wives and the husbands, strange to us and perfectly natural to in amazement: "Could it be that among you, ans, it is no so? You mean one could not live one's brother?" And upon receiving a negative uld dolefully shake their heads, saying: "Well, d law!" And they would look with disbelief at ture, of course, is the same everywhere; even ttacks of jealousy, but, with regard to persons of ories, jealousy never expresses itself in any kind e of repression -- in extreme cases a jealous brothe is rival move to another house or to another village e sexual intercourse naturally gave rise to a gen-d attitude toward questions of chastity; it is, of ficult to find a man or a married woman not vioocal fidelity. Even the maidens do not expecially and only considerations of an external nature force skance at the frivolous behavior of their daughters.

ere is the fear that the daughter will become inan who is unsuitable with regard to his property des, that the child born to her will be outside the o will have to be killed.
these considerations, however, there is no moral ist the violation of chastity. And yet it is the e to say that among the Gilyak sexual looseness al morality is absent. If by morality /35/ we edience to certain rules generally accepted in a e Gilyak are distinguished by an ideal sexual ith regard to persons who are outside of the group ip, their chaste steadfastness is simply amazing.
us Gilyak woman will never allow herself to have a clansman of her husband if he is not of the u, even though the seducer is younger than her likes him.

Hawes--258-259 T-3 (1901) 1903
, 574, 577, 888

"The Gilyak expects and finds a welcome almost ev embers of his khal, at every other village. Hospital n, and few there are who take unfair advantage of i st of to-morrow. Those who are too aged to hunt ar e younger generation, and even they can slice and [2 s one notable exception to these old people, who dic ions nearer than the mainland went about begging. ch ashamed, and I feel almost guilty of a breach of eleton in their cupboard. His proper name was Poei that, for he has disgraced it, and so he goes by the d Beggar.' "

erywhere, since he has relations, lity is not a virtue, but an obliga-
t. The guest of to-day may be the e supported by the exertions of 259] clean fish in the season. There l travel, and who having no re-Of him the Gilyaks were very confidence in making public this kan, but he can no longer be called title Pillanütsich, or the 'Grand

9: Hawes--300-301 1-3 (1901)
116, 423, 578, 627, 721

"Of the possession of land in our sense nearest approach to it was a prescripti place snares along certain creeks. Th freely recognized; but they would have and backwaters by the Tungus and Oro they would have simply gone elsewhere and tracks for snaring had been made sanctioned by time are seldom transgr prowess of the pioneers, yielded little according to the number of snares whi a dispute arose, and was settled by re duels. In the latter case the disputants straight blade; but as they were alway batants were parted when either becam a fatal ending."

e of the word the Gilyaks have no conception. The ive right, sanctioned by immemorial custom, to e right of all to roam over the land in hunting was resented the placing of snares in chosen creeks chons, although, rather than provoke hostilities,
e. As among themselves, the division of the creeks in olden [301] times; and the customary boundaries essed. The abundance of game, coupled with the cause for quarrel, and spots were simply annexed ch the owner of the hut possessed. Here and there ference to the klenu, the elders in council, or by fought with a weapon like a hedge-bill, with a s surrounded by a goodly concourse, the com-he exhausted, and the duel was not allowed to have

577 makes the comparison even more valuable. Unfortunately,
609 there have been cases where Gilyak have been wronged 177 by decent people, for example by soldiers who had before that behaved properly. The causes for that may be found in the peculiar manner in which the uncultivated individual regards strange peoples. He is to a certain extent inclined to regard foreigners as outlaws. However, this fact has in recent times been badly misused
and misinterpreted by some philosophers. We have pointed out how the Gilyak themselves were able to put themselves in the place of strangers as well as fellow-tribesmen, and to sympathize with them. But one must remember that, where strangers are concerned,
moral impulses such as compassion, the sharing of
pleasures, the sense of justice, etc., more than ever
make room for the egoistic impulses. Everything that tends to repress understanding and sympathy-greed, vindictiveness, etc. - breaks out more easily if one is 177 face to face with strangers. The Gilyak unfortunately 682 put their worst foot forward in their first acquaintance 627 with the civilized world. The French missionary, Le Brunière, who in the year 1848 came from China by way of the Amur and the Ussuri to the Gilyak was robbed and murdered out of pure lust for booty. But this case was and has remained an exception. The village of Vaida (32 versts from the present city of Nikolayevsk-na-Amure) still has about 200 inhabitants;
at that time it was larger by a third, and seven or eight men took part in the crime, of which none is living.

Actually murder seldom occurs. Most cases are caused by quarrels over the fair sex. The relatives of the murdered one formerly resorted to revenge;
now, however, they usually file complaints with the Russian administration. [226]

548 Prostitution in its real sense does not exist; however 837 passing amours are not too much forbidden. A Gilyak 684 woman whose husband is away probably lets herself
be persuaded by a passer-by, and the husband himself
is not too much offended, provided only that there are no consequences. In general, virginity and chastity have a certain value, but minor transgressions are not taken very seriously. However if a woman gives herself completely to a stranger she is persecuted.

578

578 INGROUP ANTAGONISMS--prevalence and importance of antagonisms within the society; sources (e.g., economic deprivation, sexual rivalry, political repression, ethnic and religious cleavages, rigor of socialization or social control); expression in individual behavior (e.g., snobbishness, intentional impoliteness, ridicule, insults, vituperation); prevalence, causes and forms of quarrels; participants (e.g., husband and wife, business competitors, rival claimants to property); manifestations (e.g., verbal exchanges, fist fights, duels); reaction of onlookers; repression and control of aggression; etc.

See also:

Social stratification 56
Family antagonisms 59
Ethnocentrism 186
Economic competition 477
Wit and practical jokes 522 Rivalry in sports 526 Lying 577
Avoidance relationships 602
Moiety rivalries 618
Social control and gossip 630 Informal justice 627, 628 Torts and crimes 673 Slander 683
Litigation 691
Sorcery 764
Cursing 789
Religious persecution 798
Quarreling and fighting by children 857 Control of aggression in children 865

/178 cont./

* 835 The right to sexual intercourse with the wives of brothers 828 has grown to be such an ordinary idea among the Gilyak that 829 they are not able to imagine an order of things whereby a woman could be the private property of one man. The Gilyak youths were extremely perplexed by my asking them so often and so persistently about these relations; they considered them so commonplace that they should not, according to their way of thinking, have caused any doubts at all, and they asked me in surprise: "Is it possible that it is different among you?
Is it bad for you to sleep with your brother's wife?" i.e., not permitted, finding that their law is better than ours. It goes 152 without saying that human nature remains true to itself. The
* 835 Gilyak, too, is jealous, and in other cases where the matter
● 578 does not concern his tuvn he can react with the unbridled passion 684 of primitive man. It means nothing to a Gilyak to kill a rival or have a bloody duel with him. But when the affair concerns /179/ his brothers, then, thanks to the notions that have been a part of him since childhood and to a whole set of prohibitions that we shall discuss below, the brutal instinct loses its power over the Gilyak; he either does not react at all to the flirta-[182] tions of his wife, or quite weakly. To avoid friction between brothers, however, some preventive measures are practical.
[602] Thus, for example, custom dictates that the older brothers [584] not only yield primogeniture in marriage to the younger brothers, but even that they help them with "valuables" for the purchase of wives.

* 835 At first glance such a custom seems all the more strange 182 in that the older persons often do not have sexual rights to the 578 wives of the younger. But, on the other hand, another advantage is gained: having married off their younger brothers, the older brothers are freed in the future to a certain extent from the encroachment of the younger brothers on their own wives. Though such a preventive gives security, albeit weak, with regard to own brothers, the younger class-brothers are too numerous to be all married off in turn and secured ooo against. By way of an exception, I observed several cases

* 835 /179 cont./ By way of an exception, I observed several cases
● 578 where jealous men moved to an isolated place immediately 182 after the wedding, in order to avoid the competition of their 166 brothers. Thus, the settlement of Sakh-Kotan, the southern-[361] most Gilyak settlement on the western shore, was founded by such a jealous man; when I visited it in 1897, I found there only its founder with his numerous descendants, and my Gilyak companions made not a few jokes about him, but he was in-vulnerable -- his wife was of an age when women are well
* 835 beyond suspicion. But such cases are exceptional, and all the 578 more exceptional are cases of sharp clashes between brothers 834 on account of jealousy. In order to avoid them, only an observance of tact is demanded. Such cases are possible when an individual wife and a bachelor tuvn go beyond the bounds of decency and tact: when a woman begins to run after her sweetheart publicly, disappears from the home, and completely disregards her obligations to her individual husband.
In such cases it is sometimes necessary for the sweetheart to move out of the house of his brother or even out of his village, [166] and the woman sometimes gets a scolding. I met such exiles a couple of times in northern Sakhalin. Usually, however, the
* 835 relations between tuvn are quite peaceful. If the older brother 578 gets a little angry, it is in silence and without any consequenc Any active reaction is considered a sin. It is considered a great sin to challenge one's brother to a duel out of jealousy.
I personally never happened even to hear of such cases. I happened to find out about one such case from B. Pilsudski, but this was a completely /180/ exceptional instance. A certain Lokhmatka, a young Gilyak also very well known to me personally, a very poor lad, but one who enjoyed unusual success with the Gilyak women, allowed himself to live too openly with the wife of one of his tuvn. According to the [626] Gilyak custom, as I have already said, publicity in such cases [594] is not allowed. It is allowed in exceptional cases, when the [556] hero is an outstanding and rich man, esteemed by all.
Lokhmatka, however, was a thriftless Gilyak, everlastingly in debt to everybody, lightheaded, and undistinguished by any

/180 cont./

*835 male virtues. Nevertheless, his older tuvn in no way reacted to ●578 even this breach of etiquette. Only at the instigation of his associates did he resolve to challenge him to a duel, but Lokhmatka absolutely rejected this flattering proposal. Then his rival hit him with a cudgel, but Lokhmatka did not react even to that, and since, according to Gilyak custom, it is prohibited to beat a man who does not defend himself, his rival had to let the matter rest, while Lokhmatka continued his public relationship with the man's wife just as before.

*835 Never once among the Gilyak did I chance to observe how 578 an individual husband reacted upon finding his wife in flagrante 171 delicto with one of his brothers. But one may get an idea from a scene which I observed among the Orochi where the same rule operates with respect to the wives of brothers. Once I happened to be spending the night in the tent of the richest and most respected Orochi, Ivan Kuznets. In the tent, besides Ivan and his wife, there chanced to be spending the night a very distant kinsman of Ivan's, the youth Timoshka, who was a very poor and thriftless lad, but a great lover of women, preferring to go visiting and lovemaking to any economic cares. In the evening our host left to look for elks, and Timoshka, without any ceremony, got under the covers of his young hostess. They did not expect the old man until morning. But meanwhile an unfavorable wind had interfered with the hunting, and Ivan returned earlier than might have been expected. Entering the balagan, Ivan lit a splinter and caught sight of Timoshka, taking his place in the conjugal bed. From [152] the proud and hot-tempered Ivan one might have expected -- especially against poor Timoshka -- the most furious outburst of jealousy, the more so because his wife was considered a prize beauty, and he was already at an age when jealousy shows itself particularly strongly. Nevertheless, Ivan limited himself to swearing a strong Russian curse-word, after which Timoshka, smiling embarrassedly, moved over to his own place, while Ivan, groaning, lay down beside his frivolous wife.

/247 cont./

000 weakly developed. Among the Gilyak there are very few 152 such outstanding, passionately devoted hunters as are to be 224 found among the Tungus. Nor do the Gilyak, especially 152 during the past half-century, possess the heroic emotions of 72 war. Indeed, what the Gilyak called wars in ancient times [614] were in fact nothing more than sporadic clan skirmishes
● [578] motivated by vengeance or, even more frequently, were over [463] women. The Gilyak have never known war as a profession, as the favorite occupation of youth. It is natural that their 831 emotional energy should be principally directed toward [152] sexuality. The Gilyak begin their sexual life with the onset of puberty and devote all their leisure, all their thoughts, to women, the more so since by far not every Gilyak, as we 836 shall see, finds it possible to marry. The bachelor youth is not content with the women to whom they have rights in their own settlement; they do not stop with the circle of women to whom they have rights by law. The only category of women before which the Gilyak halts is the class of women prohibited 484 to him. Neither length of time nor immensity of distance will 836 deter the Gilyak from his romantic adventures, if he can but find his fill of feminine society. The young man sets off most eagerly of all, of course, for the village of his "fathers-in-law" --akhmalk'i but he is not averse to undertaking a journey even to completely alien villages. During the time of my [122] travels, young men frequently voluntarily joined me, offering me their assistance without compensation for many weeks, and this was done in the hope of finding occasion for romantic adventures, since this was not so very difficult. Owing to 836 the Gilyak's traditional hospitality and eagerness for any news, 674 the doors of every home are wide open to each new arrival. Thus, the Gilyak feels at home everywhere. A few hours [203] after his arrival in some settlement, he has already managed to spend some time in every home, everywhere relate his news, to which the men and women listen with equal avidity, and has already managed to let his glance fall on some woman who has caught his fancy. The rest is a matter of his amatory experience and art.

/302 cont./

● 578 Quarrels and methods of reconciliation. If a son-in-law /zyat'/ 627 has beaten his brother-in-law /shurin, wife's brother/, he must (present) a pack of racing dogs (three to five; they are sold only in packs) -- kylyn k:an. The first dog is kyly-k:an, the second -- k:akh, the third -- jerkhpe-k:akh, the fourth -- tyly-k:akh. If the first is sold separately, all of them will be useless. They are placed at a certain distance (10-15 paces) from one another and in reverse order, namely, the first -- kyly-k:an -- last, farthest away, and she must catch up with all of them and the object is that all should come together at the same time, and, [435] if the kyly-k:an arrives first, then it is not suitable. The cost of a pack is up to 100 rubles. The son-in-law /zyat'/, in case of [431] a fight with a brother-in-law /shurin/, gives him such a pack of dogs as a present, and, furthermore, he brings them himself or, if he is ashamed, through another, and they cannot be returned, [435] except if the dogs are poor. On the other hand, if a brother-in-law /shurin/ offends a son-in-law /zyat'/, he gives for reconciliation a silk robe (35-60 rubles) or a bear as a present.

/303/ Quarrels within the clan. N left his wife, received back 578 his bride price, and began to carry on with Russians and so forth.
614 The old men assembled and decided to take the woman back, 627 but the father-in-law did not agree: "A woman is not a dog, to try and throw away." Nevertheless, she was purchased for a certain young man. Then N, in Khez', began to storm and threaten because they took his abandoned wife. But they replied to him: "You did not buy her yourself but with your father's money" (clan money). The matter ended by their giving a racing dog, fur, and two bottles of vodka.

595 The oath. Oath -- simbi chakhci lambe -- in Goldi, chkhyz'u 835 nyydz:rá -- in Gilyak.
825 One must kill a wolf (lygyz') and saw, in order, the tendons on both hind legs from the heel to the knee, and ask: "Where is the tendon for the thief? (ennikhrongz'? ennikh -- heel, tongz -- tendon), where is the stolen tendon? -- jeng:az' tongz' shamdzhna?" The tendon that twitches is taken out secretly and

9: Hawes--238 1-3 (1961) 1963

116, 535, 578, 755, 776, 782

"[LSS: During a cure by a medicine man] Th foams at the mouth, and sings the orders of th

'Take two great dogs,
One black,
The other white;
Kill these two offerings
There,
Where is kept the bear;
That will make the sick ma

The first syllable in each line is articulated slowly, merging into a howl. (1)

1. Each line in the Gilyak original is mad

If the cham is angry with the sick man, or he may ruin the whole family by his interpret to bring all their dogs and everything that the times human offerings were demanded."

he eyes of the cham are like flames; h e evil spirit—

n well.'
l quickly, and the last vowels in the lin e to end in a—aa.

has any spite against him or his relati ation of the spirit's demands, forcing t y value most. It is even said that in ol

116, 177, 578, 692, 756

"His [LSS: The cham or medicine man] losing ground, as the Gilyaks come more i said to a Russian, 'A cham tells very man
'Then why do you call him in?'
'He is needed. If he got angry it would b It is true that it may result badly for the divine anger to fall upon his head; but whe accused of crime, the cham may remembe the last word, he can make the punishmen moral influence among his tribe is certain into contact with the Russians. One of them y lies.'

e bad for us,' was the answer.
Gilyak, not because the cham can cause t n the Gilyak has a misunderstanding, or is er his [240] omission or insult, and as he h t very severe."

As far as deceit is concerned, it is very rare among themselves but is practiced against Russians. The cheating usually consists in a Gilyak asking for a loan of money from a Russian, promising him fish, sable, etc., in return and then not reappearing. However, one is not justified in assuming from this that the Gilyak have two different moral standards, which would contradict our previous statements. The discrepancy may be much more simply explained. To sell something at too high a price to a Russian or to take his money and not return it, - such things many Gilyak take the liberty of doing because they think Russians in general are mightier and wealthier than themselves and they feel that for this reason they would be forgiven. But more frequently they are motivated by the feeling that civilized persons would be the first to cheat them. Russian and Chinese merchants often played nasty tricks on them, in fact it has happened that a Gilyak lost all patience and control and hurled himself on his shameless creditor in order to make an end to the latter's ever-increasing demands. It is actually surprising that, having been taught by such masters, the majority of Gilyak nevertheless refrain from cheating, and this fact is highly appreciated by decent Russians. Often I heard peasants of neighboring villages say: "The Gilyak are in general more honest than our sort, especially those who live in distant villages [225], for they do not even permit themselves to cheat strangers." (1) However, one must

1. I myself had the following experience. I bought some ear-rings from a Gilyak woman and gave her a ruble in paper money because I had no change. The woman took the money with some astonishment. Somewhat later when the little steamer with which I had arrived weighed anchor, the woman suddenly appeared rowing toward me in a boat and called out to me that the ear-rings were "not silver, just ordinary ones". Obviously she did not want to be taken for a swindler.

not believe that the peasants are generally dishonest; on the contrary, they are an upright people, which

/323 cont./

756 When shamans fight, the one who has more souls wins. The 794 killing of one shaman by another is accompanied by the acquisition 796 of the kekhn of the opponent. During his supposed death, the soul [578] of the shaman travels over islands of the sea (tol). On these islands, which are of various colors, the houses are of stone tol-kekhn. Sometimes his soul goes into the mountains to the abode of pal-kekhn. The shaman kekhn fears only Pal milk and Tol milk, but not the milk of sables, foxes, otters, and rats (1).

1. Concerning the rat, see Chapter VII, "Miscellanea." S. Sh.

Among the kekhn there are variously colored eared seals, iron trout, and tigers.

756 How the shaman Chomkx resurrected a woman (the settlement of 539 Rykovskoye). A husband and a wife were fishing. The wife fell sick and died before morning. The husband said: "All you shamans are deceiving me. Now my wife is dead. Well, make her live!" The shaman became angry and said: "I shall shamanize all night; if before morning she moves her left little finger, she will live." That is what happened.

756 A shaman stabbed himself and shot himself in the mouth, and "nothing."

756 A female shaman has more spirits than a male shaman.
841 She kills her shaman competitor, sending her kekhn to rub her 754 competitor's eyes with the menstrual blood of shankh-chokh. A [562] feature of this blood is that a drop in food makes a person waste [578] away. Copulation during the menstrual flow also leads to local [833] ataxia.

756 The kamlanie of a female shaman, who, according to her 796 own words, was milkternd (mad) after the birth of her first daughter.
[158] She first made inau and then rubbed her face, breast, and so forth with marsh tea, lighted it on the hearth, and warmed her tambourine... Then she bound her legs and arms with shavings and girdled herself with shavings.. She yawned. Moderate blows... The sounds grew stronger. She sighed loudly and whispered. She rule, offerings were made in the open air, always on deserting our camp-fire for the consumption of the deity. Not only were they the god's due, but the ful of the rite brought good luck, and the omission ill-luck. All misfortunes are ed to the anger of the god. If the Gilyak is unconscious of guilt, then it must en some of his kindred who provoked the god to righteous anger; perhaps it wa , who had failed to guard the honour due to the hearth by allowing somebody to n it, or to leave the hut with his pipe lighted from the sacred fire."

562 really a sort of purchase. Moreover, the widow is in a 587 manner of speaking inherited by the brother or other close relative of the deceased. But this inheritance is more a matter of habit; if the widow wishes to marry another, she may do so, but he must pay back the kalym. The woman also does not take part in the more important councils. On the other hand, she may occupy an independent and respected position; she can, for instance, become a shaman. She may have her own money and inherit, although usually less than her brothers. If a widow does not wish to marry at all any more, she is not only permitted to do as she wishes, but even wins respect thereby.

584 In the case of a girl given in marriage by her parents; 557 their wishes are usually the determining factor, and the wealthy 562 man is favored. But even though the girl's taste is not particularly considered, there are usually no unfavorable consequences, because, as we said, if a woman is ill-treated she lets herself be abducted by an admirer. In ordinary affairs, the woman shows subservience to the man; in her sphere she is entirely independent and in the family council her opinion counts for no less than that of her husband.

832 The forms of greeting and manifestations of affection be-576 tween man and [128] woman are very primitive and austere, as is 593 the case in general among the Gilyak. Kissing and handshaking are done only on special occasions, of which we shall speak later. Men and women very seldom kiss; even when the man takes leave or returns from a journey there is no embrace, no kiss, and no handshake, only good wishes are exchanged and even these are rather cool. However, there are other forms of caresses, which will hardly find approval. In tender moments, the woman looks for lice in the man's hair and cracks the game thus hunted between her teeth. Sometimes, the reverse occurs, and the man does it to his lady. Another expression of tenderness consists in washing each other's face with saliva.

578 The abduction of a woman always occurs with her full con-
586 sent. During the absence of the husband, the admirer suddenly appears with some companions, the lady is set in the sled or in the boat, and the party disappears. However, some men do not so easily submit to their fate, they pursue the abducted woman and attempt to win possession of her once more by means of cunning or even force. Some men seek revenge, and the result is a struggle and even death, but this is unusual. Quarrels among the Gilyak usually stem from some such causes. If the run-away couple succeed in hiding

578 out somewhere in the taiga for a whole year, the consen 586 usually favors them and the first husband must abandon claims. In recent years many Gilyak have resorted to a 177 special ruse in order to make sure of their wives. Such 586 chaps who are probably not of the best and who may thus 797 faced with the prospect of eventually being deserted by t wives, have themselves baptized by a Russian priest, be cause they know that, according to the Greek religion, marriage must be permanent, and they would consequen in case of desertion, be entitled to the ispravnik's prote However, it is doubtful whether this maneuver will help much in the long run, for such baptized individuals who have no intention of keeping their Christianity alive, are forgotten in official circles. No one knows who or where they are, the wilderness is vast, and looking for them is more than troublesome.

If the abducted woman had had children by her first marriage, these usually remain with the father. [129]

171 Child training. Toward the end of her pregnancy, a 844 woman is taken out of the house for 10 (1) days and broug 183
343

1. The duration of this exile is not the same everywhere. From some Gilyak I learned that eight days sufficed; on the island of Sakhalin, however, 12 days were given.

a hut made of birch bark, in which a small fire is burnin This custom which is known to exist among other primiti peoples, for instance among the Ostyaks, is, up to the p ent, very strictly observed by the Gilyak even in winter ing the most severe cold, as a result of which the newly-child often freezes to death. Conceivably a child which vives such a test must be strong. The mother also prov this what rigors these people are capable of enduring. D ing her entire stay in the hut only women are permitted t come to her, often she must be her own mid-wife. No o could tell me the actual meaning of this custom: most pr bly it cannot be explained on the basis of "impurity" of th woman, but it is related to another superstition of which shall speak later, and which was originally perhaps some hygienic regulation. That no mystical idea of "impurity" underlies it may be seen from the fact that when the wom 854 returns to her house she undergoes no "purifying" ritual.
515 The bathing of the newly-born is also done in the impro 302 vised lying-in establishment, and it is given its other baths

/191 cont./

601 174 158 178 the natural key to the /192/ restoration of the Gilyak system of marriage in its pure primitive aspect.

But what does the kinship terminology teach us?

First of all, we see that the Gilyak kinship terminology does not have special terms for relationships by marriage, which are absolutely identical with the terms of blood (cognate) kinship. In Gilyak, kinsmen by marriage are called pandf, i.e., people of a common origin, cognates, for a man, from the side of the mother, for women -- from the side of the father. The father of the wife is the brother of the mother; the mother of the husband is the sister of the father; the husband is the son of the father's sister; the wife is the daughter of the mother's brother, etc.

602 211

It is clear that such a terminology could develop only under conditions where marriages had to be made exclusively with blood kinsmen through the father or through the mother. This was first. In what form these marriages were accomplished is shown to us by other kinship terms.

614 601 582 174

Within each clan, as we have seen, in each generation the wives of tuvn, that is, the wives of own and collateral brothers, call each other sisters, and their mothers-in-law, that is the mothers of all these tuvn, they call aunts (sisters of the father), and, conversely, these latter call them nieces; on the other hand, every male calls the sister of his father-in-law his mother. From this it is clear that 1) the wives of all the members of the clan are necessarily kinswomen taken from one clan, in other words, each clan takes wives for itself exclusively from one common clan, with marriage outside of this clan being impossible; 2) under these conditions, marriage is regulated by generations, i.e., in each generation the clansmen-"brothers" take from a clan which is obligatory for marriage a corresponding generation of "sisters," the nieces of those women whom the generation of their "fathers" married, and their descendents, in turn, take the following generation of "sisters," the nieces of their mothers, etc. This is why the wives of "brothers" call each other 831 533 The importance of the role of love in the life of the Gilyak may be judged by the wealth of song material. Not every Gilyak can relate a story or poem, but everyone knows love songs. Songs play a quite exceptional role in Gilyak love. The song is the language of lovers. At their assignations lovers sing improvised songs to each other in place of conversation, and, if they find it impossible to meet, they send each other songs, composed ad hoc, through a third person. Special terms have even been made up for such songs.

/252 cont./

An idea of the intensity of love among the Gilyak may be gained from the reaction of lovers in cases where their love encounters insuperable obstacles. In such cases the solution is suicide. Obstacles in the Gilyak environment are of a twofold nature. Most frequently the obstacle is presented by the parents, who, either from mercenary motives or from an unwillingness to violate /253/ the childhood agreement of betrothal, force a marriage, or when a woman is violently carried away. In such cases suicides frequently take place quite a long time after the involuntary marriage. In such cases the woman first of all seeks to save herself from the unloved man by flight and, in the event of failure, ends with suicide. I remember one such characteristic instance. A girl from the village of Nyanivo was given in marriage against her will. Soon she ran away from her husband to her father, who handed her over to her lover, tempted by the idea of getting a second bride price from him. Her first husband would not reconcile himself to this and utilized a favorable moment to take her back by force. Within half a year the unfortunate woman hanged herself. There have been instances where a woman, fleeing from her unloved husband, has slain the children that she had by him. Men prefer to defend their rights to love by action. Ordinarily they seek to carry the woman away by force with the aid of clansmen, but they will not stop at slaying the husband of their beloved. I noted one very outstanding

831 584 593 762

831 58 593 762

(849)

831 58 158 (682)

/253 cont./

831 58 159 instance of such amorous heroism in the village of Nyanivo. The most respected and wealthiest man of the local clan at this time was a Gilyak by the name of Nyugun. At one time his beloved was forcibly given in marriage to another man. He slew his competitor, after which he was arrested and taken to Nikolaevsk. In the meantime the brother of the widow again gave her in marriage against her will to another man. Breaking out of prison, Nyugun immediately set off for the settlement of his beloved. Going up to her yurt, he stripped everything off himself, except the short pants of modesty, and naked, despite the winter season, he rushed in this state into the yurt, which was overflowing with people, and by his appearance struck such fear into those present that he was able without hindrance to take his beloved by the hand and take her to his home, after which he lived with her tranquilly for many years (his late wife had time to sew for him four fox-fur coats and four fur coats out of sable tails).

58 182

835 762 831 533 The most tragic obstacle in love is the position of lovers in the forbidden degrees of kinship. Here there is no solution. The parents themselves insist on suicide. Ordinarily in such cases the lovers go to the forest and hang themselves side by side on two trees. Before taking their lives, they sing songs to each other, singing of their journey to the world beyond the grave, where no one shall hinder their love. Some of these songs have come down to us in the following way. It has happened that one of the parties, namely, the man, breaks loose and after this loses the desire to repeat the attempt. It is he who preserves for posterity /254/ his dying song. One of these tragic cases of illicit love has become a popular legend. The time was a hundred years ago. A certain maiden became attached to a younger brother of her father. Shortly after this, her sweetheart set out on a long trading trip to Manchuria. At the same time, she began to show signs of pregnancy; it was no longer possible to conceal the fact, and she took her own life by hanging. When her sweetheart returned, he burned on her grave all

835 762 831 533 533 538

/261 cont./

584 585 the parents of the bride a male dog, not, however, a female. It is not permitted to remove the fillet, since it is considered testimony of betrothal. From this moment on the children are considered husband and wife, and they address each other with these terms. Usually in such cases the young wife moves to the house of her young husband, sleeps with him in the same bed, passes her childhood years with him, and upon attainment of sexual maturity begins marital life.

(601)

58 182 This haste to conclude a marriage between children is explained by many reasons, but the basic reason amounts to a timely strengthening of the right to marriage. In a few years another such lawful claimant may be born or grow up, the son of another sister or female first cousin. Furthermore, in the course of time the economic situation of both sides may change. The father of the bride may become needy and be seduced by a bride price from the outside. There are cases, of course, where the cousins becoming betrothed are of different ages; the bridegroom, the son of the sister, may be a grown lad, while the daughter of the brother /262/ is just an infant, but the procedure is exactly the same. A Gilyak of my acquaintance, Pletun, a lad of about 20, married in this fashion his five-year-old cousin, the daughter of Iksus, took her into his house at once, commenced to sleep with her, and began actual cohabitation with her when she reported her first menstruation to him. But it also happens that a child-wife remains in the home of her parents and moves to her husband's house at the first appearance of menstruation, but no formalities are required for this move, the initial agreement is considered a public act, known to all. "All Sakhalin knows of this," a Gilyak of my acquaintance, who had betrothed his little daughter to the son of his sister, said to me with great pathos. In such marriages not only is bride price not due, but there is not even any question of it. There is merely an exchange of gifts, but even this is not at all obligatory. Such is the simple arrangement in cases of betrothal of the children of male and female first cousins,

585 (582)

(675)

585 583 (178) (184)

/262 cont./

583 585 178 184 although in such cases in several places on Sakhalin there is already some question of bride price, though, to be sure, a very insignificant one.

XIII.

Marriage Terms and Survivals of Maternality

195 196 58 The terms used in the Gilyak language for designating the act of getting married are quite characteristic in a sociological sense.

Like Old Aryan and contemporary Russian, the Gilyak language has no common term for both sexes, such as the English "to marry," French se marier, German "heiraten"; on the contrary, in the Gilyak language, in this case, there is a special term for the individuals of each sex.

When a man is involved, the verb gend, khgend (root ge) with the addition of shankh (woman) or an'g:ej (wife) is used; thus, shankh gend, an'g:ej gend. When a woman is involved, an entirely different verb is used -- avind (root ay), with the corresponding addition of nigyvyn -- person, or pu -- husband, or, if without the addition, simply javind (1) (je -- him + avind).

(197) (184) 1. I choose the term of the eastern dialect; the terms are the same in the other dialects, with the usual dialectal peculiarities.

What is the basic meaning of each of these individual terms g:end and javind?

/263/ As concerns the first, the male term gend, its basic meaning is entirely clear. This is one of the most frequently used verbs in the Gilyak language, signifying "to take something" and "to buy." With regard to marriage,

/263 cont./

195 therefore, the meaning of it is this, that 1) a man takes a 196 woman into his possession as his lawful wife; 2) he buys his • 58 wife by means of a payment of bride price; and 3) in both cases in the sense of the Roman term -- uxorem ducere, i.e., the abducting of a woman into his house, as is usually practiced at the present time.

At first glance the origin of the feminine term javind, which in this form is only a marriage term for designating a woman's getting married, is not as clear. Its original meaning, however, is not difficult to make out from forms which are etymologically close to it. First of all we have the form closest to it, the reflexive verb p'avind = pi + avind, signifying -- "to support oneself," "to nourish oneself," and, finally, "to live," in the economic sense. Here is a characteristic example: n'ig:yvyn' n'enyn' pyr:k pavrà -- "a Gilyak himself alone (i.e., singly) lived" (in the economic sense). If several persons are concerned, this verb takes the meaning of "to live together," i.e., to nourish themselves conjointly, to have a common economy. From this comes the adverb p'avind -- together. Further, we have the derivative form of the active voice àjvund -- to support someone at one's own expense, to take someone as one's charge, to adopt, to nourish -- in the form of the middle voice it signifies to nourish oneself, to graze (jaivun ekhan -- a grazing cow). Finally, javind, javend means also "to warm" someone (with fire), to shelter.

Thus, the term javind, used by women with respect to a man and at the present time signifying to get married, must originally have meant literally "to take a man at one's own expense," "to receive into one's house." If this
[174] etymology is true, which one could hardly doubt, then it
[591] follows from this that originally among the Gilyak the system [171] of maternality /materniteta/ prevailed, as it does at the present time among their neighbors, the Ainu, where the husband as a common rule moved into the house of his wife, just as the masculine term g:end -- "to take for oneself" -- bears witness to the contemporary form of paternity

196 /263 cont./
195 /paterniteta/, with the wife moving into the house of her
• 58 husband. At the present time the original meaning has disappeared from the consciousness of the people to such a degree [171] that often for the expression "to get married" there is added [174] to the verb javind the verb vind, avin vind, which would [591] mean literally -- "go take a man and support him," but this is an obvious contradictio in adjecto, for it signifies moving into the husband's house and, /264/ consequently, being 196 supported by him. A linguistic remnant of the old form of 58 marriage is shown in the fact that in the old language, as far as the texts indicate, all the terms of joint marital life are expressed by means of forms derived from javind. The reflexive verb v'avind means -- to live in marriage with someone, the joint marrying of two persons, or, for example, ytk menakh vavin kuil itynd, i.e., "father ordered us to get married," literally, "father ordered us to support each other." Further, the active verb ajvund is used in the sense of to be married, to have a wife, for example, menyn ruvn an'g:ej n'enyn' ajvutà -- "two brothers lived in marriage with one wife," literally -- "they supported one wife," etc.

In contemporary life there are likewise preserved several 178 remnants of the former maternality. Eloquent testimony 606 of this is found in the contemporary formula of common 591 marriage law of which we spoke earlier, namely -- ymg:ii 174 arinkh jag:n'idra -- "one must feed the son-in-law," although, 607 according to the general rule, the son-in-law takes his wife to his home and lives apart from the father-in-law.

[171] Clearly, such a formula could only arise in a system where the son-in-law either moved into the wife's house for good, or, as among the Ainu of today, he regularly came to live at her house for a certain length of time, and it goes without saying that the wife's family was obligated to feed the son-in-law on the same bases as those on which at the present time the husband's family is obligated to feed his wife.

/266 cont./

177 To a certain degree one may admit the influence on the • 58 matrimonial psychology of the Gilyak from the Ainu, who, [173] judging from legends, were constantly infiltrating the mass of Gilyak settlements in the form of individual immigrants, and they exerted their influence on it in many respects, as we shall see particularly clearly in our examination of religious institutions. But this influence in the sphere of [171] marriage was in general quite limited, for it is impossible [601] to find a similarity between the two systems in their kinship terms or their norms of marriage.

/267/ XIV.

Forms of Concluding Marriage

582 We have already had occasion to introduce in another 538 place, as a clear illustration of the former obligation to marry women from the clan of the mother, from the an'g:ej the episode from the Gilyak poem, when the Gilyak, dying from a wound inflicted on him by a man who has the right to his daughter, summons his slayer and says to the people who a are present: "Although this man has slain me, give him my daughter; do not fail to carry out my wish for any reason." The epos just as clearly portrays for us the old forms of concluding marriage, corresponding completely to the norms of obligatory marriage.

58 Once a marriage is obligatory, there can be no question of complicated procedures in concluding the marriage, such as betrothal and negotiations concerning property obligations, and, of course, there can be no question of payment for the bride. There can be no question of religious rites connected with a move into an alien clan. The bride and the groom are of one common blood on the paternal and on the [538] maternal side. Therefore, in all the works of the epos

/267 cont./

• 58 we find one and the same picture of concluding marriage
538 without any formalities. It is merely necessary for a man, even though he may come from far away, even though he is only by hearsay considered a candidate for being a son-in-law, to state the reason for his coming, and he immediately receives the consent of the parents, and after that all the rights of a spouse, and on the very next day he may take his wife home with him. And that is not all; not only do they not demand any compensation from him, but usually the father-in-law even provides the departing ones with generous [593] gifts. As a matter of form, it is true, they ask for the consent of the daughter, but maidens usually obey the will of their parents and the demand of the law. The sole rite which 585 inevitably is practiced is a kind of Roman confarreatio, but 538 in the most primitive form: the groom and his bride must eat and smoke together. Here is an example of the procedure of concluding a marriage from one of the poems taken down by me. An old woman, the mother of two daughters, asks a young man who has arrived: "Son, why have you come here? Did you come to seek a wife? Your wives are over there in that pile yurt, your wives are there, go!" Our Gilyak ascended to the place, went in, and two young women were there. He sat down between them; having dipped into his tobacco pouch, he began to smoke, gave to the younger sister, she took, she smoked; he then gave to the older sister, she took she smoked. The older sister said: "Having prepared a bite, feed us..." All three ate together. Having eaten, they finished, they slept, on the next day they arose early, ate, our Gilyak /268/ said: "Shall we go today?" That woman said: "Well, having spent today here, tomorrow we shall go!" Having spent the day, on the next day they went back in a boat (1).

1. Shternberg, Materialy /Materials/, pp. 118-119.

CONTINUED ON NEXT FICHE

855 and deloused. They are never cuffed, it seems, or punished 524 with the rod. Nor can it be said that boys take priority in their parents' affections. The play and activity of the children consists of bathing (in summer), of scuffling and romping about in the sand and snow, and of imitating their elders, especially in archery. Occasionally their mother sews them a leather ball which they knock about with a stick on the flat ground or on the ice. The children also make themselves willow whistles.

674 [222] XI. Morality and Crime.

Crimes are rare and neither manifold nor refined. This negative side of morality is less developed among these natural people than the positive side, that is, moral traits of character. Some of these we touched on in previous chapters; we should now like to consider them in detail.

152 First of all, the Gilyak are a brave people. Not everyone, it is true, decides to attack the bear single-handed with his lance, but for two people to set out against the bear, armed with rifles- this is a very common thing. The seal hunt on Sakhalin is often linked with great danger because of the floating ice. Even traveling along the coast of the Amur in windy weather with the kind of vessels the Gilyak have is certainly not without danger, especially if one remembers what poor swimmers the Gilyak are.

It cannot be said that resignation and patience in the endurance of bodily pain falls entirely within the realm of morality, for it can also be a result of insensitivity of the nervous system; nevertheless, a certain self-effacement in such instances is not to be denied. And the Gilyak bear suffering extremely well. Not only hunger and physical pain, but the ailments connected with the latter, they endure steadfastly. Loss of eye-sight, paralysis of the limbs, etc., do not call forth lamentations or complaints. [223]

592 The quiet way in which several families live in one house, 578 or more accurately, in one room, already points to 888 peaceableness and forbearance. I repeatedly heard neighboring peasants praise the Gilyak for these characteristics; and they marveled particularly that the "women folk got along together". The house usually belongs to one owner, but the occupants do not pay him anything, they merely help him with repairs, wood cutting, etc. The old people of both sexes in the house are sometimes called the "masters of the house". In general, old people are respected. They are not permitted to work, they are given all they need, and their advice is followed.

623 usually concern abductions of women or major transgres-
681 sions and crimes. Women do not take part in them. The opinions of the older generation usually are decisive. In cases of particular importance the Gilyaks of surrounding villages are drawn in. The penalties for crimes consist of fines in money for the plaintiffs, in banishment of the guilty one from the village, or in a sort of ostracism which results in a cessation of all intercourse with him. Occasionally, though rarely, the death penalty is pronounced, but this is of course kept a secret from the Russian administration. As for corporal punishment, the Gilyak are no adherents of the idea. It is sometimes applied, but there is evidence that formerly it was never used.

578 Quarrels between men sometimes lead to a duel. It is 411 conducted in the presence of witnesses. The weapon used is the kaur, but in this case they fight with the end which does not have the iron point. The challenger deals the first blow, the blows are parried as much as possible with the stick. The fight usually continues until blood is drawn or one of the fighters is stunned and reels. This fight seldom ends in death. Sometimes when two Gilyak get very angry- which, however, seldom happens- they reach for their knives and begin stabbing each other in disregard of any kind of rules. [228]

563 A sad spectacle are the man-hunts, i.e., persecution of 177 fleeing Russian criminals, which the Gilyak also sometimes carry on. Such refugees or so-called broydagi (i.e., loafers) are a common sight on all large highways in Siberia and the direction they take is always the same, that is, from east to west. Most of them are convicts who have escaped from forced labor. Since the island of Sakhalin was chosen as the chief deportation center for non-political criminals, these brodyagi also pass through the Amur region. Very few of them escape in order to go back to their homes, i.e., European Russia. Even though the thought of home, of their native villages and families may arouse warm, tender emotions in even the most hardened criminals, nevertheless, these refugees know too well the possibility of arrest to entertain great hopes. The usual practical goal which they hold up to themselves is-not to be recognized in case of arrest and thus to be put in the general class of brodyagi in which they would also be condemned to hard labor, but only for a few years, after which they could become Siberian citizens. Others, finally, escape without any particular

579

579 BRAWLS, RIOTS, AND BANDITRY--prevalence and causes of brawls, types (e.g., drinking brawls, gang fights); running amok; incidence and types of riots (e.g., bread riots, race riots, political riots); methods of control; manifestations of mob psychology; incidence of organized violence (e.g., banditry piracy), etc. See also:

Political corruption 66
Strikes 468
Organized vice 548
Police 625
Social control 636
Lynching 637
Feuds 628
Revolutions 669
Punishment of disorderly conduct 689
Martial law 722
Warfare 726
Petty delinquency 738
Children's gangs 857

/418 cont./

000 however, is not done by the men, but by the women. As I my-301 self have seen among the Gilyak and as is reported from other 17 Amur peoples (Olcha, Manegir, Orochon) (2), the thumb ring 411

[113] 2. Maak", Putesh. na Amur", pp. 75, 207. Gerstfel'd", "O pribrezhn. zhit. Amura" (Viestn. Imp. Russk. Geogr. Obshch., Part 20, 1857, Sec. on Res. and Mat., p. 296).

is used to draw the bow, to grasp the string better, and, in case of a strong pull on it, to protect the skin of the finger from [554] injury as a result of severe abrasion (3). Aside from this practical [113] 3. According to Anutschin /Anuchin/ (Luk" i striely, Arkheologo-etnograf. ocherk" /Bow and Arrows, an Archeological-ethnographic Essay/, Moscow, 1887, p. 35), this is the bow pull especially characteristic for the peoples of the Mongolian race, and, according to Morse, in his work, "Ancient and modern Methods of Arrow-Release" (Bullet. of the Essex Instit.), the so-called "Mongolian" method of drawing the bow.

purpose, however, the thumb ring is also a special ornament, since it is regarded as a sign of manliness and is associated with skill with the bow and arrow. No halfway adult Gilyak therefore lacks the aam, and it is the same among the other peoples.
[199] Indeed, even where the bow has in large part already been pushed out by firearms, Chinese matchlock guns, or Russian-Yakut rifles, as among the Manegir and Orochon, the thumb ring is still [579] generally worn (4). Here, then, apart from its use in an occasional

4. Gerstfeldt, loc. cit., and Maack, loc. cit.

301 fist-fight, it is gradually becoming a mere ornament. And this 191

58

MARRIAGE--general statements dealing with several specific aspects of marriage. Marriage is a socially sanctioned relationship between a man and a woman involving economic cooperation and residential and sexual cohabitation. The culturally patterned norms of this relationship regularly specify who may and may not enter into it, how it may be established and terminated, and what each partner may and may not do within it. As a relationship, marriage is to be distinguished sharply from the family, the social group within which it is typically embedded.

/129 cont./

114 595 In his own way Schrenck was right; it was perhaps impossible for him personally to notice the polyandrous nature of Gilyak marriage, for in effect it is impossible to find among the Gilyak open, public polyandry in the form /130/ in which those who have never seen it in life picture it to themselves. On the other hand, the statements of Mamio Rinso are also quite uncertain, since due to his ignorance of the language he could note only a factual looseness in relations, but he could never grasp the chief essence, the normativeness, the lawfulness of the sexual relations that he observed.

In order to discover the polyandrous nature of Gilyak marriage, it is necessary to penetrate deeply into the most intimate aspects of Gilyak life, know their language, live a long time with them in their yurts (which helped Rinso see that which escaped Schrenck), and, in any case, become familiar with their kinship nomenclature, which Schrenck, due to his slight acquaintance with the language, completely failed to accomplish (1).

1. Certain information given by Schrenck in this regard can only mislead the reader. Thus, for example, he completely erroneously affirms that a man gives to his mother and to the sister of his father the identical designation "ymk." See Schrenck, op. cit., Vol. III, p. 6. Probably the individual who gave Schrenck this information was speaking, not of the sister of the father, but of the sister of the mother.

• 58 [595] To the superficial observer, the institution of Gilyak marriage actually does not present anything peculiar. By all outward indications the wife or the wives of the Gilyak (polygamy -- two, three, or four wives -- is permitted by Gilyak custom) represent his individual property. The wife [591] is purchased by the husband for a very high price from her

/130 cont./

• 58 [591] agnates, the father or her brothers; she makes her permanent residence in his home, follows him in his journeyings and emigrations, and before all the world is considered the personal wife of the Gilyak who purchased her and the mother of his children. The children belong exclusively to the father and 59 [85] succeed him after his death. After the birth of the first child, [551] husband and wife cease to call themselves by their former [553] names and begin to be called by the name of the newborn ("the father of so-and-so, the mother of so-and-so" -- teknonymy). The exclusive rights of the husband to his wives [684] apparently are sanctioned by the right of retribution, even bloody retribution, upon the infringer on his conjugal rights. [614] The clan is based on the principle of agnation, exogamous marriage. One can travel over the whole territory of the Gilyak, live in their yurts, long observe their family life, and note nothing extraordinary. In the large winter yurts, the inhabitants occupy their places by families, each living with regard to its own particular interests. Between husband and wife or wives and their children, harmony and tender /131/ relations prevail. Cases of a striking attachment between spouses are not infrequent; when one of them dies, the other sometimes lays hands on himself or dies of grief.

*601 121 125 [59] In a word, to all appearances we are dealing here with a type of individual family which is generally accepted as being patriarchal and in any case not polyandrous. Such were my own personal impressions at first. But my first inquiries in the realm of kinship nomenclature awoke serious doubts in me, and I therefore determined first of all to make a detailed study of this aspect of their relations. The study of the kinship nomenclature, it appeared to me, could be most successfully accomplished by a systematic census of the population. With [114] this objective, I undertook during the winter of 1891 my first census of the Gilyak villages on the western shore of northern Sakhalin, and as a result I discovered their complex classificatory system of kinship and their peculiar form of group marriage (1).

[113] 1. At the time the account of this was

/181/

*835 Such are the relations between the categories of group pu and an'g:ej. Within his own clan, the Gilyak has at his disposal the dozens of wives of his "brothers." In the clan of his akhmalk (and there may be many of these) dozens of daughters of the "brothers" of his mother are at his disposal, and finally, outside of these clans the sisters of the wives of his most distant tuvn, and the wives of the sons of his "mother's" sisters, belong to him. And since, in addition, due to the contemporary conditions of life, his own clansmen and the members of the clans of his akhmalk are scattered throughout the most remote settlements, there is hardly a place where a visiting Gilyak could not find his lawful an'g:ej. One may say the same thing about the Gilyak that is said, mutatis mutandis, about "kumi" and "kroki," who throughout the whole extent of their territory find everywhere a lawful wife for themselves.

*835 595 • 58 Thus, every Gilyak usually is joined in a dual marriage: 1) in the customary individual marriage with one or more women either from the class of his an'g:ej (in this case mainly with the daughters of his mother's brother) or with women of alien groups; this form of marriage among brothers sometimes takes on the form of purely communal polyandry; 2) in a group marriage with all the women of the class an'g:ej, where sexual intercourse with some of them is accompanied by joint cohabitation, a common economy with their individual husbands, and takes place more or less regularly (most often within a common economy of brothers); or else this right of sexual intercourse is potential and is exercised only insofar as is possible and not regularly.

*835 191 Thus, we have to do here with the typical group marriage, examples of which are known to all among the most diverse peoples of the earth. An extremely curious, typical analogue in the life of other peoples is the marriage system of the Australian Dieri tribe (1), among whom both aspects of sexual

1. "Australian Group Relations," by Howitt (Papers relating to Anthropology

/191 cont./

*174 60 Why, for example, do the wives of the most distant tuvn, although they may be completely alien to each other, call each other sisters? Why do I, a man, call my father-in-law, although he may be a complete stranger, my "mother's broth and under the same conditions a woman call her mother-in-la the "sister of her father"? Why, if I am a man and marry a woman who is a complete alien to me and to my clan, from that moment on do all the sisters of her father, even the unmarried ones, become my mothers, and no one from her clan can marry the women from my clan?

[614] Why is it that the women of my clan cannot marry into not only that clan from which anyone from my clan takes a wife, but any clan from which this latter clan takes wives? In what way could the apparently paradoxical fact that a man can have male and female agnates (sons, daughters, brothers, fathers, and mothers) in clans completely alien to him have come about? This confusion and apparent absurdity can be *174 explained only by the fact that the primitive, simple, and • 58 logically consistent system of marriage, like every religious 60 [783] norm, has created around itself by a peculiarity natural to it a fabric of extended norms. On the other hand, under the [108] influence of historical conditions and the conditions of life, it underwent a gradual extension and complication, while at the same time the kinship terminology, as an element which by its own nature, in view of its formality, was distinguished by its extreme stability, remained unchangeable. What was the scheme of primitive marriage like? In certain places in our exposition we have already discussed it. Now we must elucidate this question in all its fullness. The detailed analysis both of the prohibitive and of the permissive norms of marriage that we made in the preceding chapter has shown that these norms completely correspond to the kinship terminology. In other words, the whole intricate Gilyak kinship terminology is nothing more than an automatic registry of the marriage system. This faithful registrar, so stable in the face of all change [108]

instead of this point some arrows have a crescent-shaped piece of pointed iron. This latter device is used for duck shooting, if there is no powder to be had. On the hunt the arrows are usually kept in a quiver, which usually does not hold more than thirge. It consists of a flat and hallowed-out small board and is usually decorated on the outside with various designs or figures of animals. It is fastened to the belt.

The lance consists of a shaft about one and three-quarters meters long with a flat iron tip. Some lances made by Gilyak are artifully decorated with silver and gold figures. Moreover, all weapons except firearms are made by the Gilyak themselves. Forgig is done simply at the domestic hearth, but the fire is kindled with a bellows. Iron is bought from the Chinese or Russians. Occasionally fragments of Chinese pots are made over into knives, etc.

Finally, I must mention the shield of which few examples are still to be found among the Gilyak. These shields are very heavy, probably close to 35-40 pounds, very crudely fashioned, and consist of iron rings. They come from China and at present have no practical value because no one thinks of carrying them. Nevertheless they are regarded as something very valuable and are estimated at 200 rubles. It has happened that the owner of such a shield has pawned it to a Russian merchant, but as soon as he got some money, bought it back.

X. Marriage and the Rearing of Children

Men who have reached middle age are seldom unmarried, and it is even rarer to find married men with four or five wives, for this requires a certain amount of means; besides, there are too few women. The beginning of a /126/ marriage requires the payment of a ransom (kalym). This does not consist of money, but of certain necessary items: weapons, dog sleds, etc. An average kalym amounts to 200-300 rubles. There are no special ceremonies, but the wedding celebrations which must also be paid for by the bridegroom last a rather long time, a week or more. Besides millet, fish and tea, a great deal of alcohol is consumed.

It is curious, although not altogether unique customs are marriages between four and five year old children. As soon as the parents reach an agreement, a boy and girl are pronounced man and wife. The father of the boy pays the kalym and takes the girl with him, in order to bring her up with her "husband", sometimes, however, she remains a few more

58 years in her parental home. At what time such married couples actually enter the marital state is difficult to say. Probably, however, it is determined by the awakening of sex 582 impulse. The Gilyak believe that a 30-year-old man (which means a 15-year-old, because the Gilyak's year corresponds to our half year) can marry. However, this is also only an approximation, for they do not actually count their years. A merchant who for a long time associated with the Gilyak and who had a good memory and a gift of observation, told me that he knew of two married couples, the parents of which he had known since childhood. The woman of one of them had a child at the age of 15, the other woman was 23 years old and complained that her husband was 14 years old(yet a man. I, too, was shown 15-year-old boys with half child-like features and narrow shoulders who had their they could marry if they found a bride. We may conclude that marriage is permissible during pubertly, but actually this does not often occur. At least among men there are not infrequent examples of mature individuals (around 23-25 years old) who are still unmarried. Cases where the woman is older are rare, but the opposite often occurs. In fact, some mature men take four or five-year-old girls and rear them until they reach womanhood.

As far as marriage between close relatives is concerned, it is known that cousins marry, but that the older generation does not favor this; thus these people must also have had experiences pertaining to the harmfulness of such marriages. An uncle may be permitted to marry his niece. /127/

586 Women are in general well treated by men, partly because 562 the Gilyak customs bear the mark of instinct humanity. party because divorce is very easy. The wife of a tyrannical husband will soon be abducted by an admirer who usually strikes with his quiver and takes her away. It happens now and then that a well-to-do man has several wives, but only lives with his favorite one and keeps the others as workers. Soon, however, this leads to quarrels, and the neglected ones make an effort to get out of the situation. In all other respects, however, even such workers are well treated, especially because they are needed. As long as a woman can work, and particularly if she is skillful at needle work, she can always find a husband.

562 In general one may conclude that, theoretically, the Gilyak 587 woman seems to be regarded as somewhat inferior to the man, but actually this has no practical effects; on the contrary, the opposite is often the case. The inferiority of women is reflected in the payment of kalym, which is

/31 cont./

595 period in the evolution of marriage, and, although they could 595 have influenced one another, they basically belong, speaking in 595 the language of geology, to different formations. It is sufficient 635 to say that among the Tungus tribes sexual intercourse with wives of individuals of ascending generations is allowed, for example, with the wife of the father's younger brother, while among the Gilyak this is regarded as incest.

595 At first sight the Gilyak institution of marriage does not 587 seem to be anything special. A Gilyak will generally buy one or 589 rarely two or three wives, who come into his clan and are regarded before the world as his personal wives and the mothers of his children. The children belong exclusively to the father and 851 succeed him after his death. Nobody but the man is a father; he 851 is no longer called by his former name, but is called the father 851 of the born child. The exclusive possession of his wives expresses 684 itself in the stern custom of blood vengeance against the disturber 684 of marital harmony. The clan is based on the principle of agnation, and marriage is exogamous.

583 One can travel over the entire territory of the Gilyak, live 583 in their yurts and hunt with them for a long time, and one does 583 not notice anything peculiar in the structure of their family. In large winter yurts the inhabitants occupy their plank beds by families, each living in relation to its own particular interests. Nevertheless, a certain amount of mutual assistance and tender relations prevail among husband, wife, and their children. That is not all. One may frequently 725 encounter instances of striking loyalty and love between spouses. When one of them dies, the other frequently lays hands on himself or dies from grief. In a word, to all appearances we are dealing with the type of family which is generally called patriarchal. Actually, however, it is not. First of all, one is struck by the strange kinship nomenclature. A whole group of women call a whole group of men their husbands (pu, ivn), and the latter call them their wives (an'gel). Likewise, a whole group of men call a whole group of women their mothers (ymk) and a group of men their fathers (yik), and these call the former their children.

/149 cont./

III.

The Classificatory System of Kinship and the Norms of Sexual Intercourse and Marriage

83 Now we shall see to what degree the aforementioned kin-121 ship system corresponds to the contemporary norms of sexual intercourse and marriage.

Among the Gilyak, at least at the present time, we cannot speak of any kind of general prohibitions against extramarital sexual relations.

Sexual relations with a woman in the eyes of a Gilyak is a completely nonchalant and natural act, like any other natural act, satisfying a certain physiological need of man. Prohibitions and restrictions apply only to definite circles bound by agnate or cognate kinship. Outside of these circles there is no regulation or censure of sexual behavior, either on the part of public opinion or on the part of religion. Outside of the prohibited circles, sexual relations out of wedlock have only one restriction: the reaction of the one or the other party concerned. Young men of a given clan, having rights to the women of a certain /150/ locality, may be aggrieved at an alien usurper and roundly teach the stranger not to sneak into a territory not his own, which, by the way, happens very rarely, for adultery or some serious affair if a married woman is involved. A stranger caught in flagrante delicto with a 684 married woman is slain at the scene of the crime; such was the 684 custom at least until the most recent times; only the fear of 684 penal retaliation prevents the husband from killing the 684 slaying), which are beginning to be replaced by duels and 684 ransom. The woman suffers less in such cases. They beat her 684 thoroughly, but the affair never goes so far as killing her;
561 in the first place, because, as we shall see further on, a woman 684 is always considered the cognate of her husband, and, in the second place, because she is an article of value, having cost her husband money, and further more she is a necessary worker.
684 In any case, the matter is not settled without repremand, bloody

/156 cont./

835 and designating the wife of the younger kuvn by the prohibitory term john; and, correspondingly, sexual relations between a man and the wife of his younger brother are not permitted. Notwithstanding the dominance of this term at the present time, originally both the terminology and the norms of intercourse were apparently identical with respect to all the wives of brothers without distinction. Evidence of this is not only the fact that in certain places, as we have seen, this arrangement still prevails, but also certain features of the terminology which have been retained even in those places where the new order is dominant. Thus, for example, children everywhere without distinction call the wives of all the brothers of their father ymk, i.e., by the same term that they apply to their own mother, and (in many places) all the brothers of the father yik (father), from which we must conclude that formerly the sexual rights of men extended to the wives of all brothers without distinction.

The norms of lawful sexual intercourse. From the kinship nomenclature we conclude that whole groups of men call whole groups of women their wives, and vice versa, i.e., the latter call them their husbands. This strange nomenclature fully corresponds to actuality; in the language of our own European institutions, such groups of men and women are joined in marriage.

But before entering into a detailed examination of these relationships, strange from a contemporary point of view, it is necessary, in order to avoid misunderstanding, to analyze precisely the meaning of the term "marriage."

In the institution of marriage there are three main features: 1) sexual intercourse, 2) begetting offspring, and 3) common /157/ domestic activity. It is completely clear that the intrinsically indispensable element in marriage is only the first, namely, sexual intercourse; the other two features, although they, too, play an important role in the marital union, may be completely absent. There are marriages which, on account of natural or artificial causes, are

/157 cont./

12 58 childless. Furthermore, there are marriages which do not pursue domestic aims. By itself alone, however, sexual intercourse between certain individuals of different sex, even though it may be regular, still does not constitute a sign of marriage. In order that sexual intercourse be transformed into a marriage, it is necessary that this be sanctioned in one form or another by a given social environment, that it not provoke a social or religious reaction, in a word, that it be lawful.

12 58 The lawfulness of sexual intercourse, then, constitutes the criterion of marriage. On this point, the concept of marriage is similar among the most diverse peoples in the most diverse stages of development. If there are variations, it is only in the degree to which sexual intercourse is realized, in marriage. It is just these variations, often so contradictory to the notions of contemporary society, which most of all obscure the idea of marriage when one chances to encounter the forms of sexual intercourse among primitive peoples.

A true understanding of the institution of marriage among primitive peoples is obscured most of all by our habitual notion that marriage invariably presupposes joint cohabitation of husbands and, consequently, the manifest and regular realization of conjugal rights.

Among many peoples, however, alid not only primitive peoples, but even highly cultured ones, this is not manifest at all. Among the Spartans, for example, the women lived apart from the men, and meetings between husband and wife took place under compulsory secrecy.

12 58 This is the case, even as a general rule, among many contemporary primitive peoples, among whom are found the so-called "unions of men." These latter, including also the married ones, spend all their time in a common house where women are not allowed, while the wives and children live in special little houses. On the Fiji Islands, married couples can spend the night together only in secret. We find similar phenomena even among peoples where male unions are unknown.

/157 cont./

12 58 For example, among the Ainu, when women get married, they often remain in their father's house, and the husband, 12 58 instead of taking his wife home, sometimes at a great distance from the settlement of his father-in-law. /158/ visits his wife only at a certain time of the year. Among the Kirgiz, until the final payment of the bride price, the husband, sometimes for years, visits his wife only at night, and then in secret from her parents. We do not find regularity even among polygamists of the Mussulman type. The Turk may have in his harem women with whom he does not have sexual intercourse for years. Nevertheless, they nevertheless are considered wives, joined with him in marriage. The condition of joint cohabitation and regular sexual intercourse is still less possible among primitive peoples, according to the socially established order, a whole group of men considers a whole group of women their wives, and, conversely, a man exercises his right only as far as possible.

Within the Sudan Dieri tribe every "kunu" (a term corresponding to the Gilyak nu -- husband) finds his "koaka" (wife) throughout the whole extent of his territory, in whatever settlement he visits. A kunu may live out his whole life without seeing one or another of his innumerable koaka, but she is nevertheless his wife, for, if he visits her settlement, he can exercise his right without subjecting himself to social censure, condemnation, the gossip, or a reaction on the part of the individual husband of his koaka, as would a non-kunu who did this (1). The potentiality of lawful sexual intercourse takes various forms among different peoples, but the legal essence of the relations remains the same. In one place, persons bound by such a form of marriage are invested not only with rights, but also with obligations, in other words,

1. Pinon and Howitt, Kamilaroi and Kurnai, 1880, pp. 340 f.

/148 cont./

In another party has no right to refuse sexual relations with a person who is entitled to them. For example, among the Chukchee a woman may not refuse a man joined with her husband in the collaborative marriage, or a brother.

Among others, full scope is given to individual sympathies, as, for example, among the aforementioned Iunit and Iteln; among the Tungus people, among the Gilyak, where the agreement of both parties is demanded for sexual intercourse, but once this agreement obtains, intercourse becomes lawful. In essence, what we have here is the same phenomenon as in pure polyandry. A husband may have a wife, or a brother, even completely avoid a certain wife, but the marriage is present nevertheless. It is the same also in group marriage: in spite of the separation of the Iunit, the marriage of the group spouses and the clear potentiality of conjugal rights, lawful rights of sexual intercourse within the group, and consequently also marriage, is present.

/149/ Of course, joint cohabitation and regular sexual intercourse are the most normal for marriage. We observe the tendency towards this, although in varying degrees, among the most diverse peoples. Cohabitation, however, must not be confused with the tendency toward individual possession. The instinct for sexual possession and the sexual sympathies indeed pushes even primitive man toward establishing more or less durable conjugal bonds. But pairing-up presupposes neither obligatory sexual possession nor, what is more, obligatory joint cohabitation. We have already offered the example of the Aino, whose wife often remains living in her parents' home, sometimes several days' journey from her husband. Among the Aino, however, marriage is purely individual. All the more, it is the rule that all the aforementioned conditions among those peoples where group forms of marriage exist, or where the tendency for sexual relations is extended are many, and for this very reason joint cohabitation and, consequently, the regular coupling of the right of sexual intercourse between all the persons involved in the group marriage rarely take place.

/150 cont./

Individual wife always lives in one house with her husband, works with him, raises children with him, and is obliged to follow him from one village to another. At the same time she has the right to share her caresses with impunity also with a whole group of individuals to whom this is allowed by established rights. Life has arrived at a certain equilibrium, because, from so as economic interests here coincide with the other mighty motive of sexual selection, the individual inclinations of representatives of the different sexes. For this very reason, along with irregular marital relations, individual unions appear, also sanctioned by custom. As arrangement of marriage, there is a separate member of society may at the same time be joined in an individual marriage and in a group marriage, and those who are joined in an individual marriage are bound not only by regular sexual intercourse and cohabitation, but also by a common economy and common upbringing. At the same time, however, to each of them is given the lawful opportunity to have sexual intercourse with persons of their own marital group. And although such sexual intercourse takes place irregularly, often demands conditions of secrecy, and usually presupposes the consent of both parties, and the fact of intercourse, nevertheless it is just because this is socially recognized, lawful and, in a certain sense, obligatory, and allowed social or religious, and because it manifests itself legally -- for marriage is a term of law -- we ought to define such relations from one another, and, more specifically, to distinguish them in contrast to coincides also with the juridical views of those people among whom these institutions exist. /151/ First of all, the very kinship nomenclature itself, according to which individual and group spouses are not distinguished by appellative, is indicative of the fact that the kinship terminology imposes on the participants in a group marriage the same obligations, as are imposed on individual husbands. Thus, for example, when an individual husband dies, one of the members of the group marriage must replace the husband of the widow, even though he may no longer be capable of sexual intercourse; he must support her and her children, who usually are also considered the children of all the members of the group. Yet, as we have seen above, this is not the same case in the Tlingit, where the right to share her caresses with impunity also with a whole group of individuals to whom this is allowed by established rights. Life has arrived at a certain equilibrium, because, from so as economic interests here coincide with the other mighty motive of sexual selection, the individual inclinations of representatives of the different sexes. For this very reason, along with irregular marital relations, individual unions appear, also sanctioned by custom. As arrangement of marriage, there is a separate member of society may at the same time be joined in an individual marriage and in a group marriage, and those who are joined in an individual marriage are bound not only by regular sexual intercourse and cohabitation, but also by a common economy and common upbringing. At the same time, however, to each of them is given the lawful opportunity to have sexual intercourse with persons of their own marital group. And although such sexual intercourse takes place irregularly, often demands conditions of secrecy, and usually presupposes the consent of both parties, and the fact of intercourse, nevertheless it is just because this is socially recognized, lawful and, in a certain sense, obligatory, and allowed social or religious, and because it manifests itself legally -- for marriage is a term of law -- we ought to define such relations from one another, and, more specifically, to distinguish them in contrast to the juridical views of those people among whom these institutions exist. /151/ First of all, the very kinship nomenclature itself, according to which individual and group spouses are not distinguished by appellative, is indicative of the fact that the kinship terminology imposes on the participants in a group marriage the same obligations, as are imposed on individual husbands. Thus, for example, when an individual husband dies, one of the members of the group marriage must replace the husband of the widow, even though he may no longer be capable of sexual intercourse; he must support her and her children, who usually are also considered the children of all the members of the group. Yet, as we have seen above, this is not the same case in the Tlingit, where the right to share her caresses with impunity also with a whole group of individuals to whom this is allowed by established rights. Life has arrived at a certain equilibrium, because, from so as economic interests here coincide with the other mighty motive of sexual selection, the individual inclinations of representatives of the different sexes. For this very reason, along with irregular marital relations, individual unions appear, also sanctioned by custom. As arrangement of marriage, there is a separate member of society may at the same time be joined in an individual marriage and in a group marriage, and those who are joined in an individual marriage are bound not only by regular sexual intercourse and cohabitation, but also by a common economy and common upbringing. At the same time, however, to each of them is given the lawful opportunity to have sexual intercourse with persons of their own marital group. And although such sexual intercourse takes place irregularly, often demands conditions of secrecy, and usually presupposes the consent of both parties, and the fact of intercourse, nevertheless it is just because this is socially recognized, lawful and, in a certain sense, obligatory, and allowed social or religious, and because it manifests itself legally -- for marriage is a term of law -- we ought to define such relations from one another, and, more specifically, to distinguish them in contrast to the juridical views of those people among whom these institutions exist. /151/ First of all, the very kinship nomenclature itself, according to which individual and group spouses are not distinguished by appellative, is indicative of the fact that the kinship terminology imposes on the participants in a group marriage the same obligations, as are imposed on individual husbands. Thus, for example, when an individual husband dies, one of the members of the group marriage must replace the husband of the widow, even though he may no longer be capable of sexual on the mother's side, of one common blood. For each individual member of the group, his or her brother (his sister), are joined in the fact that a person usually marries the daughters of his mother's brother, in other words, the daughter of every man belonging to the same of his sister. Thus, the kinship ties from which not only the classificatory system of kinship, so complicated in appearance, but also group marriage and, finally, the clan grew. We shall also examine this dynamic. We shall see below that this principle, still so common nowadays among many primitive peoples, the principle that the daughters of the brothers belong to the sons of their sisters, goes back to the most ancient stage of the classificatory family, that immediately followed blood marriage, and served as the basic method of providing the group with wives. In order to understand this vital need in the early stages of human society, every thether obtained for her son the daughters of her brothers, in other words, all the women of a clan obtained as wives all the descendants of her brother. Why such a principle arose, why they took as wives exclusively the daughters of her brothers, and not the sisters of her brothers, or the mother's sister or the daughters of the father's brother, or the daughters of the mother's brother, in other words, in accordance this principle had in its practical application.

/151 cont./

/151 cont./

/153 cont./

/154/ Thus, the daughters of the brothers belonged from birth to the son of the father, it was most natural that the future husbands should go at a very early age to the homes of their wives-to-be. This arrangement is still to be seen among the Gilyak, among many other primitive tribes. In "pure" marriage, i.e., between the children of brother and sister, from earliest childhood the future wife moves to the home of the husband and grows up with him. Terminologically, the relations between the children born from both children in certain classes stand in the reciprocal relationship of pu and ai(ai-e) toward each other (1).

/154 cont./

1. This fact radically refutes the assertion of Westermarck, Crawley, and others that the prohibition of marriage between brothers and sisters arises from an instinctive sexual aversion created by living intimately together. Crawley cites in this respect the argument of Letourneau of Ellis (see "Exogamy and the Slating of Courtship," Anthropological Review, 1897).

2) The above-mentioned principle created in the persons of the daughters of the brother a permanent pool of women for each man, but this measure was inadequate for the satisfaction of the sexual desire for which it was created; corresponding norms of distribution were necessary in order to guarantee peace between the possessors of the women. It is a fact of all clear that the norms of distribution could not be exclusively individual or exclusively communal. Communal distribution, in the sense of the sharing of women, already discussed, a purely individual arrangement was not always possible because of the inevitable transitoriness and distribution of men and women, especially within the limited sphere of a few families. The norms to be worked out, therefore, had to be of such a nature that they could give satisfaction in the face of any combination. -

The individual wives of distribution, of course, would be the most satisfactory, but it requires an equal distribution of the sexes, which is not always possible, especially within the limited sphere of a few families. It also requires a distribution under such conditions had to be a compromise between the communal and individual mode, in order to satisfy any combination of the distribution of the sexes.

/154 cont./

Thus there was created that type of individual group marriage which we see among the Gilyak, and among all primitive peoples, and which is the basic type of marriage relations which they have in common with the Gilyak. This type of individual group marriage was developed under the influence of the various combinations in the distribution of the /155/ sexes among the descendants of brother and sister. In order to be convinced of this fact, it is enough to consider several such combinations.

1. The simplest case is that of one brother and one sister. Moreover, the brother has as many daughters as the sister has sons. Then of course, individual distribution is entirely possible, if, between men and women, simultaneously reached the marriageable age. But a la longue /in the long run/ such a combination is almost impossible. Sooner or later the descendants of the sister and the descendants of the brother separate into several families, and in such an environment only as an exception can there be cases when the number of men of marriageable age in one group of descendants is greater than the number of women of the same age in another group of descendants.

2. Let us take another instance: one brother and one sister, but at the given moment the brother has only one daughter, while the sister has several sons. Then communal sharing, as it is described among many peoples and appears to typically in all the descriptions of the Tibetans, become inevitable. This is the situation among the Gilyak among epos in such expressions as this, "two (or more) brothers supported one wife," a situation which, as we have indicated, is often encountered in reality even today. The most customary mode of using wives is the same as in group marriage -- each brother enjoys the conjugal rights with the sister of the other: "in Tiber, where the brothers very often have only one common wife, it is rare for more than one brother to be in the house at one time" (Sg. Afong the group tights to the wives of his elder brothers, who in their time enjoyed his wives. In the majority of cases, therefore, the wives of the younger brothers are the wives of the wives of the elder brothers.

/156 cont./

3. That is, we have taken the simplest combination -- one brother and one sister. Where there are several brothers and several sisters, the consequences will be similar, but will assume a more complex form. If there were always the same number of sisters and brothers, and if each brother had sisters born in succession, and if each sister made offspring, then each pair of brothers and sisters could form a closed marriage group, but actually such cases can only be rare exceptions. Usually, the sons of the eldest brother of brothers and sisters is not equal, and an even distribution of the sexes is not possible. Let us take some examples. Let us take several examples. Several brothers have one sister; the brothers have several daughters, the sister several sons. The sons, of course, will be the husbands of the daughters of the brothers. Thus, the sons of the sister will be the husbands of the daughters of the sexes is such that there are not enough own sisters for the own brothers, where, where the group union will be composed not only of own brothers and sisters, but also of the female fair cousin as well.

Finally, women did not always have brothers, and the latter did not always have daughters, and then, naturally, it was necessary /157/ for resort to the adoption of first and second cousins. In a word, into a marriage group of the offspring of a brother and sister are inevitably drawn, on the one hand, all the cousins, brought up to the most distant degrees, and, on the other -- the collateral sisters, and thus there is multiplied the number of marriageable women and brothers, on the one hand, and own and collateral sisters on the other -- the typical paralus family in its purest form.

/156 cont./

Gilyak this is not required in cases of communal possession; the brothers, of course, have the right to share the wives given to another. As for the children, either they are not distinguished at all accepting to father, or, as in the case of Gilyak, they consider the children born to the marriage of the eldest brother, the second of the next brother, etc.

3. The same situation is a non-fatant: the first brother has reached marriageable age before the second. The elder brother takes the only daughter of the sister of his and sister born in succession, and, if each brother made offspring, then each pair of brothers and sisters could form a closed marriage group, but actually such cases can only be rare exceptions. Usually, the sons of the eldest brother of brothers and sisters is not equal, and an even distribution of the sexes is not possible. Let us take some examples. Several brothers have one sister; the brothers have several daughters, the sister several sons. The sons, of course, will be the husbands of the daughters of the brothers. Thus, the sons of the sister will be the husbands of the daughters of the sexes is such that there are not enough own sisters for the own brothers, where, where the group union will be composed not only of own brothers and sisters, but also of the female fair cousin as well.

Finally, women did not always have brothers, and the latter did not always have daughters, and then, naturally, it was necessary /157/ for resort to the adoption of first and second cousins. In a word, into a marriage group of the offspring of a brother and sister are inevitably drawn, on the one hand, all the cousins, brought up to the most distant degrees, and, on the other -- the collateral sisters, and thus there is multiplied the number of marriageable women and brothers, on the one hand, and own and collateral sisters on the other -- the typical paralus family in its purest form.

/155 cont./

As we have seen, the Gilyak were also furnished with wives by marriage, just like the Aino, furnished them with chiefs. Some influence was also exerted by Japanese in the marriage relations of the women of the neighboring peoples. The Amur Gilyak often went into Aino territory for years on hunting expeditions or for purposes of trade and frequently brought Aino women back to their homeland. Conversely, representatives of the Tungus people also roamed among the Gilyak and entered into marriage relations with them or carried off their women. And all this these cases might be isolated, nevertheless they could not be without influence.

A quite specific influence in the economic sphere has been exerted by Japanese colonization. Nevertheless, the encounters with the Chinese and the Russians there was stimulus for the accumulation of riches. Until then there was no such stimulus for accumulation. The Gilyak, unlike them, and the highest ambition of a more capable or successful man was to have many wives with them. Trade with the Chinese created the stimulus for accumulation. The appeared new valuables which it was impossible to conceal from the wives, and the husband had to accumulate and accumulate. There appeared rich men, fortunate possessors of valuables, and men who did not have the means to purchase them. In rich men there was born a consciousness of their wealth and their importance, and together with it the ambition to become related to their equals. Formerly poor people there arose the temptation to make the marriage of their daughters a source of the accumulation of valuables. The old form of the obligatory marriage, where the daughter was given without a bride price, became superfluous, and the marriage of the daughter of the rich man was sold to the old imperative. Finally, the phenomenon of the conversion of the marriage transformed the structure of individual marriage. The custom of brothers' family together with

ONTINUED
FROM PRECEDING
FICHE

177 /270 cont./
178 in one's own we 556 possession of sev 582 and so forth. T 584 differentiation.
[565] become related choice of a wife of a wife that s consequently, o in the ancient " matrimonial dea 178 equal." On the 556 a special fastidi 58 women who were 614 were outstanding their artistry in marriage came clans, the forme There appeared which introduce of purchase-sale alien clans dem cedures of betro
The terms of be 192 pressed by vario 584 come to an agre maker -- "the "future wife";
for groom and b orthodox marria bride, for accor pu -- husband, [174] which is used no inadmissible wi with orthodox m intercourse. Th of betrothal aros orthodox m alth, although it only amounted to the eral pieces of silk material, Japanese sabers, here appeared on the scene a tendency toward The rich man desired to associate with and to only rich people. In the question of the there appeared new dictates. One demanded he be from a family of equal wealth and, f an equally high social rank. And now, even ylgund" -- legends -- there is heard in lings the expression: "He (or she) is not my other hand, wealth allowed one to manifest ousness in the choice of a wife, to seek e famous for their special qualities, who for their beauty, their domestic talents, sewing, and other feminine tasks. But once to be practiced between members of alien er simplicity of concluding marriage vanished.

on the scene the new institution of bride price, d into the institution of marriage the element
; besides this, marriage between persons of anded preliminary negotiations and the prothal. We now turn to these institutions. rothal. The procedure of betrothal is exis terms, denoting literally, "to agree, to ement about the bride"; hence, the match-han who makes an agreement", bride -- room -- "future husband." For us, the terms ide are particularly interesting. With e there is no special term for groom and ing to the right of birth the groom is called nd the bride -- an'g:ej. The term jokh, wadays to designate the bride, is entirely n orthodox marriage, for, as we have seen, arriage jokh is a term of prohibition for sexual s, the term itself shows that the procedure e after the weakening of the regime of arriage.

/302/

595 ●58 A person can take two sisters as wives. Brothers may take widows without distinction. It is best of all to take a wife from the clan of one's mother, and then one can even get her for nothing, and even if a payment is required, it is less in any case. In the past one did not pay for a woman if she was from the clan of one's mother. It is not permitted to exchange women between clans. Here, too, one's daughter is given for sale to the wife's brother, but the latter cannot demand this.

582 There is a prohibition against the descendants of one's sister down to the fourth generation.

614 173 In Vaydy (see above) there are Gilyak of the Hirulung clan who have entered into a union k:khal n'akh:r: with the Khydzyr' in Chil'bi. Formerly, they lived together in the same locality and belonged to the clan of the tiger. There is a Gilyak clan which has become related to a snake (there are snakes on the Amgun; they were seen on the Amgun by Putyun) (1). There are also Goldi who are kin to snakes.

[114]

1. In the text, "boa," but, judging by note 6 on page 222 in Materialy po izucheniiu giliatskogo iazyka i fol'klora /Materials on the Study of the Gilyak Language and Folklore/, this is a mistake in the notes on the journey.

538 839 A young man from Vaydy fell in love with the wife of a Korean, a Gilyak woman, and enjoyed reciprocity. She went to the town with a fish; the Korean stayed to guard the potatoes. Then the lover went to the town. They met and spent two weeks in the town. She came home -- her mother also liked the Gilyak.

The Korean demanded that his wife sleep with him, but she resisted. At night the Gilyak woman ran outside and slept with the Gilyak. The husband gave her a beating; her mother and brothers tried to protect her; the Korean complained, why did he take a Gilyak woman. He killed the Korean (settlement of Mago).

/268 cont./

85 In another poem, in response to the demand of the bride-38 groom, the father-in-law makes only one condition: "You will not go back before tomorrow!" He then orders his slaves to prepare a bite for the couple and, turning to his daughter, says: "Eat together with your husband!" That woman ate with our Gilyak. Having eaten, they went out, urinated, entered, arranged the bedding and lay themselves down under the same blanket, and went to sleep. On the following day that old man said: "You shall set out in five large boats loaded to the top with nothing but valuables" (1) /see footnote 1 above/.

38 Another example. The hero of a poem arrived in a 84 town with many people, and, when he went into the center 85 yurt, a woman was alone there. This woman said: "O, guest, from where have you come?" Our Gilyak said: "I have come to take you!" This woman said: "If you wish to take me, go to my father, talk it over!" Our Gilyak went out, went into a yurt; an old man, an old woman were there. This old woman said: "You are a man from where?" Our Gilyak said: "I have come to take your daughter!" That old man rose: "Well then, prepare mos' feed my son-in-law." Our Gilyak left, he came to his wife: "Your father said that we both, having come as guests in the evening, are to eat mos'." His wife: "All right!" That evening they went visiting, having eaten mos' they left; having had a good sleep, they arose, ate, and then went back (i.e., with her husband to his village). /Footnotes 2 and 3 at the bottom of the original text p. 268, referring to Shternberg's Materialy, p. 84 and pp. 57, 58, respectively are not indicated in the text./

582 Orthodox forms at the present time. Now, as we see, firmly 581 seated in every Gilyak there is the consciousness that only an orthodox marriage, i.e., marriage from the clan of akhmalk'i, from the clan of the mother, is lawful, "pure."

84 Even on the Amur, where the old norms have especially 78 undergone change, to the question about the marriage norms they will say to you first of all: "It is necessary to take a wife from the fathers-in-law -- the root of one's birth" (i.e.,

/268 cont./

582 origin from a common mother). The favored and most frequent form of such an orthodox marriage is a marriage between the son of a brother and the daughter of a sister /sic/.

584 Such marriages are concluded in childhood. Negotiations 585 take place /269/ between the mothers soon after the birth of the children, but after the agreement a public ceremony is organized, in which, besides the fathers, the grandfathers of the children who are being married take part. The father of the groom brings a male dog, and the mother spins two threads out of the fur of this dog and a nettle; with one she binds the hand of the little girl, while with the other the father of the groom ties the son's little hand (1). All this is performed in the presence of the elder members of the clan, and the marriage is considered inviolable.

[171] 1. It is curious that among the Haida the ceremony of concluding the marriage of infants, which among them is expressed by the giving of a blanket instead of a dog, bears the technical designation, "nakladyvanie perevyazki" (Engl. "putting the string on"). Evidently this ceremony, as among the Gilyak, was formerly carried out by means of a binding up with string or thread, just as is done in such cases up to the present day among the Tamil in India.

● [581] The idea of the orthodox marriage up to the present 584 is thought of not merely as being desirable, but as a right and obligation. When a marriage from the akhmalk clan is 582 arranged on Sakhalin (although that clan may have only recently attained such a position by virtue of the fact that some kinsman took his wife from that clan), negotiations are usually begun with words like this: "You are my akhmalk, let

/369 cont./

797 baptism exclusively for the purpose of obtaining a certificate of legal marriage to such and such a Gilyak woman, certificates which give the right and opportunity to secure governmental assistance for the return of the wife in case of her abduction. I have, moreover, met a great number of baptized Gilyak from the mainland, and from my conversations with them I have been convinced that they do not have the slightest idea of even the ritual side of Christianity, let alone its substance. Nevertheless, the Gilyak is capable of grasping the idea of the one God with His attributes as taught by the Christian religion. I could say a great many things about the methods used on the Amur to convert the natives to Christianity, but this /370/ is not the appropriate place for it. As for the Sakhalin Gilyak, an especially talented missionary could perhaps make some progress; many generations will have to pass, however, before the Gilyak breaks his ties with the gods which provide him with fish, seals, and sable. The baptized [171] Goldi and the Amur Gilyak are now pronounced skeptics in their [171] attitude toward religion in general, but they continue to make [178] sacrificial offerings as before. It must further be added that the Sakhalin Gilyak have no idols.

IV.

Juridical Life

● 581 Marriage. Despite all the remains and remnants of the old order of life of which I have spoken, the modern marriage of the Gilyak, from a juridical point of view, has a completely individualistic form. One cannot call it, in the strict sense of the word, either monogamy or polygamy, but one cannot call it communal, either.

581 In the eyes of the world every married woman is the wife of 684 a given individual, and her children are the children of that individual. Violations of fidelity on the part of the wife bring 684 bloody retribution from the husband. The Gilyak who catches his wife in flagrante delicto with a stranger kills the seducer and beats

/638 cont./

834 The moral austerity of the Gilyak also appears in the 577 altogether decent behavior of the two sexes toward each other and in the modesty of their women and girls. One living with them in their houses never sees indecent physical exposure, such as occurs so frequently among the Ainu (2), or any other

[113] 2. N. Busse, Ostr. Sakhalin" i Eksped. 1853-54 gg. /Sakhalin Island and the Expedition of 1853-54/, St. Petersb., 1872, pp. 55, 56, 70.

597 shocking scenes. Violations of chastity, particularly among 836 unmarried persons, are, of course, not impossible, but are 848 most severely censured by the parents of the girl who has 849 been seduced and has given birth to a child. According to the Gilyak, in such a case the girl's mother metes out corporal punishment to her daughter, while the father tries to eliminate the scandal by killing the newborn child and [562] secretly doing away with it. This is always done if the child is a girl, whereas a boy is shown mercy in certain circumstances, and the girl's chances suffer less in this case.

839 Although contracted by purchase, and in part because 593 of this, as is clear from what has been said, the marriages ● [581] of the Gilyak usually take a happy or at least a satisfactory course. Marital fidelity is strictly observed. The husband jealously guards the fidelity of his wife, especially while she is young, and the latter is on her guard against giving her husband cause for mistrust and suspicion and arousing his 586 anger. One very salutary influence checking and curbing the passions on both sides is the circumstance that the husband, if he casts out his wife for any reason and returns her to her parents does not by any means thereby gain any right to a refund of the articles paid for her, and that, on the other hand, he may claim such a refund if the wife leaves him on her own accord. In this case she may by no means count on a friendly reception by her parents. Therefore, simply for

582

582 REGULATION OF MARRIAGE--minimum and average age at marriage for each sex; postponement of marriage (e.g., for economic reasons, to enable an elder sibling to marry first); marriage laws and regulations; physical and mental bars to marriage; endogamous and exogamous restrictions; primary marriage preference and practice (e.g., with a cross-cousin, hypergamy); explanations and rationalizations of marriage restrictions; tests of marriageability (e.g., of skill, prowess, fertility); etc. See also:

Marriages between members of different social strata 56 Kin group exogamy 61 Preferred secondary marriages 587 Polygamous marriages 595
Local exogamy and endogamy 621
Sex and marital offenses 684 Incest taboos and privileged sex relationships 835 Premarital sexuality 836 Puberty ordeals 881
Definition of majority 884

/xxviii cont./

*114 582 595 The question of cousin marriage is developed particularly assiduously in these works. In this respect, Shternberg enriched the history of marriage with valuable material, very shrewdly analyzed by him. When Shternberg tries to extract cousin marriage from group marriage, however, he contradicts /xxix/ himself and takes an anti-Morgan and at the same time anti-Engels position. To accept the proposition that cousin marriage preceded group marriage logically leads to the conclusion that individual marriage preceded cousin marriage. The reasoning of Shternberg on the causes for the transition from marriage between sisters and brothers to cousin marriage is just as completely idealistic.

Shternberg revealed the clan character of the group marriage of the Gilyak with great thoroughness and, in addition, established the principles of the third- and fourth-clan phratry. Indisputably, the conclusions of Shternberg about the precedence of cross-cousin marriage to unilateral-cousin marriage are correct.

*114 602 595 Shternberg's discovery among the Gilyak of the institution of izbeganiya (avoidance), according to which people not having mutual sexual rights must avoid mutual glances, conversations, and so forth, also has extremely great importance for confirming [174] the existence of group marriage. He considers the survival of this institution among peoples who have already emerged from the stage of group marriage as extra proof of its previous existence.

*114 614 Further, the works of Shternberg give a vivid picture of the clan way of life of the Gilyak and of the basic norms of their common law. By the way, in speaking of the clan, one must stress the correctness of Shternberg's criticism of Kunov, who, in spite of Engels, rejected the existence of a clan structure among the Australians.

*114 614 556 Shternberg considers in some detail the khlai-ni-vukhakh and quite correctly explains that they are recruited from the yzi (wealthy men), but we wait in vain for an answer from him on the question of the reasons for the degeneration of the clan and the appearance of the yzi. At the same time it must be said that the fact of the existence of the wealthy men among contemporary, so-called primitive peoples, and especially their social role, has been treated with silence in ethnographic literature, and Shternberg was one of the few non-Marxist ethnographers who paid attention

/31 cont./

601 171 174 [595] [835] periods in the evolution of marriage, and, although they could have influenced one another, they basically belong, speaking in the language of geology, to different formations. It is sufficient to say that among the Tungus tribes sexual intercourse with wives of individuals of ascending generations is allowed, for example, with the wife of the father's younger brother, while among the Gilyak this is regarded as incest.

595 581 [583] At first sight the Gilyak institution of marriage does not seem to be anything special. A Gilyak will generally buy one or rarely two or three wives, who come over into his clan and are regarded before the world as his personal wives and the mothers of [851] [611] [551] [684] [614] [582] his children. The children belong exclusively to the father and succeed him after his death. When a Gilyak becomes a father, he is no longer called by his former name, but is called the father of the born child. The exclusive possession of his wives expresses itself in the stern custom of blood vengeance against the disturber of marital harmony. The clan is based on the principle of agnation, and marriage is exogamous.

593 601 [592] [352] One can travel over the entire territory of the Gilyak, live in their yurts, and observe their family life for a long time, and not notice anything peculiar in the structure of their family. In large winter yurts the inhabitants occupy their plank beds by families, each living in relation to its own particular interests. Complete harmony and tender relations prevail among husband, wife, and their children. That is not all. One may frequently [765] encounter instances of striking loyalty and love between spouses. When one of them dies, the other frequently lays hands on himself or dies from grief. In a word, to all appearances we are dealing with the type of family which is generally called patriarchal. Actually, however, it is not. First of all, one is struck by the strange kinship nomenclature. A whole group of women call a whole group of men their husbands (pu, ivn), and the latter call them their wives (an'gej). Likewise, a whole group of men call a group of women their mothers (ymk) and a group of men their fathers (ytk), and these call the former their children.

/36 cont./

because of the vicissitudes of the clan life of the Gilyak, their migrations, depopulations, immigrations, and other such reasons, naturally in the course of time had to become complicated and lose its former simplicity.

A key to the discovery of this original type is the same kinship nomenclature, which, without doubt, is a living reflection of the sexual norms which were discarded or are being discarded.

First of all, it is clear that the kinship nomenclature according to which I, a man, call the sisters of my father-in-law mother (ymk), while my father calls them his wives, at the same time that my wife and the wives of my brothers, both own and agnate, call one another sister, can develop only under circumstances in which all my clansmen take their wives exclusively from one common clan, and furthermore in such a way that each generation of brothers of all degrees of kinship takes for wives a corresponding generation of women-sisters of all degrees of kinship. Then, in fact, the sisters of my father-in-law will be the wives of my father and of his brothers, and consequently, my mothers, while my wife and the wives of my brothers will be sisters to one another. Under such a system, marriages between persons of ascending and descending generations (uncles and nieces) are impossible.

But which clan is the one from which all my clansmen must necessarily take their wives? This is eloquently answered by that detail of the kinship nomenclature by which I and my clansmen of my generation, i.e., my brothers and cousins in the male line, call from birth our mothers' brothers' daughters our wives, and conversely, they call us their husbands. It is clear from this that the clan from which my mother came, i.e., the clan of her father and of her brothers, is that clan from which I and my clansmen (the mothers of the clansmen of my generation are the sisters of my mother) must necessarily and exclusively take our wives, and furthermore, as I have already said, from corresponding generations. If my father and his brothers took for their wives a group of sisters from a certain clan, then I and my brothers must marry the daughters of the brothers of this group of sisters from the same clan. But to exchange women, i.e., giving women to that clan from which my /37/ clan takes wives, is prohibited: all the women of my clan must, in turn, go to a third clan, whose ar sisters of the male ancestors of my clan. In the kins this limitation is clearly expressed in the fact that I daughter of the sister of my father wife (an'gej), bu navkh, and she calls me, not husband (pu, ivn), but Such was the type of the primitive structure of the f reconstructed a priori from the kinship nomenclature however, arrive at my conclusions a priori.

/37 cont./

In spite of all the unfavorable conditions indic which relaxed the exclusiveness of marriage within clan, the old principle continues to be dominant up day. Upon first acquaintance with the way of life o not yet knowing their kinship nomenclature in detai pressed by the persistent tendency of each clan to ta predominantly from one particular clan, namely, fr one's mother. P'fand'ukh umgu genedzh urdzhra -- take your wives there from whence you came, i.e., of your mother" (1); thus the Gilyak taught me their [192]

1. The etymology of the word p'fand'ul is interesting; it is composed of pi (one own, yours), pandf (kinsmen of the mot and ukh (from). The word pandf is fro pandynd -- "to be born."

[835]

wisdom. Although now it is permitted to take wive clan of one's mother, the terminology has imprinte prohibition on this group of women: brides not from mother bear the name yokh, i.e., a woman with w intercourse is prohibited (thus, for example, elder b whom sexual intercourse with the wives of the young prohibited, call the latter yokh), while a bride from clan is called an'gej (wife, any woman with whom course is permitted). Indeed, the favorite form of the Gilyak even now is marriage to a daughter of a (preferably) or agnate, of the mother, but in any ca
"brother" of the latter. On the other hand, marriag

/37 cont./

582 601 daughter of the father's sister is not permitted. In the predilection shown by the Gilyak for such a marriage, the almost religious-reverential attitude toward a custom which at one time was indubitably a universally binding, religio-social requirement is

582 584 perceptible. Every woman, as soon as she bears a son, approaches her brother, if he has a daughter, with a request for the engagement of their children. The ceremony of engagement consists in the binding of the arm of the bride with a piece of dog hair by the child-groom or by his father (a symbol of being carried away on dogs and also an echo of the totem /38/ cult of the dog). When the bride reaches five or six years of age, often even earlier, she goes to the home of the groom, with whom she grows up and is educated until she enters the period of maturity, when, without any ritual,

582 614 she in fact becomes his wife. The degree to which the principle of compulsory marriage exclusively with women from the clan of one's mother is still strong may be seen from the fact that, if even one clansman of the clan, let us say, A, took his wife from the completely alien clan, D, that is quite sufficient for all the women of the first clan to become forbidden to clan D, because the fact, even though unique, of the moving of women from clan D into A makes the first (D) the clan of the mother, into which the marriage of women from clan A is forbidden. In this case, how-

[125] [601] ever, "numbers" may testify most eloquently. During the census that I made specifically for the study of the structure of the Gilyak family and clan, I was impressed from the very first days by the abundance of married (i.e., other-clan) women in each clan who called each other "sister" and "aunt," and not only in name, but who had actually been taken from one clan, namely, from that one from which the given clan had taken its women (the clan "of the mother") from ancient times.

582 178 If this regulation of marriage survives to such an extent even now, in spite of the obstacles mentioned by us that lay in its way, then without doubt it was originally universally accepted, and even if all traces of it had disappeared in the contemporary customs, sufficient proof of its existence remains in the kinship terminology preserved up to the present in all its originality and recreating with extraordinary objectivity the old regime which gave rise to it.

/38 cont./

It is not difficult to understand even the raison d'être of this institution which at first glance is strange and confusing.

Such a binding regulation of marriage conformed as much as possible to both the basic principles of the clan and the individual feelings of the separate heads of families. The clan, at its base, rests on the principle of blood unity. In an agnatic clan this unity will most ideally be attained if all the wives of the agnates are taken from one clan close in blood and, of course, from the clan of their ancestress. This not only satisfies the formal principle of the unity of blood, but confirms the unity of the cult of the ancestors in both lines, so important in the eyes of primitive man.

If we now turn our attention to the psychology of the individual members of the clan, it /39/ fully coincides with the clan, where the sons, in accordance with the general rule, remain within the clan and take their wives from outside, it is natural that every mother prefers to have as a wife for her son a woman very close to her by blood and furthermore to assemble within her family women from that clan from which she herself comes. She cannot, however, marry her son to the daughter of her sister, for her sister is either a wife of her husband or of his brothers, and consequently the daughter of the latter is either an own sister or an agnate of her son; all that remains is to marry him to a daughter of her brother, as has become established in reality. For the entire aggregate of the women of a clan it is of tremendous interest that they are all of a common origin and feel behind them the solid protection of the whole clan from which they come.

Such a marriage (of a son to the daughter of his mother's brother is equally in the interests of the father, who thus marries his son to a kinswoman (praplemyanitsa) of his mother. Since the sister of the husband also desires, in turn, to marry her sons to the daughters of her brother, a mother cannot marry her daughters to the sons of her brother, and, thus, an exchange marriage, i.e., an exchange of women, between two such families was impossible, just like a marriage within a family.

/39 cont./

582 614

So far we have considered, as it were, the statics of the question; now let us turn to its dynamics. Let us see how from some very simple beginning, with inevitable necessity, as a mighty tree develops from a single seed, the controversial, confusing fabric of the Gilyak marriage and clan grew up.

The essence of the entire complex system of regulation of Gilyak marriage and the clan, and furthermore the key to understanding it, is a unique fact, namely, the principle established in its day that men must marry the daughters of their mother's brother, in other words, the daughters in each family belong from birth to the sons of their father's sister. We have already said something about the motives that could have given rise to this principle. In any case, its universal incumbency was guaranteed, no doubt, as the categorical imperative of the primitive religion.

This simple rule leads logically to the following:

1) Once every mother has the right to take for her sons the daughters of her brother, her daughters by the same right absolutely must enter the family of her husband's sister, in other words, /40/ every woman belongs to her first cousins, the sons of her father's sister. Therefore, a woman cannot marry the sons of her mother's brother, and a man cannot marry the daughters of a sister of his father: they cannot exchange the women of the family of a brother and of a sister. It is clear that this prohibition does not have anything to do with a fear of marriages within close degrees of kinship, because the daughter of the sister of my father is related to me in the same degree of kinship as the daughter of the brother of my mother, whereas marriage is prohibited with the first and obligatory with the second, a fact that is extremely important for the genesis of prohibitions within close degrees of kinship.

582 614 595

2) Once marriages between the daughters of a brother and the sons of a sister are obligatory, once the former necessarily belong to the latter, certain situations naturally arise in view of the normal quantitative inequality between persons of different sexes, in view of such possibilities, for example, as that a brother has one daughter while his sister has several sons, or, conversely, the brother has several

/40 cont./

582 595 614

daughters while his sister has only one or two sons, or that a long interval of time elapses between the birth of the first son the ones that follow, or that, which even further complicates the question, several sisters have but one brother or one sister several brothers: in the first case several brothers have a com mon wife; in the second, either one possesses several sisters, two brothers live in common marriage with a group of sisters; in the third case, the younger brother, who reaches puberty when the elder brother has managed to take all his cousins, must of necessity have marital rights to the wives of his elder brothers; finally, in the last two cases, either several first cousins will have as common wives the daughters of the broth of their mothers, or several brothers will have as common wiv several of their first cousins. We have given only the simples cases; in reality, the matter is, of course, much more compl cated. Thus, in one way or another, there absolutely inevita arises a group marriage of brothers (own and further) with a gr of sisters (own and further), and in any case the unconditional reciprocal conjugal rights of brothers of all degrees of kinship Of course, these group rights consequently embraced more an more people of more distant degrees of kinship, for a mother not always have brothers, or the latter daughters, and it was inevitably necessary to take wives from among the /41/ first, second, etc. cousins of the mother, and hence the union of people united by the common rights of a group marriage grew.

No vicissitudes of tribal life destroyed this group principl even up to the present time. When in the course of time, as result of depopulations, the dispersion of kindred families, wa and other such reasons, there arose the necessity of resorting t marriages from alien families, these customs, inconvenient i themselves, led to the situation that we see at the present tim that a man is the officially recognized husband of one or seve women and is required to share this right either with all his brothers (in some clans) or (in others) only with the younger ones, and, moreover, not only with his own, but with all the agnate brothers as well.

/41 cont./

582 614 3) Since in every family sons must marry daughters of a brother of their mother, and daughters -- sons of a sister of their father, it follows that from the time of the establishment of this custom all the descending posterity of each pair of ancestors in all lines eo ipso form a closed group, prohibited from one another maritally, an exogamous organism, a clan, and, depending on whether the men go into the clan of the wife or remain in their own, either a maternal or paternal clan prevails.

At the present time, among the Gilyak a paternal, agnatic clan has been established.

4) Such a clan rests not only on the negative tie of exogamy, but also on valuable positive bonds, on the common rights of clansmen to the women of the blood clan of their ancestress, the mutual rights of group marriage, and, finally, on the obligation to save their women for the clan that took the sisters of their ancestor.

If we take into consideration the fact that marriage regulations among primitive peoples, among whom the cult of the ancestors and, consequently, blood ties play such a tremendous role, become religious imperatives, it will become clear that the clearly indicated mutual rights and obligations cement the clan union.

In particular, the important cementing element of a clan is also the fact that all the women coming in (wives of clansmen) are taken from one clan and are either one another's sisters (own and agnate), or aunts and nieces. As for men, the clansmen, they represent in each generation a group of brothers (own and agnate) married to a group of sisters and cousins from the clan of their mothers, i.e., to their first cousins, /42/ in relation to whom they have reciprocal conjugal rights.

We have already spoken about the effects that these customs have on the kinship nomenclature.

614 615 5) The clan, therefore, is not a self-contained organism. The existence of each clan is organically bound up with the existence of at least two clans, blood kindred with it, one the blood clan of its ancestress, from which it takes its wives, and another clan which took the sisters of its ancestor and to which it must give up its own women.

/41 cont./

615 614 The first of the latter two clans in relation to the third bears the name akhmal'k (father-in-law), the second navkh or ymri (son-in-law /zyat', "son-in-law, brother-in-law"/). All three are pandf (cognates) to one another. Thus, every Gilyak is an organic member not only of his own, but of a tri-partite, blood, tri-clan union, forming, in the literal sense of the word, a phratry (1) (phratry -- brotherhood). In this triple "brotherhood"

[582] [614] 1. The Gilyak phratry has nothing in common with the one of Morgan, for within it mutual marriages are not only allowed, but were obligatory.

all the men and women of each generation are actually brothers and sisters (cognate male cousins and female cousins, see below).

Specifically, in relation to each member of a given clan each woman of the second clan is either his mother, his wife or the wife of his sons and agnatic nephews, and conversely, in the third clan, every woman is either his sister, daughter, or a sister of his father. Such are the blood ties of the members of a phratry!

One can get an idea of the form of the Gilyak three-clan phratry from the following schematic table:

Clan A (Andreev)	Clan V (Vasil'ev)	Clan S (Stepanov)
Andrei + Varvara (sister of Vasilii from clan V).	Vasilii + Sof'ia (sister of Stepan from clan S).	Stepan + Anna (sister of Andrei from clan A).
Their children:	Their children:	Their children:
1. The sons marry the daughters of the mother's brother, Vasilii, from clan V.	1. The sons marry the daughters of the mother's brother, Stepan, from clan S.	1. The sons marry the daughters of the mother's brother, Andrei, from clan A.
2. The daughters marry the sons of the father's sister, Anna, from clan S.	2. The daughters marry the sons of the father's sister, Varvara, from clan A.	2. The daughters marry the sons of the father's sister, Sof'ia, from clan V.

/44 cont./

614 615 578 mother, but it is natural that practically it was inconvenient to extend the prohibitions to the akhmal'ki of all degrees of kinship, and it was rarely necessary to go beyond the akhmal'k of the second degree, to which the prohibition was limited. But with the appearance of this prohibition, the tri-clan phratry ceased to satisfy the new conditions of the regulation. Exclusive marriage within three clans became impossible, because in a tri-clan phratry (see the table) clan S is the akhmal'k of the first degree for V and of the second degree for A; consequently, the women of clan A cannot marry into clan S. It was necessary to add to the phratry a fourth clan, D (Dmitri, Dar'ya), let us say. The changes that occurred in our phratry consisted in the fact that Stepan's wife (clan S) would now be Dmitri's (clan D) sister, while the latter would have as his wife a sister of Andrei (clan A). Since in more distant times, the prohibitions undoubtedly spread to the akhmal'ki of more distant degrees, the phratries naturally /45/ had to consist of an ever greater number of clans. At the present time, when, due to the reasons mentioned above, it is necessary in the selection of wives to resort to completely alien clans, the phratry has naturally lost its former, strictly closed position.

It is not hard to imagine how much genealogical information one must have with regard to this complicated, confused system, in order to correctly decide, in each given case, on the right to marry of some member of a clan. And, actually, this constitutes a whole science, to which a Gilyak dedicates himself from his earliest childhood.

IV.

Some Conclusions from the Norms of Gilyak Marriage

171 601 582

I have already said that Gilyak kinship nomenclature and their norms of marriage in general do not represent an isolated case. An analogous nomenclature and analogous phenomena of group marriage are found among a mass of primitive peoples in the most remote parts of the world. But the details that I

/45 cont./

174 582 601 But the details that I have attempted to clarify here and the history of the development of the institution which I sketched are capable, I think, of shedding light on certain phenomena of primitive marriage which heretofore have been completely isolated and separate.

171 174 582 601 614 1) First of all, the clan organization of the Gilyak makes completely clear to us why among many peoples, as, for example, among the Batak on Sumatra, a wife or a mistress is called "a son of the father's sister" -- ibibere-ri-datang; or among the Gond (Gondy) of the province of Satpûras in central India where a marriage between male cousins and female cousins is almost compulsory when the brother has a daughter and the sister a son. These separate facts remained unexplained up to now and are, therefore, perhaps fragments of a once common clan organization similar to the one that I found among the Gilyak (1).

[114] 1. It is remarkable that up to the present time some scientists are skeptical of even the actual fact of the discovery of marriage norms identical with those of the Gilyak. Thus, quite recently it was discovered that among the Hottentot marriage is permitted between a man and the daughter of his mother's brother and, conversely is forbidden between a woman and a son of her mother's brother (exactly as among the Gilyak), while Kohler, presenting this fact, and the author of the article on Kohler's work in Année Sociologique both doubt the possibility of such norms, even though they were known to McLennan. See J. Kohler, [113] "Das Recht der Hottentots," in Zeitschrift f. vergleich. Rechtswissenschaft, Vol. XVI, No. 3, pp. 341-342, and L'Année Sociologique, 11th year, p. 306.

/46/

171 582 [835] 2) The norms of Gilyak marriage explain to us further th strange institution among the Dieri tribe in Australia, where great council of the tribe, at appointed periods solemnly declares which men and women of the tribe have the right to group cohabitation.

From what we have said above about the intricacy and d ficulty of determining the genealogical rights in matrimonia questions among the Gilyak, questions which for primitive m have an extremely serious religious significance, it is clear there would gradually have to develop a rule whereby the de cisions on these questions ceased to be a matter for the indiv ual person and became the function of a competent institutio of elders and specialists on genealogy and marriage law.

3) The Gilyak system of marriage explains to us why am many Australian tribes the women in each clan belong to a s totem. In fact, as among the Gilyak, all the women comin [614] in must be taken from a single clan, i.e., they are of a sing totem.

4) This same system explains to us why, mutatis mutand every kumi and kroki among the Australians finds his wife th out the territory of the distribution of his tribe; in reality he her only in that clan from which his clan must take its wives in which every woman of the corresponding generation is his

5) It explains to us the strange class system among many Australian peoples, for example, among the Kamilaroi, whe ascending and descending generations belong to different cla and only in the third, among some -- in the fourth, or even the fifth -- sixth generation, do they return to the class of th fathers.

The Gilyak norms, in spite of all the difference in detai from those among the Australians, satisfactorily explain this strange phenomenon.

615 614 582 Let us recall again the tri-clan phratry and for clarity ca clan A -- Andreev, clan V -- Vasil'ev, and clan S -- Stepa Consistent with the Gilyak norms, Varvara's daughter from clan A is from birth considered the wife of one of the Stepan (of clan S), and, consequently, her sobriquet will be not And

/46 cont./

615 614 582 but Stepanova; her daughter (a granddaughter of Varvara's), in turn, from birth, as the wife of one of the Vasil'evs (of clan V) would be called Vasil'eva, but, the daughter of this last, i.e., Varvara's great-granddaughter, would have to be the wife of one of the Andreevs (of clan A) /47/ and thus, in the third generation, she would again bear the class sobriquet of her great-grandmother.

582 [601] 6) As we have seen, Gilyak marriage to a considerable extent simplifies our understanding of the complicated kinship nomenclature, for in the Gilyak system of marriage many categories of the Turanian system of kinship, which at first sight appear completely independent, are in fact identical, such as, for example, wives of brothers, sisters of the wife, and sisters of the wives of brothers turn out to be the same persons, just like mothers, wives of the father's brothers, sisters of the father-in-law, sisters of the mother, etc.

But these are all facts of a secondary character. It seems to me that the scheme of Gilyak marriage can shed light on certain basic questions about primitive marriage.

1) From an analysis of the norms of Gilyak marriage, we have seen that from the simple, single rule that men must marry daughters of their mother's brother, there inevitably arise by natural necessity such complex institutions as group marriage, the clan, the phratry, and finally marriage prohibitions.

174 583 614 615 [171] 2) An analysis of the Gilyak regulations sheds light on the genesis of the institution of abduction in general and in particular, on the strange institution of mock abduction, an institution which is practiced among such primitive peoples as the Australians and the Eskimo, and, furthermore, in such strange forms that it is quite impossible to consider it a simple remnant of actual abduction, as is normally thought. Let us recall again our tri-clan phratry with its norms of marriage. Clan A must take wives from clan V and give up its women to clan S. We shall remember that in the primitive stages of development such obligations are religious imperatives, the violation of

/83 cont./

*614 602 by virtue of that same proposition concerning the unity of the "father-in-law," all those women who enter the clan are agnate kinswomen to one another, either sisters or aunts and nieces, so that both elements -- male and female -- each separately and both together, are cemented together by the firm intimate bonds of kinship, which, of course, are profoundly reflected in all the social relations of the members of the clan among themselves.

*614 No influence has been exerted upon these relations by those circumstances that we mentioned, at the time, by reason of which it sometimes becomes necessary for individual members of the clan to take their wives outside the confines of one original akhmal'k clan; the general spirit and the general norms have remained the same.

But the cement which strengthens the union of kinsmen in the indestructible organization of the clan does not rest only on the formal consciousness of a common origin and kinship, and not only on the formal norms of marriage, for by themselves they are not so strong as to hold people from generation to generation in a closed hereditary union. The reasons go far deeper. First of all, there is the religious sanction, which plays such an important role in the eyes of primitive man, originally not the sanction of the clan union itself, but of those marriage norms which created the clan. The principle that [582] each man must take wives from the clan of the mother, that the wife must be a blood relative of the husband, is a religious principle, intimately bound up with the cult of the ancestors, in particular with the cult of the mother. [684] The seizure of a married woman is a religious offense against the clan of the abducted woman equal to the slaying of a clansman; the struggle for her return, or at least the demand for a ransom, is obligatory, as in matters of vengeance, to the third generation!

28 Now let us proceed to the institution of ransom, "tkhusin which has in part taken the place of revenge and in part coex with "revenge," serving as its indispensable corrective.

The reasons that gave rise to the institution of ransom si side with the imperative of blood retaliation, which was fina squeezed out completely by the former, remain completely u explained in science to this day.

Among the Gilyak, we believe, it is easy to find at leas principal reason for this great transformation in social relatio It rests on that special form of exogamy about which we spok detail in its place.

614 582 628 /102/ Each clan is bound to a number of clans, at least by bonds of the most intimate character. It takes its wives fr the akhmal'k clan or clans, and from these clans came its m it gives in marriage its own women, daughters and sisters, to ymgi clan or clans. These clans, in the natural order of thin are dear to it; mothers, daughters, sisters bind it to them in- separably.

614 628 562 The clan of the slayer can easily turn out to be the one t takes its women from it, in which are its sisters and daughter one which provides it with women. Hence the first great mo tion: the inviolability of women in conflicts of vengeance.

But the role of the women does not end here. If the slay is from the akhmal'k clan, i.e., the clan from which come mothers and wives of the avengers, it is not difficult to imag that these women cannot be indifferent spectators of a war ag their own brothers and fathers. If the slayer is from the ymgi the wives of the latter likewise will not lightly reconcile ther selves to the destruction of their husbands and sons at the han their own fathers and brothers. In both cases the intervention the women is inevitable, and a few precedents of their pacify influence suffice to turn the precedents into a lawful custom, first coexisting with blood revenge and later squeezing it out.

Indirectly the influence of women in this respect must ha found expression in still another way, purely mechanical, so Their inviolability factually hindered to a considerable degre the realization of blood retaliation itself. Their sentry duty,

/121 cont./

In practice, as we know, these bonds extend far beyond the confines of the original four clans. First of all, in addition to these last, every clan with which at least one clansman has formed matrimonial ties is already an akhmal'k or ymgi to all his clan. On the other hand, we know that every akhmal'k and every ymgi retains its appellation not only with respect to those clans with which it is directly bound matrimonially, but also with respect to those who consider themselves the corresponding ymgi and akhmal'k of the former, so that in addition to the akhmal'k and ymgi of the first degree, each clan has still others of the second, third degreen, etc. All these clans call each other pandf, individual or common origin.

Thus we see that the basic principle, simple and clear, which lay at the basis of the family and clan, a principle according to which a man preferably marries the daughter of the brother of his mother, becomes the basis of blood ties and sympathy, not only within each separate clan, but of even more extensive unions, interclan and, finally, of the whole tribe. True, by virtue of the unfavorable circumstances mentioned by us, such as the dispersion of a small tribe over an enormous territory and many other circumstances, these bonds could not take formal shape in such completed organizations as the phratries and tribes, for example, of the North American Indians, but here also they created an atmosphere of social unity which led the clan from an egoistic isolation onto the path of interclan community and brotherhood.

/122/ Let us consider a little more closely the bonds which arise between the pandf clans, between each clan and those from which the Gilyak takes his wives or to which he gives his women. These bonds are not limited to feelings alone; they are expressed in quite real form.

First of all, there is the obligation of mutual sustenance and hospitality. This in essence is only an extension of that same obligation existing within the clan to the blood pandf; the extension to them of that benevolence of the clan deities for the man, and more or less bloody for the woman. But all this concerns only cases involving a married woman. Sexual relations with an unmarried woman or with a widow, if it is with the permission of the woman, do not provoke any reaction, even on the part of the father or brothers of the wife, notwithstanding their extreme interest in the bride price which is received when a woman gets married; I, at least, did not happen to hear of repressions in such cases. A reaction on the part of the kinsmen of the woman occurs only in a case of coercion; then there is the possibility of duels and suits for ransom. Also, at the present time there are no prohibitions against marrying a person of this category, i.e., persons not bound by kinship. It is another matter with individuals who are bound by the classificatory terms of kinship. Here there appears on the scene a complete system of limitations and prohibitions. Here, against the violators of the prohibitions, there appears on the scene both a social reaction and the categorical imperative of religion, under the influence of which there have developed suitable instincts which have turned artificially created norms into natural human feelings. We shall dwell on this aspect of Gilyak psychics in more detail later, when we speak of sexual morals. Now we shall turn to the norms of prohibitions and limitations themselves.

/150 cont./

These prohibitions and limitations, it turns out, fully correspond with the kinship nomenclature. Only those persons who, according to the established class terminology, are mutually reckoned in the classes "pu" and "an'gej," that is, /131/ who from birth call each other "husband" and "wife," have the right to sexual relations with one another and to enter into matrimony. All the remaining classes are placed under unconditional prohibition.

What are these prohibited classes? First of all there is the extensive class of kishal, i.e., the persons born into one common agnatic clan. The Gilyak clan is absolutely exogamous; among the agnates, as we have seen, there are no classes that call each other "pu" and "an'gej"; neither marriage nor sexual intercourse is possible among them.

/163 cont./

are the an'gej of the slayer. Then he immediately orders the killer to be summoned to his house, that is, the man against whom blood vengeance is obligatory, although the killing was unpremeditated, the man whom it was the greatest sin to allow into his house; and in the presence of the assembled members of the clan he solemnly declares: "Although this man has killed me, give him my daughter. Do not fail to carry out my wish for any reason." Such is the force of the ancient categorical imperative of marriages between the categories of pu and an'gej. This imperative is also active nowadays.

Let us return for a moment to the kinship terminology. We shall make a full analysis of this terminology in connection with the bases of marriage later on. For our purposes now it is necessary to remember the following facts: 1) the wives of clansmen, according to their generations, call each other either older or younger "sisters" or "aunts" and "nieces"; 2) all the agnate kin of the wife are considered, according to generation, the "fathers-in-law" of all the clansmen of this /164/ man; 3) the man calls the sister of his "father-in-law" his "mother," and he calls the daughter of his mother's brother wife (an'gej). Judging from this, 1) the wives of all the members of each given clan must be taken from one clan, and, consequently, in each generation they are sisters (own and collateral); 2) the clan of these women, for each individual man, is the clan of his mother, and the wife of each individual man, must be the daughter of his mother's brother. This we see in actuality, notwithstanding all the deviations of modern times, the causes of which will be made clear later. The ideal of the clansmen is to have women from one clan, from one clan of common akhmal'k; if this turns out to be impossible and it is necessary to turn to still another clan, then once again it is preferably to that clan which is already the akhmal'k of the given clan, that is, that clan from which the individual clansmen, fathers and grandfathers, at an earlier date took their wives for some reason or other. Under these conditions, for each individual person the most favored marriage is that with the daughter of the mother's brother. "Pandfakh an'gej gen urdra" -- "from the clan of your pandf" (see above), from the clan from which you originated (were born), i.e., from the clan from which your mother came, you should take a wife," runs the Gilyak maxim. "I miss the house of my mother's brother" -- such is the motif of the contemporary Gilyak song. And statistics prove the degree to which these principles play a role in nature. Even the very first days of my statistical census, when I was not yet conversant with all the subtleties of the kinship nomenclature, I was astounded that in each clan there were so many kinsmen's wives who were taken from one and the same clan, who called each other, according to the generation of the husband, sisters and aunts, and who actually seemed to be such. It was necessary to record many Gilyak wives who were married several times, and most often their wives turned out to be from one and the same clan, specifically, from the clan of the husband's mother. One of my companions on my journeys, Isayka, had been married three times, and always to wives from the very same clan. And in the majority of cases, it turned out that the husbands and wives were not only cognate cousins, but were corresponding children of own sisters and brothers.

/164 cont./

The preference shown for this form of marriage even today is always the result of the religious imperative; we have seen above that only such a marriage is considered "pure." As to the role of this form of marriage in the Gilyak, one may express it in the same words that have been used to describe the same phenomenon among the Song and Bygar tribes of the province of Sarpûras in central India. In these tribes, "marriage between cousins is almost /165/ compulsory when a brother has a daughter and his sister a son" (1).

1. Fison and Howitt, Kamilaroi and Kurnai, p. 154.

/165 cont./

Among the Gilyak, this type of marriage is imperative to such a great extent that such marriages are often performed soon after the birth of the future spouses, in order to avoid any possible chance circumstances that could interfere with this important matter. The first concern of a mother soon after the birth of a son is to do everything possible in order to marry him to the daughter of one of her brothers. In the ritual of the wedding, the child-groom or his father ties up the little hand of the bride with a thread twisted from the hairs of dog fur and a nettle, the magical symbols of a common economy -- dog-breeding -- and fishing; they fashion nets from the nettle. From this moment the marriage is concluded, and when the bride has grown a little more, approximately to the age of four or five years, she usually moves to the house of her groom, where she grows up with him, and they call each other, however strange it may seem to us, by the pet names "my wife" and "my husband" (m'an'gej, n'fu) up to the attainment of sexual maturity, at which time they become actual spouses, without any of the ritual or formalities which usually must be observed in concluding marriage with outsiders. This custom probably explains why the grown-up spouses are most often called "yr-ikh" and "mam," i.e., old man and old woman, since at the age when most of us are only preparing to get married the young Gilyak spouses may already be celebrating their silver anniversary. This custom sometimes leads to abnormal marriage unions. Now and then one finds in one yurt a pair who call themselves husband and wife, where the husband is a youth of about sixteen, while his wife is only four or five years old. The explanation for this is either that the older sister of the latter has died or that her mother is considerably younger than her own brother. One way or another, such cases still further emphasize the imperative nature of the aforementioned marriages. It is characteristic that this case is particularly zealously carried out in the richest families, which usually are distinguished by their especially strict observance of all the ancient customs and rites.

/168 cont./ Under such circumstances,[1] it would be necessary for a considerably large number of the population who are not well-to-do to remain unmarried. And it is right here that the institution of the right to marriage with persons of the class of an'gej about which we spoke above appears as a corrective. In the first rank of those available to the Gilyak are the daughters of his mother's brother, next their collateral sisters, and, finally, any daughter in general of that broad class of persons whom the Gilyak calls "fathers-in-law".

We already know the nature of the relations of these latter with their son-in-law /syat'ya/, and it is clear, therefore, that obtaining an individual wife among the an'gej, among the daughters of one's born akhmal'k, is surrounded by the most favorable conditions. In an extreme case, a man stands a sure chance of getting the widows of his brothers. But in view of the generally small number of women in comparison with the men, and considering the fierce competition within each class of pu for their an'gej and under the conditions of an extreme avidity for the bride price, which has developed under the influence of commercial relations and has greatly weakened the traditional matrimonial relations, even this privilege can often be a nudum jus. But at this point there appears on the scene another powerful corrective for the individual marriage -- the group marriage, an absolutely unlimited right to sexual intercourse between classes of pu and an'gej. We turn next to this right.

* 835 Group marriage. Though the right and obligation of individual marriage in the Gilyak tribe, which have been considerably shaken by the inevitable influence of both historical conditions and the conditions of life, the right to group marriage, the right to sexual intercourse between persons of these classes, continues to be preserved in full strength. This right, it is true, does not carry with it a definitely compulsory character; a woman cannot be compelled into sexual intercourse either by her kin or by her pu. It is not even allowed that the father, brother, or husband of a woman propose to the daughter

A lie, a limited choice of women plus unequal sex ratio in favor of the men. --Analysr]

/172 cont./

602 know, an ymgai is the closest person to an akhmaik and to his wife. An ymgai is a preferred hunting companion summer and winter. He is the dearest guest; the wife serves the most delicate dishes to him. He makes them still happier for a special reason. With their clansmen-brothers the akhmaik'i /173/ and their sons can neither converse nor joke, but the ymgai is a legitimate interlocutor, with whom they may make merry to their hearts' content. And in such surroundings there [836] are dozens of maidens -- his anĝ:ej, with whom he may openly converse, joke, and, when the opportunity presents itself, have sexual intercourse.

* 835 Now we shall turn to the relations of the pu with their 602 married anĝ:ej.

From the kinship terminology we know that a man's [184] married anĝ:ej include, first of all, the individual wives of his "brothers" (tuvn), which, among the Gilyak speaking the western dialect, refers to all tuvn, while among the Gilyak speaking the eastern dialect -- only to the elder; further -- all the married "sisters" of his own wife; finally, the married sisters of his tuvn -- a huge category, including many dozens of persons distributed throughout the
* 835 territory of Gilyak settlement. Concerning the last two groups -- the wife's sisters and the sisters of the brothers' wives -- one must make the following reservation: usually, in agreement with the general norms of Gilyak marriage, the sisters marry persons of the class same as, or, at the with regard to the sisters of the wife and the sisters of the brothers' wives a general rule concerning the wives of "brothers" operates. But, due to deviations from the traditional norms, it may turn out that the sister of one's brother's wife or the sister of one's own wife is married to a completely alien man, or even to someone who is an accidental akhmaik (1).

[582] 1. An accidental akhmaik is what I [214] call a man from a clan from which one of the kinsmen of the speaker has

/173 cont./

* 835 by chance taken a wife secretly, 614 rather than from the clan from 582 which all the kinsmen usually take a wife.

601 In these cases the norms of sexual relations, and the
* 835 terminology as well, are not the same. Among the majority 184 of clans, in both cases sexual intercourse with these women 614 is legitimate, the participants call each other pu and anĝ:ej, and their children call each other tuvn and the sisters of their mother and their husbands correspondingly "mothers" and "fathers." But among other clans, mainly among clans who are neighbors of the Ainu, the arrangement is different. If the sister of a man's wife marries his akhmaik, then sexual intercourse with her, as in general with the wife of an akhmaik, is absolutely prohibited, and, instead of anĝ:ej, the man calls her achik (mother-in-law). But if she marries a completely alien man, then the relations between them are as between aliens, i.e., sexual intercourse is not considered a
* 835 sin, but neither is it legitimate. What is remarkable, however, is that the offspring of both families are in all cases, even in such /174/ relations, considered to be tuvn (brothers) (1)

* 835 1. I shall give an example which 601 depicts very well both the relations of such tuvn (i.e., the children of sisters whose husbands are aliens to each other) among themselves and their mutual relations towards their wives.

Wremgin and Hibl are individuals of two different clans (ikhal), one from the clan Fanĝ'i, the other from the clan Khoi, but their mothers were tuvn, i.e., sisters from one and the same clan. And

/191 cont./

601 the natural key to the /192/ restoration of the Gilyak system
* 174 of marriage in its pure primitive aspect.
583 But what does the kinship terminology teach us?
[178]

First of all, we see that the Gilyak kinship terminology does not have special terms for relationships by marriage, which are absolutely identical with the terms of blood (cognate) kinship. In Gilyak, kinsmen by marriage are [602] called pandf, i.e., people of a common origin, cognates, [214] for a man, from the side of the mother, for women -- from the side of the father. The father of the wife is the brother of the mother; the mother of the husband is the sister of the father; the husband is the son of the father's sister; the wife is the daughter of the mother's brother, etc.

It is clear that such a terminology could develop only under conditions where marriages had to be made exclusively with blood kinsmen through the father or through the mother. This was first. In what form these marriages were accomplished is shown to us by other kinship terms.

614 Within each clan, as we have seen, in each generation 601 the wives of tuvn, that is, the wives of own and collateral ● 582 brothers, call each other sisters, and their mothers-in-law, that
* 174 is the mothers of all these tuvn, they call aunts (sisters of the father), and, conversely, these latter call them nieces; on the other hand, every male calls the sister of his father-in-law his mother. From this it is clear that 1) the wives of all the members of the clan are necessarily kinswomen taken from one clan, in other words, each clan takes wives for itself exclusively from one common clan, with marriage outside of this clan being impossible; 2) under these conditions marriage is regulated by generations, i.e., in each generation the classmen-"brothers" take from a clan which is obligatory for marriage a corresponding generation of "sisters," the nieces of these women whom the generation of their "fathers" married, and their descendents, in turn, take the following generation of "sisters," the nieces of their mothers, etc. Thus all why the wives of "brothers" call each other

/191 cont./

614 "sisters" (for they are such in reality), their mothers-in-law -- 601 aunts on their fathers' side, and husbands call the sisters of ● 582 their fathers-in-law mothers. We shall not speak here of the
* 174 group character of these marriages unions and of the classet of "mothers," "fathers," "brothers," "fathers-in-law" (wives' fathers) which arise from this, for we have already explained it in detail earlier.

Thus to the first principle -- the obligation of marriage with one's blood kinsmen -- is added another principle -- the wives of classmen must of necessity be taken from one common clan, i.e., two clans are bound to each other by a mutual obligation: one must take wives from the other clan, and the latter /193/ must give its wives to the former. All men of the latter, according to generation, are considered from birth to be the husbands of the women of the corresponding generation of the other clan, and, as we have seen, these classes in actuality call each other pu and anĝ:ej.

But from the kinship terminology we know that the reverse is not allowed, i.e., men of the second clan and women of the first are not joined in the class of husbands and wives. Thus, an exchange marriage between the two aforementioned clans is not allowed. All these principles which have been deduced by us above a priori from the kinship terminology completely correspond to contemporary reality. We have seen that even now there exists the right of marriage, that even now a marriage from the class akhmaik is alone considered "pure," that marriages of classmen are usually made from one common clan and that exchange marriage between clans is not allowed. Now we can with confidence continue our analysis.

614 But what is this clan from which classmen are obliged 601 to take wives? The answer to this is that detail of nomencla-602 ture whereby the mother of every man is the sister of his 582 father's father. In other words, all wives of classmen are
* 174 taken from that clan from which their ancestors come. The members of the clan are that, both on the father's side and

/193 cont./

614 on the mother's side, of one common blood. For each individual member of the clan, as we have seen above, this is expressed 601 in the fact that a person usually marries the daughters of his
● 582 mother's brother, in other words, the daughters of every man
* 174 belong to the sons of his sister. This principle also is the link from which not only the classificatory system of kinship, so complicated in appearance, but also group marriage and finally, the clan grew. We shall also examine this dynamic. We shall see below that this principle, still so common nowadays among many primitive peoples, the principle that the daughters of the brothers belong to the sons of their sisters, goes back to the most ancient stage of the maternal family, the one that immediately followed blood marriage, and served as the basic method of providing the group with wives. In order to satisfy this most vital need in the early stages of human society, every mother obtained for her sons the daughters of her brother, in other words, all the descendants of a sister obtained as wives all the descendants of her brother. Why such a principle arose, why they took as wives exclusively the daughters of the mother's brother, and not the children of the mother's sister or the daughters of the father's brother, we shall see below. Now let us look at the consequences
* 174 this principle had in its practical application.
582 /194/ 1) Once the daughters of the brother belonged from 591 birth to the sons of the sister, it was most natural that the 581 future husbands should go at a very early age to the homes of their future wives /nic/. This arrangement is still to be seen among the Gilyak, as among many other primitive tribes. In "pure" marriages, i.e., between the children of brother and sister, from earliest childhood the future wife moves to the home of the husband and grows up with him. Termi-[602] nology has perpetuated this arrangement in that even from birth children in certain classes stand in the reciprocal 581 relationship of pu and anĝ:ej toward each other (1).

* 174 582 591 581 [114]
[835]

1. This fact radically refutes the assertion of Westermarck, Crawley, and others that the prohibition of marriage between brothers and sisters arises from an instinctive sexual aversion created by living intimately together. Crawley cites in this respect the categorical assertion of Ellis (see "Exogamy and the Mating of Cousins," Anthropological Essays, Oxford, 1907, p. 62).

[113]

* 174 2) The above-mentioned principle created in the persons 582 of the daughters of the brother a permanent pool of women 581 for each man, but this measure was inadequate for the satisfaction of the objective for which it was created; corresponding norms of distribution were necessary in order to guarantee peace between the possessors of the group of women. It is first of all clear that the norms of distribution could not be exclusively individual or exclusively communal. Communal possession, as a general rule, would have evoked endless discord; a purely individual arrangement was not always possible because of the inevitable fortuitousness in the distribution of men and women, especially within the limited sphere of a few families. These norms have worked out, therefore, had to be of such a nature that they could give satisfaction in the face of any combination.

The individual mode of distribution, of course, would be the most satisfactory, but it requires an equal distribution of the sexes, which is not always possible, especially within the limited sphere of a few families. The norms of distribution under such conditions had to be a compromise between the communal and the individual mode, in order to satisfy any combination of the distribution of the sexes.

/194 cont./

* 174 Thus there was created that type of individual-group 581 marriage which we see among the Gilyak, and among all ● 582 other peoples where marriage is founded on this principle of marriage relations which they have in common with the Gilyak. This system of individual group marriage was developed under the influence of the various combinations in the distribution of the /195/ sexes among the descendants of brother and sister. In order to be convinced of this fact, it is enough to consider several such combinations.

1. The simplest one is that of one brother and one sister. Moreover, the brother has as many daughters as the sister has sons. Then of course, individual distribution is entirely possible, if, however, men and women simultaneously reached the marriageable age. But à la longue /in the long run/ such a combination is almost completely impossible, because the descendants of the sister and the descendants of the brother expand into several families, and in such an environment only as an exception can there be cases when the number of men of marriageable age in one group of descendants at any given moment will be equal to the number of women in another group of descendants.

171 2. Let us take the same instance; one brother and one
* 174 sister, but at the given moment the brother has only one 581 daughter, while the sister has several sons. Then communal 582 marriage, as it is described among many peoples and appears 595 so typically in all the descriptions of the Tibetans, becomes inevitable. This is the situation described in the Gilyak epos in such expressions as this, "two (or more) brothers supported one wife," a situation which, as we have indicated, is often encountered in reality even today. The most customary mode of using wives is the same as in group marriage -- each brother enjoys the communal wife in the absence of the other: "in Tibet, where the brothers very often have only one common wife, it is rare for more than one brother to be in the house at one time" (1). Among the

1. Westermarck, op. cit., p. 116.

/197 cont./

174 582 601 The natural result of this system was the classificatory system of kinship, according to which a man gives the name of wife not only to his individual wife, but also to all her sisters, and to the wives of all of his own brothers and to the sisters of these wives, both own and collateral; on the same basis he gives the name of mother to all the wives of the brothers of his father, both own and collateral, while he calls their husbands his fathers, and he calls their children his brothers and sisters; in exactly the same way he calls the brother of his mother father-in-law, her sister -- mother, while he calls the daughters of the brothers of the mother his wives.

The classificatory system, which appears to be so complicated, becomes completely clear and simple; it is logically developed out of a basic principle -- the female offspring of a brother belong to all the male offspring of his sister. At first it may seem strange and extremely complicated that, for example, a man's wives include not only the wives of his brothers, but also their sisters. In actuality, this is explained very simply -- the wives of the brothers cannot be other than sisters, and they all belong to the whole group of "brothers" -- cousins of these sisters. Or, a man calls the brother of his mother "father-in-law"; this is because his father-in-law can only be the brother of his mother, no one else.

The only variation possible in this system is connected with the differences in the rights of group marriage of younger and elder brothers. Among some peoples all the brothers are equally the group husbands of their mutual spouses; among others only the younger brothers enjoy group rights with respect to the wives of elder brothers. Among the Gilyak, as we have seen, we find both systems, and correspondingly two terminologies with respect to the brothers of the father and the wives of the brothers. Among some only the elder brothers of the father are called fathers, while

/197 cont./

* 174 ● 582 601 among others only the younger brothers; similarly among some a man only calls the wives of his elder "brothers" his wives, while among others all the wives of the brothers equally.

Now we shall continue our analysis of the Gilyak norms.

* 174 614 6. Once every mother by right takes the daughters of her brother /198/ for her sons, then by the same right her daughters must belong to the sons of the sister of her husband; this sister, moreover, cannot be married to her brother, because, as we have seen, the exchange of women between the descendants of sister and brother is not permitted. Thus, side by side with the two groups, the descendants of the brother and the descendants of the sister, there is formed a third group -- the offspring of the sisters of the husbands of the latter group.

7. Since in each of these groups the men draw their wives from the group of the brothers of the mother, while the women marry into the third group of the sister of the father, each group forms a completely exogamous unit, i.e., clan, and, depending on whether the men go into the clan of the wife or, vice versa, the women into the clan of the husband, there resulted either a maternal or a paternal clan. Among the Gilyak the clan has been paternal from remote times. The strength and unity of such a clan union rested not only on the negative bond of exogamy (exogamy or prohibitions against certain degrees of kinship can exist even without a clan union), but on the precious positive ties, on the common right of marriage, on the common right of the clansmen to the women of the blood clan of their ancestress, on the mutual rights of group marriage, on the privilege of having for one's sons-in-law /zyat'ya/ one's blood kinsmen -- the children of the sisters of one's fathers, the members of that clan which from time immemorial has married its ancestresses. The strength of this union was doubled by the peculiarity of its composition. Within the clan there was not a single non-blood element: if the clan was maternal and the sons-in-law moved to the urdering the girls are possible. Such examples are well-nown among the Toda tribes, in spite of the fact that the mber of males is greater there than the number of females.

10. Likewise, with this arrangement the institution of ide price is impossible under normal conditions. Payment r the bride is not permitted; otherwise the obligation of arriage would be merely fictitious. This is still to be seen nong the Gilyak today: no matter how avid the Gilyak may for bride price, it is not permitted in cases of marriage to e daughter of the mother's brother.

In order that such an essentially exogamous system might preserved and function in all its purity, a whole series of vorable conditions is necessary. First of all, a whole mplex of favorable economic, social and sanitary condi-ons is required in order that, on the one hand, in propagating emselves the various families of the phratry should be able maintain themselves on the common territory, and, on the her hand, that the increase should exceed the losses of the milies, and that there should be no cases of extinction of tire clans constituting links in the phratry. Furthermore, me degree of isolation of the tribe from alien influences is cessary, so that the religious imperative of obligatory arriages within the phratry may be preserved in all its rigor.
nally, it is necessary that there be preserved economic con-tions under which, on the one hand, the social equality of the embers of the phratry would remain more or less the usual enomenon, and, on the other hand -- that under the in-ence of new economic conditions there should not be gendered one or another temptation to make woman the ject of purchase and sale.

The preservation of all these conditions among primitive oples in the course of a long time inevitably encounters a ole series of obstacles. And so it has been among the lyak. No matter how much the Gilyak prize the primordial ode of their forefathers, economic conditions force individl persons, individual families, and sometimes even a whole 161 Still more destructive is the process of depopulation. We 177 are speaking not of the gradual dying out of separate families, 614 but mainly of the process of catastrophic depopulation. This 731 process is of comparatively recent origin, for it is an im-*174 mediate consequence of clashes with cultured peoples, first Eastern and later European peoples as well. These peoples, together with their alcohol and exploitations, have brought the Gilyak a whole set of communicable diseases with an especially destructive effect in their non-immunized primitive surroundings. We have already discussed the ravaging effects of this process. It is sufficient to say here that whole clans died out before my eyes, and one not infrequently meets clans in which only one or two individuals are left. It must be borne in mind that the process of depopulation does not by any means strike clans equally, so that at any given time one clan may remain untouched, while another may lose a considerable number of its members.

161 War also has an effect similar to that of diseases and 614 various other causes. Although according to the interclan 72 rules the women are spared and the number of men who are *174 killed is limited, nevertheless /202/ in the heat of battle the rules are not always observed, and thus a military epopee can also lead to the destruction of a clan.

*174 Contact with other peoples, both primitive and more 177 highly cultured, must have acted in an indirectly destructive manner. As a general rule, the contact of outlooks broadens intellectual horizons and weakens the strength of religious imperatives. A representative of a higher culture looks down on the institutions of a lower race, and the representatives of the latter gradually begin to observe their own institutions less rigorously themselves. At first separate individuals begin to violate the law a little, and they gradually begin to draw after them many others. The • [582] Gilyak themselves assert that with the coming of the Russians their marriage regulations were considerably weakened. But even before the appearance of the Russians the Gilyak had contact with various other peoples.

174 giving women to alien clans. The procuring of such wo 178 presented great difficulties. As a result of this long strug *614 for the women of alien clans -- a struggle about which i 615 be necessary for us to speak in detail later, there appear [583] institution of the "bride price," payment for the bride -- institution which removed all obstacles to free marriage.

174 But once having appeared, the institution of the bri 178 price became, in turn, a powerful factor for the spreadi 583 of the institution of the free marriage.

*614 The bride price became the most powerful temptati 615 for violating the old norms, even in cases where there w no necessity for their being violated.

For poor people, daughters became capital, and the rich, who came into being with the establishment of tra relations, began to look on the free marriage union as a means of satisfying their ambition and of becoming relat to people who were their equals in wealth and distinctio

*614 And nevertheless, notwithstanding all the unfavorab 615 circumstances, notwithstanding the intrusion of the new 178 stitution of "free" marriage, the old norms continue to l and to preserve their power over minds. In the great ma jority of cases the old imperative still is stronger than al the temptations of bride price and of free marriage. In [583] eyes of the contemporary Gilyak, marriage from the akh • [582] clan, from the mother's clan, is still the only "pure" ma riage, and the most favored marriage for each individua man is marriage to the daughter of the mother's brother, in which case bride price is not only not required, but is even allowed. Free marriages are rather sporadic pheno which destroy the customary norm for only a moment an then are spontaneously drawn into the ruts of the old nor This comes about in different ways. In some cases a ma may not marry for one or another reason from his mother clan, but his offspring nevertheless again begin to take wives from the old clan of the ancestress. In other cases if for some reason a return is not possible, then the alien clan from which the man takes his wife becomes the law marriage clan for his offspring, who in each generation

/196 cont./

174 58 582 [835]

group rights to the wives of his elder brothers, who in their time enjoyed his wives. In the majority of cases, therefore, we see that only younger brothers enjoy group rights to the wives of the elder brothers.

5. Thus far, we have taken the simplest combinations -- one brother and one sister. Where there are several brothers and several sisters, the consequences will be similar, but will assume a more complex form. If there were always the same number of sisters and brothers, and if each brother and sister had a corresponding number of female and male offspring, then each pair of brothers and sisters could form a closed marriage group, but actually such cases can only be rare exceptions. Ordinarily, on the contrary, the number of brothers and sisters is not equal, and an even distribution of the sexes in their offspring is even less possible. Let us take several examples. Several brothers have one sister; the brothers have several daughters, the sister several sons. This time it is not only own sisters, but also first cousins who are the group wives of the brothers. Or: there are several brothers and several sisters, but the distribution of the sexes is such that there are not enough own sisters for the own brothers, whereupon the group union will be composed not only of own brothers and sisters, but of male and female first cousins as well.

Finally, women did not always have brothers, and the latter did not always have daughters, and then, naturally, it was necessary /197/ to resort to the daughters of first and second cousins. In a word, into a marriage group of the offspring of a brother and sister are inevitably drawn, on the one hand, all the collateral brothers up to the most distant degrees, and, on the other -- the collateral sisters, and thus there is established group marriage between own and collateral brothers, on the one hand, and own and collateral sisters on the other -- the typical punalua family in its purest form.

Gilyak this is not required in cases of communal possession; the wife first sleeps with one brother (the oldest), then moves over to another. As for the children, either they are not distinguished at all according to fathers, or, as in the case of the Toda tribe, the first child is regarded as the offspring of the oldest brother, the second of the next brother, etc.

3. The same situation in a new variant: the first brother has reached marriageable age before the second. The elder brother takes the only daughter of the sister of his father /sic/ as his individual wife, but then the younger brother comes of marriageable age. The elder brother remains the individual spouse, but the second brother enjoys conjugal rights, by the rights of a group spouse. Then another daughter of the brother grows up to be of marriageable age. She naturally becomes the individual spouse of the second brother, but the elder brother obtains the same group rights to the wife /196/ of the younger brother as the latter once enjoyed with respect to the wife of the elder brother.

4. At a given moment a brother has several adult daughters, while the sister as yet has only one adult son. The latter becomes the husband of all the daughters of the sister of the brother /sic/. Thus it is at the present time among the majority of American Indian tribes, where a man who has married the oldest daughter is for that reason obliged to take as wives all of her sisters. But now another brother grows up. One of the wives is yielded up to him as his individual wife, the rest remaining with the elder brother as the most well-to-do, who is better able to support several wives than the brother who is just beginning to earn his livelihood. The latter, naturally, is rightfully the group husband of all the wives of the elder brother; the converse right of the elder brother is not so indisputable.

An analogous development takes place if the elder brother-polygamist has several brothers who gradually grow up; then each one of them will obtain his own individual wife, but at the same time each of the younger brothers will have

/216 cont./

[192] why when these marriages were recognized to be harmful and marriage between the children of brother and sister was established that the original, single society was divided into two exogamous halves: in one of these halves were the brothers with their wives and their descendants, and in the other the sisters with their husbands and their descendants. Consequently, the dual division was a result of cross-cousin marriage, and one must therefore not seek the cause of the aforementioned regulations of the form of marriage in the dual division, but in something else. This cause must be sought in that situation under which the change from bilateral marriages to exogamous marriage in the form of cousin marriage took place. The study of the Australian classes first of all confirms the long disputed opinion of Morgan that exogamy is the result of realizing the harm of blood marriages, marriages between brothers and sisters. It shows also that the transfer to the exogamous form took place in extreme paleolithic antiquity and slowness, a fact that is easily explained by the usual conservatism of primitive man in general, and in particular with regard to such an institution as marriage, which is so closely bound up with religious ideas. This very psychology of conservatism, which at every change of the old institution tries to preserve at least the old form, in which it clothes the new institution, has resulted in the apparently paradoxical fact that the institution which, in the consciousness of the harmful effects of blood marriage, established marriages between cousins of the first degree allowed such marriages exclusively between the children of brothers and sisters and at the same time forbade such marriages between the children of two brothers and two sisters. Although the latter are hardly distinguished in any way from the former in the blood sense.

/216 cont./

[193] How did this come about? The fact is that the cross-cousin marriage undoubtedly appeared to replace the marriage between brother and sister. Under this form of marriage, not only were the spouses brothers and sisters, but also their parents. The fear of the consequences of this marriage was expressed in the fact that marriages were effected between the children of brother and sister, and these latter were spouses in their turn.

This is why, when necessity forced the abandonment of this form of marriage and the replacing of it by cousin marriage, the conservatism of primitive man chose the form which bore the closest outward resemblance to the old form sanctified by time /217/ and religion, namely, that one in which the only orthodox marriage were marriages between the children of brother and sister (although now these latter were no longer spouses), and not between the children of two brothers and two sisters. Thus the form, which at first plays a paramount role in the eyes of the primitive man, was in reality only the form, primitive man unhesitatingly realized that the existence of a new change was thus concealed from the deity -- the usual manner of pious "deceit" of the gods.

In just such way brothers -- own and collateral -- and their descendants, on the one hand, and sisters and their descendants, on the other hand, formed the two exogamous halves of the single society.

Another very important, although less cardinal question to which the investigators of cousin marriage give no answer is the following: if cousin marriage is explained as the first stage of exogamy, as the first measure thereof, then from where does its obligatory, its almost necessary character come? It would seem, on the contrary, that once the good of exogamy was recognized it would be most logical to encourage marriage between the least closely related persons, even between individuals who were entirely alien to each

/217 cont./

[194] other, while marriages between cousin should have been forbidden. Why, then, is cousin marriage so obligatory, so necessarium, in order that it might pass completely out of use as an antisocial institution.

The prohibition of marriage among the Australian peoples can serve as the best example of this strange fact. Among these peoples, judging from the organization of classes and from their personal declarations, the consciousness of the harm of marriage within close degrees of kinship is quite well developed, and they have manifested great resourcefulness in order to block the possibility of close marriages, excelling other peoples in this respect. Such a complicated system as the kinship system of the Arunta tribe has been specially devised for the abolishment of marriages between close degrees of the first degree. It would seem after this that marriages between the most remote degrees of relationship ought to be encouraged, while marriages between cousins of the second degree ought to be regarded as merely allowable. Among these peoples, however, "cousins of the first degree are thought too remote, and marriages beyond this degree are prohibited" (1). Thus, marriage with cousins, even an impossibly close degree is not only allowed, but obligatory.

1. Crawley, op. cit., 61.

Further, if cousin marriage is only the first stage of exogamy, /218/ why, in spite of the enormous period of time which has passed since its inception, does it continue to survive so stubbornly up to the present time among a large number of tribes, including such numerous ones as the Dravidians, in its original, unaltered form. And even there, among the tribes of Australia, it underwent limitation in the sense of the exclusion of marriages between cousins of the first degree, but still the principle, as we just saw, is preserved inviolate, and marriages beyond cousin of the third degree are not permitted. This stubborn involving of [195] for example, this persistent striving to perpetuate it by means of obligation, must rest on a serious basis. It seems to us that the strength of the cousin marriage rests on two important motives. The first motive is the same as the striving of every kinship group, in particular of each mother, to provide her progeny with wives.

/218 cont./

At the primitive stage of human development the element of struggle in sexual relations undoubtedly played just a tremendous a role as in the zoological kingdom in general. And one of the most important problems of human communities was to limit this struggle as far as possible, by one or another regulation.

The institution of marriage, obligatory between persons of a certain group, was that form of sexual regulation which was called upon to ratify the above-mentioned fundamental dictate of the community. Prior to the establishment of exogamy, this dictate could be satisfied by the intrabloood marriage obligatory between brothers and sisters. With the establishment of the principle of exogamy, cross-cousin marriage seemed to have solved the problem to a certain degree but the question of the sister of the father, but the daughter of a brother and sister could once again be joined in marriage only in the second generation. Spouses become blood kinsmen. We saw as well that, in accordance with a whole series of motives -- conservatism, religious ideas connected with the cult of ancestors, and, finally, the desire for the peaceful organization of marriage -- primitive man did not proceed immediately from blood marriage between brother and sister to remote degrees of kinship or to marriage between persons alien by blood. In the great revolution in blood-kinship relations the most scrupulous gradualness was observed. Thus, as we saw, even now among the Australian peoples the first form of exogamy took the form of obligatory marriage between the children of brother and sister. Since these marriages proceed continently from generation to generation, society, with such an arrangement, is divided into two halves, which mutually, by generations, give each other their women.

/218 cont./

[196] That is why up to the present time among a large number of Dravidian tribes marriage is mandatory when a brother has a daughter and a sister is born. That is why, as we saw, among the Australian tribes, with all the striving toward limiting cousin marriage, marriages more remote than cousins of the third degree are prohibited; consequently, marriages between cousins of the second degree are obligatory. That is why among the Mongols, whose favored marriages are the marriages between persons alien to each other, marriages between the children of a brother and sister are called "white ass," i.e., considered acceptable, while marriages more remote than the most remote members of one clan are "black sin," i.e., completely unallowable. In order not to increase the difficulties of the subject and with the desire to show, in spite of all the peripetetia of this small tribe, only the marriage between the son of a sister and the daughter of her brother is considered as legitimate.

After these preliminary observations, we may proceed to an examination of the question as to what place the marriage between the children of the sister of the father and the /219/ different places. In Australia this marriage proceeded very early on the path of exogamy: from marriages between cousins of the first degree, they proceeded to marriages between cousins of the second degree, and the marriages between cousins of the second degree were prohibited.

Nothing in the social structure changed with this arrangement. Society remained divided as before into two halves which exchanged women, with the difference that a man married, not the daughter of the sister of his father, but the daughter of his son of the first degree, so that the progeny of a brother and sister could once again be joined in marriage only in the second generation. Spouses become blood kinsmen. We saw as well that, in accordance with a whole series of motives -- conservatism, religious ideas connected with the cult of ancestors, and, finally, the desire for the peaceful organization of marriage -- primitive man did not proceed immediately from blood marriage between brother and sister to remote degrees of kinship or to marriage between persons alien by blood. In the great revolution in blood-kinship relations the most scrupulous gradualness was observed. Thus, as we saw, even now among the Australian peoples the first form of exogamy took the form of obligatory marriage between the children of brother and sister. Since these marriages proceed continently from generation to generation, society, with such an arrangement, is divided into two halves, which mutually, by generations, give each other their women.

/219 cont./

[197] When adapted to individual families, this arrangement is expressed in the fact that the son of a brother marries the daughter of his father, because marriages of the son of a sister marries the daughter of her brother. The spouses are cousins of the first degree, while the wife of each man is, on the other hand, the daughter of the sister of his father, and, on the other hand, the daughter of the brother of his mother, because the fathers of the spouses married each other's sister. Such was the first stage of the limitation on marriage between persons close by blood. Further limitation occurred

/220/ differently in different places. In Australia this marriage proceeded very early on the path of exogamy: from marriages between cousins of the first degree, they proceeded to marriages between cousins of the second degree, and the marriages between cousins of the second degree were prohibited.

Nothing in the social structure changed with this arrangement. Society remained divided as before into two halves which exchanged women, with the difference that a man married, not the daughter of the sister of his father, but the daughter of his son of the first degree, so that the progeny of a brother and sister could once again be joined in marriage only in the second generation. Spouses become blood kinsmen. We saw as well that, in accordance with a whole series of motives -- conservatism, religious ideas connected with the cult of ancestors, and, finally, the desire for the peaceful organization of marriage -- primitive man did not proceed immediately from blood marriage between brother and sister to remote degrees of kinship or to marriage between persons alien by blood. In the great revolution in blood-kinship relations the most scrupulous gradualness was observed. Thus, as we saw, even now among the Australian peoples the first form of exogamy took the form of obligatory marriage between the children of brother and sister. Since these marriages proceed continently from generation to generation, society, with such an arrangement, is divided into two halves, which mutually, by generations, give each other their women.

/220 cont./

[198] The peoples of this group, for which the Gilyak serve as the most striking representative, begin to limit marriages between cousins of the first degree, considering it necessary to establish a more remote degree of kinship between spouses, but they did not wish to sacrifice that principle which seemed to them most important, namely, the one according to which each mother receives for her son the daughter of her brother. They actually preserved this principle, but, in order to satisfy the necessity of lessening the closeness of kinship between spouses, they sacrificed the other principle of cross-cousin marriage.

As we know, the son of a woman receives the daughter of her brother, but the reverse, i.e., the marriage of the son of a brother with the daughter of his sister, is not allowed. As a result the limitation on the closeness of kinship obtains -- spouses are cousin of the first degree only on one side -- the side of the mother of the father of the husband, but on the side of the mother of the wife, while previously, with cross-cousin marriage, they were cousins of the first degree both on the side of the father and on the side of the father of both spouses. But at the same time there is preserved here the old basic principle -- marriage to the daughter of the father's sister, but the reverse, that the spouses remain cousins of the first degree -- true, on one side only.

/221/ This departure from the principles of the Australian type in the form of the limitation on marriage between cousins of the first degree brought about a fundamental change in the organization of society. It brought about the transition from a bipartite division of society with its classes to the organization of a pure clan, and in particular to the four-clan theory that we saw among the Gilyak.

With the Australian system of limitations on marriages within close degrees of kinship, no matter how far these limitations went (at the present time they do not go further than cousins of the second degree), society remains irrevocably divided from the standpoint of marriage into two exogamous

[199] groups, joined in the constant mutual exchange of women. In fact, each division is a real clan, because marriages are prohibited within the division. True, along with these two divisions a complex system of marriage classes is established, but these latter are nothing, but a means of that clan a man belongs to, he continues to remain in his division, while the classes do not change the position of the person in the clan, but are only mnemonic titles personally limiting a man (but not his offspring) in the choice of women of a particular degree of relationship. In the four-clan system -- only cousins of the first degree; in the eight-clan system, cousins of the second degree. In reality, classes are not even obligatory appurtenances for the actual clan division. Among the Dieri tribe, for example, there exists the same prohibition with respect to marriages between cousins of the first degree as among the Arunta, but, while among the latter eight classes have been established as a mnemonic device, among the former this limitation has not been reflected in an extensive class division.

Thus it is clear that in the Australian system, by virtue of its having preserved the principle of the exchange of women, cross-cousin marriage demands only a division into two clans. The society is a two-clan physry.

The Gilyak system was unable to remain in this two-clan physry. From the moment when cross-cousin marriages, i.e., exchange marriages between the children of brother and sister, were prohibited, the two-clan physry was insufficient: one clan took women from a second clan, but the latter was obliged to seek women for itself elsewhere, while, on the other hand, marriages outside of a given ethnic group were not allowed (as we see now in Australia). It remained to transform the two-clan physry into a multiclan physry.

[200] This type of one-sided cousin marriage, so simply explained in the light of the evolution of more ancient forms of cross-cousin marriage, has attracted no attention at all among the modern investigators. Many scholars have noted this institution with disbelief, considering it impossible. Thus, almost at the same time as my publication on this institution among the Gilyak (1910), the noted scientist Kohler in his article, "Das Recht der Hottentoten /The Law of the Hottentot/" (1), ascertaining, in the words of his correspondent, the existence of just such an institution among that tribe, regards this report with distrust. The cause of this distrust is quite simple. Not knowing the genesis of this institution and the place occupied by it in the evolution of cousin marriage, and having no other examples of this institution besides its remnants in the marriage prohibitions, it was difficult to comprehend the cause of the one-sided prohibition by which the son of a sister can marry the daughter of a brother, but the daughter of a sister may not marry the son of her brother, although the spouses are cousins of blood kinship in both cases is identical; and therefore the one-sidedness of the prohibition was viewed rather as an anomaly than as a normal sign of a lively institution.

(1) In Zeitschrift für vergleichende Rechtswissenschaft, B. XVI, pp. 341-342.

Due to such disbelief on the part of investigators, this institution is completely disregarded in treatises on human marriage and has remained completely misunderstood, while ethnographic literature gives quite a bit of information on such marriages among the most different peoples. Especially numerous traces of it are found in Indonesia and among the Dravidian peoples of India, among whom Morgan found the same clearly expressed trace of the Turanian system, in which group marriage was preserved. As we just saw,

/222 cont./

Kohler's correspondent reports on it from Africa among the Hottentot. From Indonesia, such an authoritative investigator as Wilken reports on it, writing: "Among the Batak, the Redjang (Borneo) and the natives of Ambonia, it is permissible for the son of a sister to marry the daughter of a brother, but the son of a brother may not marry the daughter of a sister" (3).

2. Wilken, Bijdragen /Contributions/, Serie T, V. I, p. 148.

The kinship terminology corresponds to this arrangement: among the Batak on Sumatra, for example, a wife or female sweetheart is called ibibere-re-datang, i.e., daughter of the mother's brother.

This institution was already recorded in still more definite form in the 1870's among the Dravidian tribes of India. Thus, for example, in the Song and Bygar tribes of the province of Satpdas in central India, marriage between cousins is compulsory when /223/ the brother has a daughter and the sister a son. Many data may be found in the most recent literature by Rivers (1).

1. "Marriage of cousins in India, Jour. Royal Anlat. Society, July, 1907, p. 626 pass.

/223 cont./

IX.

The Gilyak Kinship System and Morgan's Hypothesis

The Gilyak system of kinship and marriage fully confirms the basic hypothesis of L. Morgan that the terms of kinship are the result of corresponding sexual norms and norms of marriage. What for Morgan was only a deduction, we actually see to the fullest degree in Gilyak life. If a Gilyak calls a group of women by the term "wife," then those women are actually wives for him in the proper sense. If a Gilyak calls a certain group of men -- fathers, then these are actually persons who have sexual rights to his mother. If a Gilyak calls the wife of his mother "father-in-law," then it is because, according to primordial law, he is actually obliged to marry the daughter of this uncle, who will then be his father-in-law. For Gilyak system one finds the explanation of even such universal classificatory terms as elder and younger brother and elder and younger sister, which include two genders, especially in marriage aspect. First of all, these terms regulate individual marriage in the clan of the mother. An elder brother is obliged to marry the wife of his elder sister, and a younger brother a younger sister. These terms are important in the levirate, since a widow passes to a younger "term." Finally, among half of the Gilyak, only the elder brothers have sexual rights to the wives of the elder brothers.

How clearly individualized the correspondence between a kinship term and the marriage rights is in the Gilyak terminology is seen especially clearly in the relations of the brothers to their wives. Among half of the Gilyak, as we have seen, the brothers without exception have sexual rights to one another's wives. And among them the terms actually correspond to this: a man designates with the term "wife" all the wives of his brothers without exception, and therefore all the children of brothers without exception call

/240 cont./

There is yet another characteristic peculiarity. We have mentioned that cousin marriage leads to the right to marriage, and that, under such a system, bride price, payment for the bride, is forbidden.

The same thing is to be observed among the Tungiz. Finally, the existence of the clan among the Tungiz is also a not unimportant indication of the fact that endogamy is a new phenomenon here, for among purely endogamous tribes, such as the Aino, the genuine institution of the clan does not exist. The clan is an exogamous institution by nature.

We proceed to that large group of northern Paleo-Asiatics which includes the Chukchee, the Koryak, and the Kamchadal. Of this group, the Chukchee are the people who have been studied in great detail, and we must consider them at greater length.

According to Bogoras' /Bogoras/ description, the customary mode of marriage is with kinsmen and "most frequently between cousins," if possible from one side the same family, and, if this is not possible, then between kinsmen of the same encampment, i.e., cousin /241/ of more distant degree, but always within the same village. Exogamy is prohibited -- a purely Turanian feature. Since at the same time the exchange of women is practiced, we have here a kind of cross-cousin marriage -- again a typical Turanian feature.

Marriage between cousins was undoubtedly obligatory at first, only the time, this may be, by the way, from the fact that, as among the Gilyak and the Tungus, among the Chukchee marriages are concluded at an early age. This marriage is even more in fashion among the Chukchee than among the Gilyak, since, according to the words of Bogoras, the majority of marriages are concluded in childhood, and the bride price not paid, but there is not even any question of it. Marriage between cousins always became more and different with regard to the marriage of their children even before their birth. The obligation to marry also explains the reason why the bride price is not paid, the institution of the bride price is unknown to the Chukchee. The usual method of acquiring such catastrophes, as we shall see further on, are not at all rare. This alternative which, according to the epos, faced the man of olden times -- either to marry his lawful /242/, who belonged to him by right of birth, or to obtain a wife by force, while at the same time there is almost no mention of betrothal to an alien woman as a special form of marriage -- proves that obtaining a woman by purchase was a later institution, established as a corrective of the custom of abduction with /243/ all its bloody consequences, just as ransom was a corrective of blood revenge.

/241 cont./

Thus are the methods of obtaining wives depicted for us in the traditional epos.

Contemporary methods of obtaining a wife. Up to the present the Gilyak has preferred the old orthodox mode of marrying a woman of the /244/ category, a woman who is regarded as one's wife by right of birth. Only such a marriage is considered "pure." And people who are staunchly for the laws of antiquity try to observe the old law. Of all the categories of /245/ the most desirable marriage is with the daughter of the mother's brother, in other words, the most orthodox is considered the cousin marriage between the daughter of a brother and the son of his sister. Such a marriage is so highly valued that even before the future spouses appear in the world the sister and the brother give each other their word to unite the children in marriage. After the birth of the children, when they have reached the age of three or four, there takes place in the presence of the claimant of one side or the other a formal act of agreement or even the actual concluding of the marriage. Even the mother of the groom may carry on the negotiations, not only the father of the bride (for she is his sister and conversation between brother and sister is prohibited) but with his wife. The whole procedure of agreement amounts to this: the matchmaker /ynaf/ (father or mother of the groom) before everyone ties each arm and each leg of the fiancés with threads of nettle and dog hair and, in addition, gives reverence with which they approached a settlement where, according to them, one of their female ancestors had once lived.

/246 cont./

In several places to this day, to a question about origin, the Gilyak point to the places from where their mothers and wives came. For example, in the settlement of Nyyro at the mouth of the Tym' river on the eastern coast of Sakhalin, they reply to the question about the origin of the inhabitants of that settlement, "We are Nyurskie," i.e., come from the settlement of Nyur, which is on the northernmost tip of Sakhalin, and, when I asked for an explanation of this strange answer, it was explained to me: "Because we take wives from Nyur."

Thus, these people reckoned their origin according to the place of the birth of their mothers and, for, as we saw above, the wives of the Gilyak are taken predominantly from the clan of the mother. I shall introduce still another interesting reminiscence.

Usually at the present time children are given names according to the classmen of the father. Such is the general rule. But I have seen a case when the son of the chief Gilyak of Naniwo on the west shore) where they give names according to the brothers and classmen of the mother; thus, it is though the children were members of the mother's clan.

All these are remnants which are entirely out of line with the agnate organization of the contemporary Gilyak clan, but they are remnants which are incompatible with the present-day psychology of the Gilyak. For the Gilyak themselves they are not remnants: this is made clear mainly by the marriage norms, according to which spouses are cousins, the children of brother and sister, and the members of each clan perfectly take wives from one and the same clan, so that the psychologies of relativity and of consanguinity are connected with a move into an alien clan. The bride and the groom are of one common blood on the paternal and on the maternal side. Therefore, in all the works of the epos

/247/

XIV.

Forms of Concluding Marriage

We have already had occasion to introduce in another place, as a clear illustration of the former obligation to marry women from the clan of the mother, from the /248/ epos, the episode from the Gilyak epos, the Gilyak dying from a wound inflicted on him by a man who has the right to his daughter, marries his daughter off to the people who are present. "Although this man has slain me, give him my daughter; do not fail to carry out my will for any reason." The epos just as clearly portrays for us the old form of concluding marriage, corresponding completely to the norms of obligatory marriage.

Once a marriage is obligatory, there can be no question of complicated procedures in concluding the marriage, such as betrothal and negotiations concerning property obligations, and, of course, there can be no question of payment for the bride. There can be no question of a long period of contact with a move into an alien clan. The bride and the groom are of one common blood on the paternal and on the maternal side. Therefore, in all the works of the epos

/268 cont./

In another poem, in response to the demand of the bridegroom, the father-in-law makes only one condition: "You will not go back before tomorrow!" He then orders his slaves to prepare a bite for the couple and, turning to his daughter says: "Eat together with your husband!" That woman ate with our Gilyak. Having eaten, they went out, urinated, entered arranged the bedding and lay themselves down under the same blanket, and went to sleep. On the following day that old man said: "You shall set out in five large boats loaded to the top with nothing but valuables" (1) /see footnote 1 above/.

Another example. The hero of a poem arrived in a town with one people, and the chief of the town, the father of yart, a woman was alone there. This woman said: "O, guest, from where have you come?" Our Gilyak said: "I have come to take you!". This woman said: "If you take me with you, go to my father, talk it over!" Our Gilyak went out, went into a yurt; an old man, an old woman were there. This old woman said: "Your guest has come!" Our Gilyak said: "I have come to take your daughter!" That old man rose: "Well then, prepare mos' feed my son-in-law." Our Gilyak left, he came to his wife. The old man said to his daughter, having come as guests in the evening, are to eat mos'." His wife: "All right!" That evening they went visiting, having eaten mos' they left; having had a good time, they arose, ate, and then went back (i.e., with her husband to his village). /Footnotes 2 and 3 at the bottom of the original text p. 268, referring to Shternberg's Materials, p. 84 and pp. 97, 98, respectively are not indicated in the text. / Orthodox forms at the present time. Now, as we see, firmly established in the Gilyak consciousness that only an orthodox marriage, i.e., marriage from the clan of ashmak'i, from the clan of the mother, is lawful, "pure." Even on the Amur, where the old marriage has already undergone change, to the question about the marriage norms they will say to you first of all: "It is necessary to take a wife from his father's-in-law -- the root of ori's birth" (i.e., ally begin with words like this: "You are my ashmak'i performed in the presence of the elder members of the clan, and the marriage is considered inviolable.

The idea of the orthodox marriage up to the present is thought of not merely as being desirable, but as a right and obligation. When a marriage is not from the clan of ashmak'i, arranged on Sakhalin (although that clan may have old recently attained such a position by virtue of the fact that immigrant took his wife from that clan), the organization of ally begin with words like this: "You are my ashmak'i

1. It is curious that among the Haida the ceremony of concluding the marriage of infans, which among them is expressed by the giving of a blanket instead of a dog, bears the technical designation, "makladyanaie pennyayaldi" (Engl- "putting a blanket on"). Evidently this ceremony, as among the Gilyak, was formerly carried out in the form of covering with string or thread, just as is done in such cases up to the present day among the Tamil in India.

/213 cont./

614 clan, in view of the reciprocity of the clans standing in the 615 tujma akhmalk relationship, no marriage relationships are 602 possible between them. As we have seen above, the obstacle is not the closeness /214/ of kinship, but, on the contrary, the distant degree of kinship in comparison with the relationship to the other clans of the phratry.

VIII.

Cousin Marriage

582 We have seen that the basic form of marriage among 74 the Gilyak is marriage between the son of a sister and the 21 daughter of her brother. Thus, the type of the Gilyak marriage is a variety of the so-called cousin marriage.

How did this variety come about? This leads us necessarily to the general problem of kuzennogo braka (cousin marriage /given in Eng./) as an important stage in the evolution of marriage. I shall allow myself to dwell briefly on this problem.

82 As long ago as 1900, in my report to the Russian 74 Geographical Society and in subsequent articles -- "Teoriia 21 rodovogo byta /Theory of Clan Life/" and "Endogamiia i 14 ekzogamiia /Endogamy and Exogamy/" -- starting from an analysis of the Gilyak form of marriage, I showed that cousin marriage is the primary form of exogamy and that it gave rise to the classificatory system of marriage, group marriage, and the institution of the clan. At that time I showed that the exogamous institution of the clan was not only an institution of prohibitions, but an institution whose main function was to provide a given kinship union with a constant reservoir of wives from a group of persons bound by a community of blood, which plays such an important role in the various stages of the community.

/214 cont./

582 *174 121 114 171 Works of recent times, in particular those of Rivers, Crawley, and Frazer, in connection with the work of their predecessors in the field of Australian and Dravidian marriage, such as Fison and Howitt, Spencer and Gillen, Kohler, and others, revealed not only the picture of the broad distribution of this form of marriage at the present time (1).

[113]

1. This picture entitled Crawley to say that "cousin marriage generally is the favorite form of marriage among primitive peoples" ("Exogamy and the Mating of Cousins," Anthropological Essays, Oxford, 1907, p. 57).

but on the basis of examples of Australian marriage they proved without a doubt that cousin marriage was the first experience of conscious restriction of marriages between brother and sister, and that all further evolution of marriage represented a series of gradual limitations on marriages between cousins of the first degree. One cardinal question in this problem still, one might say, remains open. This is the question of why /215/ cousin marriage demands marriage between the children of brother and sister, but at the same time prohibits marriage between the children of two brothers or between the children of two sisters. Only Rivers directly refuses to find an explanation for this striking fact. "Cousin marriage," he says, "is, according to all appearances, a survival. It is quite difficult to find a straightforward psychological basis explaining why marriage between the children of a brother and a sister is desired, while marriage between the children of two brothers or two sisters is so strictly prohibited" (1).

582 *174 114 121

[113]

1. "Marriage /of/ Cousins in India," The Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society, July, 1907, p. 623.

/215 cont./

582 Others have attempted to give an explanation for this 174 fact, but these explanations are purely mechanical. Kohler, 114 for example, sees an explanation of this fact in the dual 121 organization of society (2) -- an explanation which is at least strange, for the dual organization itself is a consequence of the institution of cousin marriage. Crawley holds the same point of view as Kohler and therefore falls into the same error. He considers this form of cousin marriage to be "an automatic result of the fact that the name of the family is inherited. The children of brother and sister may marry because by their names they belong to opposite phratries" (3).

2. Zur Urgeschichte der Ehe, 121.

3. Crawley, op. cit., 57.

Frazer expresses himself in the same way. According to him, the reason that it is forbidden for these cousins of the first degree, i.e., children of two brothers or two sisters, to marry rests on the fact that they belong to one and the same exogamous class and are therefore restrained by the basic law which forbids a man to marry a woman from his own exogamous class.

The basic mistake of all these writers consists in their having taken the result for the cause, namely, that the so-called cross-cousin marriage, i.e., marriage between the children of brother and sister, was a result of the division of society into two exogamous classes, but they do not raise the question of just what it was that gave rise, in turn, to this dual division. In reality, the dual division into two exogamous classes was a result of the new institution of marriage between children of brother and sister, replacing the earlier endogamous blood marriage.

582 Before that, the group -- the descendants of one an-174 cestress -- was /216/ indivisible; marriages took place 121 within the group, usually between brother and sister. And 601 171 174 [595] [835] periods in the evolution of marriage, and, although they could have influenced one another, they basically belong, speaking in the language of geology, to different formations. It is sufficient to say that among the Tungus tribes sexual intercourse with wives of individuals of ascending generations is allowed, for example, with the wife of the father's younger brother, while among the Gilyak this is regarded as incest.

595 581 [583] [851] 611 [551] [684] 614 [582] At first sight the Gilyak institution of marriage does not seem to be anything special. A Gilyak will generally buy one or rarely two or three wives, who come over into his clan and are regarded before the world as his personal wives and the mothers of his children. The children belong exclusively to the father and succeed him after his death. When a Gilyak becomes a father, he is no longer called by his former name, but is called the father of the born child. The exclusive possession of his wives expresses itself in the stern custom of blood vengeance against the disturber of marital harmony. The clan is based on the principle of agnation, and marriage is exogamous.

593 601 [592] [352] One can travel over the entire territory of the Gilyak, live in their yurts, and observe their family life for a long time, and not notice anything peculiar in the structure of their family. In large winter yurts the inhabitants occupy their plank beds by families, each living in relation to its own particular interests. Complete harmony and tender relations prevail among husband, wife, and their children. That is not all. One may frequently [965] encounter instances of striking loyalty and love between spouses. When one of them dies, the other frequently lays hands on himself or dies from grief. In a word, to all appearances we are dealing with the type of family which is generally called patriarchal. Actually, however, it is not. First of all, one is struck by the strange kinship nomenclature. A whole group of women call a whole group of men their husbands (pu, ivn), and the latter call them their wives (an'gej). Likewise, a whole group of men call a group of women their mothers (ymk) and a group of men their fathers (ytk), and these call the former their children.

615 614 582 but Stepanova; her daughter (a granddaughter of Varvara's), in turn, from birth, as the wife of one of the Vasil'evs (of clan V) would be called Vasil'eva, but, the daughter of this last, i.e., Varvara's great-granddaughter, would have to be the wife of one of the Andreevs (of clan A) /47/ and thus, in the third generation, she would again bear the class sobriquet of her great-grandmother.

582 [601] 6) As we have seen, Gilyak marriage to a considerable extent simplifies our understanding of the complicated kinship nomenclature, for in the Gilyak system of marriage many categories of the Turanian system of kinship, which at first sight appear completely independent, are in fact identical, such as, for example, wives of brothers, sisters of the wife, and sisters of the wives of brothers turn out to be the same persons, just like mothers, wives of the father's brothers, sisters of the father-in-law, sisters of the mother, etc.

But these are all facts of a secondary character. It seems to me that the scheme of Gilyak marriage can shed light on certain basic questions about primitive marriage.

1) From an analysis of the norms of Gilyak marriage, we have seen that from the simple, single rule that men must marry daughters of their mother's brother, there inevitably arise by natural necessity such complex institutions as group marriage, the clan, the phratry, and finally marriage prohibitions.

174 ●583 614 615 [171] 2) An analysis of the Gilyak regulations sheds light on the genesis of the institution of abduction in general and in particular, on the strange institution of mock abduction, an institution which is practiced among such primitive peoples as the Australians and the Eskimo, and, furthermore, in such strange forms that it is quite impossible to consider it a simple remnant of actual abduction, as is normally thought. Let us recall again our tri-clan phratry with its norms of marriage. Clan A must take wives from clan V and give up its women to clan S. We shall remember that in the primitive stages of development such obligations are religious imperatives, the violation of

174 ●583 614 615 which brings the punishment of the gods. Now let us suppose that clan V, from which A takes wives, has died out, or that there are too few women in it, which is quite in the order of things. Clan A cannot take wives in other phratries, for there each clan saves its women for the clan of the father's sister; the alien clan, even if it had extra women, cannot decide to deviate from this imperative for fear of bringing on itself the punishment of the gods, of the gods-ancestors, for whom marriages with those of other blood constitute the greatest of insults. And a similar vengeance threatens the clan who would make use of women of other blood. Marriage is indispensable, however. Two alternatives then remain: either to abduct a woman by force, risking bringing on oneself the vengeance of the gods, /48/ to say nothing of the vengeance of the clan of the one stolen, or to circumvent the law, deceiving the gods about the real intentions of one's actions, i.e., a voluntary agreement is reached with the parents of the bride and with her herself, whereby these latter appear to resist the abduction with all their strength, while the bridegroom, in the most conscientious manner, does everything required to give to the marriage act the look of real coercion.

171 174 583 Only with such an explanation of abduction can we understand why, for example, the Australian kurnai, having allowed their daughter to run away with her loved one, set out in pursuit after her and, having caught her, pierce her leg with a spear and beat her half to death. The Australians themselves explain this, not as animosity, but as custom.

This, however, is not all. Among many tribes the bridegroom himself considers it his duty to beat his loved one no less cruelly than her parents: by this he desires to show the gods, and the gods-ancestors in particular, that the capture of the girl was in no way caused by a desire on his part to marry her.

Finally, only with this illumination on the hypothesis of the religious origin of the custom can we explain such a universal occurrence of the institution, which, in the form of mock abduction, is practiced in the marriage ceremony of even civilized peoples.

/48 cont./

174 This likewise explains the custom of avoiding one's father-● 583 in-law (for he may not be one's mother's brother); this also ex-614 plains why, for example, the Gilyak calls a bride who is not 615 from the clan of his mother by the term sokh /sic: see yokh on 606 p. 76/, a term meaning a category prohibited with regard to sex, because a woman who is not from his mother's clan originally could not be his wife; and other such phenomena.

174 Finally, this explains the universal custom of the bride price, 583 the custom of a payment for one's bride. Abduction is a sin 614 against the clan of the one abducted, a sin which demands atone-[673] ment, by force or by a material fine from the abducter. Among [689] the Gilyak this sin of atonement comes down to the third gen-[682] eration inclusive. The bride price, therefore, is that same blood-money, that same material form of atonement for a sin, [192] as for the killing of a clansman. It is not a coincidence that the blood money for a slain clansman and that for an abducted woman bear the same name, tkhusind, among the Gilyak.

174 In conclusion I shall allow myself to make another, perhaps 583 somewhat risky conclusion. Let us suppose that, as frequently happens after wars, the men of clan A who take wives from clan V have died out and there is no one to continue the clan. The maidens of clan V then remain /49/ without husbands,for the parents' fear of the punishment of the gods is stronger than their love for their children. From here it is one step to the killing of maidens. A considerable time must elapse for the superstitious spirit of primitive man to reconcile itself to necessity and begin to resort to the deception of his gods, arranging the comedies, sometimes cruel, of mock abduction.

V.

Religion of the Gilyak

771 In his world view the Gilyak, like every primitive man, is an animist. A dead, unreasoning nature does not exist for him; on the contrary, all nature is endowed with life and reason. If the Gilyak could parody the famous dictum of Hegel, he could say with greater right than the latter that all that exists is rational.

/84/

*614 Once the above-mentioned principle was created and became an immutable imperative of life, the natural consequence was the appearance of exogamy, and exogamy is the foundation of the clan.

But the exogamy of the Gilyak,as we have seen, is not the mere obligation to take wives from outside their clan. It gives a man a whole series of rights, which play an enormous role in his life.

We know that the acquisition of a wife is one of the most difficult problems of primitive man. There are ordinarily ● [583] fewer women than men. One must pay for a woman, and to [556] make matters worse each of the wealthy men snatch up many wives. For the poor man -- and such are in the majority -- acquiring a wife under such conditions is far from easy; frequently he must even resort to methods that risk his life.

The norms of Gilyak marriage give each Gilyak the right to the women of the akhmal'k clan, in particular to the daughters of the brothers of his mother; this is simultaneously [583] his religious obligation and right. The bride price in such cases, if not a formality, is a burden which each one always has a right to expect his clansmen, interested, like himself, in his marriage to a woman from a certain clan, the clan of his mother, to share. In the worst of cases, until a man succeeds in setting up his own family, the families of his older brothers, with whom he shares the right to the women of the akhmal'k clan, are his family, their wives are his wives, to [587] whom he has lawful conjugal rights. When a married Gilyak [768] dies, his wife passes without any bride price to one of his younger brothers determined by the choice of the clan.

*614 These are all advantages which play a role of the 587 first order in the eyes of primitive man. The crown of 768 these advantages is the social privilege of every clansman of not having to fear for the fate of his wife and his children after his death. His wife and children during his life are juridically, and frequently factually as well, the wife and children of his younger brothers; they will remain such after

/124 cont./

*614 it is true, very young, unmarried, and it is dif 615 what happened to their feelings later on, but t 608 bility of such examples illustrates boldly the r tween members of matrimonial clans.

*614 The principle of mutual aid between memb 615 monial clans is reflected in the right of inherit 428 despite the strict agnatic basis, there is only o ● 583 namely, with regard to the pandf'y; by a will know, the ymgi can obtain the iron "shagund" for the bride price), while the akhmal'k can o "shagund" (going toward the bride's dowry). T reduces the bride price to the simple formality from one pocket and putting it in another, ser as an important indication of the fact that orig the Gilyak the bride price did not bear the cha ment for the bride, but rather was a form of re But for what?

*614 The fact is that under the Gilyak norms of 615 bride price is in general a strange anomaly. A 174 marriage /125/ from the clan of the mother is 583 ligation, and even preferable between the chil and sister, how can there be any talk of payme the bride? Obviously the rise of this institution been due to some recent change in the marriag [178] change we know: it consisted in the fact that when marriage from the clan of the mother wa it became necessary to take wives from a stran this clan, in its turn, was obligated to keep its own lawful ymgi and therefore could only acce away its women by masking it with some act o of the gods, which would at the same time be [182] father-in-law. By analogy with the religious of revenge (see above), there thus arose the ins bride price, satisfying both the interests of the and the dictates of religion. In its turn, the y my children and your children also be ashmakik'i. If you do not give your daughter to my son, you will completely break the old law, that will be bad. Let us do everything according to law ('live pure').."

/269 cont./

After such a reminder, rarely does anyone refuse his duty, even though this obligation entails the loss of property, for in such cases they either do not give a bride price, or they give a very small one, if the ashmakik is not an ancient one.

Unorthodox forms of concluding marriage. The most varied circumstances led to the destruction of orthodox marriages in the clans of ashmakik'i. One of the causes was the depopulation of the clans from which they took wives, which compelled them to marry women of alien clans. Another cause, perhaps the most important, was an economic one, brought about by their contact with the cultured peoples of the Far East, a contact which gave impetus to the development of hunting pursuits for commercial exchange. Objects which formerly had no value, such as the skins of the sable and fox, became objects for which one might obtain not only objects of luxury, such as expensive cloth, valuable weapons, and ornaments, but also food and spices, such as rice, groats, and, finally, alcohol and tobacco. Even nowadays the Gilyak clearly remember the time when sables and foxes used to run around fearlessly in great numbers near the Gilyak dwellings, and no one /270/ killed them, since they preferred to drive themselves in dog hides. And all of a sudden in exchange for these beasts it became possible to obtain the most desirable objects. A tremendous change inevitably took place in the psychics of the Gilyak and in the relationships of the people among themselves. If formerly a man's dream did not go beyond attaining the reputation of a good person, udla n'ivukh, i.e., an outstanding hunter who shared his catch with his tribesmen, now udla n'ivukh became a synonym for "rich man," whose dream was to amass a quantity of luxury objects. Self-interest and boasting appeared upon the scene, as well as the desire to excel others in one's own wealth, although it only amounted to the possession of several pieces of silk material, Japanese sabers, and so forth. There appeared on the scene a tendency toward differentiation. The rich man desired to associate with and become related to only rich people. In the question of the choice of a wife there appeared new dictates. One demanded of a wife that she be from a family of equal wealth and, consequently, of an equally high social rank. And now, even in the ancient "yiqunl" -- legends -- there is heard in matrimonial dealings the expression: "He (or she) is not my equal." On the other hand, wealth allowed one to manifest a special fastidiousness in the choice of a wife, to seek women who were famous for their special qualities, who were outstanding for their beauty, their domestic talents, their artistry in sewing, and other feminine tasks. But once marriage came to be practiced between members of alien clans, the former simplicity of concluding marriage vanished. There appeared on the scene the new institution of bride price, which introduced into the institution of marriage the element of purchase-sale; besides this, marriage between persons of alien clans demanded preliminary negotiations and the procedures of betrothal. We now turn to these institutions.

/270 cont./

The terms of betrothal. The procedure of betrothal is expressed by various terms, denoting literally, "to agree, to come to an agreement about the bride"; hence, the matchmaker -- "the man who makes an agreement"; bride -- "future wife"; groom -- "future husband." For us, the terms for groom and bride are particularly interesting. With orthodox marriage there is no special term for groom and bride, for according to the right of birth the groom is called pu -- husband, and the bride -- an k-e-j. The term jokh, which is used nowadays to designate the bride, is entirely inadmissible with orthodox marriage, for, as we have seen, with orthodox marriage jokh is a term of prohibition for sexual intercourse. Thus, the term itself shows that the procedure of betrothal arose after the weakening of the regime of orthodox marriage.

/279 cont./ Along with the distribution of the bride

price within the family, customs of a completely exceptional character are preserved, clearly testifying to the old orthodox form of marriage. Namely, part of the bride price is given to the "old ashmakik," i.e., to that ashmakik with whom a given family has concluded orthodox matrimonial unions. Thus, for example, if in the course of several generations family A has taken wives from family B, i.e., the sons of sisters in each generation have married the daughters of their own brothers, then every time the family gives in marriage any one of its women, who, as we see, are forbidden to the men of family B by virtue of the unilaterality of the cousin marriage, and receives bride price, then a part of it is given to the eldest one in family B, usually to the brother of the mother of the woman who has been given in marriage, rarely to the father of the latter, if he is alive. It is curious that the family of the groom presents this gift to the old ashmakik as part of the bride price. This custom is practiced in a still more striking form. They give their infant sister to the brother of their mother, or their daughter to the brother of their wife, in order that these persons may afterwards receive the bride price for them, but participation in the distribution of the latter may not be demanded. "It is better to propose one's daughter or sister to the old ashmakik oneself," the Gilyak usually add when they are talking about this custom, "than to wait for a request about the matter." And this is not all: if a mother has several brothers and a nephew has several sisters, then one /of the sisters/ is supposed to be given to each /of the brothers/. What is the explanation of this strange custom? We have a completely analogous case among the Tamil, where the mother's brother also receives a part of the bride price when the woman is given /280/ in marriage. But among the Tamil cousin marriage is bilateral, so that if a man's sister does not give her daughter in marriage to the son of her brother, she thereby breaks the law; but among the Gilyak cousin marriage is unilateral, and for the son of the brother of the mother the daughter of his last is forbidden. But why then does the mother's brother have such preference? Here a double explanation is possible:

/280 cont./

it is a remnant of maternality when the mother's brother played a privileged role; the contemporary institution of unilateral cousin marriage among the Gilyak appeared to replace the more ancient bilateral one when every maiden was obliged to marry the son of her mother's brother, and thus the custom which we are observing is a remnant of a more ancient norm of marriage.

I turn now to the other principal obligation, the companion to the institution of marriage -- to the dowry.

For the dowry the Gilyak have the term jokh shond-, signifying literally -- "the thing which is brought by the bride, the woman." The dowry consists mainly of various types of clothing and ornaments. The dowry of a rich bride consists of an assortment of valuable fur-coats -- fox and sable -- and silver bracelets, expensive earrings, Chinese pipes, and also rich, carved, and decorated dishes, including an assortment of artistically decorated birch spoons. The mother usually gives her ornaments to her daughter, and sometimes also a bed, but for some reason one must not give away pillows. They begin to prepare the dowry in the very earliest years and continue up until the marriage of the maiden. This is called jokh wakh -- "to get the bride ready." They lay away the dowry in good time in sacred chests with the family valuables, among which, in a well-to-do family, the bride usually sits solemnly. The size of the dowry usually should be proportional to the size of the bride price. When the gossiping women talk about one or another wedding, they refer to a "rich" and a "poor" dowry. It is considered a matter of the greatest pride to provide the daughter with a male or female slave besides her dowry. In the clan of a Gilyak of my acquaintance, Yuskin, they gave to a maiden as part of her dowry a female slave (akh), whom they provided with a Japanese saber for cleaning the soles of her mistress' boots. Especially ambitious rich people set aside a separate house for their daughter-bride, and a slave, who is later given to her as dowry, put in it to serve her.

The dowry, although it is compensation for the bride price, since it frees the husband from great expenditures for the wife, is nevertheless exclusively a gift to the bride, her private property /281/ to which the husband has no rights whatsoever.

/286 cont./

went to the Amgun and left a sharpened stick (chiakl-varadz-, Gilyak gesmiz, geshka nanji); the second party did not /287/ notice and traveled to Chkharbakh (Turkhung), while the third party did not like the fast current of the Amgun and it settled in Gok.

After the Chinese, Tyr was inhabited by the Kojma-fing see Koyma above/. This was at the time when "the pike lived on land and the snake in the water; the pike used to bite, and war was declared on it with a net, arrows, and so forth. Then the god decided that the pike should live in the water and the snake under the stones." After this the Kojma-fing left for Koyma.

Settlement of De, one kilometer from Tyr. 1) Khal Ajumka. 2) Khal Samakhaji. 3) Khal N'ashkhaj.

Settlement of Khok (one and a half kilometers from Tyr). 1) Kalm-fing -- Gilyak. 2) The Udan clan (Khan'gan -- forty years of age) -- Negda; moved from the Amgun, and it had come to the Amgun from Udyli.

Settlement of Kal'ma at seven and a half kilometers from Tyr. Three Chinese; one of them married to a Gilyak woman One Kugi from Kounaya has already lived here 20 years; he is not married, "no money to buy a wife."

A khal living here is a mixture of the Chokchagli and the Aimu khal'a of Dmittriya in Tyr. They make chêdzigr (see below) and select their wives from the Olcha and the Gilyak; there are women from the Amgun as well. At the present time they may not take women from the Chokchagl. They can take two sisters. They may not exchange women between clans. Here they may take widows as well. The daughter is given to the wife of the brother in order to be sold, but he cannot demand this. At the bear festival anyone can shoot at the bear (1910).

Settlement of Dal'dzha. -- A Negidal clan. Originally the Ry-Negda lived in Dal'dzha, 30 kilometers from here. They all died (only one girl remained). They lived at a winter encampment. Once upon a time, in summer, a tiger appeared before the entrance. They attempted to get out of the yurt, but could not. Finally they got out by stepping over the tiger. Then Settlement of Tebakh, a village some 20 years ago (1896). Vas'. Cape Vasin. 1) Levkh-ping. The cape lies next to Nifevo; 2) Derbir-vun (1896).

/290 cont./

Kuklya and Meo. The first master of the village before the Russians was the Kegin clan; now nine persons are left; they live in Vas' (1896). Meo-fing, from Khayma above Bogorodskoye (1896).

Settlement of Kol'. Clans: 1. Miera-fing. Miera -- the oldest khal -- this Chvunung khal (Larun) came from the north from the Ali River (a two-day walk from Shantar -- Kyvmif); then the khal separated, and part of it went to Sakhalin (Larun, Vlevut). It takes women from the Khovnung. The Ali is a river as broad as the Amur. A long, long time ago Y'lur and Gilyak were one khal. They heard that the Aleut, too, raise dogs and hold the bear festival. 2. Tigr tor ping. A man sailed on a hoyykh (raft) down the Amur. The Machinskiye Gilyak caught him and brought him here in a boat. Takes women from the Perkhvung. 3. Kedzung (from Petakha) -- takes women from the Khovnung. 4. Perkhvung (from Sakhalin). Takes women from the Khovnung. 5. Nynkhay-fing and Khovnung from the settlement of Kyt beyond Sofisk where the Nynkhay River is (they came from there -- chiniroikh). There is here in Kol' one khal from Khovnung. It takes women from the Langy. 6. Khovnung (Goldi). Two brothers quarreled and decided to divide the ox -- chain and stone on the little-leaf one of the brothers, and then killed her. They have a Nima dagger with a silver handle. Take women from the Snarning. 7. The Snarning take women from the Perkhvung. 8. The Tyvliing -- from Ulkhir, near Sofisk (Onyr). Takes women from the Perkhvung.

/291/ The old man Nashg (86 years of age): his clan has lived here for at least 150 years, in his opinion, eight generations. At the present time his khal is Snarning. His ancestor came from the Amgun; at the mouth of the Amgun he set up a post, but it fell down. He traveled with his family to Lake Chiya and crossed to here. Now his clan is on the Amgun -- N'ash'khaji. He came on foot. He also broke the fire. He bought the Tyyv River (a tributary of the Kol') by exchanging his sister for it (1896).

/299 cont./

calls him a slave, he can bring suit against them, and therefore when you ask the descendant of a slave what clan he is from, he replies quietly: "Pilavon kikhal purard hokhagin on' krygrys" (1).

1. Krygrys -- an Aimu slave; akh -- a Chinese one.

i.e., that he is from the Pilavo clan, by origin a slave ("root slave"). When people swear, they say: "You are pure only to your neck, while there you are impure."

/300/ If a krygrys bought himself free and his master had to give him a wife, an economy, and part with him, he would still be considered a krygrys, impure. Every krygrys was considered a kikhal, and, until he passed to a free state, he was serfed, and he participated in the sacrifices. A good krygrys is given a share of his earnings -- he has the right to half of the income and can claim it through the courts -- of the khlaj-n'ivukh; older women have the right to participate in a trial (they are invited and have the right to come themselves if they feel sympathy for the slave). It is permitted to complain about beatings.

A krygrys woman cannot demand a share in court, because she is married. Nor can a share be demanded for her by her husband.

A Chinese slave, akh, has the same rights as the krygrys. A free one is kinyiygy n'ivukh ("pure"). The killing of a slave is punished by the clan. When drunk, they revile the murderer: "If you are a brave man, we have an elder beast (pal pila kotr -- big mountain bear, mer edr -- tiger), fight with him: it would have been better if you had killed a bear and treated us. We do not need brave men like you. You can only exhibit your courage in front of your wife." The women in particular attack him. Even at the present time, however, the descendants of the krygrys are treated with condescension. In 1909 two yurts of former slaves still stood in Takhta.

Slaves were most frequently acquired through the purchase of Aimu women, who received a male and a female slave as a

/300 cont./

567 part of their dowry. In buying wives, the price corresponded to 568 the additional slaves. In 1896 a former slave, about whom we 569 have the following information, lived there. A Nanai bought 570 from Kizi a Kugi (Ainu) maiden, and an illegitimate child was 571 born. Khuzin's father bought the son of this Kugi (kygryn) in 572 Kizi. He was 25 years old; he was paid for with nine pieces 573 of silk material (21 meters) at 75 rubles a piece.

This worker served him for five years. Eighteen years ago he ran away to Kizi, and then to Arvo (near Nishnetambovskiy).
The name of this kygyn was Kutz. His former master from Khez' summoned him to conduct shamans ceremonies, and he used this opportunity to run away. Now he is an old man and blind. One absolutely must take him back, though blind, feed him, and bury him with their own hands, and then his soul will follow him to Miyvo (his father, dying, requested this of him).

Chinese girls were bought in a similar fashion. It was necessary to take along 100 sables, 100 foxes, 100 otters, 100 squirrels, 100 polecats, between 10 and 100 black-brown foxes, 100 seals, and 100 bears. The traveler to Sanin was met by a merchant who would take away all their merchandise and, without counting it, would transport it to his warehouse. The visitors would be feted for two days and /301/ questioned in Goldi or through an interpreter. The newcomers would tell their hosts about their wish to get married, then they would record how much each had brought, and they would be taken to the governor. He would provide carriages and food, and they would be transported to the major city (Peking). They would be housed and accommodated in the palace, assigned servants, fed and looked after like "gentlemen," and taken around the city with an interpreter. Finally whole rows of women with covers over their faces would be lined up in front of them: behind each woman would stand a castrated slave. The old Gilyak would recommend:
"a young male slave -- an old woman -- a risk." They would choose right there; they would each be led to a room. A slave would sweep and spread out the bedding, and that very night he would learn his fate. They were painted. He sticks his tongue in the mouth; there are no teeth.

/301/

A person can take two sisters as wives. Brothers may take 595 two widows without distinction. It is best of all to take a wife from 596 the clan of one's mother, and then one can even get her for nothing, and even if a payment is required, it is less in any case.
In the past one did not pay for a woman if she was from the clan of one's mother. It is not permitted to exchange women between clans. Here, too, one's daughter is given for sale to the wife's brother, but the latter cannot demand this.

● 582 There is a prohibition against the descendants of one's sister down to the fourth generation.

In Vaydy (see above) there are Gilyak of the Hirulung clan who have entered into a union kikhal n'akhur; with the Khydzyr' in Chil'bi. Formerly, they lived together in the same locality and belonged to the clan of the tiger. There is a Gilyak clan which has become related to a snake (there are snakes on the Amgun; they were seen on the Amgun by Putyun) (1). There are

(114) 1. In the text, "boa," but, judging by note 6 on page 222 in Materialy po izucheniiu gilyatskogo iazyka i fol'klora /Materials on the Study of the Gilyak
Language and Folklore/, this is a mistake in the notes on the journey.

also Goldi who are kin to snakes.

A young man from Vaydy fell in love with the wife of a 533 Korean, a Gilyak woman, and enjoyed reciprocity. She went to 536 the town with a fish; the Korean stayed to guard the potatoes.
Then the lover went to the town. They met and spent two weeks in the town. She came home -- her mother also liked the Gilyak.

The Korean demanded that his wife sleep with him, but she resisted. At night the Gilyak woman ran outside and slept with the Gilyak. The husband gave her a beating; her mother and brothers tried to protect her; the Korean complained, why did he take a Gilyak woman. He killed the Korean (settlement of Mago).

/635 cont./

583 wife-abduction, it needs no further special refutation after what 714 has been said above. But in view of everything that I heard from them about it, I must also deny that the Gilyak must always undertake the much abduction of the bride or maiden in concluding a marriage, which can be regarded as a survival of a formerly obligatory wife-abduction among them. The abduction of a woman is never a /636/ trifling affair among them, but, as has been said, is damage to property, always a deadly serious business.

Let us now turn to the regular conclusion of marriage among ● 587 the Gilyak. Only to a very limited extent is blood relationship 60 an obstacle to marriage, in that only siblings and the children of brothers are not permitted to marry each other. Even in the language they are not differentiated, in that "ykyn" and "antchek" mean older and younger brother as well as older and younger cousin on the father's side, and "ranh" mean sister as well as female cousin on the father's side, and, accordingly, the brother and the sister of the father are designated with the same word as father and mother, namely, "ytyk" and "ymyk." But beyond that, 582 the membership of both partners in the same paternal kin group, which, as we have seen later, is also taken into account in other connections by the Gilyak, constitutes no obstacle to marriage among them as it does among some Siberian peoples (1) and,

(114) 1. As, for instance, among the Ostyak, Samoyed, Lapps Tylet /Tylot/, Forsch.
über die Urgesch. der Mensch. und die Entwick. der Civilis. /Researches into the Early History of Mankind and the Development of Civilization/, transl. from the English by H. Müller, p. 359).

on the other hand, among the Chinese (2) and through them, in (113) 2. Du Halde, Descr. de l'Emp. de la Chine et de la Tart. Chinoise, Paris, 1735, Vol. III, p. 133. Panthier,

● 582 (113)

2. (cont.)
Chine mod. ou descr. de ce vaste Emp.
d'après des docum. chinois, Part I, pp. 25, 275; Part II, p. 238. Iahin[?], Kitai /China/, St. Petersb., 1840, p. 198.

as much distorted form, among the Goldi (3). Even a difference

3. A more detailed explanation of this will be given in the following.

563 Even a difference 622 of nationality is by no means as decisive for the conclusion of the marriage as the Gilyak does not usually feel any great the radical difference of their language from those of all their neighbors.
On the mainland there are frequent marriages between the Gilyak and their immediate neighbors on the Amur, the Olcha, and probably it is to this circumstance above all that the similarity in the cus-tons and usages of the two peoples, or, in other words, the Gilyakization of the Olcha stretched several times already, is to be attributed. I no longer repeat what I already stated, as was pointed out at the beginning of this section, can be spoken of here, I must limit myself to a few statements tied in with the above remarks about the Gilyak.

/637/ In the preceding chapter the high degree of equalization that has taken place between the Olcha and the Gilyak in all aspects of the external life has been discussed -- an equalization which must be regarded as an assimilation of the former by the latter. This high degree of equalization has also taken place with regard to the family relations of the two peoples, which, in fact, become the basis for the most penetrating and enduring manifestation of this assimilation, both externally and internally.
And the medium that served and still serves to bring about this equalization may be clearly discerned, namely, the frequent mixed marriages which have taken place between these two peoples since the Olcha migrated to the Amur and, after the loss of their reindeer, settled down there as fishermen in the immediate neighborhood of the Gilyak, marriage which even today are concluded between them continually. In this manner the

G 614 615 616 625

● 582

G 648 649 650

● 582

/637 cont./

example, in the above-mentioned case of Nendjan, drive one to bloodshed, and then the instinct of self-preservation may keep many ● 582 impulses. The Gilyak believe that a 30-year-old man (which means a 15-year-old, because the Gilyak's year corresponds to our half year) can marry. However, this is also only an approximation, for they do not actually count their years.
A merchant who for a long time associated with the Gilyak
and who had a good memory and a gift of observation, told me that he knew of two married couples, the partners of which he had known since childhood. The woman of one of them had a child at the age of 15, the other woman was 20 years old and complained that her husband who was 14 was not yet a man. I, too, was shown 15-year-old boys with half child-like features and narrow shoulders and was told that they could marry if they found a bride. We may conclude that marriage is permissible during puberty, but actually this does not often occur. At least among men there are not infrequent examples of mature individuals (around 23 -25 years old) who are still unmarried. Cases where the woman is older are rare, but the opposite often occurs. In fact, some mature men take four or five-year-old girls and rear them until they reach womanhood.

As far as marriage between close relatives is concerned,
it is known that cousins marry, but that the older generation does not favor this; thus these people must also have had experiences pertaining to the harmfulness of such marriages.
An uncle may be permitted to marry his niece. [127]

586 Women are in general well treated by men, partly because 595 the Gilyak customs bear the mark of instinctive humanity.
562 party because divorce is very easy. The wife of a tyrannical husband will soon be abducted by an admirer who usually settles down with her and pays the payment of a dowry. Progress now and then that a well-to-do man has several wives, but only lives with his favorite one and keeps the others as workers.
Soon, however, this leads to quarrels, and the neglected ones make an effort to get out of the situation. In all other respects, however, even such workers are well treated, especially because they are needed. As long as a woman can work, and particularly if she is skillful at needle work, she can always find a husband.

562 In general one may conclude that, theoretically, the Gilyak 587 woman seems to be regarded as somewhat inferior to the man, but actually this has no practical effects; on the contrary, the opposite is often the case. The inferiority of women is reflected in the payment of dakyun, which is 58 years in her parental home. At what time such married couples actually enter the marital state is difficult to say.

Probably, however, it is determined by the awakening sex impulse. The Gilyak believe that a 30-year-old man (which means a 15-year-old, because the Gilyak's year corresponds to our half year) can marry. However, this is also only an approximation, for they do not actually count their years.
A merchant who for a long time associated with the Gilyak
and who had a good memory and a gift of observation, told me that he knew of two married couples, the partners of which he had known since childhood. The woman of one of them had a child at the age of 15, the other woman was 20 years old and complained that her husband who was 14 was not yet a man. I, too, was shown 15-year-old boys with half child-like features and narrow shoulders and was told that they could marry if they found a bride. We may conclude that marriage is permissible during puberty, but actually this does not often occur. At least among men there are not infrequent examples of mature individuals (around 23 -25 years old) who are still unmarried. Cases where the woman is older are rare, but the opposite often occurs. In fact, some mature men take four or five-year-old girls and rear
them until they reach womanhood.

As far as marriage between close relatives is concerned,
it is known that cousins marry, but that the older generation
does not favor this; thus these people must also have had experiences pertaining to the harmfulness of such marriages.
An uncle may be permitted to marry his niece. [127]

586 Women are in general well treated by men, partly because 595 the Gilyak customs bear the mark of instinctive humanity.
562 party because divorce is very easy. The wife of a tyrannical husband will soon be abducted by an admirer who usually settles down with her and pays the payment of a dowry. Progress now and then that a well-to-do man has several wives, but only lives with his favorite one and keeps the others as workers. Soon, however, this leads to quarrels, and the neglected ones make an effort to get out of the situation. In all other respects, however, even such workers are well treated, especially because they are needed. As long as a woman can work, and particularly if she is skillful at needle work, she can always find a husband.

562 In general one may conclude that, theoretically, the Gilyak 587 woman seems to be regarded as somewhat inferior to the man, but actually this has no practical effects; on the contrary, the opposite is often the case. The inferiority of women is reflected in the payment of dakyun, which is

AB6 Aimu AB6
Gilyak RX2
Goldi RX3

CHAPTER XVIII

A WOMAN CHANGED INTO A BEAR

A 735

In a former chapter I told how the Ainu have a story about a baby being changed into a bird, namely a goat-sucker. In the following legend we are told how a woman was turned into a bear, and how a bear became a man and then changed back into a bear again.
We also saw in another place how another woman became a frog. And in this story now to be translated we have it mentioned that the Northern Ainu, like the Orok and Gilyak tribes, practised polyandry. In fact, it might seem that brothers and sisters married one another up there in olden times.

"There was a certain village in which there lived two brothers who occupied the same house. They were expert hunters. So clever were they that they used to kill their quarry with lances only. When they went hunting seals, whether by boat on the sea or walking on the ice, they took many of these creatures. Although there were many brave people in the other villages, yet there were none who were as clever and brave and fortunate as these two men.

"One day the whole family stayed resting and talking in the house, but on the day following the men went out to catch large game. The chief wife went off to dig up tubers (Cryptata) on the slopes of a solitary mountain there was near the place. While busy digging up the roots, a young man came down the slope out of the forest. He had a fine black beard. He came up to the place where she was working and asked her for her pipe, saying, "Please hand me your pipe and [p133]

583 MODE OF MARRIAGE - wife-capture (e.g., actual, ceremonial); marriage by exchange (e.g., of sisters); wife-purchase; marriage by payment of consider-tion (e.g., substantial bride-price, bonus-price, service-price, bride-service to (e.g., premarital, postmarital); marriage by gift exchange; marriage by forma or informal imitation of common residence; temporary and trial marriage; elopement (e.g., mutiny, subsequent adjustment); presence and prestige of each mode; relation to rules of residence; conceptualization of bride-pric or dowry (e.g., as purchase price, as compensation for loss of services, as guarantee of marriage stability); content and mode of payment of consideration; contributors and recipients; etc. See also:
Gift-giving . . . . . 431 Residence rule 521 Infrequent modes in secondary marriage . 587

/155 cont. /

violated its own law, protected itself by another fiction: the violated man of the "unlawful" father-in-law received the title of ahimat'k and became, as it were, a lawful clan for marriage unions. As such instances increased, the bride price, whose exclusive genesis had been forgotten, became the general rule in all marriages, even with lawful clans.

Such, perhaps, was the origin of the bride price among other peoples as well.

4. Another weighty factor which consolidated the bonds between matriarchal clans is the opinion of the gandi'y in the bear festival.

In the opinion of cementing interclan relations it plays almost a greater role than the Olympic games for the tribal unification of the Greeks. The bear festival takes place every winter, now in one, now in another settlement, and it organizes sometimes a rare winter games without a festival. Attendance at such a festival involves no difficulties. The bear, which every household poisonous, is harmless, and off they go; the rest is on the guest's worry.

Everywhere on the road, as in the village where the festival is held, his dogs will be fed and he himself will be treated to the choicest delicacies. The only difficulty in the organization of travel there is a whole array of high social gratifications: the bear sports, the very sacrifice of the festival — the procession, the shooting at the target, the killing, the skinning of the bear, etc.; then, meetings with the abkut and most respected representatives of the tribe. Finally, the competition /'ijgi' in wrestling, races, and dances, the feast, conversations, jokes, and songs, in a word, an endless series of congratulations. Against the sober background of hut gray existence, the hungry days, the deprivations, dangers, and tremendous impressions, the bear festivals appear as the most joyous moments of existence, as it were, landmarks of everyday life which one recollects and dreams about. But these festivals, unfortunately, are strictly regulated. Besides clansmen, only yengi are invited, and these have the right to invite their own yengi but abkut's for the mass, and more or less bloody for the woman. But all this concerns only cases involving a marriage. Sexual relations with an unmarried woman or with a widow, if it is with the permission of the women, do not prejudice marriage, even on the part of the father or brothers of the wife, notwithstanding their extreme interest in the bride price which is received when a woman gets married. It, at least, does not happen to bear of regressions in such cases. A reaction on the part of the kinsmen of the woman occurs only in case of coercion; then there is the possibility of death and suits for ransom. Also, at the present time there are no prohibitions against marrying women of their own kin (Gilyak), as, for example, in the Amur region. It is another matter with individuals who are bound by the relationship of kinship. In the past, this relationship was the scene a complete system of limitations and prohibitions.

/150 cont. /

Yet, against the violations of these prohibitions, there appears on the scene both a social reaction and the categorical imperative of religion, under the influence of which there have developed suitable legends and myths, and artificially created norms into natural human feelings. We shall dwell on this aspect of Gilyak psychic in more detail later, when we speak of sexual morals. Now we shall turn to the norms of prohibitions and limitations themselves.

These prohibitions and limitations, it turns out, fully correspond with the kinship nomenclature. Only those persons who, according to the kinship nomenclature, are considered mutually reckoned in the clause "pu" and "ni-kyu", that is, /'i'i/ also from birth call each other "husband" and "wife," have the right to sexual relations with one another and to enter into matrimony. All the remaining clansmen are placed under the strictest prohibitions.

What are these prohibited classes? First of all there is the intercourse of ajakal, i.e., the persons born into one commonagnate clan. The Gilyak clan is absolutely exogamous; among the agnates, as we have seen, there are no marriages, and, in the past, even "pu" and "ni-kyu" neither marriage nor sexual intercourse is possible among them.

/145 cont. /

Concerning the primary obligation of marriages between pu and ni-kyu, supporting evidence is offered by another extremely important phenomenon, namely, the fact that the bride price, i.e., the payments which is received by the father of a woman, enjoyed the same degree of a sacred character as the bride price among an enormous role in the question of giving a woman in marriage, it has originally lacking or at least plays an insignificant /'ilili role. In cases of marriages between cousins of the first degree, not only is a bride price not demanded, but it is prohibited to demand it during the betrothal.

The absence of the bride price in marriages between pu and ni-kyu is clear evidence that the marriage between these categories was at one time an obligatory marriage, and in the case of obligatorness without saying that there can be no question of any financial obligation.

There is no doubt that the bride price was a later institution. In the traditional poems of the Gilyak, the so-called bride-wealth, the price for the woman, is artificially described, there is never any mention of the bride price. On the contrary, the "father-in-law" usually fill the boat of his bride with all kinds of valuables.

Remembering what an enormous role the bride price plays in the life of the Gilyak, the weakness of the explanation, the only resource for giving the economy of a poor man a start, it must be realized that the neglect of the bride price in marriages of the above-mentioned category cannot be caused by reasons of a sentimental nature, the motives for such an attitude toward the bride price must be sought in a compulsory character, that is, religious. We shall have to speak about the contemporary character of the bride price.

As an illustration, we merely point out the surprising relations that, thanks to this religious imperative of marriages between pu and ni-kyu, were characteristically established between persons of the class of "father-in-law" and their legal "son-in-law" /'ijgi'i/. These relations are surprising

/146 cont. /

"husband" and "wife." Thus, each man has several "fathers-in-law," and all the agnates of these class, according to the kinship nomenclature, call the "son-in-law" the wives of his kinsmen. So it is in the kinship terminology, and so it is in life.

It will be necessary for us to consider in detail later how this complicated system developed.

For the present, it is quite enough but been said to the that in the sphere of individual marriage the applications pu and ni-kyu have played and still play an enormous role, manifesting themselves the remarkable institution of the right to marriage — one of the many benefits which the clan system has brought to the Gilyak people.

Now we shall indicate only the practical significance of this institution, which, as we have seen, is the present time for the contemporary Gilyak, marriage is one of the most difficult matters of life. Not only in the fairy tales, but also in real life, there is no doubt that the bride price was a later institution. The traditional poems of the Gilyak, the so-called bride-wealth, the price for the woman, is artificially described, there is never any mention of the bride price. On the contrary, the "father-in-law" usually fill the boat of his bride with all kinds of valuables.

Remembering what an enormous role the bride price plays in the life of the Gilyak, the weakness of the explanation, the only resource for giving the economy of a poor man a start, it must be realized that the neglect of the bride price in marriages of the above-mentioned category cannot be caused by reasons of a sentimental nature, the motives for such an attitude toward the bride price must be sought in a compulsory character, that is, religious. We shall have to speak about the contemporary character of the bride price.

As an illustration, we merely point out the surprising relations that, thanks to this religious imperative of marriages between pu and ni-kyu, were characteristically established between persons of the class of "father-in-law" and their legal "son-in-law" /'ijgi'i/. These relations are surprising

/146 cont. /

My good friend and first teacher of the Gilyak language, Ivan Ivanovich Kenkin, was married to the daughter of an old Gilyak on Sakhalin, lived in just this way with his younger brother, Fiun. The latter was himself a no less capable person than his elder brother, enjoyed the name of an excellent hunter, and had been able to accumulate a huge quantity of "valuables," so that he could easily have taken for himself not one but several wives; nevertheless, he preferred to enjoy the wife of his older brother. It had evidently come about in this way: as a rule, he had enjoyed the wife of Ivan Kenkin, with the rights of any younger brother, but gradually a stronger attachment grew between the wife and the younger brother, and of an individual marriage, to live constantly with the wife of his elder brother, was quite natural. It is characteristic here that everyone, including Jibel'ka himself, regarded this as an entirely normal phenomenon. When I approached Gibel'ka himself with a request to tell me, he, with a shadow slipped across his handsome, intelligent face; he well knew how the Russian intelligentsia regarded this, and this question did not produce any particular impression on him.

He spoke enthusiastically about his two wife, loved his children (twenty), although he could not have any confidence whatsoever that they were his, and his son, a boy of 14, felt a great affection for his younger brother, the father of his children, for which he was reproaching him for his lack of manliness. Such examples are well known among the Tonda tribes, in spite of the fact that the Gilyak are not characterized by the number of females.

/146 cont. /

10. Likewise, with this arrangement the institution of the bride price, which, in the present, as we have seen, is not for the bride is not permitted; otherwise the obligation of marriage would be merely fictitious. This is also the case with the Gilyak today, no matter how avid the Gilyak may be for bride price, it is not permitted in cases of marriage to the daughter of the mother's brother.

In order that such an essentially exogamous system might be preserved and lasting, it is necessary that a number of favorable conditions is necessary. First of all, a whole complex of favorable economic, social and sanitary conditions is necessary. In the past, the Gilyak, in the majority of cases, lived in a state of poverty and of hunger, and, in general, there was no stimulus for the accumulation of riches. Until then there were only objects of consumption. No one accumulated them, and the wealth of the Gilyak was so small that no pecuniary fund was to share his acquisitions with others. Trade with the Russians brought a certain stimulus for accumulation, and appeared new valuables which it was impossible to consume, but which they began to value, which were profitable to accumulate, which were exchanged for the Russian commodities and which, people who did not have them and wished to possess them, were willing to give the maximum amount of their wealth and their importance, and together with this the ambition to become related to their equals. Among the poor people there arose the temptation to make the marrying of their daughters a source of the acquisition of valuables. The old form of the obligatory marriage, when the woman was given without a bride price, became unpardonable, and it was replaced by the new form of the marriage, more convenient the old imperative. Finally, the phenomenon of the institution of wealth strengthened the institution of individual marriage. The custom of brothers' living together with one bone of the wife, all the women born into the clan remained the property of the clan, and, in the past, the wife of all the same clan — the male cousins of their wives, the sons of the sisters of their fathers, the agnates of their husbands, women were all kin to each other, either sisters or aunts and nieces of each other, and, in the past, women of the clan were have led to the institution of /'ilili. But, for the wife which is giving its women in marriage in violation of the prohibition, this is a means of deceiving the gods, the gods-ancestors, to whom marriages with persons of alien blood are the gravest sin, and, in the past, a whole series of favorable conditions is necessary. First of all, a whole complex of favorable economic, social and sanitary conditions is necessary. In the past, the Gilyak, in the majority of cases, lived in a state of poverty and of hunger, and, in general, there was no stimulus for the accumulation of riches. Until then there were only objects of consumption. No one accumulated them, and the wealth of the Gilyak was so small that no pecuniary fund was to share his acquisitions with others. Trade with the Russians brought a certain stimulus for accumulation, and appeared new valuables which it was impossible to consume, but which they began to value, which were profitable to accumulate, which were exchanged for the Russian commodities and which, people who did not have them and wished to possess them, were willing to give the maximum amount of their wealth and their importance, and together with this the ambition to become related to their equals. Among the poor people there arose the temptation to make the marrying of their daughters a source of the acquisition of valuables. The old form of the obligatory marriage, when the woman was given without a bride price, became unpardonable, and it was replaced by the new form of the marriage, more convenient the old imperative. Finally, the phenomenon of the institution of wealth strengthened the institution of individual marriage. The custom of brothers' living together with one murdering the girls are possible. Such examples are well known among the Tonda tribes, in spite of the fact that the Gilyak are not characterized by the number of females.

/148 cont. /

/148 cont. /

10. Likewise, with this arrangement the institution of the bride price, which, in the present, as we have seen, is not for the bride is not permitted; otherwise the obligation of marriage would be merely fictitious. This is also the case with the Gilyak today, no matter how avid the Gilyak may be for bride price, it is not permitted in cases of marriage to the daughter of the mother's brother.

In order that such an essentially exogamous system might be preserved and lasting, it is necessary that a number of favorable conditions is necessary. First of all, a whole complex of favorable economic, social and sanitary conditions is necessary. In the past, the Gilyak, in the majority of cases, lived in a state of poverty and of hunger, and, in general, there was no stimulus for the accumulation of riches. Until then there were only objects of consumption. No one accumulated them, and the wealth of the Gilyak was so small that no pecuniary fund was to share his acquisitions with others. Trade with the Russians brought a certain stimulus for accumulation, and appeared new valuables which it was impossible to consume, but which they began to value, which were profitable to accumulate, which were exchanged for the Russian commodities and which, people who did not have them and wished to possess them, were willing to give the maximum amount of their wealth and their importance, and together with this the ambition to become related to their equals. Among the poor people there arose the temptation to make the marrying of their daughters a source of the acquisition of valuables. The old form of the obligatory marriage, when the woman was given without a bride price, became unpardonable, and it was replaced by the new form of the marriage, more convenient the old imperative. Finally, the phenomenon of the institution of wealth strengthened the institution of individual marriage. The custom of brothers' living together with one

/205 cont. /

As we have seen, the Gilyak were also furnished with wives by the Chinese; they, just like the Aino, furnished them and the Russians, who, in addition to the payment for the "bride price," payment for the bride — an institution which removed all obstacles to free marriage.

But once having approved, the institution of the bride price became. in turn, a powerful factor for the spreading of the institution of the free marriage.

The bride price became the most powerful temptation for violating the old norms, even in cases where there was no case, might be violated, therefore the old norms

For poor people, daughters became capital, and the rich, who had no daughters, were compelled to conclude marriage relations. began to look on the free marriage union as a cheaper and more convenient form and of because there was no temptation for people who were their equals in wealth and distinction.

And nevertheless, notwithstanding all the unfavorable conditions, the institution of the free marriage, the old form of institution of "free" marriage, the old norms continue to live and to preserve their vitality. The old form of the majority of cases the old imperative still is stronger than all the temptations of bride price and of free marriage. In the past, the Gilyak, in the majority of cases, lived in a state of poverty and of hunger, and, in general, there was no stimulus from the Jibinals (also from the mother's clan. it still the only "pure" marriage and of the institution of the free marriage. Individual man is marriage to the daughter of the mother's brother. in which case the bride price is not paid, and marriage is not even allowed. Free marriages are rather sporadic phenomena, which destroy the customary norm for only a moment and do not permanently shown into the rule of the old norm. This comes about in different ways. In some cases a man may not marry the daughter of his father's brother's clan; but his offspring nevertheless again begin to take wives from the old clan of his ancestress. In other cases, the marriage of the son of the father's brother's clan from which the man takes his wife becomes the lawful marriage clan for his offspring; who let each generation residence is known to every interested individual, and cur-tesy demands that he should be the first to pay the settlement. But such is the fate of heroes; marvellous adventures always fail to their lot. Commander Fayer was a man of great prudge, who his have suffered some catastrophe. The nearest class of their fathers-in-law may have become extinct through an epidemic or a famine, while the nearest relatives may have emigrated long, long ago to some distant place and lost all ties with those left behind-under such circumstances it is not strange that the hero must wander in all directions in order, like the hunter, to find his way to the desired goal through visible traces, inquiries, and guesses.

FS59 cont./

Finally, it also may be that the distant relatives, when the hero at last reaches, is betrothed to a stranger, and all the imposing strength and power of the hero are necessary to compel the father-in-law to violate his word, given to another, which threatens the ruin of his house in the eyes of the offended bridegroom, or, at best, with a trial and the payment of a large ransom. The hero himself must later endure a whole series of gifts when he a wife obtained in this manner. Here is a typical example of this kind from one Tarkhun: The hero, Tarkhun, was the son of a woman who is to be his wife, hears the following answer from the father of this woman in response to his claim: "Has a betrothed -- Ykgyen yakhr (technical term for a girl betrothed to a stranger). One clan of the mountain people and still other clans will come to make war on thee." On Gilyak said: "Nevertheless I shall go and carry her off."
The old man replied: "You will only come back tomorrow." (In the following day, when the bridegroom arrived feast, he not only let his daughter go without receiving any thing for her, but even ordered two boats to be loaded full of valuables as a dowry for her, and, in the possible when the woman is the lawful bride of a man by right of birth.

FS60 cont./

It is characteristic that in purely Gilyak poems, not having any traces of Goldi-Manchurian borrowings and influences, we do not encounter any procedure of betrothal, which at the present Fayer was an important role. All is reduced to a laconic dialogue: Groom: "I have come to take my wife." Father: "All right, take her." The ship everything is done unusually simply. The marriage is immediately consummated. The only ceremony, about which I shall speak in detail later on, is the conferrarie, the joint smoking or meat.

The old man, the father of the bride, questions the hero
"Has are a man from another clan." "I am a hero of Contemporary methods of obtaining a wife. Up to the present the Gilyak has preferred the old orthodox mode of marrying a woman of the same clan, or, more correctly speaking, of one's wife by right of birth. Only such a marriage is considered "pure." And the contrary, especially for the lives of antiquity try to observe the old law. Of all the categories of girls for marriage, designated according to the daughter of the mother's brother, in other words, the most orthodox in consideration of the relationship between the daughter of a brother and the son of his sister. Such a marriage is so highly esteemed that even the betrothed spouses appear in the world the sister and the brother grew each other that-and to same the sister and the brother.
After the birth of the children, when they have reached the age of three or four, there takes place in the presence of the clansmen and in the presence of the elders of a sort of agreement or even the actual concluding of the marriage. Even the brother of the groom pay a certain sum of money
with the father of the bride (he is his sister and conversation between brother and sister is prohibited) for wife his wife. The whole procedure of agreement amounts to the marriage of the brother and sister (the groom before everyone ties each arm and each leg of the fiancée with threads of cattle and dog hair and, in addition, gives

FS61 cont./

the parents of the bride a male dog, not, however, a female.
It is not permitted to remove the fillet, since it is considered sacrilegious to touch the sister and brother with the objects are considered husband and wife, and they address each other with these terms. Usually in such cases the young wife comes to the home of her father-in-law, and, instead of marriage proves that obtaining a woman by purchase was a later introduction, established in contradiction to the ancient law with FS62 all its bloody consequences, just as ransom was a correction of blood revenge.

Then are the methods of obtaining wives depicted for us in the traditional epic.

Contemporary methods of obtaining a wife. Up to the present the Gilyak has preferred the old orthodox mode of marrying
a woman of the same clan, or, more correctly speaking, of one's wife by right of birth. Only such a marriage is considered "pure." And the contrary, especially for the lives of antiquity try to observe the old law. Of all the categories of girls for marriage, designated according to the daughter of the mother's brother, in other words, the most orthodox in consideration of the relationship between the daughter of a brother and the son of his sister. Such a marriage is so highly esteemed that even the betrothed
spouses appear in the world the sister and the brother grew
each other that-and to same the sister and the brother.
After the birth of the children, when they have reached the age of three or four, there takes place in the presence of the clansmen and in the presence of the elders of a sort of agreement or even the actual concluding of the marriage. Even the brother of the groom pay a certain sum of money
with the father of the bride (he is his sister and conversation between brother and sister is prohibited) for wife
his wife. The whole procedure of agreement amounts to the marriage of the brother and sister (the groom
before everyone ties each arm and each leg of the fiancée
with threads of cattle and dog hair and, in addition, gives

FS63 cont./

children of the parents of the bride a male dog, not, however, a female.
It is not permitted to remove the fillet, since it is considered
sacrilegious to touch the sister and brother with the objects
are considered husband and wife, and they address each other with these terms. Usually in such cases the young wife comes to the home of her father-in-law, and, instead of marriage proves that obtaining a woman by purchase was a later introduction, established in contradiction to the ancient law
with FS64 all its bloody consequences, just as ransom was a correction of blood revenge.

Then are the methods of obtaining wives depicted for us in the traditional epic.

Contemporary methods of obtaining a wife. Up to the present the Gilyak has preferred the old orthodox mode of marrying
a woman of the same clan, or, more correctly speaking, of one's wife by right of birth. Only such a marriage is considered "pure." And the contrary, especially for the lives of antiquity try to observe the old law. Of all the categories of girls for marriage, designated according to the daughter of the mother's brother, in other words, the most orthodox in consideration of the relationship between the daughter of a brother and the son of his sister. Such a marriage is so highly esteemed that even the betrothed
spouses appear in the world the sister and the brother grew
each other that-and to same the sister and the brother.
After the birth of the children, when they have reached the age of three or four, there takes place in the presence of the clansmen and in the presence of the elders of a sort of agreement or even the actual concluding of the marriage. Even the brother of the groom pay a certain sum of money
with the father of the bride (he is his sister and conversation between brother and sister is prohibited) for wife
his wife. The whole procedure of agreement amounts to the marriage of the brother and sister (the groom
before everyone ties each arm and each leg of the fiancée
with threads of cattle and dog hair and, in addition, gives

FS70 cont./

orthodox marriage. For an agreement concerning an orthodox FS71 marriage with a girl of the same clan, the groom FS72 Ahlagnat (eastern dialect Yagyuk).
Yenen participating in the conference: (1) the side of the groom (the groom himself, his father and mother, (2) brother of the father. (3) aides of the groom. 4) husband of the sister of the father. (5) the father-in-law of the groom, if they give apparently the norms of orthodox marriage. According to this law, (1) husband of the sister of the father is the father of the husband of the sister of the groom. Since by the norms of Gilyak law, the father-in-law daughter cannot marry brother of his daughter-in-law, the husband of the sister of the father-in-law of the groom promote the marriage of his closer ahmnik, the brother of his own daughter-in-law.
Thus, in the case of the father-in-law, the husband of the sister ahmik (demoted person) among his clansmen. Since the marriage is considered the affair of the clan, these frequently participate in the conference. Sometimes, several hundred because objects for which one might obtain not only objects of luxury, but even a woman, are: a several horse, weapons, and ornaments, bee also food and spices, such as rice, groats, and, finally, money, and, finally, a woman. Since the price Gilyak closely remember the time when sables and foxes used to run around fearlessly in great numbers and bring a dwellings, and so one FS73 killed them, since they preferred to drive themselves in big slides. And all of a sudden in exchange for these beasts it became possible to obtain the most desirable objects. A tremendous change inevitably the initial principles of the Gilyak, and, as the relations shops of the people changed themselves. If formerly a man's wife was the most valuable property, the acquisition of a good person, ordu Ayrnak, i.e., an outstanding hunter who shared his wife with other people, is not changing into ayrnak (a synonym for "rich man," whose dream was to amass a number of luxury objects. Formerly the relations were supposed upon the tribe, as well as the desire to excel others

FS74 cont./

children. Nevertheless, in the side of the groom FS75 marriage, the groom's relatives are represented FS76 Ahlagnat (eastern dialect Yagyuk).
Yenen participating in the conference: (1) the side of the groom (the groom himself, his father and mother, (2) brother of the father. (3) aides of the groom. 4) husband of the sister of the father. (5) the father-in-law of the groom, if they give apparently the norms of orthodox marriage. According to this law, (1) husband of the sister of the father is the father of the husband of the sister of the groom. Since by the norms of Gilyak law, the father-in-law daughter cannot marry brother of his daughter-in-law, the husband of the sister of the father-in-law of the groom promote the marriage
his closer ahmnik, the brother of his own daughter-in-law.
Thus, in the case of the father-in-law, the husband of the sister ahmik (demoted person) among his clansmen. Since the marriage is considered the affair of the clan, these frequently participate in the conference. Sometimes, several hundred because objects for which one might obtain not only objects
of luxury, but even a woman, are: a several horse, weapons, and ornaments, bee also food and spices, such as rice, groats,
and, finally, money, and, finally, a woman. Since the price Gilyak closely remember the time when sables and foxes used
to run around fearlessly in great numbers and bring a dwellings, and so one FS77 killed them, since they preferred to drive themselves in big slides. And all of a sudden
in exchange for these beasts it became possible to obtain the most desirable objects. A tremendous change inevitably
the initial principles of the Gilyak, and, as the relations shops of the people changed themselves. If formerly a man's wife was the most valuable property, the acquisition of a good person, ordu Ayrnak, i.e., an outstanding hunter who shared
his wife with other people, is not changing into ayrnak (a synonym for "rich man," whose dream was to amass a number of luxury objects. Formerly the relations were supposed upon the tribe, as well as the desire to excel others

FS78 cont./

him carry: "That is not your business. We will take care of that. If she is bad, we will teach her!" This unconditional answer he presents to the father of the bride, and, in the end, know how to set the most advantageous conditions, to which the matchmaker is entitled to agree (1).

1. This is exactly the way the Gilyak explain the motives for the father's dependency opinions of his daughter.
I think, therefore, that Sobolevsky was wrong in saying that the daughter cannot marry husband against his will. For the old woman was very timidly and in the most polite form, yet quite pointedly, but when they came to a discussion of the bride price, Sobolevsky signed with her, and, finally, said: "Then let portrayed to give the what thou have. You have a daughter, I have a son. Let us become ahmnik!" (The Korsak, 73b. Sobolevsky was already given my word to others.
Even When if you did give your word to another man?
You also gave your word to me before witnesses. I will go to court with you!
After such preliminary negotiations, they proceed to the bride price and dowry. In the Gilyak institution of the bride price and dowry. In the Gilyak institution of the bride price and dowry. In the Gilyak institution of the bride price and dowry. In the Gilyak institution of the bride price and this institution is extremely characteristic. This term, I believe, throws light on the very origin of the institution.
The Gilyak language shape initial a replaced by the word ar, ayk from ammyrd (= to give a gift, to that ayk (= gift, to give a gift, to give a dowry. Thus, the of the case of the groom given to the family or the clan of his bride. That that term ammyrd is used in the sense to give a blessing. In other dialect cases where compensation for the bride price, or, more correctly, in the case of ammyrd -- (antique) gift to an adopted woman, for a wife, or, in a marriage, when the land came, do then come to my aid.

FS79 cont./

"to pay." It is curious that this word FS80 ayknu -- " (to give a gift, to give a dowry, to give a present ayk is a synonym of ammyrd -- to fight, to war (ayknu is more the active voice of this verb. The word ammyrd is the passive voice of the verb ayknu. Ancient wars peacemaking by payment of damages. This evolution can be traced in the Gilyak language. Initial a replaced by the one, where the bare has gone to take revenge for his mother's father, he pay an him an he return. Pyk ychod yayk -- " you fulfill ychod for your father (literally ychod -- "fulfill yayk -- "payment of damages." Ychod -- "fulfill killed them all." Here the term ychod is used in the sense act of blood revenge. Here the term yayk is used in the sense in the sense of ransom. "Yes yayk yehen" -- "For these yayk compensation." Yehen -- "compensation." Thus all this it is clear that the bride price in its origin sense was not at all a payment for the bride, but a gift, offe to the family or the clan of the bride for the fact that this way by no means one-sided. For the father of the bride it w not an obligatory payment, but a gift, and, in the end, a pr wedding gift to the groom, and these gifts of clothing contin to increase in proportion to the wealth of the groom and the than the bride price (1). It is considered a disgrace not t

1. Here is an illustration of the institution of the bride price as an institution of mutual gift-giving, not of many centuries which it seem down.
As either in the settlement of Poyr, a man who was not well-to-do, gave as a bride price to his father-in-law Chinese beetles, one Japanese Yantrk, one Japanese Yantrk, the father-in-law sent his son-in-law two Chinese robes and for two or three years regularly sent him rice, tobacco, and tea, and divided with him all that he obtained in the way of objects of consumption. Besides this, he had given a large dowry of clothing, furs, and ornaments.

/276 cont./

return a gift of equal value to the bridegroom. A Gilyak who breaks this custom becomes a general laughingstock. Besides the gifts to the groom, it is also the father's obligation to provide his daughter with a dowry equal in value to the bride price, and the dowry is in essence as much a gift to the daughter as it is to her husband, who is freed from the great expense of expenditures on his wife.

Thus, it is clear that, at least among the Gilyak (among other peoples, too, there is much reason to think) (2), bride price is not at all a replacement for marriage by abduction, as has been asserted up to now by many and considered to be axiomatic until very recently. In the legal consciousness of the Gilyak, marriage accompanied by bride price is not an act of buying and selling, either; evidence for /277/ this is the fact that it is positively not allowed to buy wives from one another.

2. Incidentally, among the Turkic peoples and the Shoshoni Indians, where marriage actually has the character of buying-selling, giving presents to the groom is just as obligatory as it is among the Gilyak.

It remains for us to answer the question, why is there no bride price in the orthodox marriage? The fact is that in this last case marriages are concluded between persons who are bound by common blood both on the side of the father and on the side of the mother; the marriage is sanctioned both socially and religiously. But when marriages are concluded between alien clans, the exchange of gifts plays a role both magical (a mutual guarantee of safety from evil magical influences) and social, as a symbol of friendship, analogous to the exchange of gifts upon the conclusion of ceremonial brotherhood. We see from the rites which are observed when the bride moves to the home of the groom that the Gilyak give a socio-religious significance to such symbolism of new relations.

/277 cont./

And it is also possible that into the concept of bride price there was introduced an element not only magical, but also purely religious. Giving a woman in marriage to a clan not orthodoxly prescribed was taboo, and every violation of a taboo, according to the logic of primitive man, should be atoned for in some way -- if not by blood, then by valuables. Bride price from this point of view appears to be tribute for appeasing the souls of the ancestors offended by the violation of the clan taboo. By this alone can one explain why the Gilyak react just as strongly to the nonpayment of the bride price for a woman as they do to the slaying of a clansman. The obligation to receive satisfaction in this case, as in the case of a killing, extends to the third generation in the whole clan.

For the sake of obtaining this, persons are ready to take the same risk and deprivation as in carrying out an act of blood revenge. The heroic exploits of such persons who have undertaken long and dangerous treks into the most remote places are one of the most common subjects in the epic works.

The objects used for bride price and the conditions of payment. An object that is part of the bride price is usually a particular kind of valuable, an object sui generis, the so-called shagynd (E.D.), shygynd (W.D.). These are valuables which are predominantly obtained from the Chinese and Japanese by trade. Among these objects are: Chinese silk garments and pieces of material, Chinese fur-coats, several articles of nephrite, Manchurian spears inlaid with silver, Japanese sabers, and also big, cast-iron kettles. Besides this, objects of this class include fox and sable fur-coats and feminine articles of adornment. In ancient times, evidently, axes, too, /278/ at first stone, later

/278 cont./

iron, served as objects in the shagynd (1).

1. The following splendid legend gives evidence concerning this. In the central section of Sakhalin there is a mountain, Kryus´pal, and along side of it another, somewhat smaller mountain, the "wife" of the latter, who has run away from him and hidden her shagynd. Three riverside rocks represent the different objects of the shagynd. One bears the designation Wa-ul-s´if, meaning "place where the Japanese saber is buried," another Wyn-ul-af -- "place where the kettle is buried," and the third, Kys'okhty -- the butt of the ax.

These are objects which are unalienable, extra commercium. Only in exceptional cases of extreme poverty or the absence of clansmen is the alienation of objects of the shagynd category allowed, and even then only a part of them. A poor widow in the settlement of Pilavo, who had sold her only daughter, answered my question as to what she was going to do with the shagynd in this way: "Part of it I shall sell, and the remainder will go with me to Mlyvo -- to the world beyond the grave." They are preserved for only exceptional cases in the life of the owner -- for the payment of blood money on account of a slaying, or when one must marry off one's sons and pay a bride price or give a dowry to one's daughters, and, after the death of the owner -- to accompany him to the world beyond the grave. Only such objects figure in the bride price of rich persons. But among persons of lesser means, the bride price is made up of valuable utilitarian objects -- boats, guns, dogs, and so forth.

Rich people, seeking a large bride price, are guided mainly by ambition, for obtaining a rich bride price is the best evidence of one's own wealth. For a poor man the bride price is his only chance to establish an independent economy. But there is another side to the coin -- it is almost impossible for a poor man to settle down with a family, and, consequently, an independent economy. But to a certain degree the rights of group marriage and the possibility of leading a common domestic life with his brothers come to his rescue. Everyone's dream, however, is to settle down with his own family. Usually the clan in the persons of the well-to-do clansmen comes to the rescue of the poor man. But not every clan has rich people, and, besides, there are persons whose clan has died out. The only solution then is to obtain a wife by work. Usually such a transaction is entered into by a family in which there are no offspring of the male sex, and it is as though the son-in-law were declared an adopted son, although, as a member of another clan, he cannot be an actual heir. Methods of lightening the payment of the bride price are practiced: a wife is purchased in small installments with yearly payments until her majority. But also in the purchase of an adult, /279/ installment buying is sometimes practiced, depending on the contract. A curious means of paying the bride price is the case of payment with the bride price of a future daughter. I know of such a case. The Gilyak Kanka married the sister of the young boy Pletunka. He did not pay a bride price, but he promised to support his widowed mother and to hand over to him the bride price of his own future daughter. And the agreement was fulfilled. Pletunka was about twenty years old when Kanka gave his own daughter in marriage, and he handed over the whole bride price to Pletunka.

/278 cont./

As a matter of principle the bride price belongs to the clan. At a difficult moment of life, for example, if it becomes necessary to pay blood money, each clan-member takes part with his shagynd. But usually the bride price is distributed among the brothers, although not proportionately: the youngest, as heir to the house, usually receives the smallest share. Besides this, the elder brother buys a wife for the younger brother before his own marriage, so that the younger brother does not need the shagynd for bride price. Along with the distribution of the bride

583 /279 cont./ Along with the distribution of the bride
582 price within the family, customs of a completely exceptional character are preserved, clearly testifying to the old orthodox form of marriage. Namely, part of the bride price is given to the "old akhmalk," i.e., to that akhmalk with whom a given family has concluded orthodox matrimonial unions. Thus, for example, if in the course of several generations family A has taken wives from family B, i.e., the sons of sisters in each generation have married the daughters of their own brothers, then every time the family gives in marriage any one of its women, who, as we see, are forbidden to the men of family B by virtue of the unilaterality of the cousin marriage, and receives bride price, then a part of it is given to the eldest one in family B, usually to the brother of the mother of the woman who has been given in marriage, rarely to the father of the latter, if he is alive. It is curious that the family of the groom presents this gift to the old akhmalk as part of the bride price. This custom is practiced in a still more striking form. They give their infant sister to the brother of their mother, or their daughter to the brother of their wife, in order that these persons may afterwards receive the bride price for them, but participation in the distribution of the latter may not be demanded. "It is better to propose one's daughter or sister to the old akhmalk oneself," the Gilyak usually add when they are talking about this custom, "than to wait for a request about the matter." And this is not all; if a mother has several brothers and a nephew has several sisters, then one /of the sisters/ is supposed to be given to each /of the brothers/. What is the explanation of this strange custom? We [197] have a completely analogous case among the Tamil, where the mother's brother also receives a part of the bride price when the woman is given /280/ in marriage. But among the Tamil cousin marriage is bilateral, so that if a man's sister does not give her daughter in marriage to the son of her brother, she thereby breaks the law; but among the Gilyak cousin marriage is unilateral, and for the son of the brother of the mother the daughter [194] of this last is forbidden. But why then does the mother's brother have such preference? Here a double explanation is possible:

582 /280 cont./
583 it is a remnant of maternality when the mother's brother played 583 a privileged role; the contemporary institution of unilateral cousin 194 marriage among the Gilyak appeared to replace the more ancient bilateral one when every maiden was obliged to marry the son of her mother's brother, and thus the custom which we are observing is a remnant of a more ancient norm of marriage.

583 I turn now to the other principal obligation, the companion to the institution of marriage -- to the dowry.

583 For the dowry the Gilyak have the term jokh shond:, signi-556 fying literally -- "the thing which is brought by the bride, the woman." The dowry consists mainly of various types of clothing and ornaments. The dowry of a rich bride consists of an assortment of valuable fur-coats -- fox and sable -- and silver bracelets, expensive earrings, Chinese pipes, and also rich, carved, and decorated dishes, including an assortment of artistically decorated birch spoons. The mother usually gives her ornaments to her daughter, and sometimes also a bed, but for some reason one must not give away pillows. They begin to prepare the dowry in the very earliest years and continue up until the marriage of the maiden. This is called jokh wakh -- "to get the bride ready." They lay away the dowry in good time in sacred chests with the family valuables, among which, in a well-to-do family, the bride usually sits solemnly. The size of the dowry usually should be proportional to the size of the bride price. When the gossiping women talk about one or another wedding, they refer to a "rich" and a "poor" dowry. It is considered a matter of the 583 greatest pride to provide the daughter with a male or female 556 slave besides her things. In the clan of a Gilyak of my acquaintance, 569 Yuskin, they gave to a maiden as part of her dowry a female slave (akh), whom they provided with a Japanese saber for cleaning the soles of her mistress' boots. Especially ambitious rich people set aside a separate house for their daughter-bride, and a slave, who is later given to her as dowry, is put in it to serve her.

583 The dowry, although it is compensation for the bride 422 price, since it frees the husband from great expenditures for the wife, is nevertheless exclusively a gift to the bride, her private property /281/ to which the husband has no rights whatsoever.

/281 cont./
583 She may sell it or give it to her daughters in their dowries. After 462 her death it goes to her daughters, and, if there are none, she 428 may will it, or else it goes to her brothers.

583 After the agreement on the bride price. The negotiations over 585 the bride price amount to two questions -- the question of the quantity and the question of the term. It may happen that the bride price is paid immediately after the negotiations, and then the marriage is at once considered concluded. The bride and the groom are summoned, ordered to eat and smoke a little together, a small feast with drinks is spread, and in the evening the mother of the bride orders the groom to lie down on the bed of his wife, and after spending the night in the nuptial bed the newly wedded husband carried off his wife, with a certain ceremony of which we shall speak below, to his home. But such cases are rare. It does happen, when both the groom and the bride belong to families of little means and the bride price is therefore small, that it is brought at once, and the dowry of the bride amounts to the most necessary things of her toilette, and 583 no preparations whatsoever are demanded. Among rich families, 585 the immediate removal of the bride occurs only when the groom 556 lives very far away, when the given marriage is especially valued, either as a result of the high social standing of the parents of the bride or as a consequence of the particular renown enjoyed by the bride ("a maiden famed throughout the entire land"), and they are afraid of any delay for fear of the agreement's being broken if a richer competitor appears. In such cases they come at once in several boats with the whole bride price and in the company of their noblest clansmen, and after the bringing in of the bride price, a feast, and several short ceremonies, they carry the bride away along with her dowry.
583 But, I repeat, such cases are rare. Usually in such cases the 585 wedding is delayed. The delivery of the bride price is arranged 452 in installments. At first only one object is left, usually a kettle; the remaining part is brought either directly before the removal of the bride, or, if the bride price is very large, part of it is even brought within a certain agreed-upon length of time after the removal of the bride.

/281 cont./
583 The wedding may be delayed also on account of the dowry.
584 Although they begin to prepare the dowry in childhood, nevertheless, depending on the bride price which is brought, it may become necessary to prepare a new one. The last item in the negotiations is the date of the wedding. This is considered very important, for on the day of the groom's arrival the dowry must be ready, and likewise the numerous viands, not only for the wedding feast, but also those viands of all kinds which the bride will take away with her as a present to the groom's family.

584 /282/ The agreement which has been concluded between the 614 two families is considered an agreement between two clans, and the bride herself from this moment on is regarded as belonging [686] to the clan. In case of refusal on her part or on the part of her parents, the clan will demand her by force.

584 The agreement is also binding for the other side, but 686 here no sanction is demanded, for in case of refusal it loses the part of the bride price which has been brought (usually half). It happens, however, but quite rarely, that the groom will ask for, instead of one sister, another sister. But this is absolutely forbidden. In such cases they answer him:

"If you do not like her, then you do not like both (both the one and the other). When the matter concerns dogs, you want a good one, and I give you (a good one); if one does not suit you, then both will not suit you. When we give you something to eat, if you eat up the first dish, then I shall give you the second."

[595] In other words, one may ask for two daughters, but to ask for one instead of the other is not permitted.

585 When, finally, the day agreed upon arrives, the groom, together with his parents, comes in boats in the summertime, on sleds in the winter, bringing with them the part of the bride price [576] agreed upon and refreshments. Etiquette forbids that they come on foot, although the bride may live very close by. At this time the family of the bride hangs out the objects of the bride price for the public inspection of the clansmen, and refreshments are spread for the elder representatives of both clans. The women look after the bride in all kinds of ways; they comfort her, give

/370 cont./
634 his wife half to death. Even his ruyn, in such cases, does not [84] escape without a severe lecture, while among the Amur Gilyak 614 even the ruyn finds no mercy. But such bloody vengeance is absolutely required only when the seducer is caught in flagrante [197] delicto. Fear of Russian justice has weakened the force of this bloody custom, and frequently in such cases the matter ends with 178 a sound thrashing. The modern method of securing a wife grad-583 ually worked itself out from the old clan arrangements, from the collective and individual abduction of women from another clan and the subsequent reconciliation by means of a ransom, transformed in the course of time into the modern bride price. But even today the custom of the abduction of women exists among the Gilyak of both Sakhalin and the mainland. In part it is a corrective against the coercion of womanly sensibilities in the contemporary form of marriage, in part a reaction against the purchase of wives, not possible for every Gilyak. When a Gilyak comes to like a woman, either a maiden or a married woman, and for one reason or another it appears impossible to obtain her in a peaceful manner, /371/ he arranges things with a group of his clansmen, and one fine day (usually in the summer) when the men are out of the yurt, the boat of the abductor draws near the settlement, and, profiting by the absence of the men, they bear away the desired woman. Abductions sometimes take place by preliminary agreement with the woman, or sometimes without her assent and even against her will. Abductions, of course, produce counter-abductions, even with an armed hand (I know of one instance where a group of 14 men armed with spears and guns broke into the yurt of the elder of a settlement at night and bore away a woman), but in the event of failure the matter ends with reconciliation and the payment of bride price. Not infrequently the abduction is performed by the father of the woman himself, or at his instigation, in those instances where the son-in-law does not fulfill all the conditions of the bride price and at the same time does not voluntarily return the woman he has purchased. To this day the Gilyak regard the custom of abduction as a normal phenomenon; it astonishes no one and is censured by

/371 cont./

583 no one, and this demonstrates how widespread, even universal, 584 it was in quite recent times. The wars of which Gilyak tradition 585 tells were fought principally on account of the abduction of women, and they developed the practice of reconciliation by 586 way of payment of a ransom. The entrance of the Russians into 583 the Amur region has led to a considerable diminution in the number of abductions. No matter what efforts accompany the abduction of a woman, the display of a paper from a Russian office will incontrovertibly result in the return of the abducted woman.
Thus, the prevailing mode of obtaining wives has become that of purchase. The price paid for a woman is known to the Russians under the term kalym. The bride price is ordinarily paid in articles, money, and labor. As bride price they give boats, kettles, guns, spears, fur coats, pieces of silk material, dogs, and, finally, money. The size of the bride price is in proportion to the wealth of both sides, the age of the bride, and her domestic talents. A woman who is an "accomplished woman" in the full sense of the phrase among the Gilyak is one who understands the culinary arts well, sews garments and footwear well, is industrious and meek. In general the purchase of a wife is a rather expensive affair. Here is an example of a not very considerable bride price. One Gilyak from Kitnidvo paid for his wife with two Japanese kettles (one large one, costing 60 rubles), one spear with silver fretwork, a fox-fur coat, ten dogs, and, in addition, took down his father-in-law's summer yurt, after 583 which the wife was irretrievably abducted. An extremely characteristic method of acquiring a wife, one which recalls /372/ the biblical story of the service of Jacob for Laban, is that of labor. Some clanless Gilyak will work in a family for several years, and as his reward he will receive the sister or daughter of the master. When the head of a family is a middle-aged man and has no sons, he takes to himself a son-in-law who agrees, instead of a bride price, to share with him all the economic labor for a certain period or for the entire life of the father-in-law. The son-in-law, customarily a complete pauper, fishes and kills seals, and all this constitutes the common

/372 cont./

583 property of the whole family, but the personal money earnings of the son-in-law, as well as the sables and foxes that he obtains through his efforts and skill, remain at his disposal, which makes it possible for the son-in-law to attain an independent standing in time. But in general the payment of the bride price by labor is not frequently encountered, for the sale of the woman is too enticing a prospect for her kinsmen, and moreover the Gilyak have not yet grown accustomed to asking for the labor 583 of others. The bride price is paid to the father of the bride, or, 614 in his absence -- to her brothers, if they are adults, otherwise -- to their guardian, i.e., to that clansman-ruvn to whom they, along with their mother, have passed; in the absence of any brothers of the bride -- to that same ruvn of whom we just spoke, that is, the one to whom the mother of the bride has passed; in the absence of such -- to the brothers of the father, then to the distant clansmen-ruvn, but in general to clansmen of the male sex. Originally the bride price was always given, not to a separate individual, but to the khal' (clan). And even nowadays among the Tungus, fellow tribesmen of the Gilyak, the bride price is paid to the "nasleg," i.e., the clan. And this is perfectly natural, since originally the bride price was a ransom paid to a whole clan, which was avenging the abduction of the 583 women. This primitive significance of the bride price is re-614 flected in the custom whereby the wife of a deceased Gilyak al-583 ways remains in the clan of her husband and passes, according to the decision of the clan, to one of the brothers (ruvn) of the deceased (only to a younger brother, however, and only in the event of the unwillingness of the ruvn to marry the widow does the return to the clan of her father, while the children remain in the clan of the husband. The obligation of the clansmen-ruvn with regard to the widows of their deceased ruvn reminds one of biblical story of Boaz and Ruth. The bride price is either paid all at once or in part in advance and in part some time after the bride moves to the home of the groom.

583 There are instances of the sale of children of the female 584 sex. A Gilyak purchases for himself or for his young son a young

/372/ cont.

583 girl, who, until the proper age, remains in the home of her 584 parents for instruction in all the women's sciences and crafts; in /373/ this case, part of the bride price is paid at the conclusion of the agreement. Every year after that the groom makes presents to his future father-in-law, and the remaining part of the bride price is paid when the bride moves to the home of her future husband. If the "bartered bride" should die in the interval between the conclusion of the agreement and moving to the home of the husband, the bride price is returned. Young girls customarily move without delay to the home of the groom, who is often several times older than the bride and who purchases her, even though he already has one or two wives, with the sole aim of having a young worker when the other wives grow old. If the groom is also underage, the future spouses are raised together, become friends from childhood, and become attached to each other for life, but this good feature of the purchase of small children does not at all atone for the other features of the custom, which is based solely on the calculation of buying a wife cheaply. The custom of purchasing wives for underaged sons was perhaps one of the reasons for the above-mentioned prohibition against the enjoyment of conjugal rights by an elder brother with regard to the wives of his younger brothers, and from this arose the custom of forbidding the older brother to marry even the widow of a deceased younger brother. The Gilyak pursues bargains to such a degree in purchasing a wife that not infrequently he obtains for his underaged son a bride who may be two or three times older than he, if only he gets her at a bargain. The payment of a large bride price gives the husband the right to get a part of it back in the event the wife dies soon after the marriage, and sometimes 583 also a part of the heritage of the father-in-law. But side by side with the payment for the bride there exists among the Gilyak another institution -- the dowry. Before setting off for the bridegroom's home the wife is attired in festive dress and is provided, according to the condition of her parents, with valuable fur coats, garments, and ornaments. This dowry belongs to the bride, who,

/373 cont./

583 in the event of the dissolution of the marriage, takes it back. It is inalienable during the life of the wife and is customarily burned with her on her funeral pyre. This form of the dowry confirms Zibe's /Sieber?/ view of the dowry in primitive societies as a present to the bride.

585 Marriage is effected among the Gilyak without any ceremonies. A feast is held, of course, upon the departure of the bride and upon her arrival at the home of the bridegroom, but 586 nothing more. The marriage is as easily dissolved as it is con-583 cluded. The husband, disappointed in his wife, takes her back to her father and gets his bride price back. Similarly, the father, dissatisfied with the position of his daughter in the new family or /374/ the incomplete fulfillment of the conditions of payment by the son-in-law, takes his daughter back, returning the bride price.
583 In general, the method for peacefully acquiring a wife among the 584 Gilyak falls entirely under the "purchase-sale" agreement, with its accompanying "rectification," etc. I have seen how one middle-aged Gilyak, not having the wherewithal to feed his wife, sold her (with her consent, however) to another Gilyak for a small compensation.

462 But in spite of the character of this acquisition of a wife, 562 and despite the fact that the assent of the woman is not only not 584 required, but is not even asked, nevertheless the position of women is in general not as bad as it may appear. It is required of her that she be industrious and thrifty. Much, in fact, is required of her.
She cleans and dries an incredible quantity of fish, which is used for the year-round sustenance of the family and dogs. It is she who scutches wild hemp, spinning it into triple thread, and for months thereafter she ties enormous nets, utilizing for this purpose every free minute. She sews clothes for the entire family, and on her lies the entire burden of the Gilyak kitchen and the feeding of the dogs. It is she who, for whole days on end, gathers sarana, berries and roots which constitute the daily diet of the Gilyak during the winter. Finally, she bears the whole burden and care of feeding the numerous guests who arrive and stay for weeks, while her husband leaves to pay visits and enjoys his winter rest. Yet,

/632 cont./

595 certain conditions, as, on the whole, a rare exception. Accord-[184] ing to the statements of the Gilyak, the latter is practically not found at all on Sakhalin, along the Liman, and along the coast of the Sea of Okhotsk, whereas among the Amur Gilyak it occurs more frequently. An explanation for this will appear from the information in the following. In polygamous marriage the number of wives is usually limited to two. Among the Amur Gilyak I discovered several such marriages (1). Marriages with three

1. For example, the Gilyak Ssogin in Kulk (Mäo) had two wives, Keliguk and Malguk; similarly, the Gilyak Tschigun had two, Chumsik and Tyisuk, etc.

to five wives are very rare, and, according to the statements of the Gilyak, there are none at all among them with more than five wives. In addition to voluntary polygamy, however, there is among the Gilyak a form of polygamy brought about by the law of inheritance or, more accurately, by hereditary obligations, which will be discussed later.

583 The chief motive which impels the Gilyak toward monogamy is the custom of buying their wives which prevails among them, as among most primitive peoples and in particular among all the indigenous peoples of Siberia (2). The Gilyak expression for "to

[171]

2. As, for instance, among the Tungus, Ostyak, Samoyed, Tatars, Cheremis, Chuvash, Votyak, and others (cf. note 1 on p.1030). The same custom also prevails among the Chinese (Grosier, Descr. génér. de la Chine, Paris, 1787, Vol. II, p. 261. Bazin, Chine moderne, 2nd Part, Paris, 1843, p. 482). Even among the ancient Germans, marriage was originally a purchase, as in Iceland, Norway, and among the Anglo-Saxons (Peschel, Völkerkunde /Ethnology/, Leipzig, 1874, p. 237).

/632 cont./ The Gilyak expression for "to 583 marry" is "umgu genytsch," to buy a wife. If a Gilyak wants to [192] marry in a peaceful and lawful fashion, he must pay the father, or, if the latter is no longer living, the brothers of the girl he desires to marry, a certain amount determined by mutual agreement. Depending on the circumstances, this consists of various articles needed in daily life and housekeeping, such as clothing materials, cooking kettles, boats, sleds, dogs, etc., as well as a number of luxury items of hypothetical value, such as neatly worked spears provided with small inlaid silver plates, old Manchu iron-armor, and so on. To give an idea of the amount of the bride price among the Gilyak, I shall add here the payments which a couple of Gilyak whom I knew had to pay for their respective wives. The Gilyak 583 Ssogin in Kulk (Mäo), for instance, had to pay the following price 435 for his second wife, Malguk from Langr:

6 large spears with inlaid silver, at 10 ja apiece (3), together . . 60 ja

3. The prices presented in the following may serve at the same time as a partial confirmation of and a supplement to the above (pp. 933-937) table of prices of the Gilyak compiled independently.

2 large Chinese hearth-kettles, at 4 ja apiece, together				. . . .	8 ja
3 Japanese kettles (kughi-wunj), " 9 "	"	"	. . . .	. . . .	27 "
4 large boats, " 10 "	"	"	. . . .	. . . .	40 "
20 dogs, " 1 "	"	"	. . . .	. . . .	20 "
				Total	155 ja = about 310 rubles.

/633/ My guide Chossiambo, who, to be sure, was an Olcha himself, but had married a Gilyak woman, the daughter of the oft-mentioned Judin in Tebach, had to pay the following price for his wife, according to his and her testimony:

/633 cont./

583 5 pieces of Chinese silk at 4 ja each, together . . . . .20 ja 585 1 large Chinese hearth-kettle . . . . . 3 " 1 Japanese kettle with three handles . . . . . 30 " 1 Manchurian iron-armor . . . . . 30 " 1 large bear . . . . . 30 " 5 especially good dogs (kyla-kan) at 4 ja each . . . . 20 "
Total 133 ja = about 266 rubles.

583 The bride price is therefore very high among the Gilyak, which indicates the relative prosperity of the people (1). Custom

583 1. For the sake of comparison I shall cite here the bride price of several Siberian 191 peoples in older and more recent times.
113 At the time of Adam Brand (Neuverm. Beschr. seiner grossen Chinesisch. Reise, welche er anno 1692 etc. /Newly Enlarged Description of His Great Chinese Journey Which He in 1692, etc./, Lübeck, 1734, p. 99), it amounted to 10-15 reindeer among the Tungus on the Werchnaja Tunguska. A rich Ostyak girl on the Obj at the time of Pallas was not often given in marriage for less than 100 reindeer and a quantity of all kinds of furs (Sujef, in Pallas, Reise durch versch. Prov. des Russ. Reichs /Travels through Various Provinces of the Russian Empire/, St. Petersb., Vol. III, 1776, p. 52). According to Castren (Reiseber. und Briefe aus d. J. 1845-1849 /Travel Report and Letters from the Years 1845-49/, St. Petersb., 1856, p. 56), the current price for an ordinary girl in marriage among the Ostyak on the Irtysch amounted to 200-300 rubles in

/633 cont./

583 1. (cont.)
191 money, one horse, a cow, and an ox, 113 7-10 different pieces of clothing, a pood of flour, a pail of liquor, and some hops for the preparations for the wedding celebration. The high bride-prices which Middendorff (Reise in d. Nord. und Ost. Siberien's /Travels in the North and East of Siberia/, Vol. IV, p. 1459) gives for the Assja-Samoyed women are somewhat reduced by the dowry which the bride brings, so that under some circumstances it almost only amounts to an exchange, which is never the case among the Gilyak. On the other hand, the bride price was very low among the Votyak, Cheremis, and Chuvash: among the former, who were the poorest, it amounted to only 5-15 rubles, among the latter two 10-30 rubles, and among the Kungur Cheremis, who were the wealthiest, 100 rubles and more (Müller, Samml. Russ. Gesch. /A Collection on Russian History/, Vol. III, p. 369).

583 requires that it be paid at one time and not in installments. In 583 view of the circumspect and thrifty nature of this people, con-595 stantly thinking in terms of augmenting its possessions, as has 556 been pointed out in my previous descriptions, even a well-to-do 184 man will not find it easy to buy a second or a third wife, in addition to the one. Only a particularly intense desire to have his wealth duly appreciated by his countrymen and thus to gain special esteem among them would prompt him to do so. Therefore, polygamy is more frequent among the generally wealthier Amur Gilyak living together more densely than it is among their countrymen along the Liman, on Sakhalin, and along the coast of the Sea of Okhotsk.

/633 cont./

583 It is to be seen in part from the preceding that the custom 121 of wife purchase has, on the whole, a beneficial influence upon a 182 primitive people. Even though, to our minds, it involves an in-[562] sulting disregard for human dignity and the personal rights of the woman, /634/ in that, in relation to the man, it makes her simply a commodity, nevertheless it exerts some moral pressure upon the men. For, above all, it forces them, through activity and industry, to acquire the means to buy a wife and to found a household of their own, and thus it puts an effective curb on premature marriages. Moreover, as we have seen, through the material obstacles that it puts in the way of polygamy, it promotes monogamy. And, finally, it provides the wife with both a guarantee of good treatment on the part of her parents, for a well-fed and well-supported girl can be married off more easily and at a higher price, and, in particular, some protection against rough mistreatment on the part of the husband, for what is bought with difficulty and at some expense is as a rule, among primitive people in particular, more highly prized and better cared for than that which is attained without effort and for a low price or even as a gift. Thus, among primitive peoples, the bride price to [562] a certain extent constitutes a corrective for their lack of esteem and spiritual appreciation of the wife, and the higher it is, the greater its effect is bound to be, and the more favorable the prognosis for the marital and family relations of the people concerned. To what extent this may be true among the Gilyak, beyond the above-mentioned prevalence of monogamy among them, we shall have occasion to learn from the following observations.

583 On the other hand, it cannot be denied that the higher the bride price, the greater the temptation for poor but enterprising young men to avoid paying it and to gain possession of a wife by a ruse or force. Indeed, among the Gilyak the abduction of women is by no means rare. According to their own statements, it almost always takes place by prearrangement between the two parties, the abductor and the one to be abducted. In order to carry it out, the man appears, as if by chance, in the house

/634 cont./

583 of the parents of the desired girl, calmly makes use of the customary hospitality, and seizes the proper moment, when the host and hostess are very busy or have gone off, to flee with the girl on a waiting sled or boat. He follows the same procedure 583 in abducting a woman who is unfaithful to her husband. As soon 584 as the wronged father or husband notices the theft, he pursues the 628 fugitives with a few relatives or villagers. If they are overtaken, the abducted woman can be brought back, but not without a bloody fight with the abductor and his helpers, in case he has provided for some, since both parties resort to knives and spears. In most cases, however, the abductor was clever enough to provide for an escape with his willing booty. Then the feud continues and may be prolonged for years, since, as a result of the blood vengeance practiced among the Gilyak, which will be discussed later, revenge is demanded and an opportunity to carry it out is sought both by those who have suffered directly by the abduction and by those who have been injured in the fighting. Whole villages may thus become involved, so that the inhabitants of them, in order to avoid the danger of a surprise attack, carefully avoid each other and /635/ intercourse between the villages ceases entirely (1). In the face of such complications and dangers, the

1. In my time, for example, the villages of Tammla-wo and Talwantigr-wo, along the Liman coast of Sakhalin, were engaged in such a feud, and the inhabitants of the latter, as much the smaller, had to be on their guard against those of the former.

Gilyak rarely undertake the abduction of a woman in a neighboring village, but, as a rule, select a more distant field of operations. It most frequently happens that Gilyak from the Sea of Okhotsk and from the Liman coast of Sakhalin abduct the daughters or wives of their countrymen on the Amur, either because, in view of their distant habitation sites, they need have less fear of their revenge, or, as a result of their being less well off, are unwilling

/635 cont./

583 or unable to pay the high bride price of the Amur Gilyak. And 628 among the latter the Tammla-wo Gilyak are especially notorious 684 and feared on account of their predatory disposition.

As much harm as the abduction of women causes for many Gilyak, and as bloody as the consequences are as a rule because of their emotional and irascible temperament, a lighter and nobler aspect appears in the motives occasioning it. Since, as has been said, it almost always takes place with the consent of the female party, inducements other than crude male rapacity, in particular a revolt of female pride against the treatment of the wife as a mere object of purchase, and in certain cases even deeper affection defying all obstacles and dangers, may also not infrequently contribute to it in decisive fashion. Thus, in [533] abducting a wife there is a romantic-poetic element which the [126] conclusion of marriage by purchase lacks, and it is certainly no mere accident that among the few Gilyak songs which I obtained, and which, unfortunately, are unintelligible to me except for individual words, there are two which allegedly were sung by Gilyak men (Orkin and Largun) to their wives (Rschywguk and Nymguk) obtained by abduction.

Another point with regard to the abduction of women must 583 be touched upon here. Dr. Awgustinowitsch, who spent a year 114 (1871/72) as a physician in the Gilyak part of Sakhalin, maintains that, in order to get married, the Gilyak are absolutely obliged to steal the girl of their choice, which is almost always done with her and her parents' consent: among them the abduction of the bride constitutes the whole ceremonial of concluding the marriage. Later the man brings to his parents-in-law a gift which usually consists of a weapon that can be used for fishing or hunting (2). If this statement is supposed to imply actual obligatory [113] 2. F. Avgustinovich", Zhizn' Russkikh" i inorodtsev" na ostr. Sakhalinie /Life of the Russians and the Aborigines on Sakhalin Island/, St. Petersb., 1874, p. 38.

/635 cont./

583 wife-abduction, it needs no further special refutation after 114 has been said above. But in view of everything that I heard them about it, I must also deny that the Gilyak must always take the mock abduction of the bride or maiden in concludi marriage, which can be regarded as a survival of a formerly obligatory wife-abduction among them. The abduction of a is never a /636/ trifling affair among them, but, as has bee is damage to property, always a deadly serious business.

582 Let us now return to the regular conclusion of marriag 601 the Gilyak. Only to a very limited extent is blood relations an obstacle to marriage, in that only siblings and the childr of brothers are not permitted to marry each other. Even in language they are not differentiated, in that "ykyn" and "a mean older and younger brother as well as older and younge cousin on the father's side, and "ransh" means sister as well female cousin on the father's side, and, accordingly, the br and the sister of the father are designated with the same wor father and mother, namely, "ytyk" and "ymyk." But beyo 582 the membership of both partners in the same paternal kin gr which, as we shall see later, is also taken into acc t in o connections by the Gilyak, constitutes no obstacle to marria among them as it does among some Siberian peoples (1) and

[171] 1. As, for instance, among the Ostyak, [113] Samoyed, Lapps Tyler /Tylor/, Forsch. über die Urgesch. der Mensch. und die Entwick. der Civilis. /Researches into the Early History of Mankind and the Development of Civilization/, transl. from the English by H. Müller, p. 359).

on the other hand, among the Chinese (2) and through them

[113] 2. Du Halde, Descr. de l'Emp. de la Chine et de la Tart. Chinoise, Paris, 1735, Vol. III, p. 133. Pauthier,

116, 422, 435, 583, 591

"On Sakhalin, when the would-be husband—not the thirteen years old to assist his ageing spouse—but t keeping, is in possession of wealth enough to pay th fronted by a difficulty if he wishes to have a separat to live on in the paternal home, or, if [269] not, he friends and comrades to help him build a hut; but th required, and this is a very expensive item. He ma forty-five rubles (4 1/2 guineas). I have even heard was the difficulty with our Vanka, who was a capabl his own estimate, but according to our notions abou desirous of marrying, and offered to take me and m summer to the 'end of the world,' with the aid of thr rate charge of forty rubles apiece. With this sum he and he had already saved sufficient for the purchase old man who buys a second wife ne youth who aspires to set up house-e price demanded, he is still cone establishment. He may be content will probably be able to get his is is not enough, a cauldron is have to pay in skins the value of of them costing sixty rubles. This young man of fifteen, according to twenty-six or twenty-eight. He was interpreter during the following ee of his companions, for the mode-would be able to buy a cauldron, of a wife."

/646 cont./

567 people who themselves are obliged to bear the heaviest yoke, the Ainu, are the ones most involved in the slave trade. Finally, [197] indicating that this deplorable custom of the Ainu and Goldi is [648] rooted in the moral degeneracy to which they have been brought [181] by the oppressive yoke of the Japanese and Chinese on them is [439] the fact that the latter themselves sometimes negotiate the sale of Ainu and Goldi women as slaves to the Gilyak, for which the trading trips of the latter furnish them the opportunity. The Gilyak, on the other hand, who have best been able to preserve their freedom and independence with regard to these peoples, to be sure buy slaves from the Ainu and Goldi and under certain conditions sell them again, but they most decidedly abhor keeping any of their own people as slaves or selling them as such to others. In fact, they were of the opinion that if one of them tried to do it, he /647/ would arouse such indignation among his countrymen that he would be in constant danger of his life.

567 On the whole, the number of male slaves, as well as that 435 of the female slaves, who are always more common, is small among the Gilyak. The principal reason for this is the high price that they cost both in direct trade with the Ainu or Goldi and in [583] particular in their resale by the Gilyak. It is much more expensive to acquire a slave in trade than to buy a wife. The Gilyak Ssogin in Kuik, for instance, paid far more for his slave, an Ainu woman named Kot, than for his second wife, Malguk from Langr; as noted above, he bought the latter for 155 ja = 310 rubles, but the former cost him 40 pieces of Chinese silk, which alone amounted to 200 ja, or about 400 rubles, aside from other things. In appearance she was far behind his two wives. As will be seen from the following, however, this does not matter at all, in view of the social position of female slaves among the Gilyak. Because [556] of the high price of the female slaves, only very rich Gilyak can afford to keep any, and whoever has one is usually very boastful about it, as, for instance, Ssogin was. Such a possession seems [584] so enviable to them that in order to obtain it many a Gilyak does [583] not hesitate to sell his daughter to a countryman as a wife in [556] exchange for a female slave and to pay the difference in the purchase price in some other form.

/652 cont./

568 Thus, an attitude toward the slaves similar to that among the [7] Gilyak seems to exist among the Chukchee, and in this attitude, as in the motives for it, the more intense national consciousness and sense of freedom, there is a parallel between these two peoples similar to the one discussed above (p. 961) in their enterprising genius for trade and their extensive trade activity.

The law of inheritance existing among them gives us 428 further insight into the family relations of the Gilyak. After 562 what has been said above about marriage, it is almost self-evident that it is concerned solely with the male members of the family, while the female members are not only left empty-handed, but even treated as objects of the estate. The first and, [601] if there are any, only heirs of a Gilyak are his sons, and, to be sure, the property of the father is inherited by them in equal shares, regardless of the order of seniority -- a custom which is all the more remarkable since the Gilyak language has a special term (ykkyn) for the oldest brother in contrast to the younger one (atschek). The wife and the daughters, whether married or unmarried, have no share in the inheritance. The former, if, be- [768] cause of her age, there is no chance of her remarrying, is taken [583] care of by her sons; the married daughters have entered other family circles, after they have increased their brother's inheritance by the bride price paid to their father for them, and the unmarried daughters become the property of their brothers and, if a suitor is found, must be purchased from them, and the bride price is shared equally among them. If one of the brothers dies unmarried, the other, surviving brothers inherit from him, again in equal shares. The same thing happens when from among several sons of a Gilyak, who have become independent, one dies unmarried while his father is still alive; the latter receives nothing, because under no circumstances may a father inherit from his son.

428 The law of inheritance is different if one of several brothers 587 dies and he was married and leaves behind a wife or perhaps wife and child, especially minor daughters and sons. If only a widow survives, she, along with all that she and her husband had, goes to the next brother of her deceased husband, and, to be sure, as a wife, regardless of whether the latter is still unmarried or already

116, 435, 583

"Dr. Schrenck, speaking of the Amur Gilyaks whom he visited fifty years ago, says their word 'to marry' (umgu genich) means 'to buy a wife,' and the value of the articles given, such as bear-spears, kettles, boats, and dogs amounts to large sums; in one case to as much as 310 rubles (31 guineas). The Sakhalin Gilyaks are much poorer, and give a sledge with a team of dogs, or a spear and two pieces of foreign stuffs. Sometimes an additional arrangement obtains, where the husband, who, unable to pay a handsome price, and in consideration of the value of his wife as fish-cleaner and preparer, gives his services to his father-in-law as hunter or fisherman for one or two days in the season."

461 Under ordinary circumstances it takes little effort on the 563 part of the Gilyak to nourish himself and his family. It is 512 only during the salmon run that the Gilyak works hard, during the rest of the time only the women are industrious.
The men often sleep at home during the day, and they get up after sunrise. In the evening, however, they often sit up a long time and chat. Well-to-do mainland Gilyak sometimes even hire Russian workmen. The men who work for gold-seekers are discharged in the autumn and could live quite well throughout the winter on their pay, but it never occurs to them to save; in a few weeks everything is spent and then they do not know what to do. Such hungry chaps often wander as far as the Gilyak villages and pledge themselves to cut wood and do odd jobs in exchange for board.
464 Gilyak have monotonous work. In the vicinity of Nikolayevsk-426 na-Amure [232] they sometimes turn to hauling in order to 567 earn something; but as for digging, wood cutting, sawing and similar work, they do not let themselves be enticed into it even for good wages. This, moreover, shows that they are ordinarily not in great straits. The Gilyak almost never trade on a commission basis.

Among themselves they are very punctual about paying.
If a debtor dies or becomes incapable of working, his relatives endeavor to pay off his debts. They know nothing whatever of going into bondage or slavery because of debt.
428 The law of inheritance is very simple. The father's 587 property goes to the children if they no longer have a mother.
If the children are under age, their uncle or some other close relative is their guardian and later returns their property if it has not been entirely used up. If a widow is left with children, the property remains intact in the family, and the mother is called "the elder" in possession. If the widow is childless she keeps a small part, about an eighth of the fortune, the rest belongs to the relatives of the deceased. If she wishes to enter a new marriage, the brother or some other close relative of the husband becomes, as we said, her second spouse, but if she already has children, they keep the estate of their father. If she is poor and does not wish to re-marry, she must be helped, and this help 428 she usually pays off in work as best she can. If a father 583 whose wife died earlier leaves a son or daughter, the estate is usually divided upon the daughter's marriage. In this case, the relatives of the bride look over the bridegroom.
If they regard him as irreproachable, the bride gets half, but if he is not of the best sort, she gets less, probably in 428 order that he may not squander the property. On Sakhalin,

● 583 only the sons inherit the parents, and the daughters are married off. If after the death of the parents only one daughter is left behind, she usually gets part of the estate
upon her marriage, the rest is kept by the relatives who took care of her. In any case, if the bride has a dowry, the man has no right to it; he can get hold of it only by going against the wishes of his wife.
428 In the matter of succession, it is true, the procedure is not everywhere and always [232] the same, but in general
one can draw the following conclusions from what has been
said: a) the children take precedence over other relatives;
b) the brothers take precedence over their sisters, provided the latter marry and thus share the fortune of their husband; c) the just usufruct of the estate on the part of the nearest relatives is very common; d) women may inherit
and have their own property, but in general they are not left as much; however, they have the right to be supported;
e) widows can demand their own share, but usually they become joint-owners of the estate along with their children.
565 The Gilyak are all of one class. There are no privileged 551 classes or families. There are families, now and then, who 177 are held in great esteem because of wealth, courage, or because their ancestor was founder of the village, but they have no real privileges of any kind. Such families also have family names (which are handed down by the males);
many Gilyak, however, have only one single name to which is added the name of their village, to distinguish them from outsiders. Some of them, whether they are baptized or not,
are given this or that Russian name besides their Gilyak one,
and by this name they are known even among their fellow-tribesmen. These "Petkas," "Mikitas", etc., are usually intelligent lads and understand Russian.
567 In like manner, there are no slaves, nor have there ever 594 been any among these people. Only personal qualities, 576 either bravery, wealth, age, or intelligence, give the individual a certain significance. Wealth may be regarded with a certain esteem, since it is usually acquired as a result of real superiority, - either courage, industry or judgment.
Toward aristocrats of wealth a certain external ceremony is occasionally observed. If such a person comes for a visit, both he and the host bow after a fashion, whereupon he holds up his cheek to be kissed; he himself does not kiss the other.

/37 cont./
587 daughter of the father's sister is not permitted. In the predilection 601 shown by the Gilyak for such a marriage, the almost religious-reverential attitude toward a custom which at one time was in-dubitably a universally binding, religio-social requirement is perceptible. Every woman, as soon as she bears a son, approaches 584 her brother. If he has a daughter, with a request for the engage-● 584 ment of their children. The ceremony of engagement consists in the binding of the arm of the bride with a piece of dog hair by the child-groom or by his father (a symbol of being carried away on dogs and also an echo of the totem /38/ cult of the dog). When the bride reaches five or six years of age, often even earlier, she goes to the home of the groom with them, the groom is fed and is educated until she enters the period of maturity, when, without any ritual, 592 she in fact becomes his wife. The degree to which the principle of 614 compulsory marriage exclusively with women from the clan of one's mother is still strong may be seen from the fact that, if even one clansman of the clan, let us say, A, took his wife from the completely alien clan, D, that is quite sufficient for all the women of the first clan to become forbidden to clan D, because the fact, even though unique, of the moving of women from clan D into A makes the first (D) the clan of the mother, into which the marriage of women from clan A is forbidden. In this case, how-[125 ever, "number" may testify most eloquently. During the census 601] that I made specifically for the study of the structure of the Gilyak family and clan, I was impressed from the very first days by the abundance of married (i.e., other-clan) women in each clan who called each other "sister" and "aunt," and not only in name, but who had actually been taken from one clan, namely, from that one from which the given clan had taken its women (the clan "of the mother") from ancient times.
592 If this regulation of marriage survives to such an extent even 178 now, in spite of the obstacles mentioned by us that lay in its way, then without doubt it was originally universally accepted, and even if all traces of it had disappeared in the contemporary customs, sufficient proof of its existence remains in the kinship terminology preserved up to the present in all its originality and recreating with extraordinary objectivity the old regime which gave rise to it.

584 ARRANGING A MARRIAGE--marriage preliminaries, courtship (e.g., opportunities, methods); initiation of negotiations (e.g., by youth, by girl, by parents of either); conduct of negotiations (e.g., by parents, through go-betweens); marriage brokers; proposal of marriage, methods and consequences of rejection, requirement of consent (e.g., of youth, of girl, of parents, of chief); betrothal (e.g., conceptualization, announcement, ceremonial, symbols, duration); status and behavior of betrothed persons; infant betrothal (e.g., prevalence, procedure, nullification); breaking an engagement (e.g., reasons, procedure, consequences); adjustment to death of betrothed (e.g., substitution of a sibling); etc. See also:

courtship . . . . . 860 Sexual overture 832 Conjugal relationships . . . . . 678 Adulterous activities 865

/165 cont./
587 Among the Gilyak, this type of marriage is imperative
● 584 to such a great extent that such marriages are often performed soon after the birth of the future spouses, in order to avoid any possible chance circumstances that could interfere with this important matter. The first concern of a mother soon after the birth of a son is to do everything possible in order to 585 marry him to the daughter of one of her brothers. In the ritual of the wedding, the child-groom or his father ties up the little hand of the bride with a thread twisted from the hairs of dog fur and a nettle, the magical symbols of a common economy -- dog-breeding -- and fishing; they fashion [601] nets from the nettle. From this moment the marriage is concluded, and when the bride has grown up a little more, approximately to the age of four or five years, she usually moves to the house of her groom, where she grows up with him, and they call each other, however strange it may seem to us, by the pet names "my wife" and "my husband" (n'an'gej, n'ru) up to the attainment of sexual maturity, at which time they become actual spouses, without any of the ritual or formalities which usually must be observed in concluding marriage with outsiders. This custom probably explains why the grown-up spouses are most often called "n'rskh"
and "mam," i.e., old man and old woman, since at the age when most of us are only preparing to get married the young Gilyak spouses may already be celebrating their silver anniversary. This custom sometimes leads to abnormal marriage [582 unions. Now and then one finds in one yurt a pair who call themselves husband and wife, where the husband is a youth
of about sixteen, while his wife is only four or five years old.
The explanation for this is either that the older sister of the latter has died or that her mother is considerably younger than her own brother. One way or another, such cases still further emphasize the imperative nature of the aforementioned mar-[556 riages. It is characteristic that this case is particularly zealously carried out in the richest families, which usually are distinguished by their especially strict observance of all the ancient customs and rites.

/167 cont./ Thus, each man can have several clans 606 of "fathers-in-law," and all the agnates of these clans, ac-609 cording to generations, are considered an'g'e) -- his wives and 614 the wives of his kinsmen. So it is in the kinship terminology, [601 and it is in life.

It will be necessary for us to consider in detail later how this complicated system developed.

For the present, we think, quite enough has been said to see that in the sphere of individual marriage the appellations ru and an'g'e) have played and still play an enormous role, symbolizing in themselves the remarkable institution of the right to marriage -- one of the many benefits which the clan structure gives to each of its participants.

Now we shall indicate only the practical significance of
● 584 this institution of the right to marriage at the present time.
592 For the contemporary Gilyak, marriage is one of the most 595 difficult matters of life. Not only in the fairy tales, but also in real life "finding a wife" is a business of unusual difficulty.
First of all, there is the extreme shortage of women. Among the Gilyak, according to calculations made on the basis of the census that I took, for every 1,000 males there are 785 females; on the isolated shores of the Sea of Okhotsk, it is 694 females, while in Siberia, for every 1,000 males there are 900 females. It is necessary to add that a significant percentage of the Gilyak, namely, the wealthiest individuals, keep from two to four wives. For example, according to my census on the western shore of Sakhalin to the north of the settlement of Arkyn, for every ninth inhabitant there was one polygamous man, with the total ratio of men to women being 1000:694. There is one old bachelor for every 11 married men, and one polygamist for every 19 married men. It is not difficult to imagine how limited the choice of women was. /168/ and it was already limited by a whole set [583 of prohibitions. With such a limited choice and with such a considerable preponderance of men over women, the bride price, the payment for women (in valuables or long-term service), naturally reaches an unusually great amount. Under

/169 cont./
833 daytime the favorite place for "catching" one's an'g'e) is lo-● 835 cations where berries are gathered; in the evening -- anywhere outside of the settlement, near the well. In the winter, in the yurt; in the daytime, in the absence of strangers; at ● 835 night, after all have gone to sleep. Finally, there are periods 222 when the group spouses are free from any restrictions. The material men go for several weeks into the taiga to their hunting territories, while in the summer and winter they continually travel about on visits or to festivals. At these times ● 835 there is complete freedom for the group spouses. Only one [52] thing is most strictly demanded: neither the participants themselves nor any strangers who have chanced to be witnesses to the relations of group spouses have the right, under the penalty of sinning, to tell anyone, no matter who, and especially the persons concerned, about such relations publicly. But these demands of non-publicity, established in the interests of peace between group spouses, with the aim of preventing possible fits of jealousy, have in no way diminished the publicity of the institution of group marriage itself, the publicity of the conjugal rights themselves. These rights [671] have been nationally formulated in legal theses which have [847] come to be common property (the formulas themselves are given below in the chapter on the relations of brothers to their wives) -- theses which each father and each mother consider their obligation to impart to their children with religious solicitude from very earliest childhood. Publicly, the group spouses not only behave with unconstrained familiarity, but address each other with none other than the tender words "my [769] dear little husband," "my dear little wife." But the publicity of group relations /170/ is manifested best of all in the case of the death of a man who is not joined in an individual marriage.
In such cases, before the burning of the body, one of the group wives (usually the wife of an older brother) steps out on the funeral platform and in the hearing of all mourns for ● 835 him as for her beloved, as for her husband. It is curious to ● 835 note that during the negotiations between the ru and the ● 584

/170 cont./

835 an'g:ej with regard to an anticipated seance, they go through 832 the same symbolic actions that people go through during the 584 betrothal and wedding ceremonies, namely, they smoke or eat 595 together. To say to a woman of the an'g:ej category, "Let us [195] have a smoke together," is equivalent to an offer to her to exercise her marital right.

832 The legal essence of this specific right, as we have said, 835 is in the fact that its realization, even when it becomes known 684 to all, does not provoke a reaction either of the persons concerned or of social censure, and likewise it does not constitute a violation of religious morals, a privilege of an extremely important character, for sexual intercourse with women outside of this category incurs grave consequences. If this be a completely alien woman -- although at the present time this does not constitute a religious transgression -- then it provokes, as we have already mentioned, bloody punishment if the fornicators are caught in flagrante delicto, or at best a cruel duel with sticks and a fine. There are many reasons for believing that intercourse with female strangers was even once under a religious prohibition. The following curious custom, by the way, testifies in favor of this notion. If a woman who is not bound to a man by class relationship tries to seduce him, catches him by the leg in some isolated place (a symbolic offering of herself to the man), then he (if, it goes without saying, he does not succumb to the temptation) is obliged, under penalty of punishment of the gods, to demand publicly an expiatory ransom from the woman (1).

[14] 629

1. I personally happened to be a witness to such a ceremony of ransom. It was in the settlement of Tamlevo. One of my traveling companions, a Gilyak already middle-aged, once woke me early in the morning and with anxiety asked me to go with him to "court" in the neighboring yurt. There I found a large assembly of the masters of the settlement. My companion laid before them his

/178 cont./

835 The right to sexual intercourse with the wives of brothers 828 has grown to be such an ordinary idea among the Gilyak that 829 they are not able to imagine an order of things whereby a woman could be the private property of one man. The Gilyak youths were extremely perplexed by my asking them so often and so persistently about these relations; they considered them so commonplace that they should not, according to their way of thinking, have caused any doubts at all, and they asked me in surprise: "Is it possible that it is different among you? Is it bad for you to sleep with your brother's wife?" i.e., not permitted, finding that their law is better than ours. It goes without saying that human nature remains true to itself. The 152 835 Gilyak, too, is jealous, and in other cases where the matter
578 does not concern his tuvn he can react with the unbridled passion 684 of primitive man. It means nothing to a Gilyak to kill a rival or have a bloody duel with him. But when the affair concerns /179/ his brothers, then, thanks to the notions that have been a part of him since childhood and to a whole set of prohibitions that we shall discuss below, the brutal instinct loses its power over the Gilyak; he either does not react at all to the flirtations of his wife, or quite weakly. To avoid friction between [182] brothers, however, some preventive measures are practical.
602 Thus, for example, custom dictates that the older brothers 584 not only yield primogeniture in marriage to the younger brothers, but even that they help them with "valuables" for the purchase of wives.

835 At first glance such a custom seems all the more strange 182 in that the older persons often do not have sexual rights to the 578 wives of the younger. But, on the other hand, another advantage is gained: having married off their younger brothers, the older brothers are freed in the future to a certain extent from the encroachment of the younger brothers on their own wives. Though such a preventive gives security, albeit weak, with regard to own brothers, the younger class-brothers are too numerous to be all married off in turn and secured against. By way of an exception, I observed several cases

/251 cont./

831 words signifying "my man, my woman," -- n'az'mych, [192] n'an'kh. The Gilyak themselves consider love a normal stage of life which everyone must experience in his youth. This view is very well conveyed in a song which I noted down on the Amur, in which a girl, complaining of her mother's nagging about her passion, sings:

[539]

Mother, mother, dear mother,
Haf thou forgotten thine own youth?

(Literally: "Thou hast forgotten thine own past time, let me be!")

831 Parents, however, never reproach their children for their 882 amorous passions. When the youth do hear the grumbling of 593 their elders, it is most often due to purely economic considerations, since during the period of passion the young people neglect their work and become careless and inaccurate. In general it is not even permissible to react in any way to the sexual passion of the children, maidens included. If the [684] father or brother finds out about the fornication of his daughter or sister, he not only may not use force against the seducer, but it is even forbidden to summon him to a duel, and he may not even be angry with the daughter. They treat the amorous passions of the children as a perfectly natural phenomenon. The mother in particular is often even the confidante of the amorous secrets of her children. In many [533] songs which I noted down on the Amur, sons constantly address their mother, sharing with her their amorous sufferings, seeking advice as to where and how to find their beloved. Serious remonstrances by the parents, active remonstrances
835 going to the point of pitilessness, are encountered only in [762] the case of love for a person of a forbidden category. In such cases, the parents themselves urge their daughter to commit suicide. Often the pitilessness of the parents, mainly 584 of the father, becomes manifest when love frustrates an 593 advantageous marriage, one which has been agreed on since

/251 cont./

584 childhood, and they forcibly give the girl in marriage to an 593 unloved man. But these are exceptional cases

831 In its content, love among the Gilyak does not differ in any way from love in civilized society. Coarse sexuality is completely lacking in it. In the love of this primitive people we find the whole scale of universal feeling, from the tenderest tones of poetic sentimentality and tranquil lover's sorrow to the stormiest outbursts of heroic passion, which neither halts before any obstacle /252/ nor shrinks before a manly resolution to part with one's life.

831 These psychics of the Gilyak are very well reflected in 593 love songs, especially in the songs of women.

Nature endowed the Gilyak woman with a depth and delicacy of feeling which she is able to express in touching images and forms. "Night and day do I think of thee... As on my own mother do I gaze...If thou leavest me, only of thee shall I think, where thou didst walk, there shall I walk. From the well whence we both did drink, thy dark shadow shall I drink. As of many trees the tallest one doth most greatly please, so of all men art thou most beautiful and best. O, take me with thee, I would be the wallet and flint that hang from thy belt. I shall be the bottom of thy boat, with thee would I be. My left tear flows and falls like rain, the calf of my right leg fails me, it has become immovable, wholly dry have I become, my legs do not move" -- with such expressions, taken at random from various Gilyak songs, a woman expresses her love. But it is noteworthy that the same sentimental notes sound in the songs of the men, and the references to left and right tears pattering like rain, to the knee, the same grief over separation, the same sweet dreams of reunion, are just as frequent. One finds such emotional expressions as "I have loved thee wholly, all of thee"... Only rarely does clumsy vulgar (from our point of view) crudity creep in, for example, "Of a fat thigh the joint (the malves) spins(twitches), that is how I like it." But never any cynicism.

/252 cont./

831 The importance of the role of love in the life of the 533 Gilyak may be judged by the wealth of song material. Not every Gilyak can relate a story or poem, but everyone knows love songs. Songs play a quite exceptional role in Gilyak love. The song is the language of lovers. At their assignations lovers sing improvised songs to each other in place of conversation, and, if they find it impossible to meet, they send each other songs, composed ad hoc, through a third person. Special terms have even been made up for such songs.

An idea of the intensity of love among the Gilyak may 831 be gained from the reaction of lovers in cases where their 584 love encounters insuperable obstacles. In such cases the 593 solution is suicide. Obstacles in the Gilyak environment 762 are of a twofold nature. Most frequently the obstacle is presented by the parents, who, either from mercenary motives or from an unwillingness to violate /253/ the childhood agreement of betrothal, force a marriage, or when a woman is violently carried away. In such cases suicides 831 frequently take place quite a long time after the involuntary 593 marriage. In such cases the woman first of all seeks to save 762 herself from the unloved man by flight and, in the event of failure, ends with suicide. I remember one such characteristic instance. A girl from the village of Nyanivo was given in marriage against her will. Soon she ran away from her husband to her father, who handed her over to her lover, tempted by the idea of getting a second bride price from him. Her first husband would not reconcile himself to this and utilized a favorable moment to take her back by force. Within half a year the unfortunate woman hanged herself.

There have been instances where a woman, fleeing from [849] her unloved husband, has slain the children that she had 831 by him. Men prefer to defend their rights to love by action.
593 Ordinarily they seek to carry the woman away by force with 762 the aid of clansmen, but they will not stop at slaying the [832] husband of their beloved. I noted one very outstanding

CONTINUED ON NEXT FICHE

CONTINUED FROM PRECEDING FICHE

835 /254 cont./
831 the goods that he had brought back, released his bear, which 832 he was fattening up for a feast, from its cage, and hanged 533 himself. The song which the unhappy girl sang at the mo-538 ment of parting has been preserved. We present it in its entirety in the section on lyrics. Here we quote only the first [539] lines: "Take me with thee, the board of the bottom of thy bark will I become... Now one must think only about Mlyvo (1).

1. The world beyond the grave.

That you may remember me, keep the earrings hung up on the wall."

The Gilyak employ magic means against unrequited love.
832 One of these means is the dried-up brain of the cuckoo, which [825] they mix with tobacco and offer to the girl to smoke. Or they surreptitiously sew the feather of a cuckoo to her dress.
But there are also other means that are not so harmless and lead to tragic consequences.

As they relate, one who has tasted these potions, these drugs, falls into a deep melancholy and, after a few days, dies. I knew two persons, somewhat Russified, who used to sell such drugs for a high price, and several women died of them.

832 Among the Gilyak,as in our country, there are timid in-584 • dividuals who cannot bring themselves to make a declaration of love in person. In such cases the intermediaries are old women, who, for this, must be given "tea" -- a present.
Sometimes they send some present through these intermediaries, ordinarily cloth, in which they tie several knots, corresponding to the number of days until the admirer will pay his visit.

832 There remains to be discussed only what the stimuli of love are for the Gilyak, what individual traits comprise the attraction of the beloved. First of all, of course, there is the aesthetic side -- beauty, especially facial beauty. The word "beautiful" in the Gilyak language is expressed by the term poch urland, literally -- "of a good face."

/258/

XII.

Methods of Obtaining a Wife

584 • Data from the epos. It is first of interest to reconstruct the 538 picture of the acquisition of a wife in the old days according to the data from the popular epos. Judging from these data, especially from the so-called r'afund (poems), the acquisition of a wife in the old days was not at all an easy matter (1).

[592] 1. That the procuring of a wife was not a simple matter is shown by the very expression for this undertaking, an'gej nanygind, in which the verb nanygind is a technical term for the hunting of a beast, usually accompanied by difficulties in the search and all sorts of dangers.

On the contrary, one of the chief exploits of the heroes is the search for a wife. In order to find his wife, the hero of a Gilyak poem must undertake the most distant and hazardous journeys to the end of the world; he must sail over stormy seas, even ascend to heaven or descend to the kingdom of the underworld or the bottom of the sea, not to speak of all sorts of heroic duels with whole clans of the most fearsome foes -- duels encountered in the course of these peregrinations.

Why is it so, why must the hero, a strong man, of necessity seek his wife far away, when he has every opportunity to find a wife nearby?

First of all, we shall note that the aforementioned term an'gej nanygind, "to seek a wife," may lead one to think that the ordinary mode of securing a wife for the heroes was force, abduction. True, this, too, was done by them, but most frequently they obtained their wives in the most peaceful manner, without even paying anything. This is

534 /258 cont./
538 • evident from the very expression an'gej nanygind, where to denote wife the word an'gej is used -- the term used for the category of women with respect to whom the Gilyak has the right and obligation of marriage. And in fact everything indicates that the object of the hero's searchings is precisely the lawful wife who belongs to him by right of birth. Everywhere that the hero appears with his demands he is addressed by the term ymgai -- son-in-law /syat'/, and the women to whom he makes claim are designated an'gej, but when they refer to some other possible candidate, alien to him, they do not call her an'gej, but sanih. Here is a characteristic example. The hero of one poem (2) /559/ was rejected by his

2. L. Shternberg, Materialy po izucheniiu giliatskogo iazyka i fol'klora /Materials on the Study of Gilyak Language and Folklore/, 1908, p. 118.

lawful an'gej, who declared that if she had to marry him she would kill herself. Then the father says: "Son-in-law!
Once the maiden does not want thee, what can you do? Go and seek another woman (sanih, and not an'gej)." After this he went to another place. In one yurt he found an old woman, She said: "Son (mothers-in-law frequently give this name to their sons-in-law), why hast thou come? Hast thou come in search of a wife? Thy wives are yonder (on the hill) in that pile yurt, there are thy wives, go" (1). The plural is used

1. L. Shternberg, op. cit., 118.

here because these were two sisters, and both, in accordance with Gilyak law, belonged to him. True, it may seem strange that the heroes of the poems must seek their lawful wife with such tremendous exertions; it would seem, on the contrary, that this would be extremely easy, because commonly there are very many women of this category, their

/259 cont./
584 • residence is known to every interested individual, and cus-538 tomarily one can find them in the nearest settlement. But such is the fate of heroes; marvellous adventures always fall to their lot. Commonly they are isolated people, whose kin have suffered some catastrophe. The nearest clans of their fathers-in-law may have become extinct through an epidemic or a famine, while the surviving branches may have emigrated long, long ago to some distant place and lost all ties with those left behind -- under such circumstances it is not strange that the hero must wander in all directions in order, like the hunter, to make his way to the desired goal through visible traces, inquiries, and guesses.

Finally, it also may be that the desired an'gej, whom the hero at last reaches, is betrothed to a stranger, and all the imposing strength and renown of the hero are necessary to compel the father-in-law to violate his word, given to another, which threatens him either with war with the clan of the offended bridegroom, or, at best, with a trial and the payment of a large ransom. And the hero himself must later endure a whole series of such wars for a wife obtained in this manner. Here is a typical example of this kind from one n'ax'umd. The hero, appearing at the home of the woman who is to be his wife, hears the following answer from the father of this woman in response to his claim: "She is betrothed -- n'ky-yvyn iokhta' (technical term for a girl betrothed to a stranger). One clan of the mountain people and still other clans will come to make war on thee." Our Gilyak said: "Nevertheless I shall go ahead and carry her off."
The old man replied: "Thou wilt only come back tomorrow." [583] On the following day, after the customary communal /260/feast, he not only let his daughter go without receiving anything for her, but even ordered two boats to be loaded full of valuables as a dowry for her, which is only possible when the woman is the lawful bride of a man by right of birth.

/260 cont./
538
• 538 585 [597] It is characteristic that in purely Gilyak poems, not having any traces of Goldi-Manchurian borrowings and influences, we do not encounter any procedure of betrothal, which at the present time plays such an important role. All is reduced to a laconic dialogue: Groom: "I have come to take my wife." Father: "All right, take her!" After this everything is done unusually simply. The marriage is immediately consummated. The only ceremony, about which I shall speak in detail later on, is the confarreatio, the joint smoking or meal.

The old man, the father of the bride, questions the hero:
"Thou art a man from where?" Our Gilyak: "I am a dweller of the village in the middle of the bay, I have come to take thy daughter in marriage." Then this old man said: "My child, this guest has come to take thee, go with him." This woman said: "Very well, I shall go with him." This old man said: "Ho, slaves! Prepare a meal, feed the guest"...
Our Gilyak ate with his wife. Having eaten, having finished, he set out with his wife" (1). Another example even better

1. Shternberg, op. cit., 47.

depicts this simplicity of ritual. "That old man (the father of the bride) said: 'Eat with your husband.' Then that woman ate with our Gilyak. Having eaten, they went out, urinated, came in, made the bed, got in under one blanket, lay down, and slept." On the following day the hero departed with his wife and the dowry (2).

2. Ibid., 81.

583 But along with such lawful marriages there are also 538 described cases of the forcible carrying off of women. And this is quite natural, for such misfortune may overtake the hero that the clans of his lawful fathers-in-law may become extinct, and willy-nilly he must obtain a wife by force.

/260 cont./
583 Such catastrophes, as we shall see further on, are not at all 538 rare. This alternative which, according to the epos, faced the man of olden times -- either to marry his lawful an'gej, who belonged to him by right of birth, or to obtain a wife by force, while at the same time there is almost no mention of betrothal to an alien woman as a special form of marriage -- proves that obtaining a woman by purchase was a later institution, established as a corrective of the custom of abduction with /261/ all its bloody consequences, just as ransom was a corrective of blood revenge.

Thus are the methods of obtaining wives depicted for us in the traditional epos.

584 Contemporary methods of obtaining a wife. Up to the pres-
• 584 ent the Gilyak has preferred the old orthodox mode of marrying a woman of the an'gej category, a woman who is regarded as one's wife by right of birth. Only such a marriage is considered "pure." And people who are staunchly for the laws of antiquity try to observe the old law. Of all the categories of an'gej the most desirable marriage is with the daughter of the mother's brother, in other words, the most orthodox is considered the cousin marriage between the daughter of a brother and the son of his sister. Such a marriage is so highly valued that even before the future spouses appear in the world the sister and the brother give each other their word to unite the children in marriage.
After the birth of the children, when they have reached the age of three or four, there takes place in the presence of the clansmen of one side or the other a formal act of agreement [593] or even the actual concluding of the marriage. Even the [602] mother of the groom may carry on the negotiations, not with the father of the bride (for she is his sister and conversation between brother and sister is prohibited) but with 584 his wife. The whole procedure of agreement amounts to 585 this: the matchmaker /svat/ (father or mother of the groom) before everyone ties each arm and each leg of the fiancés with threads of nettle and dog hair and, in addition, gives

/261 cont./
584 the parents of the bride a male dog, not, however, a female.
585 It is not permitted to remove the fillet, since it is considered [601] testimony of betrothal. From this moment on the children are considered husband and wife, and they address each other with these terms. Usually in such cases the young wife moves to the house of her young bedgroom, sleeps with him in the same bed, passes her childhood years with him, and upon attainment of sexual maturity begins marital life.

58 This baste to conclude a marriage between children is 182 explained by many reasons, but the basic reason amounts to a timely strengthening of the right to bed marriage. In a few years another such lawful claimant may be born or grow up, the son of another sister or female first cousin. Furthermore, in the course of time the economic situation of both sides may change. The father of the bride may become needy and be seduced by a bride price from the outside. There are cases, of course, where the cousins becoming betrothed are of different ages; the bridegroom, the son of the sister, may be a grown lad, while the daughter of the brother /262/ is just an infant, but the procedure is exactly the same. A Gilyak 565 of my acquaintance, Pletun, a lad of about 20, married in this fashion his five-year-old cousin, the daughter of Ikisu, took her into his house at once, commenced to sleep with her, and began actual cohabitation with her when she reported her first menstruation to him. But it also happens that a child-wife remains in the home of her parents and moves to her husband's house at the first appearance of menstruation, but no formalities are required for this move;
the initial agreement is considered a pledge and, known to all.
"All Sakhalin knows of this," a Gilyak of my acquaintance, who had betrothed his little daughter to the son of his sister, said to me with great pathos. In such marriages not only is 585 bride price not due, but there is not even any question of it.
583 There is merely an exchange of girls, but even this is not at [178] all obligatory. Such is the simple arrangement in cases of [184] betrothal of the children of male and female first cousin,

/265 cont./
602 preserved in the form of remnants even among peoples who 604 by now have shifted to paternity, for example, the peoples 191 of the Caucasus, where a tribesman has the right to steal his uncle's horse, if the latter refuses to give it as a gift. Among the Altaians the saying that "a tribesman is worse than seven wolves" has been preserved to this day.

Moreover, the role of the brother in giving his sister in • 584 marriage is quite characteristic. In many cases, it is not 593 the father, but the brother who plays the main role in this affair; the agreement to the marriage depends on him, and the bride price is handed over to him.

Not a few other extremely indicative traces which may 194 be considered remnants of maternality have been preserved 196 in the language and customs. Thus, if a Gilyak wishes to say 597 that he is married, that he has a wife and children, he says: 191 n'i-umgarvo ivri, literally "I have a wife's village" (ni -- I, umgar -- wife's, vo -- village, ivri -- there is), an expression completely corresponding to the present-day way of life of the Ainu, among whom to this day maternality has been preserved, and often husband and wife live in different settlements, and the former shows up to live with her for several months, and then he returns to his own settlement, so that a man has, besides his own native settlement, still another settlement where his wife lives.

194 Another example: the term for designating a person's 191 origin is the expression pandos', literally "root of birth."
614 This term indicates not the clan of a man, as would naturally 186 be expected under the contemporary agnatic system, nor the settlement in which he was born, but the place of his mother's clan. It is interesting to note in this case the reverence with which the Gilyak regards the homeland of not only his mother, but also her female ancestors. No matter how distant such a settlement might be, every man tries to find an occasion to visit, and more than once my /266/ Gilyak companions during the time of my travels amazed me by the tenderness and

/268 cont./
535 In another poem, in response to the demand of the bride-538 groom, the father-in-law makes only one condition: "You will not go back before tomorrow!" He then orders his slaves to prepare a bite for the couple and, turning to his daughter, says: "Eat together with your husband!" That woman ate with our Gilyak. Having eaten, they went out, urinated, entered arranged the bedding and lay themselves down under the same blanket, and went to sleep. On the following day that old man said: "You shall set out in five large boats loaded to the top with nothing but valuables" (1) /see footnote 1 below/.

Another example. The hero of a poem arrived in a 538 town with many people, and, when he went into the center
• 542 yurt, a woman was alone there. This woman said: "O, guest, 585 from where have you come?" Our Gilyak said: "I have come to take you!" This woman said: "If you wish to take me, go to my father, talk it over!" Our Gilyak went out, went into a yurt, an old man, an old woman were there. This old woman said: "You are a man from where?" Our Gilyak said:
"I have come to take your daughter!" That old man rose:
"Well then, prepare mos' feed my son-in-law." Our Gilyak left, he came to his wife: "Your father said that we both, having come as guests in the evening, are to eat mos'." His wife: "All right!" That evening they went visiting, having eaten mos' they left; having had a good sleep, they arose, ate, and then went back (i.e., with her husband to his village). /Footnotes 2 and 3 at the bottom of the original text
p. 268, referring to Shternberg's Materialy, p. 84 and pp. 57, 58, respectively are not indicated in the text/.

582 Orthodox forms at the present time. Now, as we see, firmly [581] seated in every Gilyak there is the consciousness that only an orthodox marriage, i.e., marriage from the clan of [184] akhmak'i, from the clan of the mother, is lawful, "pure." [178] Even on the Amur, where the old norms have especially undergone change, to the question about the marriage norms they will say to you first of all: "It is necessary to take a wife from the fathers-in-law -- the root of one's birth" (i.e.,

/269 cont./
582 my children and your children also be akhmak'i. If you do not give your daughter to my son, you will completely break the old law, that will be bad. Let us do everything according to law ("live peace")."

[583] After such a reminder, rarely does anyone refuse his duty, even though this obligation entails the loss of property, for in such cases they either do not give a bride price, or they give a very small one, if the akhmak is not an ancient one.

Orthodox forms of concluding marriage. The most varied 197 circumstances led to the destruction of orthodox marriages 198 in the clans of akhmak'i. One of the causes was the depopu-133 lation of the clans from which they took wives, which com-555 pelled them to marry women of alien clans. Another cause, 58 perhaps the most important, was at economic one, brought [582] about by their contact with the cultured peoples of the Far East, a contact which gave impetus to the development of hunting pursuits for commercial exchange. Objects which formerly had no value, such as the skins of the sable and fox, became objects for which one might obtain not only objects of luxury, such as expensive cloth, valuable weapons, and ornaments, but also food and liquor, such as rice, groats, and, finally, alcohol and tobacco. Even nowadays the Gilyak clearly remember the time when sables and foxes used to run around fearlessly in great numbers near the Gilyak dwellings, and no one /270/ killed them, since they preferred to dress themselves in dog hides. And all of a sudden in exchange for these beasts it became possible to obtain 197 the most desirable objects. A tremendous change inevitably 198 took place in the psychics of the Gilyak and in the relation-556 ships of the people among themselves. If formerly a man's 582 dream did not go beyond attaining the reputation of a good [581] person, unla n'vukh, i.e., an outstanding hunter who shared [194] his catch with his tribesmen, now urdla n'vukh became a synonym for "rich man," whose dream was to amass a quantity of luxury objects. Self-interest and boasting appeared upon the scene, as well as the desire to excel others

197 /270 cont./
198 in one's own wealth, although it only amounted to the 133 possession of several pieces of silk material, Japanese sabers, 555 and so forth. There appeared on the scene a tendency toward 58 differentiation. The rich man desired to associate with and [582] become related to only rich people. In the question of the choice of a wife there appeared new dictates. One demanded of a wife that she be from a family of equal wealth and, consequently, of an equally high social rank. And now, even in the ancient "yigund" -- legends -- there is heard in marriagetal [illegible] expressions: "He (or she) is not my equal." On the other hand, wealth allowed one to manifest 556 a special fastidiousnent in the choice of a wife, to seek 58 women who were famous for their special qualities, who 614 were outstanding for their beauty, their domestic talents,
their artistry in sewing, and other feminine tasks. But once marriage came to be practiced between members of alien
clans, the former simplicity of concluding marriage vanished.
There appeared on the scene the new institution of bride price,
which introduced into the institution of marriage the element
of purchase-sale; besides this, marriage between persons of alien clans demanded preliminary negotiations and the procedures of betrothal. We now turn to these institutions.

192 The terms of betrothal. The procedure of betrothal is ex-584 pressed by various terms, denoting literally, "to agree, to come to an agreement about the bride"; hence, the matchmaker -- "the man who makes an agreement", bride --
"future wife"; groom -- "future husband." For us, the terms for groom and bride are particularly interesting. With orthodox marriage there is no special term for groom and
bride, for according to the right of birth the groom is called [194] nu -- husband, and the bride -- angej. The term jokh, which is used nowadays to designate the bride, is entirely inadmissible with orthodox marriage, for, as we have seen, with orthodox marriage jokh is a term of prohibition for sexual intercourse. Thus, the term itself shows that the procedure
of betrothal arose after the weakening of the regime of orthodox marriage.

197 /270 cont./
198 orthodox marriage. For an agreement concerning an orthodox 585 /271/ marriage with a young girl there is even the special [194] term tshagund (eastern dialect tygnydz).

Persons participating in the betrothal. On the side of the groom 584 the representatives are: 1) father and mother; 2) brother of the 280 father; 3) elder brother of the groom; 4) husband of the sister [582] of the father. The role of the bride's individual is explained apparently by the norms of orthodox marriage. According to this last, the husband of the sister of the father is the father of the husband of the sister of the groom. Since by the norms of Gilyak marriage his daughter cannot marry the brother of his daughter-in-law, the husband of the sister of the father considers it his duty to promote the marriage of his closest akhmak, the brother of his own daughter-in-law.
584 If the father is dead, he is replaced by one of the urdla 602 n'vukh (honored persons) among his clansmen. Since the 614 marriage is considered the affair of the clan, there frequently participate, in addition to these persons, several honored clansmen. When the betrothal involves a very wealthy per-[556] son, the honored clansmen come in several boats, bringing [582] with them at once the articles of the bride price, and frequently, if the delegation plus the rich bride price makes the proper impression, they immediately take the maiden away with them upon the conclusion of the negotiations.

The bridegroom also attends the betrothal. If he is all 584 alone, or if, on the contrary, he is quite wealthy and re-602 nowned, he can become betrothed by himself. In one song the 556 maiden sings to her beloved: "Holding my hand, betroth me." [533]

Matchmakers are unnecessary in the case of a married 595 man who wants to marry a second wife. Then he himself 584 usually goes to the clan of his first wife, but often the latter 614 herself goes to her own clan or to another one (if there are no suitable candidates in her own) for the selection and betrothal of a new girl-friend for her husband.

/272 cont./

584 184 [171] The bride is not present during the betrothal, the mother has the absolute right of veto, and the kinsmen play no role.

last moment, when the bridegroom arrives to take her home 584 184 with him. The disregarding of wishes of the daughter is not at all, I believe, the result of the newer stage of marriage accompanied by bride price, where the parents have motives of self-interest in the choosing of a bridegroom; it is rather a remnant of the orthodox marriage, where from her very childhood a girl was destined by obligation for one definite person or limited group of persons, and there could be no question of full freedom of choice, all the more because the marriages were actually concluded soon after birth.

584 The procedure of betrothal. In the procedure of betrothal among the Gilyak we find features which are repeated with remarkable similarity among the most diverse peoples. The procedure of betrothal is a true diplomatic war surrounded by a whole series of military stratagems. In serious cases, when the matter involves a very wealthy and renowned girl, the matchmakers try to catch the other side unawares and at first conceal the object of their coming. Arriving at the house, they say that they are passing by. Casually they bring out vodka from their travel provisions. The unsuspecting hosts readily accept the treat, and, when they are in a good mood, the matchmakers begin to recall that they are old friends of the host, that he has never refused their requests, and they hope that in the future they shall not meet with refusals. The host, suspecting nothing, promises zealously to assist them with everything at his disposal. And here they take him at his word and come to the point. /273/ He can no [675] longer decline, for he has given his word. In order that the host may not repudiate his promise, the matchmakers have taken timely, precautionary measures to invite witnesses.

/273 cont./

584 675 Even without invitations, however, there are always witnesses, for the arrival of countrymen immediately becomes known and the yurt is filled with outsiders. Repudiation of [686] one's word is a serious matter, for which one is summoned to court, and this results in a large fine.

584 576 But even if the matchmakers do not wish to or cannot conceal the purpose of their coming, etiquette does not permit them to come immediately to the point.

At first they speak about the most unrelated things, not giving any hint of the purpose of their coming. During the conversation, drinks are passed around. Having conversed enough concerning "news, events," they gradually come to the point, but they are obliged to approach it through circumlocutions and hints, attempting to discover how favorable the chances are. If the father of the bride disapproves from the start, he immediately cuts off the matchmakers with a categorical rejection. But this rarely happens, for no one goes to make a match without a chance for an agreement.
[203] Usually they come, as the Gilyak say, as "equals to equals," for all the Gilyak, no matter how far they live from one another, know everything about one another, down to the minutest details, even who killed how many sables during the last season. The question is merely one of not assenting quickly, in order to bargain as much as possible. Etiquette requires the father to pretend for a long time that he does not know why the matchmakers have come, and, when it is no longer possible to pretend, he must think up all possible excuses and obstacles. Ordinarily he resorts to deprecatory opinions about his daughter, asserting that she is very ugly in appearance, understands nothing about the care of the house, that she is quarrelsome, etc. But the guests are quite prepared for these evasions and have answers prepared in advance. "We," they say, "are not chasing after loveliness; and as for the care of the house, she is still quite young, she will learn, and anyway we have enough women experts without her; as for her ill-temper, that is no misfortune, the years will teach her how to live with people." Or they interrupt

/273 cont./

584 576 him curtly: "That is not your business. We will take care of that. If she is bad, we will teach her!" This unconditional approval of the bride is all the host needs; after that he will know how to set the most advantageous conditions, to which the matchmakers are compelled to agree (1).

[114] [171]

1. This is exactly the way the Gilyak explain the motives for the father's deprecatory opinions of his daughter. I think, therefore, that Iokhel'son was wrong in explaining this custom among the Koryak as a preventive against possible future complaints (The Koryak, 739).

/274/ But it may happen that the father will not give any sign that he is gratified by the attitude of the matchmakers toward the inadequacies of his daughter. When all the objections are exhausted, he suddenly fires the phrase which the Gilyak commonly utters when he wants to cut short a disagreeable conversation: "I know nothing," he says through the pipe clenched in his teeth. And after a short pause he angrily declares: "Ask my wife what she wants, it is not my business." Then they begin to regale the mother of the bride, who, after long excuses, in turn finishes with the laconic phrase: "Why do you ask me? Let the men de-583 584 184 cide!" Finally, the negotiations move to the business basis of the bride price and dowry. In this connection the customs are different on Sakhalin and the Amur. On the Amur, where the people are more mercantile, the bride's side unashamedly enumerates down to the slightest detail the objects of the bride price.

On Sakhalin they are more modest; at first they name only two or three objects, the most valuable ones of the expected bride price, and after that they only haggle over secondary valuables. But in both places the procedure of the negotiations is carried on in an elevated atmosphere.

/274 cont./

584 583 At this stage the viscosity of the negotiations reaches its apogee, and "tayoray" /spelled with Russian letters; see below/ begins to play a quite exceptional role. I happened to be present when in the settlement of Pil'vo on Sakhalin a Gilyak whom I knew, a certain Isayka, betrothed his little boy to the 15-year-old daughter of an old widow. The old woman had no kin in the settlement, neither any of her own nor any on the side of her deceased husband. At her request, therefore, all the honorable persons of the settlement assembled. On the bridegroom's side there appeared, besides his father, his clansman, Sofronka. At first, it seemed that the business would quickly end, for the old woman was very needy and had pushed forward her own proposal herself. But when they came to a discussion of the bride price, Sofronka argued with her the whole day. In vain did he employ all his eloquence and ask those present to help him convince the old woman of the acceptability of the conditions. She invariably reiterated one thing: "tajoraj /spelled with Latin letters/!" Finally, after a whole day of tormenting negotiations, when the old woman found that she had sufficiently maintained her character and completely fulfilled all the demands of etiquette, she offered the conditions with which the other side had been in agreement from the very beginning, namely, that the bride price should be paid at once in its entirety.

[126] To indicate the character of the ceremony of negotiations, I shall cite the introductory dialogue of a matchmaker with the father of the bride that I wrote down /275/ on the Amur. The matchmaker, the father of the groom, Pevn by name, is asking for the daughter of Lakkan. Both are well-to-do men, old acquaintances.

584 583 539 [203] [596] After the customary exchange of news, after drinking some vodka, Pevn says (I translate literally): We both have been for a long time as an elder brother with a younger (like brothers), great friends have we been. Now I have come through need, it was necessary to come to thee, It is a matter, a big matter, when the need came, do thou come to my aid.

/275 cont./

584 583 539 Lakkan: Whatever I have, (with it) I am ready to aid thee, although I have nothing.

Pevn: If thou hast something, wilt thou not pity me, wilt thou not wish to help?

Lakkan: To this day I have refused thee nothing, is it not so?

Pevn: Of course.

Lakkan: If thou shalt have something, thou wilt have pity on me. Once thou shalt have something, I shall also have, is it not so?

Pevn: If thus hast thou spoken, it gladdens me. Thus in truth thou art ready to give me what thou hast?

Lakkan: What I have, if thou shalt ask, I am ready to give thee.

After this the matchmaker again pours the drinks and, finally, unexpectedly announces: "Thou hast promised to give me what thou hast. Now you have a daughter, I have a son. Let us become akhmalk'i."

To this Lakkan replies: I have already given my word to others.

Pevn: What if you did give your word to another man? You also gave your word to me before witnesses. I will go to court with you.

583 [584] After such preliminary negotiations, they proceed to the business negotiations concerning the bride price.

Bride price and dowry. In the Gilyak institution of the bride price, payment for the bride, the term that the Gilyak call this institution is extremely characteristic. This term, I believe, throws light on the very origin of the institution.

194 583 192 In the Gilyak language bride price is expressed by the word az', azh from azimynd (?) -- to give as a gift, so that literally az', az'r means a present, a gift, which the family or the clan of the groom gives to the family or the clan of the bride. That this term was not formed by chance is shown from the following. In other ritual cases where compensation [628] with valuables is obligatory, for example, in the case of ransom -- damages paid for an abducted woman, for a murdered man -- the term used is jus'kind, which means

/281 cont./

583 584 The wedding may be delayed also on account of the do Although they begin to prepare the dowry in childhood, never less, depending on the bride price which is brought, it may b come necessary to prepare a new one. The last item in the negotiations is the date of the wedding. This is considered ve important, for on the day of the groom's arrival the dowry m be ready, and likewise the numerous viands, not only for the wedding feast, but also those viands of all kinds which the bri will take away with her as a present to the groom's family.

584 614 /282/ The agreement which has been concluded betwee two families is considered an agreement between two clans, a the bride herself from this moment on is regarded as belonging [686] to the clan. In case of refusal on her part or on the part of he parents, the clan will demand her by force.

584 686 The agreement is also binding for the other side, but here no sanction is demanded, for in case of refusal it loses th part of the bride price which has been brought (usually half). It happens, however, but quite rarely, that the groom will ask for, instead of one sister, another sister. But this is absolutely forbidden. In such cases they answer him:

"If you do not like her, then you do not like both (both one and the other). When the matter concerns dogs, you want a good one, and I give you (a good one); if one does not suit then both will not suit you. When we give you something to e if you eat up the first dish, then I shall give you the second."

[595] In other words, one may ask for two daughters, but to as for one instead of the other is not permitted.

585 When, finally, the day agreed upon arrives, the groom, together with his parents, comes in boats in the summertime, sleds in the winter, bringing with them the part of the bride pr [576] agreed upon and refreshments. Etiquette forbids that they com on foot, although the bride may live very close by. At this ti the family of the bride hangs out the objects of the bride price the public inspection of the clansmen, and refreshments are spread for the elder representatives of both clans. The women look after the bride in all kinds of ways; they comfort her, gi

593 /271 cont./
584
614 The bride is customarily represented by the father and [602] mother, but for the final decision the attendance of representatives of the clan is required. The latter, both those of the bride and of the groom, intervene in the negotiations, but their participation is rather passive. In resolving the question, aside from the consent of the father and mother, the wishes of the brothers play a part. Frequently the wishes of the latter are decisive. Here is a remnant of maternality.
593 In the epos the role of the brothers stands out in sharp relief.
584 In one story which I wrote down, a father, when his son in-[538] forms him of his intention to give his sister in marriage, replies: "Do thou but think upon it only after hearing the counsel of your younger brothers!" It is noteworthy, also,
584 that the role of the mother, despite the fact that women 184 generally /272/ do not participate in community affairs, is [593] no smaller in matrimonial affairs than that of the father.
[562] This, however, is the case only on Sakhalin; on the Amur the wishes of the bride are not considered, although the negotiations are conducted in the presence of the maiden, who sits silently in her accustomed place among the trunks with her dowry and waits for the decision concerning her fate. Ordinarily her role begins when the matter has already been decided, and it only remains for her to submit. And if she does not have a lover to whom she has promised herself, and if the bridegroom is more or less attractive in appearance, she ordinarily tosses off the laconic phrase: "Since you wish this, is it for me to contradict!" But it may happen that the maiden, upon the appearance of the matchmakers with the bridegroom, immediately runs away and does not return until the departure of the matchmakers, and then the matter frequently ends in naught (1). The bride, however, appears on the scene at the

[171]

1. It is interesting to note that among the Negda, whose customs, as a result of ancient matrimonial ties, are as a rule similar to those of the Gilyak, considerable differences were noticed by me.

9: Hawes--264-265 T-3 (1901) 1903
116, 533, 584, 762

And to-day the reproachful tones of the cruelly deceived mai
'swish of the sledge and the howl of the dogs as the narta starts

'You said you would kill yourself,
And you did not.
You are a deceiver!
Men are liars!' "

den may be heard in the off'—

/283 cont./

It is noteworthy that such a ceremony of "stamping the kettle" takes place among the Tungus tribe of the "Negda," who since olden times have concluded marriages with the Gilyak, from whom they have undoubtedly borrowed the custom.

A year after the wedding the newlyweds, usually already with a child, come to stay a little while with the wife's family, and when they again depart they once more go through the ceremony of "stamping the kettle," only this time, instead of kettles, they use cups.

The vicissitudes of marriage. Just as in our society, marriages are not always happy. Since the consent of the woman to the marriage is not asked, and rarely does any girl resolve to disobey the will of her parents, and very rarely do the parents yield to the protests of their daughters, not backing down from their decision even in the face of a threat of suicide, life after the wedding is fraught with tragedies. Either a woman runs away with her lover, or she runs away to her parents, especially in the case of ill-treatment by her husband. In such cases the husband often tries to take back the fugitive by force, and otherwise he demands the return of the bride price. Since no one has a desire to part with something once it has become his own property, litigations to recover the bride price are endless. During my wanderings among the Gilyak, who at first took me to be one who had power, I had to listen to complaints concerning the return of bride price in every settlement. They preferred, however, to ask for the forcible return of the wife, which was often done by the Sakhalin administrators with the favorable assistance /284/ of the priests. The fact was that persons who had lured away or abducted another man's wife appeared before a missionary with the request to be baptized and married, in order to guarantee themselves against the wife's being forcibly taken back by her former husband. The missionary willingly fulfilled such requests and gave them a marriage certificate, which gave to her owner the right to a police order demanding her return in case she was forcibly taken away. And this led to tragedies. One such case deserves to be immortalized.

/372 cont./

583 property of the whole family, but the personal money earnings of the son-in-law, as well as the sables and foxes that he obtains through his efforts and skill, remain at his disposal, which makes it possible for the son-in-law to attain an independent standing in time. But in general the payment of the bride price by labor is not frequently encountered, for the sale of the woman is too enticing a prospect for her kinsmen, and moreover the Gilyak have not yet grown accustomed to asking for the labor of others. The bride price is paid to the father of the bride, or, in his absence -- to her brothers, if they are adults, otherwise -- to their guardian, i.e., to that clansman-ruvn to whom they, along with their mother, have passed; in the absence of any brothers of the bride -- to that same ruvn of whom we just spoke, that is, the one to whom the mother of the bride has passed; in the absence of such -- to the brothers of the father, then to the distant clansmen-ruvn, but in general to clansmen of the male sex. Originally the bride price was always given, not to a separate individual, but to the khal' (clan). And even nowadays among the Tungus, fellow tribesmen of the Gilyak, the bride price is paid to the "nasleg," i.e., the clan. And this is perfectly natural, since originally the bride price was a ransom paid to a whole clan, which was avenging the abduction of the women. This primitive significance of the bride price is reflected in the custom whereby the wife of a deceased Gilyak always remains in the clan of her husband and passes, according to the decision of the clan, to one of the brothers (ruvn) of the deceased (only to a younger brother, however, and only in the event of the unwillingness of the ruvn to marry the widow does she return to the clan of her father, while the children remain in the clan of the husband. The obligation of the clansmen-ruvn with regard to the widows of their deceased ruvn reminds one of biblical story of Boaz and Ruth. The bride price is either paid all at once or in part in advance and in part some time after the bride moves to the home of the groom.

There are instances of the sale of children of the female sex. A Gilyak purchases for himself or for his young son a young girl, who, until the proper age, remains in the home of her parents for instruction in all the women's sciences and crafts; in /373/ this case, part of the bride price is paid at the conclusion of the agreement. Every year after that the groom makes presents to his future father-in-law, and the remaining part of the bride price is paid when the bride moves to the home of her future husband. If the "bartered bride" should die in the interval between the conclusion of the agreement and moving to the home of the husband, the bride price is returned. Young girls customarily move without delay to the home of the groom, who is often several times older than the bride and who purchases her, even though he already has one or two wives, with the sole aim of having a young worker when the other wives grow old. If the groom is also underage, the future spouses are raised together, become friends from childhood, and become attached to each other for life, but this good feature of the purchase of small children does not at all atone for the other features of the custom, which is based solely on the calculation of buying a wife cheaply. The custom of purchasing wives for underaged sons was perhaps one of the reasons for the above-mentioned prohibition against the enjoyment of conjugal rights by an elder brother with regard to the wives of his younger brothers, and from this arose the custom of forbidding the older brother to marry even the widow of a deceased younger brother. The Gilyak pursues bargains to such a degree in purchasing a wife that not infrequently he obtains for his underaged son a bride who may be two or three times older than he, if only he gets her at a bargain. The payment of a large bride price gives the husband the right to get a part of it back in the event the wife dies soon after the marriage, and sometimes also a part of the heritage of the father-in-law. But side by side with the payment for the bride there exists among the Gilyak another institution -- the dowry. Before setting off for the bridegroom's home the wife is attired in festive dress and is provided, according to the condition of her parents, with valuable fur coats, garments, and ornaments. This dowry belongs to the bride, who,

/372 cont./

1: Sternberg--529 E-5 (1890-1897, 1910)1933 RX2 Gilyak RX2

/373 cont./

583 in the event of the dissolution of the marriage, takes it back. It is inalienable during the life of the wife and is customarily burned with her on her funeral pyre. This form of the dowry confirms Ziber's /Sieber?/ view of the dowry in primitive societies as a present to the bride.

585 Marriage is effected among the Gilyak without any ceremonies. A feast is held, of course, upon the departure of the bride and upon her arrival at the home of the bridegroom, but 586 nothing more. The marriage is as easily dissolved as it is con- 583 cluded. The husband, disappointed in his wife, takes her back to her father and gets his bride price back. Similarly, the father, dissatisfied with the position of his daughter in the new family or /374/ the incomplete fulfillment of the conditions of payment by the son-in-law, takes his daughter back, returning the bride price. 583 In general, the method for peacefully acquiring a wife among the 584 Gilyak falls entirely under the "purchase-sale" agreement, with its accompanying "rectification," etc. I have seen how one middle-aged Gilyak, not having the wherewithal to feed his wife, sold her (with her consent, however) to another Gilyak for a small compensation.

462 But in spite of the character of this acquisition of a wife, [562] and despite the fact that the assent of the woman is not only not [584] required, but is not even asked, nevertheless the position of women is in general not as bad as it may appear. It is required of her that she be industrious and thrifty. Much, in fact, is required of her. She cleans and dries an incredible quantity of fish, which is used for the year-round sustenance of the family and dogs. It is she who scutches wild hemp, spinning it into triple thread, and for months thereafter she ties enormous nets, utilizing for this purpose every free minute. She sews clothes for the entire family, and on her lies the entire burden of the Gilyak kitchen and the feeding of the dogs. It is she who, for whole days on end, gathers sarana, berries and roots which constitute the daily diet of the Gilyak during the winter. Finally, she bears the whole burden and care of feeding the numerous guests who arrive and stay for weeks, while 000 her husband leaves to pay visits and enjoys his winter rest. Yet,

2: Schrenck--1052 E-5 (1854-1856) 1881-1895 RX2 Gilyak RX2

/646 cont./

567 people who themselves are obliged to bear the heaviest yoke, the Ainu, are the ones most involved in the slave trade. Finally, [177] indicating that this deplorable custom of the Ainu and Goldi is [648] rooted in the moral degeneracy to which they have been brought by the oppressive yoke of the Japanese and Chinese on them is [181] the fact that the latter themselves sometimes negotiate the sale [439] of Ainu and Goldi women as slaves to the Gilyak, for which the trading trips of the latter furnish them the opportunity. The Gilyak, on the other hand, who have best been able to preserve their freedom and independence with regard to these peoples, to be sure buy slaves from the Ainu and Goldi and under certain conditions sell them again, but they most decidedly abhor keeping any of their own people as slaves or selling them as such to others. In fact, they were of the opinion that if one of them tried to do it, he /647/ would arouse such indignation among his countrymen that he would be in constant danger of his life.

On the whole, the number of male slaves, as well as that 569 of the female slaves, who are always more common, is small 435 among the Gilyak. The principal reason for this is the high price that they cost both in direct trade with the Ainu or Goldi and in particular in their resale by the Gilyak. It is much more expensive [583] to acquire a slave in trade than to buy a wife. The Gilyak Ssogin in Kulk, for instance, paid far more for his slave, an Ainu woman named Kot, than for his second wife, Malguk from Langr: as noted above, he bought the latter for 155 ja = 310 rubles, but the former cost him 40 pieces of Chinese silk, which alone amounted to 200 ja, or about 400 rubles, aside from other things. In appearance she was far behind his two wives. As will be seen from the following, however, this does not matter at all, in view of the social position of female slaves among the Gilyak. Because [556] of the high price of the female slaves, only very rich Gilyak can afford to keep any, and whoever has one is usually very boastful about it, as, for instance, Ssogin was. Such a possession seems [584] so enviable to them that in order to obtain it many a Gilyak does [583] not hesitate to sell his daughter to a countryman as a wife in [556] exchange for a female slave and to pay the difference in the purchase price in some other form.

9: Hawes--264-265 T-3 (1901) 1903 Gilyak -1-2
116, 533, 584, 762

"Among the eighty-eight adults who died between 1891 and 1895 on the west coast, [LS S: of Sakhalin] one was a young Gilyak woman who hanged herself, because she had been given in marriage to a man she disliked. Under this strange wild exterior, this dirt-encased, skin-clad, unkempt, ill-favoured form, we are startled by the 'one touch of nature;' and yet the old, old songs of this people tell mostly of such events—of the death of the disappointed lovers, or of the impassioned appeal to the loved one.

Perhaps one day we may hope to have some of these Gilyak lyrics from the pen of Mr. P.; [LSS: Pilsudski] meanwhile, his kindness enables me to give one here, and to tell the story of another.

The usual motif of these lyrics is the betrothal of the girl when young, and her subsequent violent and secret attachment to another and youthful lover. If the mutual passion is strong, then rather than become the wife of one chosen by her parents for her, she and her lover will commit suicide. This they do in the same manner, i.e. by plunging a knife to the heart, or by strangling, since those who thus kill themselves in the same way will be together in heaven. There is one song, well known among the Gilyaks, which tells how a young man loved a fair maiden already betrothed in her childhood to another, and how they agreed to commit suicide. This man, however, proved faithless, and not only did not fulfil his word, but had never intended so to do. Until this day, it is said the maiden's spirit has never ceased to upbraid him, calling always, 'Ah, you said you would kill yourself, and you have not. You deceived me! Men are liars!' [265] ally a sort of purchase. Moreover, the widow is in a nner of speaking inherited by the brother or other close lative of the deceased. But this inheritance is more a tter of habit; if the widow wishes to marry another, she ay do so, but he must pay back the kalym. The woman also es not take part in the more important councils. On the her hand, she may occupy an independent and respected sition; she can, for instance, become a shaman. She may ve her own money and inherit, although usually less than r brothers. If a widow does not wish to marry at all any ore, she is not only permitted to do as she wishes, but en wins respect thereby.

In the case of a girl given in marriage by her parents, eir wishes are usually the determining factor, and the wealthy an is favored. But even though the girl's taste is not rticularly considered, there are usually no unfavorable nsequences, because, as we said, if a woman is ill-treated e lets herself be abducted by an admirer. In ordinary airs, the woman shows subservience to the man; in her here she is entirely independent and in the family council.
r opinion counts for no less than that of her husband.
The forms of greeting and manifestations of affection be-een man and [128] woman are very primitive and austere, as is e case in general among the Gilyak. Kissing and handaking are done only on special occasions, of which we shall eak later. Men and women very seldom kiss; even when e man takes leave or returns from a journey there is no brace, no kiss, and no handshake, only good wishes are changed and even these are rather cool. However, there e other forms of caresses, which will hardly find approval. tender moments, the woman looks for lice in the man's r and cracks the game thus hunted between her teeth.
metimes, the reverse occurs, and the man does it to his
ly. Another expression of tenderness consists in washing ch other's face with saliva.
The abduction of a woman always occurs with her full con-
nt. During the absence of the husband, the admirer sudnly appears with some companions, the lady is set in the d or in the boat, and the party disappears. However, some n do not so easily submit to their fate, they pursue the ducted woman and attempt to win possession of her once re by means of cunning or even force. Some men seek venge, and the result is a struggle and even death, but this unusual. Quarrels among the Gilyak usually stem from ne such causes. If the run-away couple succeed in hiding

585

585 NUPTIALS--wedding (e.g., preferred time and place, ceremonial, persons attending and officiating); symbolic rites; means of assuring publicity and legality (e.g., banns, licenses); civil and ecclesiastical weddings; variations dependent upon status; associated property transactions (e.g., transfer of gifts, of bride-price); homecoming of bridal couple; consummation (e.g., immediate or deferred, private or public); defloration rites (e.g., jus primae noctis); concern for virginity of bride (e.g., exhibiting tokens); postwedding events (e.g., honeymoon, exchange of visits); status and activities of newly married persons; etc. See also:
Marital sexuality . . . . . 83 Residence in marriage 591

/122 cont./

*614 615 476 574 which belongs to them by right through the female line: "Ymgi (sons-in-law /zyat'ya/ must be fed" -- such is the formula of this interclan obligation.

*614 615 476 574 591 This rule, however, does not find expression at all in an obligation of the akhmal'k to support his son-in-law /zyat'/ and his family permanently in his own home. It may be that at a very remote time, in the period of maternality when the husband went to live in the home of the wife, it was actually so, but at the present time, under agnatic principles, the wife goes to the home of the husband and customarily moves completely to the clan site of her spouse's habitation. Nevertheless, the principle of "sustenance," as we shall see, plays a most important role in the unification of the clans.

615 ●585 591 476 It is consolidated in a special, extremely peculiar religious rite, which consists of the following. At the last moment before the bride is carried away from the home of her father, there is placed just inside the threshold a large, four-handled cast-iron kettle brought by the bridegroom as a part of the bride price for the bride, and on the outside a small kettle belonging to the father of the girl. When going out, the bride and bridegroom must step with the foot first on the inner and then on the outer kettle: the former remains with the father-in-law, the second is borne home by the bridegroom -- ymgi. In a year, when, according to custom, the couple pay a visit to the akhmal'k, the same ceremony is repeated before their departure; only this time on each side of the threshold there is placed a pot and a cup, which are again exchanged as in the first instance. It is characteristic that the exchanged objects bear the designation nich (mine-thine, a symbol of mutual sustenance), while the whole rite is called nich zychyyynd (trampling of the nich). It is also called lymyz'n-zand -- trampling of the threshold, which points to the religious element of the rite, in which a role is played by the so-called lymyz'n-mam -- an old woman, the mistress of the threshold, the woman-forbear, the guardian genius of the home, whose

476 615 585 591 796 615 476 /122 cont./ ● blood flows equally /123/ in the veins of both of the newlyweds, the children of brother and sister. Standing in close connection with this rite is the previously described moment in the bear festival, when, before the shooting at the mark, the master of the bear (the akhmal'k) and his ymgi each sets beside himself an ax and a kettle, which are also called nich and which are also mutually exchanged. If the first rite symbolizes mutual sustenance, the second symbolizes reciprocal co-operation in hunting, which, as we shall soon see, has a quite real basis.

615 *614 476 574 606 [431] The principle of "sustenance" is not limited to periodic visits to the relatives of the wife, although they have some economic significance, since the akhmal'k'i each time, in addition to the hospitality shown, give a valuable present to their ymgi, especially on the first visit after the marriage, when the son-in-law /zyat'/ is customarily given, depending on the resources, one or several pairs of smart garments for men. Cases of actual need are much more important. There

*614 731 476 574 606 615 are times when one's own clan is powerless to aid its clansman, because misfortune, having overtaken one, has overtaken all. Let something happen during the season of the fish run to turn them from their accustomed path, and general disaster is at hand. At such a time there is a simple way out. A man gathers up his family, his dogs, and all his movable goods and chattels in general and emigrates for the whole season to the settlement of his father-in-law.

Here he is met with outstretched arms, and from the first minute he feels himself at home, where they give him food and drink and share everything with him. The son-in-law /zyat'/, of course, is not a do-nothing; he helps in one way or another, but this is far from making up for the expenses involved in the long and unexpected visit of a whole family, often at a time when the supplies of fish have already been prepared and it is impossible to increase them.

615 724 725 476 *614 Similar fraternal relations between akhmal'k'i and ymgi are manifested in sea hunting and land undertakings.

The most important of these require the participation of several persons: hunting bear in summer and winter (taking it

/165 cont./

582 584 Among the Gilyak, this type of marriage is imperative to such a great extent that such marriages are often performed soon after the birth of the future spouses, in order to avoid any possible chance circumstances that could interfere with this important matter. The first concern of a mother soon after the birth of a son is to do everything possible in order to
• 585 marry him to the daughter of one of her brothers. In the ritual of the wedding, the child-groom or his father ties up the little hand of the bride with a thread twisted from the hairs of dog fur and a nettle, the magical symbols of a common economy -- dog-breeding -- and fishing; they fashion
[601] nets from the nettle. From this moment the marriage is concluded, and when the bride has grown up a little more, approximately to the age of four or five years, she usually moves to the house of her groom, where she grows up with him, and they call each other, however strange it may seem to us, by the pet names "my wife" and "my husband" (n'an g:ej, n'fu) up to the attainment of sexual maturity, at which time they become actual spouses, without any of the ritual or formalities which usually must be observed in concluding marriage with outsiders. This custom probably explains why the grown-up spouses are most often called "yr:kh" and "mam," i.e., old man and old woman, since at the age when most of us are only preparing to get married the young Gilyak spouses may already be celebrating their silver anniversary. This custom sometimes leads to abnormal marriage [582] unions. Now and then one finds in one yurt a pair who call themselves husband and wife, where the husband is a youth of about sixteen, while his wife is only four or five years old. The explanation for this is either that the older sister of the latter has died or that her mother is considerably younger than her own brother. One way or another, such cases still further emphasize the imperative nature of the aforementioned mar-[556] riages. It is characteristic that this case is particularly zealously carried out in the richest families, which usually are distinguished by their especially strict observance of all the ancient customs and rites.

/169 cont./

833 daytime the favorite place for "catching" one's an'g:ej is lo-
* 835 cations where berries are gathered; in the evening -- anywhere outside of the settlement, near the well. In the winter, in the yurt: in the daytime, in the absence of strangers; at
* 835 221 night, after all have gone to sleep. Finally, there are periods when the group spouses are free from any restrictions. The married men go for several weeks into the taiga to their hunting territories, while in the summer and winter they continually travel about on visits or to festivals. At these times
* 835 there is complete freedom for the group spouses. Only one thing is most strictly demanded: neither the participants them-[521] selves nor any strangers who have chanced to be witnesses to the relations of group spouses have the right, under the penalty of sinning, to tell anyone, no matter who, and especially the persons concerned, about such relations publicly. But these demands of non-publicity, established in the interests of peace between group spouses, with the aim of preventing possible fits of jealousy, have in no way diminished the publicity of the institution of group marriage itself, the publicity of the conjugal rights themselves. These rights
[671] have been nationally formulated in legal theses which have [867] come to be common property (the formulas themselves are given below in the chapter on the relations of brothers to their wives) -- theses which each father and each mother consider their obligation to impart to their children with religious solicitude from very earliest childhood. Publicly, the group spouses not only behave with unconstrained familiarity, but address each other with none other than the tender words "my [764] dear little husband," "my dear little wife." But the publicity of group relations /170/ is manifested best of all in the case of the death of a man who is not joined in an individual marriage. In such cases, before the burning of the body, one of the group wives (usually the wife of an older brother) steps out on the funeral platform and in the hearing of all mourns for
* 835 him as for her beloved, as for her husband. It is curious to 832 note that during the negotiations between the pu and the • 585 584

/170 cont./

* 835 an'g:ej with regard to an anticipated seance, they go through 832 the same symbolic actions that people go through during the 584 betrothal and wedding ceremonies, namely, they smoke or eat
• 585 together. To say to a woman of the an'g:ej category, "Let us [195] have a smoke together," is equivalent to an offer to her to exercise her marital right.

832 The legal essence of this specific right, as we have said,
* 835 is in the fact that its realization, even when it becomes known 684 to all, does not provoke a reaction either of the persons concerned or of social censure, and likewise it does not constitute a violation of religious morals, a privilege of an extremely important character, for sexual intercourse with women outside of this category incurs grave consequences. If this be a completely alien woman -- although at the present time this does not constitute a religious transgression -- then it provokes, as we have already mentioned, bloody punishment if the fornicators are caught in flagrante delicto, or at best a cruel duel with sticks and a fine. There are many reasons for believing that intercourse with female strangers was even once under a religious prohibition. The following curious custom, by the way, testifies in favor of this notion. If a woman who is not bound to a man by class relationship tries to seduce him, catches him by the leg in some isolated place (a symbolic offering of herself to the man), then he (if, it goes without saying, he does not succumb to the temptation) is obliged, under penalty of punishment of the gods, to demand publicly an expiatory ransom from the woman (1).

[114] [627]

1. I personally happened to be a witness to such a ceremony of ransom. It was in the settlement of Tamlevo. One of my traveling companions, a Gilyak already middle-aged, once woke me early in the morning and with anxiety asked me to go with him to "court" in the neighboring yurt. There I found a large assembly of the masters of the settlement. My

/247 cont./

000 amatory experience and art. The Gilyak woman, it is true, 836 conducts herself in an extremely inaccessible manner. Upon 832 the appearance of a strange man, she lowers her eyes, sits all [834] the time with her brows knit, and hardly answers the questions of the stranger. But this is only external inaccessibility, concealing an inner lasciviousness. Unnoticed by those about her, she /248/ casts oblique, curious glances at the new man at a time when he can catch them. And if the guest has made a proper impression, the matter is consummated very quickly. The man follows her to the well, or to the berry patch, or simply catches her in the entrance hall, and then, after a short symbolic dialogue, such as, "Let's smoke together a little (i.e., drawing in turn at the same pipe)," or "let's hear the news," the matter is settled very simply. Sometimes the guest simply remains in the yurt of his beloved and at night moves over to her couch, or vice versa. Sometimes the business is consummated without words, limiting itself to a mute symbolism, touching the breasts, seizing the leg, and if this symbolism does not encounter any rebuff, the consent of the woman is secured. It is curious that the symbolism of amatory proposals recalls the rites of the wedding ceremonies. The proposal to smoke together is a joking imitation of the rite of conferratio /confarreatio/.
• [585] The snatching of the leg or the breast, although it does not [171] figure at the present time in the wedding ceremonies of the Gilyak, is still to be found among certain peoples of North America, for example among the Lillooet Indians, according to the testimony of Boas and Teit.

836 Such license in alien villages is practiced not only by 837 the unmarried youth, but by the married, middle-aged 159 Gilyak as well. On one of my first trips there was among my companions an old respectable Gilyak, Gibel'ka, who enjoyed great fame throughout all of Sakhalin by reason of his wealth and outstanding intellect. When we stopped in the settlements, he spoke breathlessly on a par with his young companions about the pretty women of the settlement, and once he became so carried away that he began to ask my

/257 cont./

143 that he began to wear men's clothing, got married, and now 826 is the foremost hunter of the vicinity. Normally he lives 588 with his wife, but sometimes copulates with men. He considers the latter more pleasurable and speaks of himself with pleasure: "I have two chances, two joys." All treat him as an urdla n'ivukh. In all I was able to count five such cases among the Gilyak, the number that Bogoraz found among the Chukchee.

881 The Gilyak have no special rites at the time of attain-[302] ing sexual maturity. The only outward sign for a maiden who has attained sexual maturity is that she begins to plait her hair in two braids. The moment of the onset of sexual maturity for a maiden is considered the menstrual period, which ordinarily begins in the thirteenth or fourteenth year.
881 This moment is considered the beginning of marriageable 826 age, although the proper term for a woman who has attained sexual maturity is the expression -- "a woman who has seen her body," i.e., whose breasts have grown to the point where she can see them. A similar term exists for men -- "a man who [302] has seen his body," but in this case the word "body" refers to the mustache.

881 Some time before the onset of menstruation the mother 867 prepares her daughter for the approaching change in her life and instructs her in all the necessary rites and taboos con-881 nected with blood. The Gilyak, both men and women,
• 585 fully recognize the significance of menstruation as the mark 833 of sexual maturity and do not have sexual intercourse before its onset. Adult Gilyak frequently marry little girls and from the first day sleep with them under one covering, but do not begin sexual intercourse until the wife informs her husband of the onset of the first menstruation.

/260 cont./

538 584 585 [177] It is characteristic that in purely Gilyak poems, not having any traces of Goldi-Manchurian borrowings and influences, we do not encounter any procedure of betrothal, which at the present time plays such an important role. All is reduced to a laconic dialogue: Groom: "I have come to take my wife." Father: "All right, take her!" After this everything is done unusually simply. The marriage is immediately consummated. The only ceremony, about which I shall speak in detail later on, is the confarreatio, the joint smoking or meal.

The old man, the father of the bride, questions the hero: "Thou art a man from where?" Our Gilyak: "I am a dweller of the village in the middle of the bay, I have come to take thy daughter in marriage." Then this old man said: "My child, this guest has come to take thee, go with him." This woman said: "Very well, I shall go with him." This old man said: "Ho, slaves! Prepare a meal, feed the guest", .. Our Gilyak ate with his wife. Having eaten, having finished, he set out with his wife" (1). Another example even better depicts this simplicity of ritual. "That old man (the father of the bride) said: 'Eat with your husband.' Then that woman ate with our Gilyak. Having eaten, they went out, urinated, came in, made the bed, got in under one blanket, lay down, and slept." On the following day the hero departed with his wife and the dowry (2).

1. Shternberg, op. cit., 47.

2. Ibid., 81.

583 538 But along with such lawful marriages there are also described cases of the forcible carrying off of women. And this is quite natural, for such misfortune may overtake the hero that the clans of his lawful fathers-in-law may become extinct, and willy-nilly he must obtain a wife by force.

/260 cont./

583 538 Such catastrophes, as we shall see fu rare. This alternative which, accor the man of olden times -- either to who belonged to him by right of birt by force, while at the same time th of betrothal to an alien woman as a proves that obtaining a woman by pu tution, established as a corrective o with /261/ all its bloody consequenc
a corrective of blood revenge.

Thus are the methods of obtaini
in the traditional epos.

582 584 Contemporary methods of obtaining ent the Gilyak has preferred the old a woman of the an'g:ej category, a one's wife by right of birth. Only su sidered "pure." And people who are of antiquity try to observe the old la gories of an'g:ej the most desirable daughter of the mother's brother, in orthodox is considered the cousin ma daughter of a brother and the son of marriage is so highly valued that ev spouses appear in the world the siste each other their word to unite the cl After the birth of the children, whe age of three or four, there takes pla clansmen of one side or the other a [593] [602] or even the actual concluding of the mother of the groom may carry on t with the father of the bride (for she versation between brother and sister 584 585 his wife. The whole procedure of a this: the matchmaker /svat/ (fathe before everyone ties each arm and e with threads of nettle and dog hair ther on, are not at all ling to the epos, faced narry his lawful an'g:ej,

, or to obtain a wife re is almost no mention pecial form of marriage -- rchase was a later insti-the custom of abduction es, just as ransom was ng wives depicted for us a wife. Up to the pres-orthodox mode of marrying woman who is regarded as ch a marriage is constaunchly for the laws

w. Of all the cate-marriage is with the other words, the most arriage between the his sister. Such a en before the future r and the brother give hildren in marriage.
n they have reached the ce in the presence of the formal act of agreement e marriage. Even the the negotiations, not is his sister and con-is prohibited) but with greement amounts to r or mother of the groom) each leg of the fiancés and, in addition, gives

/261 cont./

584 the parents of the bride a male dog, not, however, a fe 585 It is not permitted to remove the fillet, since it is consid [601] testimony of betrothal. From this moment on the childr are considered husband and wife, and they address each other with these terms. Usually in such cases the young moves to the house of her young husband, sleeps with hi the same bed, passes her childhood years with him, and attainment of sexual maturity begins marital life.

58 This haste to conclude a marriage between children 182 explained by many reasons, but the basic reason amount a timely strengthening of the right to marriage. In a fe years another such lawful claimant may be born or grow the son of another sister or female first cousin. Furthern in the course of time the economic situation of both side may change. The father of the bride may become need and be seduced by a bride price from the outside. There cases, of course, where the cousins becoming betrothed of different ages; the bridegroom, the son of the sister, be a grown lad, while the daughter of the brother /262/an infant, but the procedure is exactly the same. A Gil 585 of my acquaintance, Pletun, a lad of about 20, married [582] this fashion his five-year-old cousin, the daughter of Iks took her into his house at once, commenced to sleep wi
her, and began actual cohabitation with her when she re ported her first menstruation to him. But it also happen [675] that a child-wife remains in the home of her parents an moves to her husband's house at the first appearance of menstruation, but no formalities are required for this m the initial agreement is considered a public ac, known "All Sakhalin knows of this," a Gilyak of my acquaintan who had betrothed his little daughter to the son of his si 585 said to me with great pathos. In such marriages not onl 583 bride price not due, but there is not even any question o
There is merely an exchange of gifts, but even this is n [178] all obligatory. Such is the simple arrangement in cases [184] betrothal of the children of male and female first cousin

"The cauldron plays an important part, not only in the everyday domestic economy, but at the very threshold of the new joint life—at the marriage ceremony itself. At least, this is so among some of the clans on Sakhalin. No religious function, as we understand it, graces the occasion; only a simple custom, which appears as a traditional sanction to this important departure in the Gilyak's family life.

The payment hav ing been made without formality to the bride's father, a feast is prepared in his hut, to which the bridegroom comes with his friends, bringing a new Japanese cauldron. The marriage feast is then cooked in this new vessel, and eaten with rejoicing, for the eating together is part of the necessary function. This ended, the two cauldrons, the new one and that pertaining to the hut, are both cleaned and placed by the bridegroom's kindred in front of the bride, who, with her partner, is standing with her back turned to the fire, and face to the door of the hut. She then places her left foot in the new vessel and her right in the paternal, or rather maternal, cauldron, the two being placed one step apart. The bridegroom then moves them one by one, a step at a time, until the bride reaches the door. Here the couple take up their own and go to their new hut, amid the acclamations of their kindred."

586

586 TERMINATION OF MARRIAGE--methods (e.g., desertion, separation, annulment, divorce); prevalence of each; reasons (e.g., cruelty, infidelity, laziness, sterility); initiative and rights of each sex; procedure; residence readjustments; allocation of children (e.g., to mother, to father, to parent least at fault, division by age or sex); property arrangements (e.g., return of bride-price, alimony); subsequent relations of divorced spouses; social attitudes toward separation and divorce; etc. See also:

Sex status	562	Termination of marriage following the death of one spouse	768
Sex and marital offenses	684	Adultery	837
Dependency	736	Barrenness and sterility	842

/283 cont./

585 It is noteworthy that such a ceremony of "stamping the kettle" 788 takes place among the Tungus tribe of the "Negda," who since 171 olden times have concluded marriages with the Gilyak, from 797 whom they have undoubtedly borrowed the custom.

A year after the wedding the newlyweds, usually already 585 with a child, come to stay a little while with the wife's family, 574 and when they again depart they once more go through the cere-788 mony of "stamping the kettle," only this time, instead of kettles, they use cups.

The vicissitudes of marriage. Just as in our society, marriages 593 are not always happy. Since the consent of the woman to the 586 marriage is not asked, and rarely does any girl resolve to disobey [584] the will of her parents, and very rarely do the parents yield to the protests of their daughters, not backing down from their decision even in the face of a threat of suicide, life after the 593 wedding is fraught with tragedies. Either a woman runs away 586 with her lover, or she runs away to her parents, especially in 837 the case of ill-treatment by her husband. In such cases the husband often tries to take back the fugitive by force, and otherwise he demands the return of the bride price. Since no [691] one has a desire to part with something once it has become his own property, litigations to recover the bride price are endless.

[123] During my wanderings among the Gilyak, who at first took me to be one who had power, I had to listen to complaints concerning 593 the return of bride price in every settlement. They preferred, 586 however, to ask for the forcible return of the wife, which was 837 often done by the Sakhalin administrators with the favorable 171 assistance /284/ of the priests. The fact was that persons who 797 had lured away or abducted another man's wife appeared before a missionary with the request to be baptized and married, in order to guarantee themselves against the wife's being forcibly taken back by her former husband. The missionary willingly fulfilled such requests and gave them a marriage certificate, which gave to her owner the right to a police order demanding her return in case she was forcibly taken away. And this led to tragedies. One such case deserves to be immortalized.

/284 cont./

From an Amur Gilyak named Tys', 22 years old and from the settlement of Mkhyl', another Gilyak, Urgayn from Vayda, stole the wife and went with her to the missionary Moskvitin. The husband overtook them and began to beg the missionary not to marry them, but he carried out the request of the abductor for a certain bribe. Then the husband collected his clansmen and took back his wife by force. The original abductor presented his marriage certificate to the police, who, for a bribe, ordered the woman to be returned to her lawful owner. It ended with the husband's shooting his wife and himself. They return the bride price without litigation when the wife dies childless soon after her wedding, or when she runs away because her husband is poor and is not in a position to feed a wife, and, finally, when a wife betrothed in childhood dies.

/285/

Separate Materials on the Ethnography of the Amur Gilyak (Extracts from Notebooks and Diaries)

I.

The Tribal and Clan Composition of the Population of the Lower Amur

A legend. Long, long ago the Gilyak, the Orochi, and the Goldi were one people. They were born on one branch of an alder tree. The brother and sister did not know where to go. The sister said, "down to the earth," and was the first to descend.

Settlement of Bulava. Due (Kugi /Ainu/) -- 35 people; one finds them also in Patu, Tebakh, and Mago. When three men came, they found one house of an Ulcha khal'a. Mongol -- khala -- Djakhsul came down from the Goldi village of Chol'chi (1896).

/373 cont./

in the event of the dissolution of the marriage, takes it back. It is inalienable during the life of the wife and is customarily burned with her on her funeral pyre. This form of the dowry confirms Ziber's /Sieber?/ view of the dowry in primitive societies as a present to the bride.

Marriage is effected among the Gilyak without any ceremonies. A feast is held, of course, upon the departure of the bride and upon her arrival at the home of the bridegroom, but nothing more. The marriage is as easily dissolved as it is concluded. The husband, disappointed in his wife, takes her back to her father and gets his bride price back. Similarly, the father, dissatisfied with the position of his daughter in the new family or /374/ the incomplete fulfillment of the conditions of payment by the son-in-law, takes his daughter back, returning the bride price. In general, the method for peacefully acquiring a wife among the Gilyak falls entirely under the "purchase-sale" agreement, with its accompanying "rectification," etc. I have seen how one middle-aged Gilyak, not having the wherewithal to feed his wife, sold her (with her consent, however) to another Gilyak for a small compensation.

But in spite of the character of this acquisition of a wife, and despite the fact that the assent of the woman is not only not required, but is not even asked, nevertheless the position of women is in general not as bad as it may appear. It is required of her that she be industrious and thrifty. Much, in fact, is required of her. She cleans and dries an incredible quantity of fish, which is used for the year-round sustenance of the family and dogs. It is she who scutches wild hemp, spinning it into triple thread, and for months thereafter she ties enormous nets, utilizing for this purpose every free minute. She sews clothes for the entire family, and on her lies the entire burden of the Gilyak kitchen and the feeding of the dogs. It is she who, for whole days on end, gathers sarana, berries and roots which constitute the daily diet of the Gilyak during the winter. Finally, she bears the whole burden and care of feeding the numerous guests who arrive and stay for weeks, while her husband leaves to pay visits and enjoys his winter rest. Yet,

/638 cont./

The moral austerity of the Gilyak also appears in the altogether decent behavior of the two sexes toward each other and in the modesty of their women and girls. One living with them in their houses never sees indecent physical exposure, such as occurs so frequently among the Ainu (2), or any other shocking scenes. Violations of chastity, particularly among unmarried persons, are, of course, not impossible, but are most severely censured by the parents of the girl who has been seduced and has given birth to a child. According to the Gilyak, in such a case the girl's mother metes out corporal punishment to her daughter, while the father tries to eliminate the scandal by killing the newborn child and secretly doing away with it. This is always done if the child is a girl, whereas a boy is shown mercy in certain circumstances, and the girl's chances suffer less in this case.

2. N. Busse, Ostr. Sakhalin" i Eksped. 1853-54 gg. /Sakhalin Island and the Expedition of 1853-54/, St. Petersb., 1872, pp. 55, 56, 70.

Although contracted by purchase, and in part because of this, as is clear from what has been said, the marriages of the Gilyak usually take a happy or at least a satisfactory course. Marital fidelity is strictly observed. The husband jealously guards the fidelity of his wife, especially while she is young, and the latter is on her guard against giving her husband cause for mistrust and suspicion and arousing his anger. One very salutary influence checking and curbing the passions on both sides is the circumstance that the husband, if he casts out his wife for any reason and returns her to her parents does not by any means thereby gain any right to a refund of the articles paid for her, and that, on the other hand, he may claim such a refund if the wife leaves him on her own accord. In this case she may by no means count on a friendly reception by her parents. Therefore, simply for material reasons, which are always decisive to a great extent among the Gilyak, each of the two parties avoids taking the initiative in the dissolution of the marriage.

/638 cont./

For the most part similar utilitarian considerations lie at the root of the peaceful life shared by the husband and wife and the good treatment which the latter receives from the former. /639/ The Gilyak is much too practical and too intent on the preservation and increase of his possessions not to realize the great usefulness of his wife and to appreciate the tremendous amount of work she achieves through her industriousness, skill, patience, and experience. In the division of labor between husband and wife for their common household, the greater share by far falls to her. In general, the man only has to attend to providing the most important means of subsistence. Hunting, catching sturgeon and hausen, killing the seal and dolphin, and trade, and, in particular, the many trips and voyages required for it, make up the field of action that is exclusively his. To be sure, he also does other fishing and, at the time of the mass migrations of the various species of salmon, even does this in a very energetic fashion, but in this the women are of great help to him, and the tiresome work of cleaning the tremendous amount of fish brought ashore, of cutting them up and hanging them on the racks to dry in the sun, falls entirely on them. They also collect, in part with the help of the children, all the winter supplies of vegetable foods insofar as they are part of the native flora, the various edible berries, roots, herbs, moss, and the like. In addition, the wife has to tend to the entire household and everything pertaining to it. The single thing that the man does for it directly is to cut the needed firewood in the nearby forest, split it, and bring it to the front of the house. To carry it into the house as needed, however, is again left to the women, just as they are obliged to fetch the water needed for drinking and cooking -- a task which in winter and in bad weather involves much toil and effort in the villages that lie high above the river. These are, as a rule, also the first tasks of the day, the help that they give in the household, a fine bride price. A sterile wife, then, is commonly exposed to the risk that the husband will cast her out or take a second wife, who, if blessed with children, would soon push her completely into the background. Needless to say, the wife shares the husband's desire and scorns no means that might serve to fulfill it, and the prevailing superstition gives her many such means. For instance, I saw many a woman wear the tooth of a bitch around the neck in the belief that this would make her fertile. Presumably other amulets specially carved for the purpose are worn by the women, though I am unable to name a particular object of this sort.

/641 cont./

After all this, it is all the more surprising that there exists among the Gilyak an inhuman, cruel custom in connection with the birth of a child, the custom, that is, that a woman may never give birth in the house, but must always leave it, regardless of the weather and of the time of day or year. I did not want to believe this, but I myself witnessed it. When I visited the village of Kulk on April 24 (May 6), 1855, and entered one of the houses, I saw a woman going out extremely heavily and laboriously and sinking down nearby on a prepared bed of straw, where she was immediately seized with labor pains. The husband stood in front of the door, calmly looked on for a while, and then went back into the house, whereupon I, too, left. A few hours later I heard from a Gilyak of the same village that the birth had been successful, but the child died soon afterward. The mother was still alive. The mean temperature on this day was 2.8° R. in nearby Nikolayev. At 7 o'clock in the morning the thermometer registered only 1.1° at 2 o'clock in the afternoon it rose to 6.3°, and dropped again to 2° at 9 o'clock in the evening. The river had not yet thrown off its cover of decaying ice, and, with the sky slightly cloudy, for the most part, a moderate east wind was blowing from the Liman

1. Cf. Vol. IV., p. 30, of this work.

During the colder seasons, in the late fall and winter, delivery does not take place in the open, but rather in a birch-bark tent

/262 cont./

583 although in such cases in several places on Sakhalin there is 585 already some question of bride price, though, to be sure, a 78 very insignificant one.
84

XIII.

Marriage Terms and Survivals of Maternality

95 The terms used in the Gilyak language for designating 96 the act of getting married are quite characteristic in a 58 sociological sense.

Like Old Aryan and contemporary Russian, the Gilyak language has no common term for both sexes, such as the English "to marry," French se marier, German "heiraten"; on the contrary, in the Gilyak language, in this case, there is a special term for the individuals of each sex.

When a man is involved, the verb gend, khgend (root ge) with the addition of shankh (woman) or an'g:ej (wife) is used; thus, shankh gend, an'g:ej gend. When a woman is involved, an entirely different verb is used -- avind (root av), with the corresponding addition of nigyvyn: -- person, or pu -- husband, or, if without the addition, simply javind (1) (je -- him + avind).

97 84 1. I choose the term of the eastern dialect; the terms are the same in the other dialects, with the usual dialectal peculiarities.

What is the basic meaning of each of these individual terms g:end and javind?

/263/ As concerns the first, the male term gend, its basic meaning is entirely clear. This is one of the most frequently used verbs in the Gilyak language, signifying "to take something" and "to buy." With regard to marriage,

/267 cont./

58 we find one and the same picture of concluding marriage
538 without any formalities. It is merely necessary for a man, even though he may come from far away, even though he is only by hearsay considered a candidate for being a son-in-law, to state the reason for his coming, and he immediately receives the consent of the parents, and after that all the rights of a spouse, and on the very next day he may take his wife home with him. And that is not all; not only do they not demand any compensation from him, but usually the father-in-law even provides the departing ones with generous [593] gifts. As a matter of form, it is true, they ask for the consent of the daughter, but maidens usually obey the will of their parents and the demand of the law. The sole rite which
•585 inevitably is practiced is a kind of Roman confarreatio, but 538 in the most primitive form: the groom and his bride must eat and smoke together. Here is an example of the procedure of concluding a marriage from one of the poems taken down by me. An old woman, the mother of two daughters, asks a young man who has arrived: "Son, why have you come here? Did you come to seek a wife? Your wives are over there in that pile yurt, your wives are there, go!" Our Gilyak ascended to the place, went in, and two young women were there. He sat down between them; having dipped into his tobacco pouch, he began to smoke, gave to the younger sister, she took, she smoked; he then gave to the older sister, she took she smoked. The older sister said: "Having prepared a bite, feed us..." All three ate together. Having eaten, they finished, they slept, on the next day they arose early, ate, our Gilyak /268/ said: "Shall we go today?" That woman said: "Well, having spent today here, tomorrow we shall go!" Having spent the day, on the next day they went back in a boat (1).

1. Shternberg, Materialy /Materials/, pp. 118-119.

/268 cont./

•585 In another poem, in response to the demand of the bride-
538 groom, the father-in-law makes only one condition: "You will not go back before tomorrow!" He then orders his slaves to prepare a bite for the couple and, turning to his daughter, says: "Eat together with your husband!" That woman ate with our Gilyak. Having eaten, they went out, urinated, entered arranged the bedding and lay themselves down under the same blanket, and went to sleep. On the following day that old man said: "You shall set out in five large boats loaded to the top with nothing but valuables" (1) /see footnote 1 above/.

Another example. The hero of a poem arrived in a 538 town with many people, and, when he went into the center
584 yurt, a woman was alone there. This woman said: "O, guest, 585 from where have you come?" Our Gilyak said: "I have come to take you!" This woman said: "If you wish to take me, go to my father, talk it over!" Our Gilyak went out, went into a yurt; an old man, an old woman were there. This old woman said: "You are a man from where?" Our Gilyak said: "I have come to take your daughter!" That old man rose: "Well then, prepare mos' feed my son-in-law." Our Gilyak left, he came to his wife: "Your father said that we both, having come as guests in the evening, are to eat mos'." His wife: "All right!" That evening they went visiting, having eaten mos' they left; having had a good sleep, they arose, ate, and then went back (i.e., with her husband to his village). /Footnotes 2 and 3 at the bottom of the original text p. 268, referring to Shternberg's Materialy, p. 84 and pp. 57, 58, respectively are not indicated in the text./

582 Orthodox forms at the present time. Now, as we see, firmly [581] seated in every Gilyak there is the consciousness that only an orthodox marriage, i.e., marriage from the clan of akhmalk'i, from the clan of the mother, is lawful, "pure."
[184] Even on the Amur, where the old norms have especially [178] undergone change, to the question about the marriage norms they will say to you first of all: "It is necessary to take a wife from the fathers-in-law -- the root of one's birth" (i.e.,

/268 cont./

582 origin from a common mother). The favored and most frequent form of such an orthodox marriage is a marriage between the son of a brother and the daughter of a sister /sic/.
584 Such marriages are concluded in childhood. Negotiations •585 take place /269/ between the mothers soon after the birth of the children, but after the agreement a public ceremony is organized, in which, besides the fathers, the grandfathers of the children who are being married take part. The father of the groom brings a male dog, and the mother spins two threads out of the fur of this dog and a nettle; with one she binds the hand of the little girl, while with the other the father of the groom ties the son's little hand (1). All this is performed in the presence of the elder members of the clan, and the marriage is considered inviolable.

[171] 1. It is curious that among the Haida the ceremony of concluding the marriage of infants, which among them is expressed by the giving of a blanket instead of a dog, bears the technical designation, "nakladyvanie perevyazki" (Engl. "putting the string on"). Evidently this ceremony, as among the Gilyak, was formerly carried out by means of a binding up with string or thread, just as is done in such cases up to the present day among the Tamil in India.

[581] The idea of the orthodox marriage up to the present 584 is thought of not merely as being desirable, but as a right and obligation. When a marriage from the akhmalk clan is 582 arranged on Sakhalin (although that clan may have only recently attained such a position by virtue of the fact that some kinsman took his wife from that clan), negotiations are usually begun with words like this: "You are my akhmalk, let

/281 cont./

583 She may sell it or give it to her daughters in their dowries. After 192 her death it goes to her daughters, and, if there are none, she 428 may will it, or else it goes to her brothers.

583 After the agreement on the bride price. The negotiations over ● 585 the bride price amount to two questions -- the question of the quantity and the question of the term. It may happen that the bride price is paid immediately after the negotiations, and then the marriage is at once considered concluded. The bride and the groom are summoned, ordered to eat and smoke a little together, a small feast with drinks is spread, and in the evening the mother of the bride orders the groom to lie down on the bed of his wife, and after spending the night in the nuptial bed the newly wedded husband carried off his wife, with a certain ceremony of which we shall speak below, to his home. But such cases are rare. It does happen, when both the groom and the bride belong to families of little means and the bride price is therefore small, that it is brought at once, and the dowry of the bride amounts to the most necessary things of her toilette, and 583 no preparations whatsoever are demanded. Among rich families, 585 the immediate removal of the bride occurs only when the groom 556 lives very far away, when the given marriage is especially valued, either as a result of the high social standing of the parents of the bride or as a consequence of the particular renown enjoyed by the bride ("a maiden famed throughout the entire land"), and they are afraid of any delay for fear of the agreement's being broken if a richer competitor appears. In such cases they come at once in several boats with the whole bride price and in the company of their noblest clansmen, and after the bringing in of the bride price, a feast, and several short ceremonies, they carry the bride away along with her dowry.

583 But, I repeat, such cases are rare. Usually in such cases the 585 wedding is delayed. The delivery of the bride price is arranged [452] in installments. At first only one object is left, usually a kettle; the remaining part is brought either directly before the removal of the bride, or, if the bride price is very large, part of it is even brought within a certain agreed-upon length of time after the removal of the bride.

/281 cont./

583 The wedding may be delayed also on account of the dowry.
584 Although they begin to prepare the dowry in childhood, nevertheless, depending on the bride price which is brought, it may become necessary to prepare a new one. The last item in the negotiations is the date of the wedding. This is considered very important, for on the day of the groom's arrival the dowry must be ready, and likewise the numerous viands, not only for the wedding feast, but also those viands of all kinds which the bride will take away with her as a present to the groom's family.

584 /282/ The agreement which has been concluded between the 214 two families is considered an agreement between two clans, and the bride herself from this moment on is regarded as belonging [686] to the clan. In case of refusal on her part or on the part of her parents, the clan will demand her by force.

584 The agreement is also binding for the other side, but 686 here no sanction is demanded, for in case of refusal it loses the part of the bride price which has been brought (usually half). It happens, however, but quite rarely, that the groom will ask for, instead of one sister, another sister. But this is absolutely forbidden. In such cases they answer him:

"If you do not like her, then you do not like both (both the one and the other). When the matter concerns dogs, you want a good one, and I give you (a good one); if one does not suit you, then both will not suit you. When we give you something to eat, if you eat up the first dish, then I shall give you the second."

[595] In other words, one may ask for two daughters, but to ask for one instead of the other is not permitted.

● 585 When, finally, the day agreed upon arrives, the groom, together with his parents, comes in boats in the summertime, on sleds in the winter, bringing with them the part of the bride price [596] agreed upon and refreshments. Etiquette forbids that they come on foot, although the bride may live very close by. At this time the family of the bride hangs out the objects of the bride price for the public inspection of the clansmen, and refreshments are spread for the elder representatives of both clans. The women look after the bride in all kinds of ways; they comfort her, give

/282 cont./

● 585 her advice on how to live in a strange land, and, if she is unhappy about the marriage, they try to persuade her in every way possible. During the farewell feast the groom sits alongside the bride, and both eat from one dish and smoke from the same pipe, but during that day they usually do not converse. In general, the groom is supposed to comport himself modestly the whole day, and not to converse. Late in the evening, when the feast is over, the bride's mother orders the bridegroom to lie down on the bride's bed, and the marriage act is consummated. On the next morning the newly married woman brings something to eat to the newly married man and calls him "husband." On that very

585 morning they depart. Before the departure there is a last 782 regalement, and at that time the parents of the newlyweds exchange prayers of good wishes. Here is an example of such benedictions, taken down on the Amur:

539 "If god gives happiness, they will live out their time 585 happily. If there is no happiness, they will live out their time 782 badly. O god, make the life of our children a happy one!"

After this the father or a clansman of the groom says /283/ the following prayer: "O god, make, make happy the time of our children, in order that we may live happily; to our life together give good fortune!"

Saying their benedictions, they sprinkle vodka in the 585 direction of the heavens and in all directions. Before actually 788 setting out they go through a ceremony which bears the designa-[782] tion "stamping the kettle." It consists of the following. At the inner side of the threshold of the yurt there is placed a large Manchurian kettle with five little ears (for the feeding of dogs) from the bride price of the groom, and at the outer side a small kettle from the bride's parents. Upon going out of the yurt, the bride and the groom, one after the other, place one foot in the large kettle and the other foot in the small kettle, not treading on the threshold. This ceremony establishes a symbolic union of mutual nourishment and mutual friendship in the presence of the two female penates -- the "old woman-mistress of the threshold" and the "mistress of the crossbeam over the door."

● /283 cont./

585 It is noteworthy that such a ceremony "stamping the kettle" 783 takes place among the Tungus tribe of the "Negda," who since 171 olden times have concluded marriages with the Gilyak, from 177 whom they have undoubtedly borrowed the custom.

585 A year after the wedding the newlyweds, usually already 574 with a child, come to stay a little while with the wife's family, 788 and when they again depart they once more go through the ceremony of "stamping the kettle," only this time, instead of kettles, they use cups.

593 The vicissitudes of marriage. Just as in our society, marriages 586 are not always happy. Since the consent of the woman to the [584] marriage is not asked, and rarely does any girl resolve to disobey the will of her parents, and very rarely do the parents yield to the protests of their daughters, not backing down from their decision even in the face of a threat of suicide, life after the

593 wedding is fraught with tragedies. Either a woman runs away 586 with her lover, or she runs away to her parents, especially in 837 the case of ill-treatment by her husband. In such cases the husband often tries to take back the fugitive by force, and otherwise he demands the return of the bride price. Since no

[697] one has a desire to part with something once it has become his own property, litigations to recover the bride price are endless.

[123] During my wanderings among the Gilyak, who at first took me to be one who had power, I had to listen to complaints concerning

593 the return of bride price in every settlement. They preferred, 586 however, to ask for the forcible return of the wife, which was 837 often done by the Sakhalin administrators with the favorable 171 assistance /284/ of the priests. The fact was that persons who 797 had lured away or abducted another man's wife appeared before a missionary with the request to be baptized and married, in order to guarantee themselves against the wife's being forcibly taken back by her former husband. The missionary willingly fulfilled such requests and gave them a marriage certificate, which gave to her owner the right to a police order demanding her return in case she was forcibly taken away. And this led to tragedies. One such case deserves to be immortalized.

/304 cont./

685 for your master!" And thus /305/ they go around the entire vil-754 lage, meanwhile pulling on the tendon. Then the thief begins to suffocate from fright and confesses. A shout goes up; it happens that the thief dies from it.

627 An oath is taken also in controversial matters. Before the 695 court, in a balagan where the khlaj-nivukh sits, nothing is allowed to be boiled; they eat raw yukola.

A stick (kyz') -- about an arshin in length with a human chkhnaj.

If the matter reaches the point of breaking the stick, then they pay more -- double. Both big and little assemble in the balagan of the khlaj-n'ivukh'a (the settlement of Karga, 1896).

881 Women, Childbirth, and Children. A maiden who has reached 30 sexual maturity makes two braids. Women pierce both ears in 178 order to put in earrings (mes'kh); formerly men also pierced their ears. A wife who is a minor can be slept with only after she be-

● 585 gins to menstruate. During menstruation the woman puts on her 841 oldest clothes and does not sleep with her husband. Women wash [302] themselves, but not with hot water, for otherwise the tŏgurmam (the mistress of the fire) takes offense.

171 Among the Kekhal (Orochi) a man who has two wives ac-839 commodates a guest under one blanket.

843 A pregnant woman must not look at the Amur when it be-823 gins to break up, in order not to slow up the opening of the river.

844 They give birth in the balagan (midwife -- langyv-mam). In winter the mother spends one and a half days in it, in summer -- three days.

84 One must not cry out during delivery -- a sin. The husband at this time does not go anywhere. If a child has died during birth, the woman must not travel on the river or sea for a whole year -- there would not be any fish. For a month before childbirth, it is not permissible to bind anything tightly or to drive in stakes; it is not permissible to repair anything for an alien.

[789] During difficult deliveries they open up boxes, tear off patches, and unscrew their rifles. The newborn baby is washed with cold water. The midwife is not paid. Until the umbilicus heals, the

/374 cont./

in the event of the dissolution of the marriage, takes it back. It is inalienable during the life of the wife and is customarily burned with her on her funeral pyre. This form of the dowry confirms Ziber's /Sieber?/ view of the dowry in primitive societies as a present to the bride.

Marriage is effected among the Gilyak without any ceremonies. A feast is held, of course, upon the departure of the bride and upon her arrival at the home of the bridegroom, but nothing more. The marriage is as easily dissolved as it is concluded. The husband, disappointed in his wife, takes her back to her father and gets his bride price back. Similarly, the father, dissatisfied with the position of his daughter in the new family or /374/ the incomplete fulfillment of the conditions of payment by the son-in-law, takes his daughter back, returning the bride price. In general, the method for peacefully acquiring a wife among the Gilyak falls entirely under the "purchase-sale" agreement, with its accompanying "rectification," etc. I have seen how one middle-aged Gilyak, not having the wherewithal to feed his wife, sold her (with her consent, however) to another Gilyak for a small compensation.

But in spite of the character of this acquisition of a wife, and despite the fact that the assent of the woman is not only not required, but is not even asked, nevertheless the position of women is in general not as bad as it may appear. It is required of her that she be industrious and thrifty. Much, in fact, is required of her. She cleans and dries an incredible quantity of fish, which is used for the year-round sustenance of the family and dogs. It is she who scutches wild hemp, spinning it into triple thread, and for months thereafter she ties enormous nets, utilizing for this purpose every free minute. She sews clothes for the entire family, and on her lies the entire burden of the Gilyak kitchen and the feeding of the dogs. It is she who, for whole days on end, gathers sarana, berries and roots which constitute the daily diet of the Gilyak during the winter. Finally, she bears the whole burden and care of feeding the numerous guests who arrive and stay for weeks, while her husband leaves to pay visits and enjoys his winter rest. Yet, 585 As soon as the bride price is paid, the marriage is regarded as concluded, and the man may take his wife and lead her to his home. This is often done without further ado. Wealthier [556] people, however, usually arrange a feast to celebrate the wedding of their daughter or sister, at which, aside from relatives, village and friends also /637/ take part. Similarly, a supply of various foods, fish, mossj, berries, millet, etc., are given to the departing married couple, so that the young wife, having reached the home of her husband, is also able to give a feast for the relatives, there, as well as members of the household and village.

591 592 As a rule the young couple moves to the place where the husband has his home, that is, where his parents or brothers live, and take up residence with one or the other of them, according to circumstances, since the Gilyak dwellings, as has been described above, are of the type that can accommodate several families. The house, however, is by no means always inhabited only by relatives, but often also by other villagers who perhaps helped in building it or have some other connection with its owner. The members of the household remain together until, through the increase in the families, the space becomes too crowded and some of them have the means to build another house for themselves either in the same village or elsewhere. Besides 592 the central room used by all the members of the household, with 342 the hearth in the earth yurt or the dog table in the winter house 35 built in Chinese fashion, each family has its particular share of the sleeping benches running all around and each individual has his designated place on them. But these individual sections are never separated from one another in any way by screens, curtains or the like, and the whole interior of the house always gives the impression of a room used by everyone in common.

577 171 As little as such living together by all the members of the household in one room can be conducive to morality, generally speaking, I must nevertheless give the Gilyak a good rating in this respect. In fact, I do not hesitate to call them a morally austere people, in contrast to their neighbors, the Goldi, Orochi, 577 Ainu, and even more the other Paleo-Asiatic peoples. There is

116, 177, 586

"Mr. Pilsudsky, whom I found to be a great and true an intelligent member of this tribe, whom he knew—one by the Russian Government to track brodyagi—came to h his wife. He had migrated to a far-off village on the riv

1. Which discharges on the east coast at a spot a few of the Tim.

day that he arrived at Mr. P.'s hut, his father-in-law a they told the story of the newly married wife's desertion Gilyak to the Bay of Okhotsk. This was hundreds of mile less to do anything, and advised the young husband to ac wife live with the man she loved; but nothing would satis ing upon it. He had seen such effect mighty things; buy bring about the arrest of a criminal, and so he would ha portunity was such that at last Mr. P. gave him a paper good to take away the wife of another man.' The Gilyak and went away; and afterwards on the strength of this pa body in taiga could read, he got his wife back again."

friend of the Gilyaks, tells how of those appointed as overseer im in difficulty one day about er Nabil (1) and married. On the miles south of the mouth ccompanied him, and together and elopement with another s away, and Mr. P. was power-quiesce in his fate, and let the fy him save a paper with writ(ruble notes) untold wealth, and ve this magic. [264] His im, on which he wrote, 'It is not took the paper, in an envelope, per, the writing of which no-

years in her parental home. At what time such married couples actually enter the marital state is difficult to say. Probably, however, it is determined by the weakening sex impulse. I would believe that a 35-year-old man (which means a 15-year-old, because the Gilyak's year corresponds to our half year) can marry. However, this is also only an approximation, for they do not actually count their years. A man's wife can be a long time associated with the Gilyak and who had a good memory and a gift of observation, told me that he knew of two married couples, the partners of which he had known since childhood. The woman of one of them had a child at the age of 15, the other woman was 20 years old and complained that her husband who was 14 was not yet a man. I, too, was shown 15-year-old boys with half child-like features and narrow shoulders and was told that they could marry if they found a bride. We may conclude that marriage is permissible during puberty, but actually this does not often occur. At least among men there are not infrequently cases of mature individuals (around 23–28 years old) who are still unmarried. Cases where the woman is older are rare, but the opposite often occurs. In fact, some mature men take four or five-year-old girls and rear them until they reach womanhood.

As far as marriage between close relatives is concerned, it is among the Gilyak only very rarely, but that the older generation does not favor this; thus these people must also have had experiences pertaining to the harmfulness of such marriages. An uncle may be permitted to marry his niece. [127]

Women are in general well treated by men, partly because the Gilyak women bear the mark of instinctive humanity, partly because divorce is very easy. The wife of a tyrannical husband will be abducted by an admirer who usually consoles the husband, the husband, for the payment of halym. It happens very rarely that a well-to-do man has several wives. The man only lives with his favorite one and keeps the others as workers. Soon, however, this leads to quarrels, and the neglected ones make an effort to get out of the situation. In all other respects, however, even such workers are well treated, especially because they are needed. As long as a woman can work, and particularly if she is skillful at needle work, she can always find a husband.

In general, we can conclude that, theoretically, the Gilyak woman seems to be regarded as somewhat inferior to the man, but actually this has no practical effects; on the contrary, it happens just the case. The inferiority of women is reflected in the payment of halym, which is 582 really a sort of purchase. Moreover, the widow is in no manner of speaking inherited by the brother or other close relative of the deceased. But this inheritance is more a matter of [illegible] than a 35-year-old man [illegible] man may do so, but he must pay back the halym. The woman also does not take part in the more important transfers. On the other hand, she may occupy an independent and respected position she can, for instance, become a shaman. She may have her own money and inherit, although usually less than her brothers. If a widow does not wish to marry at all any more, she is not only permitted to do so she wishes, but even is respected thereby.

584 In the case of a girl given in marriage by her parents, 557 their wishes are usually the determining factor, and her inability 558 to resist is favored. But even though the girl's taste is not particularly considered, there are usually no unhappy consequences, for as we said, it is woman is ill-treated 571 she lets herself be abducted by an admirer. In ordinary 572 relations, the women of mature individuals (around 23–28 years old) who are still unmarried. Cases where the woman is older are rare, but the opposite often occurs. In fact, some mature men take four or five-year-old girls and rear them until they reach womanhood.

As far as marriage between close relatives is concerned, it is among the Gilyak only very rarely, but that the older generation does not favor this; thus these people must also have had experiences pertaining to the harmfulness of such marriages. An uncle may be permitted to marry his niece. [127]

Women are in general well treated by men, partly because the Gilyak women bear the mark of instinctive humanity, partly because divorce is very easy. The wife of a tyrannical husband will be abducted by an admirer who usually consoles the husband, the payment of halym. It happens very rarely that a well-to-do man has several wives. The man only lives with his favorite one and keeps the others as workers. Soon, however, this leads to quarrels, and the neglected ones make an effort to get out of the situation. In all other respects, however, even such workers are well treated, especially because they are needed. As long as a woman can work, and particularly if she is skillful at needle work, she can always find a husband.

In general, we can conclude that, theoretically, the Gilyak woman seems to be regarded as somewhat inferior to the man, but actually this has no practical effects; on the contrary, it happens just the case. The inferiority of women is reflected in the payment of halym, which is

578 out somewhere in the taiga for a whole year, the consensus 586 usually favors them and the first husband must abandon his 177 special rule in order to make sure of their wives. Such 588 chaps who are probably not of the best and who may thus be 797 very dangerous if eventually being the only male of their wives, have themselves baptized by a Russian priest, because they know that, according to the Greek religion, marriage must be permanent, and they would consequently,
in case of divorce, be entitled to the [illegible] protection.
However, it is doubtful whether this maneuver will help them much in the long run, for the baptized individuals who later have no intention of keeping their Christianity, alive, are soon forgotten in solitude. No one knows where they are, the wilderness is vast, and looking for them is very troublesome.

If the abducted woman had had children by her first marriage, she must leave them with the husband.

Child training. Toward the end of her pregnancy, a woman is taken out of the house for 10 (!) days and brought to 343 1. The duration of this exile is not the same everywhere. From some Gilyak cases, if not a formality, it is a burden which each one always [illegible] to be [illegible] unwanted. Also, if a woman [illegible] his marriage to a woman from a certain clan, the clan of his mother, to share. In the worst of cases, until a man [illegible] in marriage, the clan of his mother, the family of his brothers, with whom he share the right to the women of the [illegible] clan, or his family, have also to share the women of [illegible] on the girl's part, they slay the newborn child, and the clan is saved from ruin and unhappiness.

The Gilyak clan, however, did not succeed in retaining the principle of kinship inviolate and in perfect purity. Like the clan unions of all other peoples, it had to make a deviation and reconcile itself with the institution of exogamy, with the [illegible] into its bosom form time to time of individuals from other clans.

587 SECONDARY MARRIAGES—remarriage of widowed and divorced persons, different rules governing secondary marriages (e.g., preference for relative of first spouse), reduction in bride-price, curtailing of ceremonials, levirate and sororate unions (e.g., prevalence, preference, procedure); etc. See index to series and account of widowed women. 588 Religious sects.

/184

Once the above-mentioned principle was created and became an immutable imperative of life, the natural consequence was the appearance of exogamy, and exogamy is the foundation of the Gilyak clan.

But the exogamy of the Gilyaks, as we have seen, is not the mere obligation to take wives from outside their clan. It gives man a whole series of rights, which play an enormous role in his life.

We know that the acquisition of a wife is one of the most [illegible] rights of man. There are ordinarily fewer women than men. One must pay for a woman, and so make matters worse each of the wealthy men has many wives. As we have seen—and each one in the majority—acquiring a wife under such conditions is far from easy. Frequently he must wait a long time before he can marry. [129]

The norms of Gilyak marriage give each Gilyak the right to the women of the [illegible] clan, in particular to the women of his own clan, and he has also an unconsciously [illegible] obligation and right. The bride price in such cases, if not a formality, is a burden which each one always [illegible] to be [illegible] unwanted. Also, if a woman [illegible] his marriage to a woman from a certain clan, the clan of his mother, to share. In the worst of cases, until a man [illegible] in marriage, the clan of his mother, the family of his brothers, with whom he share the right to the women of the [illegible] clan, or his family, have also to share the women of [illegible] on the girl's part, they slay the newborn child,
and the clan is saved from ruin and unhappiness.

The Gilyak clan, however, did not succeed in retaining the principle of kinship inviolate and in perfect purity. Like the clan unions of all other peoples, it had to make a deviation
and reconcile itself with the institution of exogamy, with the [illegible] into its bosom form time to time of individuals from other clans.

/184 cont.

his death as well. One of his brothers, according to the decision of the clan, will replace him in the rights and obligations of husband and father. If the deceased has no younger brothers, the supporter of his family will be one of the "elders."
Such is the immutable law of the clan.

Such are the advantages which the clan union offers by virtue of the single principle of kinship and the marriage norms which directly issue from it. It is completely natural that these blessings can be enjoyed only by those who have a right to them by virtue of kinship. The fact of being born to a clan is the sole condition. An arrangement which is a separate member of society may at the same time be joined in an individual marriage and in a group marriage. Persons who are joined in an individual marriage live in a manner by regular sexual intercourse and cohabitation, but also by a common economy and common offspring. At the same time, however, in each of them is given the right and necessity to have sexual intercourse with persons of their own marital group. And although such sexual intercourse takes place irregularly, often demanding considerable interests, and usually presupposes the consent of both parties to each act of intercourse, nevertheless it is just because this is socially recognized, lawful, that it does not damage the family life, neither social or religious, and because it manifests itself legally—it is even required by law—it can be one of the most fruitful relations as marital relations. This is not only theoretical justice; it coincides also with the juridical views of those people among whom these institutions exist. /161 first of all, the very kinship nomenclature itself, according to which individual and group spouses are not distinguished by appellation, is indicative of this. Further, the obligations which impose on the participants in a group marriage the same obligations as are imposed on individual husbands. Thus, for example, when an individual husband dies, his wife and children of his younger brothers, they will remain such after

/161 cont.

intercourse; he must support her and her children, who usually
are also considered the children of all the members of the group.

Now the Gilyak marriage is [illegible] (1) the right to the individual marriage; 2) the right to sexual intercourse (group marriage).

Let us examine each of these rights in particular.

The right to individual marriage. Above all, the categories pu and ańkej are bound by the right to marry, in other words, out of the whole circle of persons bound together by kinship terms, only these alone have the right to join in individual marriage with each other; all the other categories of kinship groups are excluded from individual marriage. This right is not exhausted by the merely negative feature — the absence of a prohibition on matrimonial ties. Certainly in the eyes of the Gilyak the consanguinity and kinship terms are a bar to marriage, but in the opinion of the Gilyak most naturally therefore tends sexual intercourse and marriage among the women with whom he has the right to do so.

These are, namely, those women whom by the kinship nomenclature, either from birth or from another specifically defined moment, he calls ańkej (wife), and he calls all other women ańtałli (forbidden). Ańkej are those women who these women are. They are, first of all: 1) the daughters of all the "brothers" of the mother; 2) all the "sisters" of the wife; 3) "sisters" of the wives of brothers; 4) "sisters" of the father-in-law of the son; 5) individual wives of all ańj, i.e., of brothers who are older than the person speaking (among the majority of Gilyak); 6) individual wives of all "brothers" of the person speaking, without distinctions of age (in certain places).

Each woman, in turn, as we know, gives the name of husband, in addition to her own official husband, to: 1) all the sons of the sisters of her father; 2) all the husbands of her "sisters" and the "brothers" of her husband; 3) the husband of the "brother" of her husband (if she is married to one of them), and among some — all the brothers of her husband.

/162 corr./

In those clans where the "older brothers" are excluded from the clan "pu" with respect to the wives of "younger brothers," the widows are ordinarily assigned to one of the "younger brothers" of the deceased, but here also, in the absence of "younger brothers," one of the "older brothers" is obliged to accept the widow, without the right, however, to sexual intercourse with her.

But the typical aspect of the marriage-rights relations between the pu and anŋ(e) is not concealed in this extremely common institution of the levirate, about which /163/ we must speak in detail. The levirate marriage is a more or less exceptional phenomenon and embraces only one intinjti-case class of this category. The most characteristic aspect of the rights-obligations of marriage between pu and anŋ(e) lies in the other classes of this category, which are well-known to us from the kinship terminology, in other words, in the conditions of the normal marriage. This right-obligation character of marriage between pu and anŋ(e) has, it is true, been considerably shaken under the influence of causes about which we shall speak further on -- the Gilyak do take wives outside of the aforementioned categories, but these marriage unions do not represent the favored, characteristic form of even the contemporary marriage. On the contrary, both the contemporary customs and the ancient epos equally indicate that precisely between these classes of pu and anŋ(e) marriage was obligatory and the most satisfactory of all from the specific point of view of the Gilyak. In order to show how imperative this consciousness of the obligation of marriage between persons of the classes pu and anŋ(e) is, it will be sufficient to introduce one example from a story I recorded. In this story, they tell about a battle between a young Gilyak and a mysterious werewolf-shaman. The fight ends with the werewolf's receiving a mortal wound and returning to his yurt. On his deathbed he remembers that he is a distant akimaik of his slayer, that is, a member of that clan from which the clan of the killer has the right to take wives, and of the very category of persons of that clan whose daughters

835 536 (54)

During

*835 /184/ my residence of many years among the Gilyak, despite careful questioning, I heard of only two or three instances of clear violation of the prohibitive norms. The most outstanding of these instances took place in the settlement of Tamlevo, where a young Gilyak, after the death of his father, lived for some time with his young stepmother, purchased by his father shortly before his death. This incident shocked all Sakhalin, and he was spoken of as some kind of monster. Another commonly known incident involved the young Gilyak, Pavlinka, who married a woman from the clan of his vmgsi, i.e., from the clan that took its wives from Pavlinka's clan. But Pavlinka was a considerably Rusified Gilyak who had served in the police service and regarded the customs of his people superciliously. Another Rusified Gilyak, Aliykh, from the settlement of Tamlevo, after the death of one of his younger vun, compelled the gathering of clansmen which was deciding, by name. Ordinarily, the question in the forbidden categories slay themselves by mutual agreement or under the direct urging of their relatives. In one last song of such an unhappy pair, the woman sings of how /185/ her elder sister called her a "bitch" for her love for her uncle, and called her father a "devil," and how all -- her mother, father, and sisters -- urged upon her: "slay thyself, slay!" Incidentally, the object of her criminal passion, her uncle, could be of her age, could grow up far apart from her, and the love between the criminal pair might seem perfectly natural in our eyes.

*835 (197) 1. There are exceptional cases of another kind when the marriage norms are disrupted for the sake of upholding other norms which are considered even more important by society; this occurs during an epidemic, when a husband is not found for this or that widow according to the principles of the levirate.

*835 183 187 587 768 (131)

/184 corr./

levirate. Then, in order that the woman remain in the clan of her deceased husband, she is given, according to the decision of the clan council, to any clansman of an ascending or descending degree of kinship with her late husband.

*835 183 187 587 768 (131)

Ordinarily the very idea of sexual connection with persons of the forbidden categories evokes an instinctive disgust. In the rare instances where feelings of love arise between such persons, the Gilyak regard it as the inspiration of an evil spirit, as a phenomenon unnatural not only in men, but in beasts. We have seen that in such instances they even slay a fornicating dog. The attitude toward people is entirely the same. Ordinarily, such people invert in the forbidden categories slay themselves by mutual agreement or under the direct urging of their relatives. In one last song of such an unhappy pair, the woman sings of how /185/ her elder sister called her a "bitch" for her love for her uncle, and called her father a "devil," and how all -- her mother, father, and sisters -- urged upon her: "slay thyself, slay!" Incidentally, the object of her criminal passion, her uncle, could be of her age, could grow up far apart from her, and the love between the criminal pair might seem perfectly natural in our eyes.

*835 The feeling of sexual repulsion toward persons of the forbidden categories has been transformed into an instinct, like the very similar feeling toward one's own clan among us in our society. The impression of an instinct is also produced on us by that amazing ability of the Gilyak to suppress in himself the feeling of jealousy, an ability which he manifests when the question of the group-husbands of his individual spouse arises. Without these instincts, or in any case the noteworthy virtues of self-control and self-restraint, the realization of the sexual norms would be impossible; unrestrained jealousy would result in the destruction of group

/198 corr./

614 home of the wife, all the women born into the clan remained *194 together; their husbands, taken into the clan, were all of the same clan -- the male cousins of their wives; the sons of the 692 sister-in-law among Gilyak, after the death of his father, lived for *194 some time with his young stepmother, purchased by his father shortly before his death. This incident shocked all Sakhalin, and he was spoken of as some kind of monster. Another commonly known incident involved the young Gilyak, Pavlinka, who married a woman from the clan of his vmgsi, i.e., from the clan that took its wives from Pavlinka's clan. But Pavlinka was a considerably Rusified Gilyak who had served in the police service and regarded the customs of his people superciliously. Another Rusified Gilyak, Aliykh, from the settlement of Tamlevo, after the death of one of his younger vun, compelled the gathering of clansmen which was deciding.

601 *835 (196) (195) (195) (195 is true that the wife works very hard, an quickly; yet among the Gilyaks she by cu ecting to her treatment, is free to divorc t even be called upon to refund the price d, as with all semi-wild and wild peoples, stom retains a certain independence; and e herself and run away to her father, who original paid him by her husband."

/381 cont./

Inheritance. The structure of the contemporary family of the Gilyak naturally arouses in the father a desire to hand down his property to his children. On the other hand, the clan organization requires that in any case the property should not leave the confines of the clan. Out of the reciprocal action of these principles it develops that the children inherit from the father, and only in their absence -- the brothers of the deceased and his more distant clansmen, but at the same time, women, not only in the customary and ascending lines of kinship, but in the descending lines of kinship, but in the descending lines as well, are excluded from the rights of inheritance, as persons who are destined to leave the clan of their father and pass into the clan of their husbands. Such is the principle. In practice, it is true, it is relaxed; thus, for example, daughters obtain their dowry out of the hereditary property, and sometimes married daughters, especially when there are no heirs of the male sex or when the husbands purchased them for a big price, also share in the inheritance; but such instances are relaxations of the principle which are not generally accepted, and customarily they are effected by way of a will. Before his death the Gilyak summons his clansmen and makes known his wishes. These deathbed dispositions make it possible for the Gilyak to make not only daughters his heirs, but even persons of another clan, for example, his sons-in-law or workmen. If he should die without such a deathbed bequest, then, of course, the above-mentioned principle of inheritance goes into effect. But the details best serve to explain the essence of this principle.

If a Gilyak dies leaving neither wife nor children, /382/ his brothers are his heirs; in their absence -- his clansmen-ruvn in the order of their closeness of kinship. If he leaves a young widow and children, the widow, according to the decision of the clan, goes to one of the brothers or ruvn of the deceased; who has the rights and obligations of a father with regard to the children and is the guardian of their inherited property until they reach their majority. The young girls obtain a dowry, while the adult sons who have separated or wish to separate obtain their share of the

/652 cont./

567 171 Thus, an attitude toward the slaves similar to that among the Gilyak seems to exist among the Chukchee, and in this attitude, as in the motives for it, the more intense national consciousness and sense of freedom, there is a parallel between these two peoples similar to the one discussed above (p. 961) in their enterprising genius for trade and their extensive trade activity.

428 562 The law of inheritance existing among them gives us further insight into the family relations of the Gilyak. After what has been said above about marriage, it is almost self-evident that it is concerned solely with the male members of the family, while the female members are not only left empty-handed, but even treated as objects of the estate. The first and, [601] if there are any, only heirs of a Gilyak are his sons, and, to be sure, the property of the father is inherited by them in equal shares, regardless of the order of seniority -- a custom which is all the more remarkable since the Gilyak language has a special term (ykkyn) for the oldest brother in contrast to the younger one (atschek). The wife and the daughters, whether married or unmarried, have no share in the inheritance. The former, if, be- [768] cause of her age, there is no chance of her remarrying, is taken [583] care of by her sons; the married daughters have entered other family circles, after they have increased their brother's inheritance by the bride price paid to their father for them, and the unmarried daughters become the property of their brothers and, if a suitor is found, must be purchased from them, and the bride price is shared equally among them. If one of the brothers dies unmarried, the other, surviving brothers inherit from him, again in equal shares. The same thing happens when from among several sons of a Gilyak, who have become independent, one dies unmarried while his father is still alive; the latter receives nothing, because under no circumstances may a father inherit from his son.

428 587 The law of inheritance is different if one of several brothers dies and he was married and leaves behind a wife or perhaps wife and child, especially minor daughters and sons. If only a widow survives, she, along with all that she and her husband had, goes to the next brother of her deceased husband, and, to be sure, as a wife, regardless of whether the latter is still unmarried or already

/652 cont./

428 587 has one or several wives. This shows most clearly that the Gilyak have no aversion to polygamy in principle and only live in monogamy for the most part for practical and economic reasons. The same happens when a widow with minor daughters or only the latter survive: the latter are regarded as part of their parents' estate, as it were, and they are inherited by the second husband of their mother, and, when they have reached marriageable age and suitors arrive, they can be purchased only by payments to him. On the other hand, if minor sons survive with the widow, her brother-in-law inherits her and the daughters, but the property of her deceased husband goes to /653/ him only temporarily for the use of the profit from it and must be handed over to her sons as their property as soon as they have grown up.

587 The marriage of the widow to her brother-in-law is not absolutely obligatory: if there is a man who wants to marry her, he can have her with the consent of her brother-in-law and for the payment of a sum designated by him, and, as happens as a rule among the Gilyak, can take her children as well. But once they are grown up and are claimed by their paternal relatives, he cannot keep them, but is obliged to let them go without any compensation or consideration.

587 428 If, however, the deceased was the youngest of the brothers, his older brothers inherit his property, to be sure, but the widow does not go to any of them, but may marry any eventual suitor, as she wishes, and the latter does not have to pay her brothers-in-law anything for her. With regard to her children from the first marriage, however, the above-mentioned rules apply.

In the last-mentioned cases, where widow and child form at least part of the objects of the estate and therefore the principle of equal shares for all the brothers cannot be observed, the Gilyak law of inheritance favors, not the older brother, but the younger one. In spite of the fact that the oldest brother is distinguished from the younger ones by a special designation, the latter are actually favored by the inheritance law.

428 Finally, if a Gilyak dies and there are neither sons nor brothers to take possession of the inheritance, it goes to the

/654 cont./
614 mentioned (1), and differently than among a number of other

1. See p. 1035, above.

peoples, members of one and the same kall may marry each other.
562 From the description of the Gilyak law of inheritance it became 428 evident how greatly the male sex is favored over the female sex among them and given preference over it. According to this description the woman not only has no right to an inheritance, but is herself inherited, first, as a girl, from the father to the brothers, and then, as a widow, to the next brother of her deceased husband, so that she can never make arrangements for [592] herself. The only thing left for her is to establish for herself, as a wife and mother and through the means and talents given her by nature, an influential and recognized position in the house, and among the Gilyak she succeeds in this to a not inconsiderable degree.

171 A law of inheritance very similar to the one among the 428 Gilyak is found in the case of another Paleo-Asiatic people, the nomadic Koryak, whose chief possessions consist of their reindeer herds. According to Ditmar (2), among them, too, only the sons

2. Bull. de la cl. hist.-phil. de l'Acad. Imp. des sc. de St. Pétersb., Vol. XIII, p. 125; Mél. russes tirés du Bull., Vol. III, p. 33.

inherit the property of the father, and, to be sure, in equal shares, but the daughters receive only those reindeer which have come from the animals presented to them when they were born. Furthermore, among them, too, upon the death of an unmarried brother, 171 the surviving brothers share equally what he left. But if the de-
● 587 ceased was married and leaves a widow, she goes to his youngest 428 brother as a wife, if he is unmarried or a widower, and, if this is not the case, to the second youngest, the third youngest, and so forth, always under the same conditions. On the other hand, she may never become the wife of an older or already married brother of her deceased husband. Hence, if among her

428 /654 cont./
● 587 brothers-in-law none fulfills these two conditions, she becomes 171 free and may marry an outsider if she so desires (3). /655/ In 000

[113] 3. The custom that the widow of the older brother goes to the younger brother, but the widow of the younger brother becomes free is also found among the Samoyed of the Turukhansk region (Krivoshapkin", "Eniseisk. okr. /The Yenisei District/," Zap. Imp. Russk. Geogr. Obshch., 1863, I, Res. and Mat., p. 178. Tret'iakov", "Turukhansk. krai /The Turukhansk Region/," Zap. Russk. Geogr. Obshch. Po obshch. Geogr., Vol. 1, 1869, p. 403), among the Yakut (Sauer, Kap. Billing's Geogr. astronom. Reise nach den nördl. Geg. Russlands, p. 164), and other Siberian peoples.

428 In 171 principal, therefore, the Gilyak law of inheritance is very similar to that of the Koryak, though still a few degrees more unfavorable for the female sex.

While we saw above that among the Gilyak the paternal 614 relatives enjoy rights that are not available to the maternal rela-602 tives, on the other hand, they also have obligations which the 628 latter do not have and which more than ever characterize them as blood relatives. This obligation appears with the practice of blood revenge prevailing among the Gilyak. Like all primitive peoples, the Gilyak, too, adhere to the principle that every act of bloodshed committed against a human being requires retaliation in likewise bloody fashion, either by himself or by his relatives. And they believe no less firmly that if this requirement is not met, the person or persons guilty of the omission are bound to be punished by misfortune, all kinds of hardship, or even death. This notion, generally widespread among them, exerts a powerful, decisive, and enduring influence upon the behavior of both parties, the active as well as the passive one, in committing acts of bloodshed. It is in the interest of the attacker to commit his act from ambush in as unexpected and startling a manner as possible,

58 years in her parental home. At what time such married couples actually enter the marital state is difficult to say. Probably, however, it is determined by the awakening sex 582 impulse. The Gilyak believe that a 30-year-old man (which means a 15-year-old, because the Gilyak's year corresponds to our half year) can marry. However, this is also only an approximation, for they do not actually count their years. A merchant who for a long time associated with the Gilyak and who had a good memory and a gift of observation, told me that he knew of two married couples, the partners of which he had known since childhood. The woman of one of them had a child at the age of 15, the other woman was 20 years old and complained that her husband who was 14 was not yet a man. I, too, was shown 15-year-old boys with half child-like features and narrow shoulders and was told that they could marry if they found a bride. We may conclude that marriage is permissible during puberty, but actually this does not often occur. At least among men there are not infrequent examples of mature individuals (around 23 -25 years old) who are still unmarried. Cases where the woman is older are rare, but the opposite often occurs. In fact, some mature men take four or five-year-old girls and rear them until they reach womanhood.

As far as marriage between close relatives is concerned, it is known that cousins marry, but that the older generation does not favor this; thus these people must also have had experiences pertaining to the harmfulness of such marriages. An uncle may be permitted to marry his niece. [127]

586 Women are in general well treated by men, partly because 595 the Gilyak customs bear the mark of instinctive humanity, 562 party because divorce is very easy. The wife of a tyrannical husband will soon be abducted by an admirer who usually settles with the husband for the payment of kalym. It happens now and then that a well-to-do man has several wives, but only lives with his favorite one and keeps the others as workers. Soon, however, this leads to quarrels, and the neglected ones make an effort to get out of the situation. In all other respects, however, even such workers are well treated, especially because they are needed. As long as a woman can work, and particularly if she is skillful at needle work, she can always find a husband.

562 In general one may conclude that, theoretically, the Gilyak
● 587 woman seems to be regarded as somewhat inferior to the man, but actually this has no practical effects; on the contrary, the opposite is often the case. The inferiority of women is reflected in the payment of kalym, which is Under ordinary circumstances it takes little effort on the art of the Gilyak to nourish himself and his family. It is nly during the salmon run that the Gilyak works hard, uring the rest of the time only the women are industrious. he men often sleep at home during the day, and they get p after sunrise. In the evening, however, they often sit p a long time and chat. Well-to-do mainland Gilyak some-imes even hire Russian workmen. The men who work for old-seekers are discharged in the autumn and could live uite well throughout the winter on their pay, but it never ccurs to them to save; in a few weeks everything is spent nd then they do not know what to do. Such hungry chaps ften wander as far as the Gilyak villages and pledge them-elves to cut wood and do odd jobs in exchange for board. Gilyak hate monotonous work. In the vicinity of Nikolayevsk-na-Amure [231] they sometimes turn to haying in order to arn something; but as for digging, wood cutting, sawing nd similar work, they do not let themselves be enticed into t even for good wages. This, moreover, shows that they re ordinarily not in great straits. The Gilyak almost never rade on a commission basis.

Among themselves they are very punctual about paying. f a debtor dies or becomes incapable of working, his relatives endeavor to pay off his debts. They know nothing whatever of going into bondage or slavery because of debt.

The law of inheritance is very simple. The father's property goes to the children if they no longer have a mother. f the children are under age, their uncle or some other close relative is their guardian and later returns their property if it has not been entirely used up. If a widow is left with children, the property remains intact in the family, nd the mother is called "the elder" in possession. If the widow is childless she keeps a small part, about an eighth f the fortune, the rest belongs to the relatives of the deceased. If she wishes to enter a new marriage, the brother r some other close relative of the husband becomes, as we said, her second spouse, but if she already has children, hey keep the estate of their father. If she is poor and does not wish to re-marry, she must be helped, and this help she usually pays off in work as best she can. If a father whose wife died earlier leaves a son or daughter, the estate s usually divided upon the daughter's marriage. In this case, the relatives of the bride look over the bridegroom. f they regard him as irreproachable, the bride gets half, 588 IRREGULAR UNIONS--marriages in violation of incest taboos, exogamous rules, caste restrictions, or prohibitions of bigamy; common-law marriages; marriages to gods, to deceased persons, to trees, to persons of the same sex; frequency of irregular unions; social reactions; etc. See also:

588

Incestuous, premarital, adulterous, and homosexual liaisons 83
Castes 564
Exogamous restrictions 61, 582

/255 cont./

832 childhood a little girl is taught to speak with a soft melodic 517 quality and to give her face a dreamy coquettish appearance.
867 A woman not infrequently succeeds through her talent for 832 singing. In their songs the women are capable, not only
533 expressing their love with great delicacy, but also of ridiculing
626 unwanted suitors most maliciously. In her sarcasm the woman does not stop at any hyperbole. In one song the nose of the undesired one is compared to open patches of water in a frozen surface, to an open door, and his clothing, his dogs, his harness, etc. are described in similar tones.

889 /256/ Sexual Abnormalities and Perversions. I asked the Gilyak many times if such sexual perversions as pederasty and bestiality were practiced among them. No one, apparently, had ever heard of any cases of pederasty. As for [158] bestiality, only in one village on the Tym' was I told, and then with disgust, of one psychically sick Gilyak who had 829 copulated with a dog. The attitude of the Gilyak to these 539 perversions is made clear by the following legend, which I wrote down on the Amur. The tiger, the panther, and even the lion (?) were once men. Once, by chance, the god Kur saw that they were copulating through the rear orifice. Then in indignation he said: "Well, since you copulate like beasts, henceforth be ye beasts forever." Thus, in the view of the Gilyak, the above-mentioned perversions are acts which make a man like a beast.

143 The Gilyak have an extremely simple attitude toward 826 hermaphrodites (miskund in the eastern dialect, miskij -- in the western dialect), in whose peculiarities they apparently see a plain anomaly, but feel no abhorrence for them and
● [588] are glad to have sexual intercourse with them. Marriages of hermaphrodites are a common event.

/256 cont./

143 In view of the fact that in ethnographic literature sexual 826 intercourse and marriages of hermaphrodites are often confused with homosexuality, I shall cite very characteristic instances of hermaphroditism from the life of the Gilyak known to me. On Sakhalin I know of two cases. In the settlement of Yama, near Aleksandrovsk, there lived an old Gilyak, Chubuk, who was known as a hermaphrodite, since up to a certain age he considered himself a woman (the membrum virile was underdeveloped) and wore woman's clothing. Later the membrum virile attained the proper development, and he began to wear men's clothing and finally married.

143 I learned of another instance in the settlement of Myy Gyrk 826 on the western shore in the far north of Sakhalin. Here I once ● 588 met two young people sitting on the shore, a man and a woman, who appeared to be spouses. I immediately noticed that the latter very much resembled a man in the face. My companions explained that only a year ago she had been wearing men's clothing, considered herself a man, and was very friendly with her present husband. Once they went fishing together. They had to spend the night together, and then the hermaphrodite revealed her secret to her friend. From that time on they began to live together and ended up by getting married, although people strongly urged the young man against [538] /257/ taking this step. Similar cases may easily have given [154] rise to the legends about transformed persons (about werewolves).

On the Amur the Gilyak Putuk told me the curious details concerning his hermaphrodite friend. The latter had been a girl up to a certain age. Suddenly he began to notice that he was developing a membrum virile, which would sometimes grow larger, sometimes diminish, and sometimes disappear completely. He communicated this to his lover, who came to him at night and was convinced of the truth of his words and on the next day told everyone about it. In the course of several years a beard grew and the male organ was definitely developed, although his vagina was also fully developed, and he could have intercourse with men. After

/257 cont./

143 that he began to wear men's clothing, got married, and now
826 is the foremost hunter of the vicinity. Normally he lives
● 588 with his wife, but sometimes copulates with men. He considers the latter more pleasurable and speaks of himself with pleasure: "I have two chances, two joys." All treat him as an urdla n'ivukh. In all I was able to count five such cases among the Gilyak, the number that Bogoraz found among the Chukchee.

881 The Gilyak have no special rites at the time of attain-[302] ing sexual maturity. The only outward sign for a maiden who has attained sexual maturity is that she begins to plait her hair in two braids. The moment of the onset of sexual maturity for a maiden is considered the menstrual period, which ordinarily begins in the thirteenth or fourteenth year.

881 This moment is considered the beginning of marriageable 826 age, although the proper term for a woman who has attained sexual maturity is the expression -- "a woman who has seen her body," i.e., whose breasts have grown to the point when she can see them. A similar term exists for men -- "a man [302] has seen his body," but in this case the word "body" refers to the mustache.

881 Some time before the onset of menstruation the mother
867 prepares her daughter for the approaching change in her life and instructs her in all the necessary rites and taboos connected with blood. The Gilyak, both men and women,

881 fully recognize the significance of menstruation as the mark 585 of sexual maturity and do not have sexual intercourse before 833 its onset. Adult Gilyak frequently marry little girls and from the first day sleep with them under one covering, but do not begin sexual intercourse until the wife informs her husband of the onset of the first menstruation.

589

589 CELIBACY--prevalence of bachelors and spinsters; reasons for celibacy; status and activities of unmarried, widowed, and divorced celibates; etc. See also:

Religious celibates 79
Care of widows 736 Mourning 768
Chastity 831
Premarital adulthood 885

/374 cont./ Yet

562 loaded down with work as she is, sometimes profoundly unfortunate, with an aged and blind husband, purchased and sold, she is [264] nevertheless not a slave. She is not shut up, as in the East; she [513] eats at the same table with her husband and children, she participates in the conversation, and she is treated with respect as a wife and mother. The children treat her with respect. They are ready [765] to exact vengeance for her. When she dies, they will cremate her with the same solemnity as her husband; as a sign of mourning they will undo their braids, not infrequently for life, and an occasional inconsolable husband will lay violent hands on himself out of grief for his wife. Although married, she does not sever her bonds with her former family and clan. She, along with her [574] husband and children, visits them frequently, and in a year of misfortune she and her husband and children will find assistance and a hearty welcome there. If her husband should offend her without cause, she will find protection in the family of her father, and true protection: they will return the bride price and take her back.

595 Polygamy is found to a limited extent. The causes of polygamy lie in part in the above-mentioned conjugal rights of • [589] brothers. It is not by chance that there are so many bachelors among the Gilyak, /375/ frequently without special reasons, such as poverty, etc. Then, again, barren wives, as well as the desire to have a young healthy worker in his old age, impel the Gilyak to provide himself with two or three wives, whom he gradually acquires. It is noteworthy that in the settlements closest to the Aleksandrovsk post, even in such a large settlement as Arkyyvo, I did not encounter a single case of polygamy.

595 This is explained, of course, by the influence of the Rus-
177 sians. Polygamy often produces quarrels between wives, and the husband, of course, most frequently takes the side of the favorite wife, yet that division into lawful wives and concubines, as in the Eastern harems, does not exist among the Gilyak.

831 Two words concerning sexual morality. In their talk the Gilyak are not very irreproachable. Young maidens allow themselves to use words and expressions that are not tolerated by the

/385 cont./

162 or adolescent, living apart from their 595 parents or not, and therefore "house-128 holds" are counted separately, and, secondly, widows and widowers and their children, and also orphans (brothers and sisters) who live as a single household.

162 The total population is 1,041, of whom 595 561 are male and 480 female; the adults (including adolescents) [167] number 678; there are 278 married or widowed persons, and 32 male polygamists (four of these have three wives each and the others two each); for each polygamist there are nine individuals who have only one wife each (3). The number of children who

• [589] 3. Under the rubric of "married we have also included widowed persons, since, in order to have accurate percentage figures for the bachelors and polygamists, widowed persons must be considered along with the married persons. The terms "polygamist" and "bigamist" are used interchangeably, since, though there are no prohibitions in this regard, we have not met on the Okhotsk shore a single case where a native had more than two wives; on the western shore and on the Amur many Gilyak have three or four wives each.

[128] [184]

163 The number of children who 165 survived birth is 515, while the number of those who died at birth is 247, so the rate of infant mortality is at least 33% (4); the [124] 4. For lack of a better method, the number of children was ascertained by asking each married man the questions: (1) how many of his children were present (the name of each child was called out and written down one by one) and how many were absent; (2) how

/387 cont./

114 settlements the settlement of Mos'bvo 36 on the banks of the Tym' River, seven 103 versts from the settlement of Rykovskoye.
361 In connection with this settlement of 221 Mos'bvo, the author makes the following comment: "It is inhabited only in autumn and winter. In spring and summer the inhabitants pass on to the western coast, mainly to the village of Arkyvo, where in the early spring they hunt seals and during the summer catch fish which are not to be found in the Tym' at this time of the year. At the beginning of August, before the Siberian salmon run, the population returns to their winter dwellings." Editors of the journal, Etnogr. Obozr."

with 109 yurts. The total population here is 703 persons (197 16 on the Tym' River, 506 on the Okhotsk coast), of whom 416 are male and 287, female; there are 169 families and 133 households, 483 adults, 175 married persons, 9 male polygamists, average fertility -- 3; 332 children survived birth; 169 402 died. Guns -- 64 (of these 30 are on the Okhotsk coast and 237 the remainder on the Tym'), 121 nets, 122 boats, 1,480 dogs.
50 During the last season 688 seals killed, 586 sables, 134 foxes, 471 43 otters, and 63 bears.
433

162 From this one can draw the following conclusions: here 592 there are, on the average, six persons per yurt, an average family has /388/ four to five members; there are 11 married males for one bachelor (1), one bigamist in 19 married men.

• [589] 1. The word bachelor is applied only to older, so to speak, inveterate bachelors.

59

59 FAMILY--general statements dealing with several specific asp family. The family is a social group consisting of two or more different sex who are married to one another, and of one or mo own or adopted, of the married parents. It is to be distinguishe marriage, the social relationship uniting the parents of opposite from the household, the social group occupying a dwelling or ot Hence, strictly speaking, a married but childless couple or a w divorced parent with children may form a household but not a fa

/128 cont./

174 Those manifest social habits and feelings which we observe
* 614 in the contemporary Gilyak, which he indisputably acquired 615 in the beneficial school of social relations, originally developed among the matrimonial clans and from them were gradually transferred first to every tribesman, later to neighbors of other tribes, and finally to man in general.

But the source of social ties between the matrimonial clans akhmal'k and ymgi, as we have seen, is rooted in that wonderful organization of the Gilyak clan, to the analysis of which we have devoted this chapter. In this evolution from the egoism of the closed clan through ties with pandf'y of other clans, close by blood, to sympathy and humanity for all men, both close and distant, is contained, perhaps, the most instructive conclusion of our long analysis. From that moment when the rule that a man should marry the daughter of his uncle on the mother's side was established, there was also laid the firm foundation for the extensive growth of social habits and feelings.

/129/

• 59 114

The Social Organization of the Gilyak

(Family and Marital-Sexual Norms)

I.
Introduction

Upon superficial acquaintance the structure of the Gilyak family and its sexual norms appear to be so simple, conventional, and similar to ours that they can mislead even the serious observer. The well-known academician Leopold Schrenck, who lived among the Gilyak for more than two years and left us the well-known, multi-volumed monograph on this tribe, was profoundly convinced that he was dealing with the ordinary patriarchal-monandrous family. This appeared so obvious to

/130 cont./

58 agnates, the father or her brothers; she makes her permanent [591] residence in his home, follows him in his journeyings and emigrations, and before all the world is considered the personal wife of the Gilyak who purchased her and the mother of his
• 59 children. The children belong exclusively to the father and [85] succeed him after his death. After the birth of the first child, [551] husband and wife cease to call themselves by their former [553] names and begin to be called by the name of the newborn ("the father of so-and-so, the mother of so-and-so" -- teknonymy). The exclusive rights of the husband to his wives
[684] apparently are sanctioned by the right of retribution, even bloody retribution, upon the infringer on his conjugal rights.
[614] The clan is based on the principle of agnation, exogamous marriage. One can travel over the whole territory of the Gilyak, live in their yurts, long observe their family life, and note nothing extraordinary. In the large winter yurts, the inhabitants occupy their places by families, each living with regard to its own particular interests. Between husband and wife or wives and their children, harmony and tender /131/ relations prevail. Cases of a striking attachment between spouses are not infrequent; when one of them dies, the other sometimes lays hands on himself or dies of grief.

* 601 In a word, to all appearances we are dealing here with a 121 type of individual family which is generally accepted as being 125 patriarchal and in any case not polyandrous. Such were my [59] own personal impressions at first. But my first inquiries in the realm of kinship nomenclature awoke serious doubts in me, and I therefore determined first of all to make a detailed study of this aspect of their relations. The study of the kinship nomenclature, it appeared to me, could be most successfully accomplished by a systematic census of the population. With [114] this objective, I undertook during the winter of 1891 my first census of the Gilyak villages on the western shore of northern Sakhalin, and as a result I discovered their complex classificatory system of kinship and their peculiar form of group marriage (1).

[113] 1. At the time the account of this was

II.

Family-Clan Relations

59 601 When one observes the family among the Gilyak, one at first does not notice anything special about it. As among many of our other natives, the Gilyak buys one or two, formerly three, wives, who are his socially recognized wives, as are his children who work with him, are supported by him, and to whom his property passes after his death. The marital fidelity of a wife is guarded with an armed hand, as we shall see below. In a word, the form of marriage is, to all appearances, completely individual /individual marriage as opposed to group marriage/. But on closer acquaintance with the inner structure of Gilyak life /352/ one encounters a whole series of phenomena which are at variance 601 with this form of marriage. First of all, it becomes apparent that a Gilyak calls by the name of father (ytk) not only his socially recognized (own) father, but also all the brothers of his father, not only own, i.e., of the first degree of kinship, but also of all the most distant degrees, and the wives of these brothers of his father he calls mothers (ymk), like his own mother. In the same way, a Gilyak calls all the sisters of his mother by the name of mother (ymk), and their husbands father (ytk). The children of brothers, as well as the children of sisters, of all degrees of kinship call one another "ruvn" (= brother and also corresponds to the German word "Geschwister" = brothers and sisters). Thus, we see what seems to us a strange phenomenon, that a person may have a tremendous number of fathers and mothers, not to speak of brothers and sisters, and such fathers and mothers are often younger than their children. But, at the same time, a Gilyak does not call the sisters of his father and the brothers of his mother "ytk" and "ymk," but "edr" and "app."

601 171 For other forms of kinship relations, the Gilyak have a whole series of names, which proves that it is not poverty of language which is the cause of this, to us, strange kinship terminology. A similar terminology exists among the Iroquois and other Indian tribes of North America, and also among certain tribes of India,

591

591 RESIDENCE--prevailing rule governing the place of residence of a m couple (e.g., matrilocal, avunculocal, patrilocal, neolocal); existen combined rules (e.g., alternating, bilocal, matri-patrilocal); occurr alternative rules under special circumstances; extent to which marri normally involves the removal of bride or groom to another communi local exogamy, local endogamy); residence changes by children or un adults (e.g., removal to home of grandparents or maternal uncle); r changes made late in married life; evidence bearing upon former or changes in residence rules; etc. See also:

Dwellings	342	Residence readjustments after divorce
Settlement patterns	361	Organization of the community
Bride-service	583	Residence changes by widows and widower
Postmarital visits	585

manner of speaking inherited by the brother or other close relative of the deceased. But this inheritance is more a matter of habit; if the widow wishes to marry another, she may do so, but he must pay back the kalym. The woman also does not take part in the more important councils. On the other hand, she may occupy an independent and respected position; she can, for instance, become a shaman. She may have her own money and inherit, although usually less than her brothers. If a widow does not wish to marry at all any more, she is not only permitted to do as she wishes, but even wins respect thereby.

In the case of a girl given in marriage by her parents, their wishes are usually the determining factor, and the wealthy man is favored. But even though the girl's taste is not particularly considered, there are usually no unfavorable consequences, because, as we said, if a woman is ill-treated she lets herself be abducted by an admirer. In ordinary affairs, the woman shows subservience to the man; in her sphere she is entirely independent and in the family council her opinion counts for no less than that of her husband.

The forms of greeting and manifestations of affection between man and [128] woman are very primitive and austere, as is the case in general among the Gilyak. Kissing and handshaking are done only on special occasions, of which we shall speak later. Men and women very seldom kiss; even when the man takes leave or returns from a journey there is no embrace, no kiss, and no handshake, only good wishes are exchanged and even these are rather cool. However, there are other forms of caresses, which will hardly find approval. In tender moments, the woman looks for lice in the man's hair and cracks the game thus hunted between her teeth. Sometimes, the reverse occurs, and the man does it to his lady. Another expression of tenderness consists in washing each other's face with saliva.

The abduction of a woman always occurs with her full consent. During the absence of the husband, the admirer suddenly appears with some companions, the lady is set in the sled or in the boat, and the party disappears. However, some men do not so easily submit to their fate, they pursue the abducted woman and attempt to win possession of her once more by means of cunning or even force. Some men seek revenge, and the result is a struggle and even death, but this is unusual. Quarrels among the Gilyak usually stem from some such causes. If the run-away couple succeed in hiding which belongs to them by right through the female line: "Ymgi (son-in-law /zyat'ya/ must be fed" -- such is the formula of this interclan obligation.

/122 cont./

This rule, however, does not find expression at all in an obligation of the akhmal'k to support his son-in-law /zyat'/ and his family permanently in his own home. It may be that at a very remote time, in the period of maternality when the husband went to live in the home of the wife, it was actually so, but at the present time, under agnatic principles, the wife goes to the home of the husband and customarily moves completely to the clan site of her spouse's habitation. Nevertheless, the principle of "sustenance," as we shall see, plays a most important role in the unification of the clans.

It is consolidated in a special, extremely peculiar religious rite, which consists of the following. At the last moment before the bride is carried away from the home of her father, there is placed just inside the threshold a large, four-handled cast-iron kettle brought by the bridegroom as a part of the bride-price for the bride, and on the outside a small kettle belonging to the father of the girl. When going out, the bride and bridegroom must step with the foot first on the inner and then on the outer kettle; the former remains with the father-in-law, the second is borne home by the bridegroom -- ymgi. In a year, when, according to custom, the couple pay a visit to the akhmal'k, the same ceremony is repeated before their departure; only this time the outside of the threshold there is placed a pot and a cup, which are again exchanged as in the first instance. It is characteristic that the exchanged objects bear the designation nich (mine-thine, a symbol of mutual sustenance), while the whole rite is called nich zychvyvnd (trampling of the nich). It is also called lymyr'n-zand -- trampling of the threshold, which points to the religious element of the rite, in which a role is played by the so-called /ymyr'n-man/ -- an old woman, the mistress of the threshold, the woman-lorbear, the guardian genius of the home, whose blood flows equally /123/ in the veins of both of the newlyweds, the children of brother and sister. Standing in close connection with this rite is the previously described moment in the bear festival, when, before the shooting at the mark, the dancer of the bear (the akhmal'k) and his ymgi each sets beside himself an ax and a kettle, which are also called nich and which are also mutually exchanged. If the first rite symbolizes mutual sustenance, the second symbolizes reciprocal co-operation in hunting, which, as we shall soon see, has a quite real basis.

/122 cont./

The principle of "sustenance" is not limited to periodic visits to the relatives of the wife, although they have some economic significance, since the akhmal'k's each time, in addition to the hospitality shown, give a valuable present to their ymgi, especially on the first visit after the marriage, when the son-in-law /zyat'/ is customarily given, depending on the resources, one or several pairs of smart garments for men. Cases of actual need are much more important. There are times when one's own clan is powerless to aid its clansman, because misfortune, having overtaken one, has overtaken all. Let something happen during the season of the fish run to turn them from their accustomed path, and general disaster is at hand. At such a time there is a simple way out. A man gathers up his family, his dogs, and all his movable goods and chattels in general and emigrates for the whole season to the settlement of his father-in-law.

Here he is met with outstretched arms, and from the first minute he feels himself at home, where they give him food and drink and share everything with him. The son-in-law /zyat'/, of course, is not a do-nothing; he helps in one way or another, but this is far from making up for the expenses involved in the long and unexpected visit of a whole family, often at a time when the supplies of fish have already been prepared and it is impossible to increase them.

Similar fraternal relations between akhmal'k's and ymgi are manifested in less fanciful and land undertakings.

The most important of these require the participation of several persons: hunting bear in summer and winter (taking it

/129 cont./
114 In his own way Schrenck was right; it was perhaps impossible 595 for him personally to notice the polyandrous nature of Gilyak marriage, for in effect it is impossible to find among the Gilyak open, public polyandry in the form /130/ in which those who have never seen it in life picture it to themselves. On the other hand, the statements of Mamiō Rinso are also quite uncertain, since due to his ignorance of the language he could note only a factual looseness in relations, but he could never grasp the chief essence, the normativeness, the lawfulness of the sexual relations that he observed.

In order to discover the polyandrous nature of Gilyak marriage, it is necessary to penetrate deeply into the most intimate aspects of Gilyak life, know their language, live a long time with them in their yurts (which helped Rinso see that which escaped Schrenck), and, in any case, become familiar with their kinship nomenclature, which Schrenck, due to his slight acquaintance with the language, completely failed to accomplish (1).

1. Certain information given by Schrenck in this regard can only mislead the reader. Thus, for example, he completely erroneously affirms that a man gives to his mother and to the sister of his father the identical designation "ymk." See Schrenck, op. cit., Vol. III, p. 6. Probably the individual who gave Schrenck this information was speaking, not of the sister of the father, but of the sister of the mother.

58 To the superficial observer, the institution of Gilyak mar-595 riage actually does not present anything peculiar. By all outward indications the wife or the wives of the Gilyak (polygamy -- two, three, or four wives -- is permitted by Gilyak custom) represent his individual property. The wife ●591 is purchased by the husband for a very high price from her

/130 cont./
58 agnates, the father or her brothers; she makes her permanent ●591 residence in his home, follows him in his journeyings and emigrations, and before all the world is considered the personal wife of the Gilyak who purchased her and the mother of his children. The children belong exclusively to the father and succeed him after his death. After the birth of the first child, husband and wife cease to call themselves by their former names and begin to be called by the name of the newborn ("the father of so-and-so, the mother of so-and-so" -- teknonymy). The exclusive rights of the husband to his wives apparently are sanctioned by the right of retribution, even bloody retribution, upon the infringer on his conjugal rights. The clan is based on the principle of agnation, exogamous marriage. One can travel over the whole territory of the Gilyak, live in their yurts, long observe their family life, and note nothing extraordinary. In the large winter yurts, the inhabitants occupy their places by families, each living with regard to its own particular interests. Between husband and wife or wives and their children, harmony and tender /131/ relations prevail. Cases of a striking attachment between spouses are not infrequent; when one of them dies, the other sometimes lays hands on himself or dies of grief.

In a word, to all appearances we are dealing here with a *601 type of individual family which is generally accepted as being 121 patriarchal and in any case not polyandrous. Such were my 125 own personal impressions at first. But my first inquiries in the 591 realm of kinship nomenclature also seemed to confirm it in me, and I therefore determined first of all to make a detailed study of this aspect of their relations. The study of the kinship nomenclature, it appeared to me, could be most successfully accomplished by a systematic census of the population. With [114] this objective, I undertook during the winter of 1891 my first census of the Gilyak villages on the western shore of northern Sakhalin, and as a result I discovered their complex classificatory system of kinship and their peculiar form of group marriage (1).

[113]

1. At the time the account of this was

/193 cont./
614 on the mother's side, of one common blood. For each individ-601 ual member of the clan, as we have seen above, this is expressed 602 in the fact that a person usually marries the daughters of his 582 mother's brother, in other words, the daughters of every man
*174 belong to the sons of his sister. This principle also is the link from which not only the classificatory system of kinship, so complicated in appearance, but also group marriage and finally, the clan grew. We shall also examine this dynamic. We shall see below that this principle, still so common nowadays among many primitive peoples, the principle that the daughters of the brothers belong to the sons of their sisters, goes back to the most ancient stage of the maternal family, the one that immediately followed blood marriage, and served as the basic method of providing the group with wives. In order to satisfy this most vital need in the early stages of human society, every mother obtained for her sons the daughters of her brother, in other words, all the descendants of a sister obtained as wives all the descendants of her brother. Why such a principle arose, why they took as wives exclusively the daughters of the mother's brother, and not the children of the mother's sister or the daughters of the father's brother, we can never know. Now let us look at the consequences *174 this principle had in its practical application.
582
591 /194/ 1) Once the daughters of the brother belonged from 581 birth to the sons of the sister, it was most natural that the future husbands should go at a very early age to the homes of their future wives /sic/. This arrangement is still to be seen among the Gilyak, as among many other primitive tribes. In "pure" marriage, i.e., between the children of brother and sister, from earliest childhood the future wife moves to the home of the husband and grows up with him. Termi-[602] nology has perpetuated this arrangement in that even from birth children in certain classes stand in the reciprocal

/194 cont./
581 relationship of ny and an'gre; toward each other (1).
*174 582 591 602 [114]
(835)

1. This fact radically refutes the assertion of Westermarck, Crawley, and others that the prohibition of marriage between brothers and sisters arises from an instinctive sexual aversion created by living intimately together. Crawley cites in this respect the categorical assertion of Ellis (see "Exogamy and the Mating of Cousins," Anthropological Essays, Oxford, 1907, p. 82).

[113]

*174 2) The above-mentioned principle created in the persons 582 of the daughters of the brother a permanent pool of women 581 for each man, but this measure was inadequate for the satisfaction of the objective for which it was created; corresponding norms of distribution were necessary in order to guarantee peace between the possessors of the group of women. It is first of all clear that the norms of distribution could not be exclusively individual or exclusively communal. Communal possession, as a general rule, would have evoked endless discord; a purely individual arrangement was not always possible because of the inevitable fortuitousness in the distribution of men and women, especially within the limited sphere of a few families. The norms to be worked out, therefore, had to be of such a nature that they could give satisfaction in the face of any combination.

The individual mode of distribution, of course, would be the most satisfactory, but it requires an equal distribution of the sexes, which is not always possible, especially within the limited sphere of a few families. The norms of distribution under such conditions had to be a compromise between the communal and the individual mode, in order to satisfy any combination of the distribution of the sexes.

/263 cont./
195 therefore, the meaning of it is this, that 1) a man takes a 196 woman into his possession as his lawful wife; 2) he buys his 58 wife by means of a payment of bride price; and 3) in both cases in the sense of the human term -- ixrem dgere, i.e., the abducting of a woman into his house, as is usually practiced at the present time.

At first glance the origin of the feminine term javind, which in this form is only a marriage term for designating a woman's getting married, is not as clear. Its original meaning, however, is not difficult to make out from forms which are etymologically close to it. First of all we have the form closest to it, the reflexive verb p'avind = pi + avind, signifying -- "to support oneself," "to nourish oneself," and, finally, "to live," in the economic sense. Here is a characteristic example: nlg-yvyr' n-lenyn' pyrk pavzi -- "a Gilyak himself alone (i.e., singly) lived" (in the economic sense). If several persons are concerned, this verb takes the meaning of "to live together," i.e., to nourish themselves conjointly, to have a common economy. From this comes the adverb p'avind -- together. Further, we have the derivative form of the active verb javind -- to support someone at one's own expense, to take someone as one's charge, to adopt, to nourish -- in the form of the middle voice it signifies to nourish oneself, to graze (jaivun ekhan -- a grazing cow). Finally, javind, javend means also "to warm" someone (with fire), to shelter.

Thus, the term javind, used by women with respect to a man and at the present time signifying to get married, must originally have meant literally "to take a man at one's own expense," "to receive into one's house." If this [194] etymology is true, which one could hardly doubt, then it
●591 follows from this that originally among the Gilyak the system [171] of maternality /matemitera/ prevailed, as it does at the present time among their neighbors, the Ainu, where the husband as a common rule moved into the house of his wife, just as the masculine term g-end -- "to take for oneself" -- bears witness to the contemporary form of paternity

/263 cont./

[196] patemitical, with the wife moving into the house of her [197] husband. At the present time the original meaning has disap-[198] peared from the consciousness of the people to such a degree [199] that often for the expression "to get married" there is added [200] to the verb javind the verb vind, avin vind, which would mean literally -- "go take a man and support him," but this is an obvious contradiction in adjectiv, for it signifies moving into the husband's house and, /264/ consequently, being [196] supported by him. A linguistic remnant of the old form of [197] marriage is shown in the fact that in the old language, as far as the texts indicate, all the terms of joint marital life are expressed by means of forms derived from javind. The reflexive verb v'avind means -- to live in marriage with someone, the joint marrying of two persons, or, for exam-[198] ple, ytk menakh vavin kull ityd, i.e., "father ordered us to get married," literally, "father ordered us to support each [199] other." Further, the active verb ajvind is used in the sense of to be married, to have a wife, for example, menyn ryvn an'gual vhnyvf ajvuzk -- "two brothers lived in marriage with one wife," literally -- "they supported one wife," etc.

In contemporary life there are likewise preserved several [198] remnants of the former maternality. Eloquent testimony
[199] of this is found in the contemporary formula of common [200] marriage law of which we spoke earlier, namely -- ymgxi [201] ainish jagn'udra -- "one must feed the son-in-law," although, according to the general rule, the son-in-law takes his wife to his home and lives apart from the father-in-law.

Clearly, such a formula could only arise in a system [197] where the son-in-law either moved into the wife's house for good, or, as among the Aino of today, he regularly came to live at her house for a certain length of time, and it goes without saying that the wife's family was obligated to feed the son-in-law on the same basis as those on which at the present time the husband's family is obligated to feed his wife.

/264 cont./

[200] This formula has preserved its vital significance even [201] today. One is supposed to send regularly to the son-in-law [197] jafu of eel-skins and a share of every catch. Moreover, the [198] young men of the category ymgxi during the course of several [199] months out of the year are unfailing guests in the settlement of their father-in-law and are indispensable participants in the more important hunting expeditions.

In particular, this relation is clearly attested to at the [200] time of dances and excursions for the hunting of sea animals.
[201] The master of the boat -- he is the head of the expedition -- in such cases especially summons his ymgxi to take part in the hunt (1).

[191] 1. We find an analogous phenomenon among the Haida Indians, a purely maternal tribe. Here, according to Swanton (Haida, p. 69), when a man undertakes a military campaign, he calls together his tribesmen who are his potential or actual son-in-law.

[191] All this time the ymgxi are not only fed for nothing, but [197] when they leave they carry away with them an equal share [198] of the catch and various /265/ gifts besides. One's relations [199] with these young men are either much more tender than with [200] one's own children. And this is entirely understandable, for [201] a man's ymgxi are the sons of his sisters or daughters, his tribesmen, who under a maternal system must live with him, while his own sons and grandsons will move to the settlement of their wives and will be completely entranged from him.

[197] This obligation for the "nourishment" of the tribesmen [198] through their son-in-law, however, is a customary institution [199] in maternality. Among several peoples, as, for example, among the Polynesians, the right of tribesmen to the property of their uncle on the mother's side has taken on completely [200] improbable forms, where a tribesman has the right to ravish [201] with impunity the possessions of his uncles. This right is

/265 cont./

[200] preserved in the form of remnants even among peoples who [201] by now have shifted to paternity, for example, the peoples [197] of the Caucasus, where a tribesman has the right to steal his [198] uncle's horse, if the latter refuses to give it as a gift. Among [199] the Altaians the saying that "a tribesman is worse than seven wolves" has been preserved to this day.

Moreover, the role of the brother in giving his sister in [198] marriage is quite characteristic. In many cases, it is not [199] the father, but the brother who plays the main role in this [200] affair; the agreement to the marriage depends on him, and the bride price is handed over to him.

[201] Not a few other extremely indicative traces which may [197] be considered remnants of maternality have been preserved
[198] in the language and customs. Thus, if a Gilyak wishes to say [199] that he is married, that he has a wife at home, he says [200] n'-umgarvo ivzh, literally "I have a wife's village" (n'i -- i, umgar -- wife's, vo -- village, ivz -- there is), an expression completely corresponding to the present-day way of life of the Aino, among whom to this day maternality has been preserved, and often husband and wife live in different settlements, and the former shows up to live with her for several months, and then he returns to his own settlement, so that a man has, besides his own native settlement, still another
settlement where his wife lives.

[201] Another example: the term for designating a person's [197] origin is the expression pandor', literally "root of birth."
[198] This term indicates not the clan of a man, as would naturally [199] be expected under the contemporary agnatic system, nor the settlement in which he was born, but the place of his mother's clan. It is interesting to note in this case the reverence with which the Gilyak regards the homeland of not only his mother, [200] but also her female ancestors. No matter how distant such a [201] settlement might be, every man tries to find an occasion to visit, and more than once may /266/ Gilyak companions during the time of my travels amazed me by the tenderness and

/360 cont./

[611] among the Amur Gilyak, among whom such a mixed assembly [612] imposes a larger or smaller fine. The elder of the clan (khal-[613] zeymar), even comparatively recently (one, two generations [614] ago), was the social leader of all the kinship group. His suc-[615] cessor was the khal'-zeymar next to him in years. The inter-[616] vention of the Manchu and the appearance of the Russians on the island brought about the disappearance of this institution. But [617] the khal'-zeymary never played the role of patriarchs with unlimited and hereditary power. Such power is not exercised among the Gilyak, even by fathers over their sons. At the present time the role of the elders of the clan amounts only to leadership in religious ceremonies, to the deciding voice in questions concerning seniority in the line of kinship, and similar questions where they play a special role in the composition of the judgment.

[618] 11. Clans are often dispersed in places very distant from one another. But after division the clansmen continue /361/ to [619] visit one another, to visit one another, and to show hospitality another assistance and protection. The Gilyak who hides from the persecution of the avenger will find security and armed protection in a remote settlement of his clansmen. Let a Gilyak become poor or an unlucky year [illegible] and he will go to spend some time with clansmen still matters improve. On the eastern coast of Sakhalin one rarely finds a settlement in which the whole population belongs to one clan; there are no more than five or six such settlements (Pranovo, Tangi, Tykh, and two or three more insignificant settlements). In the majority of cases there are two or three clans in one settlement. This partly arises from the fact that the Gilyak is often compelled to abandon his clan and emigrate, seeking a more advantageous site for fishing, and emigration does not present any difficulties, for the Gilyak joyfully accept an emigrant from another clan. Moreover, the custom of many non-it-law to emigrate to the clan of their side-aids greatly aids the mixing of clans. This [620] latter custom, possibly, a survival of the archaic clan mode of life, is based on a female principle, according to which husbands [621] [illegible] the clan of the wife, and see consequently, it is done at

/361 cont./

[611] present: frequently, by special agreement with the father-in-[612] law, the son-in-law moves to live in the house of the former for joint [613] work with him (more detail about this below).

[614] 12. The khal' has a common cemetery, closed to those [615] of other clans. It is known to all the Sakhalin Gilyak, who have [616] the custom of cremating their dead. Before the day of cremation invitations are sent to all the clansmen of the deceased, and only an extraordinary obstacle will keep a Gilyak from the performance of his last duty to a clansman. When the "living" fire, obtained [617] in this solemn instance by means of friction, has destroyed the remains of the deceased, they construct a low, little shed, closed on all sides, over the place where the ashes and small pieces of bone of the corpse remain, and at its side, a short distance away, they construct a tiny yurt, or rather a wooden box, an ashin [618] yaqara, with a roof. In this box they place the cup and dish of the deceased, his pipe, a wooden doll, ornaments (if it were for a woman), and other trifles. That there arises a whole row of yurt-[619] tombs of the clan. When the clan lives in various settlements, they bury the deceased in his village. But wherever the Gilyak [620] may die, his ashes must rest side by side with his clansmen. If a man dies in alien territory, they immediately communicate the fact to his kinsmen, who come and bear away the body for [621] cremation in his homeland. If the affair takes place in the summer, they preserve the corpse in a cold place until wintertime, when they bear it away on sleds to his homeland. But even if /362/ it should prove necessary to cremate a Gilyak in alien territory, nevertheless they carefully pick up one small bone, tie it to a piece of wood, and send it off to his homeland. There they [622] make a shed over it and construct a yurt by its side. The death of a clansman calls for mourning. Men and women undo their braids for a longer or shorter time, depending on the closeness of kinship and love for the deceased. Some wear mourning throughout their lives.

/376 cont./

[611] inheritance. Only with relation to the daughters does the father [612] have a deeper interest, for they inherit the property of the former to be disposed of as dearly as possible, although in practice this authority is considerably relaxed by the natural attachment of the father [613] to his daughter or sister, at which, aside from relatives, villagers [614] determined by the form of acquiring the means of existence.
[615] For fishing with the small nets used by the Gilyak, the co-operation of only two men is required; consequently, in this respect the [616] existence of large family households is not necessary. Likewise, the hunting of the Gilyak at the present time does not [617] require collectivism, while for the spring and fall seasons of seal-hunting the Gilyak join in temporary aruels, whose composition is completely accidental. The practice of going to Nikolayevsk for work undoubtedly has assisted in the dissolution of the large [618] family, although among the Gilyak, as among our own peasantry, such employment for one of them is frequently one of the kinds of division of labor within the family. Those who go away for such work are either bachelors or members of a large family, leaving their father and brothers at home to prepare fish for the winter. In [619] any case, the separation of adult, married sons from the family of the father is far from being a predominant phenomenon, especially in northern Sakhalin. Evidently it is of very recent origin.
[620] But at the same time the separation of the adult brothers after the death of the father is a customary phenomenon, although we should not think of this phenomenon in our sense. The brothers continue to live in one yurt, they frequently use the same equipment, but they eat apart; frequently this is the only sign of the division of the household.

[621] We shall say more later concerning the economic relations of the members of a family.

It is pertinent to point out that in many respects mutual aid, as well as the feeling of kinship and attachment between members of a family in general, is more extensive and constant among these barbarians than in a civilized family.

/636 cont./

585 As soon as the bride price is paid, the marriage is regarded as concluded, and the man may take his young wife home to his home. This is often done without further ado. Wealthier [560] people, however, usually arrange a feast to celebrate the wedding of their daughter or sister, at which, aside from relatives, villagers and friends also /637/ take part. Similarly, a supply of various foods, fish, mosj, berries, millet, etc., are given to the departing married couple, so that the young wife, having reached the home of her husband, is also able to give a feast for the relatives, there, as well as members of the household and village.

[561] At a rule the young couple moves to the place where the husband has his home, that is, where his parents or brothers live, and take up residence with one or the other of them, according to circumstances, since the Gilyak practice of the patriarchal described above, are of the type that can accommodate several families. The house, however, is by no means always inhabited only by relatives, but often also by other Gilyak who perhaps helped in building it or have some other connection with its owner. The members of the household remain together until,
through the increase in the families, the space becomes too crowded and some of them are forced to build another house for themselves either in the same village or elsewhere. Besides [562] the central room used by all the members of the household, with [563] the hearth in the earth yurt or the dog kennel in the winter house [564] built in Chinese fashion, each family has its particular share of the sleeping benches running all around and each individual has his designated place on them; but these individual sections are never separated from one another in any way by screens, curtains, or the like, and the whole interior of the house always gives the impression of a room used by everyone in common.

[565] At the same time, living together by all members of the household in one room can be conducive to morality, generally speaking. I must nevertheless give the Gilyak a good rating in this respect. In fact, I do not hesitate to call them a morally [566] austere people, in contrast to their neighbors, the Goldi, Orochi, [567] Aino, and even more the other Paleo-Asiatic peoples. There is 116, 558, 591

"A young man on marrying may make his home with his father; but if he be still in the single state and desire a hut of his own, he must marry, for it is more than infra dig. for him to do domestic work. For a Gilyak to take in his hand the woman's fish-knife (ungu-dzhakho) is considered a disgrace."

116, 422, 435, 583, 591

"On Sakhalin, when the would-be husban thirteen years old to assist his ageing spou keeping, is in possession of wealth enough fronted by a difficulty if he wishes to have to live on in the paternal home, or, if [269 friends and comrades to help him build a h required, and this is a very expensive iten forty-five rubles (4 1/2 guineas). I have ev was the difficulty with our Vanka, who was his own estimate, but according to our noti desirous of marrying, and offered to take summer to the 'end of the world,' with the rate charge of forty rubles apiece. With th and he had already saved sufficient for the d—not the old man who buys a second wife ıse—but the youth who aspires to set up house-to pay the price demanded, he is still con-a separate establishment. He may be content ] not, he will probably be able to get his ut; but this is not enough, a cauldron is n. He may have to pay in skins the value of en heard of them costing sixty rubles. This a capable young man of fifteen, according to ions about twenty-six or twenty-eight. He was me and my interpreter during the following aid of three of his companions, for the mode-is sum he would be able to buy a cauldron, purchase of a wife."

592

592 HOUSEHOLD--typical composition (e.g., nuclear or polygamous family, joint or extended family, clan); range, types, and incidence of variations; extent of inclusion of servants, retainers, and dependent relatives (e.g., aged grandparents, parents-in-law); physical seat (e.g., a single small or large dwelling, a cluster of adjacent huts, a compound); functions and cooperative activities of the household unit as such (i.e., irrespective of variations in family composition); locus of authority; rule of succession; mechanism for adjusting disputes within the household; ownership of dwelling, food stores, and household possessions; etc. Functions associated with particular forms of the family rather than with the household as such will be found in separate categories.

See also:

Property	42	Cooperative labor	476
Type of dwelling	342	Slaves	567
Servants	357	Care of aged	737, 888

/31 cont./

periods in the evolution of marriage, and, although they could have influenced one another, they basically belong, speaking in the language of geology, to different formations. It is sufficient to say that among the Tungus tribes sexual intercourse with wives of individuals of ascending generations is allowed, for example, with the wife of the father's younger brother, while among the Gilyak this is regarded as incest.

At first sight the Gilyak institution of marriage does not seem to be anything special. A Gilyak will generally buy one or rarely two or three wives, who come over into his clan and are regarded before the world as his personal wives and the mothers of his children. The children belong exclusively to the father and succeed him after his death. When a Gilyak becomes a father, he is no longer called by his former name, but is called the father of the born child. The exclusive possession of his wives expresses itself in the stern custom of blood vengeance against the disturber of marital harmony. The clan is based on the principle of agnation, and marriage is exogamous.

One can travel over the entire territory of the Gilyak, live in their yurts, and observe their family life for a long time, and not notice anything peculiar in the structure of their family. In large winter yurts the inhabitants occupy their plank beds by families, each living in relation to its own particular interests. Complete harmony and tender relations prevail among husband, wife, and their children. That is not all. One may frequently encounter instances of striking loyalty and love between spouses. When one of them dies, the other frequently lays hands on himself or dies from grief. In a word, to all appearances we are dealing with the type of family which is generally called patriarchal. Actually, however, it is not. First of all, one is struck by the strange kinship nomenclature. A whole group of women call a whole group of men their husbands (pu, ivn), and the latter call them their wives (an'gej). Likewise, a whole group of men call a group of women their mothers (ymk) and a group of men their fathers (ytk), and these call the former their children.

Aleut

/245 cont./

The peculiarities of the Aleut marriage norms did not remain isolated on the Aleutian Islands. On the northwest shore of the American continent, right up to the Columbia River itself, which was regarded by Morgan as the point of departure of the Ganowanian system, observers note them in terms almost analogous to those used by Veniaminov. We find them among the Eskimo tribe of the Koniag, the inhabitants of Kodiak Island, about whom Davydov writes: "Some women have two husbands each: the first is the actual husband, who selects the other one with the consent of the wife. This one at the same time becomes a servant i.e., he carries firewood and does a number of other chores. He can sleep with the wife only in the absence of her actual husband, and upon his return he is deprived of this right. /246/ The Russians call such husbands partners" (1). This

1. Davydov, Dvukratnoe puteshestvie v Ameriku ofitserov Khvostova i Davydova /Two Voyages to America by the Officers Khvostov and Davydov/, Part II, pp. 50-51.

This description, which almost seems to have been copied from Mamio Rinso and Veniaminov and travelers to Tibet, fails like the others to note the kinship relations between the spouses, but, on the other hand, there is the valuable report of the right of the second husband to exercise his marital rights only in the absence of the first husband, as among the Gilyak, and the obvious subservient position of this second husband. This subservient position is justly noted and strikes the eye also among the Gilyak, but it obtains, not by virtue of a marital agreement, but by virtue of the fact that the brother always plays the role of the head of the house and besides because brothers are forbidden to talk to one another the relationship between the elder and the younger may create the impression of the relationship between master harpoons, the stringers beside a yurt, fishes, little seals, bears (owl, etc.; only the streams are prohibited to him for the setting of seines for sable.

/277 cont./

/278/ Unity in exceptional cases does the Gilyak live alone with his family in the yurt. Customarily he lives with his brothers and classmates, sometimes with his father-in-law, more rarely with members of other clans. The winter yurts of northern Sakhalin are frequently enormous, holding at times up to 50 people, frequently all classmates. The economic advantage of such communal dwellings consist in the fact that the yurt, which consumes a great deal of wood among the Gilyak by reason of the unsatisfactory construction of the stoves, is used as rarely for such individual taboo separately. Moreover, these dwellings guarantee security from abduction for the women. The summer yurts are built smaller and probably house from one to three families. The winter yurt are built through the joint efforts of several brothers or classmates; the summer one's - through the efforts of one person. But all those who live in the yurt, temporary or permanent sikhalintsev, classmates or members of other clans who are temporarily helping, all live in the yurt without any compensation to the builders, and it is doubtful whether the latter ever expect any special privileges in obtaining firewood. If the yurt becomes congested, there will always be found a pair of people who are so uncomfortable will undertake the construction of a new yurt, into which the builders themselves will move, or they will remain in dwellers. Thus the dwelling of the Gilyak is, it is true, the common property of several families who participated in its construction, but at the same time it is an object of gratuitous utilization by clansmen and, in general, by anyone who desires it. This is a vestige of the time when the dwelling was built by the joint efforts of the clan and was an object of collective property.

The views of the Gilyak concerning movable property are perfectly clear and strictly defined. The ordinary articles of movable property among them are boats, fishing nets, tackle, arms, dogs, sleds, supplies of dried fish, etc. It often happen that a boat, a net, or dogs are the common property of two or three or adolescent, living apart from their parents or son, and therefore "household" are counted separately, and, secondly, wives and widowers and their children, and also persons (husbands and sinsem) who live as a single household.

/280 cont./

The total population is 1,041, of which 541 are male and 500 female, the corresponding enumeration number 678; there are 278 married or widowed persons, and 22 male persons (husbands of these married persons each and the others two each); for each polygamist there are nine individuals over who have only one wife. The average number of children who

3. Under the rubric of "married we have also included widowed persons, since, in order to have accurate percentage figures for the bachelors and polygamists, widowed persons must be included among those who are married persons. The terms "polygamist" and "bigamist" are used interchangeably, since, there are only two polygamists, in this regard, we have not met on the Chihoni dune a single man who had more than two wives; on the western shore and on the Amur Gilyak have three or four wives

/281/ The house was established in 515, while the number of houses was first used at Nivh in 547, so the rate of infant mortality is at least 106 (%) the

4. For lack of a better method, the number of children was determined by asking each married man the question: (1) how many of his children were present at the time of each child was called out and written down one by one; and how many were absent; (2) how many of his children had died between the beginning of his marriage and the time of the survey, and, finally, he estimated an exact number of the children in a given family, and, in the above description. Hence, it was easy to calculate the rate of mortality.

/283 cont./

/284/ The fertility rate - 2.7%, although this figure is below the actual one, for in the number of children we have included only those, on the one hand, children for whom their parents had bought child wives, and, on the other hand, those who died immediately after their birth. There is an average of 15 people living in each yurt, although there are a number of yurts with several families and clansmen, for example, one yurt in the settlement of Symivo accommodates 40 people, in the settlement of Ulyl

As to the size of the winter settlements, the largest of these are the following: Ulyl (settlement of Symivo, 40 persons each), Vidrov (116); Nivgu (110), Arkyyov (87), Tal'vutgrov and Tengi (64 each), Kimlevo and Pustu (59 each), Nyaivo (58); the smallest settlements are Ulyl (Ulyl, 15 persons), Ul'ya (Ulyl, 16). In the summer the most densely populated settlement is Tal'vutgrov (116), the smallest - Ul'ya (Ulyl, 16 persons). Of the total population 1,126, taboo lived in the settlements nearest to the Aleksandrovsk post, 208 - in the settlements of the Tym' River, and 707 - on the Amur.

5. The number of for animals and so forth killed during the last season was obtained from, and, finally, on the average per year, on average family has /289/ four to five members: there are 11 married

1. The word bachelor is applied only to older, so to speak, inveterate bachelors.

/285 cont./

settlements the settlement of Sim'vuo on the banks of the Tym' River, seven were from the settlement of Ul'ya, in connection with this settlement of Sim'vuo, the author has received from the above description, a winter yurt of the Gilyak, built following the Chinese pattern with an fire-place using Chinese bricks, provides adequate and comfortable space for four families. If one reckons the average family at four persons, husband, wife, and two children, this already gives 16 people living in the Chinese winter-yurt. Some yurts, to be sure, are occupied by only one or two families, at the most three families, and, on the other hand, there are yurts some across a yurt apparently standing empty throughout the entire year. Thus, in the winter settlement of Sim'vuo, as has been mentioned, single persons of both sexes, be it out of considerations of visiting or return to the winter, or, finally, and, finally, and permanent lodgings in the yurt. Also, the average figure of only two children per family seems too low, and, in reality, it is, no doubt, larger. Hence I think that it is not estimating too high if I reckon an average of 16 people living in each winter yurt. As to the summer-settlements, of, had people, these are 160 families and 130 people, average family - 3; 332 children survived birth; 189 died. Cons - 64 (of these 38 are on the Chihoni coast and the remainder on the Tym'); 121 men, 122 boats, 1,480 dogs. In the length the season 688 seals killed, 588 sables, 134 foxes, 43 otters, and 63 bears.

From this one can draw the following conclusions: here are three sex, on the average of the sex per yurt, on average family has /289/ four to five members: there are 11 married

/286/ There are 193 boats, 201 boats (one boat to every five persons), and 2,100 dogs. To make some money principal points, Tachi and Fate, exceed that number. Along the Lintan, Lengr in the north and Tachinsk in the south are in common possession with the clansmen, the exchange takes place between the mouth of the Amur, the coast of the Sea of Okhotsk and North Sakhalin. The author has received information with both the west coast of Sakhalin, the Tym' and Tro Gilyaks, and, with an fine long spring boat, provides adequate and comfortable space for four families. If one reckons the average family at four persons, husband, wife, and two children, this already gives 16 people living in the Chinese winter-yurt. Some yurts, to be sure, are occupied by only one or two families, at the most three families, and, on the other hand, there are yurts some across a yurt apparently standing empty throughout the entire year. Thus, in the winter settlement of Sim'vuo, as has been mentioned, single persons of both sexes, be it out of considerations of visiting or return to the winter, or, finally, and, finally, and permanent lodgings in the yurt. Also, the average figure of only two children per family seems too low, and, in reality, it is, no doubt, larger. Hence I think that it is not estimating too high if I reckon an average of 16 people living in each winter yurt. As to the summer-settlements, of, had people, these are 160 families and 130 people, average family - 3; 332 children survived birth; 189 died. Cons - 64 (of these 38 are on the Chihoni coast and the remainder on the Tym'); 121 men, 122 boats, 1,480 dogs. In the length the season 688 seals killed, 588 sables, 134 foxes, 43 otters, and 63 bears.

/286 cont./

/287/ Gilyak houses are not erected by individuals, but rather are erected jointly by several families, and, in general, the Gilyak dwelling is an object of collective property, and, in the above description, the Gilyak, as a people, is also a tribe, in contrast to other tribes, the Gilyak are characterized by a very small number of people, which, aside from relatives, villagers and friends who /287/ take part. Similarly, a supply of various food, fish, game, berries, millet, etc., are given to the departing married couple, so that the young wife, having reached the home of her husband, is also able to give a feast for the relatives, there, as well as members of the household and villagers.

As a rule the young couple moves to the place where the husband lives, that is, to the place of his parents or brothers and take up residence with one or the other of them, according to circumstances. Thus, in the above description, the author has described above, one of the types that can accommodate several families. The house, however, is by no means always inherited by only one family, but, in the above description, the author has helped in building it we have some other connection with its owner. The author has helped, in the above description, at, in addition to all that there are still the maternal dative, the cow-house, the sheep-house, and the. The Gilyak, husband and wife, find great pleasure in children and not infrequently express it. Children are very fond of their parents, and, in the above description, they feelings. I never saw a Gilyak give his wife a kiss, but even in the presence of strangers, husband and wife sometimes, in the sleeping benches running all around and each individual has his designated place in them... But these individual sections are never separated from another by any partition, curtain, curtain, or the like, and the whole interior of the house always give the impression of a single, undivided, room.

As little as such living together by all the members of the household contributes to mutual disturbance, generally speaking, I must nevertheless give the Gilyak a good rating in this respect. In fact, I do not hesitate to call them a model family men, in contrast to their neighbors, the Goldi, Orochi, Aino, and even more the other Paleo-Asiatic people. There is

/288 cont./

would than that for the men, thus, for the men, there could never be any lack of domestic work. But these objects are by no means made everywhere and, in general, in the Gilyak, they are only a few pieces by expert craftsmen and are, for the most part (1), so that one need only make a wooden handle or shaft and leaves the iron to it in order to produce the complete weapon. The situation is similar with respect to bow, arrows, and, in general, all hunting implements, specifically or chiefly by the male. The domestic activities of the men among the Gilyak, it, therefore, are very limited and, in general, limited to a few minor tasks with the knife or the drill to produce sleds, fish, animal, trap, and other implements of wood or bone, and to only a few tasks, such as, for example, the cutting of the pelts. The domestic tasks and accomplishments of the wife, however, are very numerous, and, in the above description, are, in addition to all that there are still the maternal dative, the cow-house, the sheep-house, and the. The Gilyak, husband and wife, find great pleasure in children and not infrequently express it. Children are very fond of their parents, and, in the above description, they feelings. I never saw a Gilyak give his wife a kiss, but even in the presence of strangers, husband and wife sometimes, in the sleeping benches running all around and each individual has his designated place in them... But these individual sections are never separated from another by any partition, curtain, curtain, or the like, and the whole interior of the house always give the impression of a single, undivided, room.

1. A large portion of them, as was mentioned above, are made by the Orochi, who live along the Choh and only given the finishing touches by the Gilyak.

/289 cont./

It must be noted here that the Japanese traveler, Matsuda Rinsh', author of the above description, has described, and especially the position of the eleven among the Gilyak, or also unfortunately [illegible] Gilyak, [illegible] Gilyak, [illegible] Gilyak, case personal motives on the part of the Japanese traveler came into play and gave rise to the wager mentioned by Sternberg, which can be interpreted in various ways. Forced to wait among the Sternerian (Gilyakat Cape Siotente for an opportune moment to carry out his planned trip to Tlaxen (or Sakhalin Island), which had been unsuccessful the year before, /645/ and without [illegible] provisions, Hamada found himself, in order to stay alive, forced to do all kinds of work, such as cutting wood and the like, in the home where he had taken refuge. For a time, however, he entered the trade of petroleum collection (petroleum derivative service in exchange for food and lodging and had to accommodate himself, like the "real" and the "other" men in a similar position, including the slaves, to act according to the order of the woman in charge of the household and to being treated "like a servant" by her. This does not mean either polygamy nor a dominant position of the woman over her husband. Pride and vanity, and perhaps also fear of the Gilyak people, probably prevented the traveler from fully and openly confessing in his report the unsatisfactory and humiliating position and treatment which had befallen him among the Sternerian, and prompted him to describe the situation to a more favorable light at the alleged request of the Gilyak people. He also forgot the fate of the Sternerian in an island light, saying that "their face and skin are extremely delicate and sensitive to the sun." Actually, however, actually the Gilyak women of Sakhalin look still darker than those on the mainland as a consequence of staying in the cramped, dirty, and sooty earth huts.

/644 cont./

Even though Mamia Rinsō avoids speaking of slaves in referring to his subordinate position among the Sternerian, he is well aware of the existence of such among them. For he says (1)

1. Sin. cit., pp. 186 and 187.

of the inhabitants of southern Karfo (Jima) that in their trade with the Santouse, that is, Gilyak, Oroka, and Goldi, they "even frequently sell human beings, and, to be sure, widowers

/684 cont./

mentioned (1), and differently than among a number of other people, members of one and the same hall may marry each other. From the description of the Gilyak law of inheritance it becomes evident how greatly the male sex is favored over the female sex among them and given preference over it. According to this description the woman not only has no right to an inheritance, but is herself inherited, first, as a girl, from the father to the brother, and then, as a widow, to the brother-in-law of her deceased husband, so that she can never make arrangements for her own fate. The only thing left for her is to remain for herself, as wife and mother and through the means and talents given her by nature, an influential and recognized position in the house, and among the Gilyak she succeeds in this to a not inconsiderable degree.

1. See p. 1030, above.

a. Law of inheritance very similar to the one among the Gilyak is found in the case of neither Paleo-Asiatic people, the nomadic Koryak, whose chief possession consist of their reindeer herds. According to Dittmar (2), among them, too, only the sons inherit the property of the father, and, to be sure, in equal shares, but the daughters receive only those reindeer which have come from the animals presented to them when they were born. Furthermore, among them, too, upon the death of a deceased husband, the widow is given to the brother-in-law. The reverse sit on low-rear seats, against the walls, which are raised and a mat is set up. The latter consists of fish skin or sail-cloth. These boats go to Sakhalin and Kamchatka.

2. Beitr. de la c.l. hist.-philol. de l'acad. imp. des sc. de St. Petersb. VIII, XIII, p. 126; Matériaux russes de Bull., VII, III, p. 36.

The Omoschka is a small wooden canoe made of birch bark; [illegible] used for a number of years, and is shaped of the same material, which rind cries—roar. Usually only one person sits in this canoe-boat rows with a double oar, both right and left.

513 heads. Their cover consists of skins, sometimes also of a [illegible] sail-cloth.

512 The houses of the Sakhalin-Gilyak are differently arranged. [illegible] have neither stoves, nor chimneys, nor windows. The floor is somewhat below the surface of the ground; in the middle of it is a low-lying open hearth made of pressed clay, and above this is an opening in the roof. In windy weather the house is so smoke full of smoke, [illegible]

514 A Gilyak house is lived in only during the cold and colder [illegible] of the year; in summer, however, those who do not go off on hunting, live in mere huts [illegible] Thus [illegible] and stands on poles in order to protect it [illegible] 515 The interpretation the Gilyak often make themselves huts of birch bark, and they carry along with them the only thing left for them in the "sea" and the "other" men in a similar position, including the slaves, to act according to the order of the woman in charge of the household and to being treated "like a servant" by her. This does not mean either polygamy nor a dominant position of the woman over her husband. Pride and vanity, and perhaps also fear of the Gilyak people, probably prevented the traveler from fully and openly confessing in his report the unsatisfactory and humiliating position and treatment which had befallen him among the Sternerian, and prompted him to describe the situation to a more favorable light at the alleged request of the Gilyak people. He also forgot the fate of the Sternerian in an island light, saying that "their face and skin are extremely delicate and sensitive to the sun." Actually, however, actually the Gilyak women of Sakhalin look still darker than those on the mainland as a consequence of staying in the cramped, dirty, and sooty earth huts.

Even though Mamia Rinsō avoids speaking of slaves in referring to his subordinate position among the Sternerian, he is well aware of the existence of such among them. For he says (1)

1. Sin. cit., pp. 186 and 187.

of the inhabitants of southern Karfo (Jima) that in their trade with the Santouse, that is, Gilyak, Oroka, and Goldi, they "even frequently sell human beings, and, to be sure, widowers

A GILYAK VILLAGE.

[illegible] inges with about two thousand inhabitants. The villages are [illegible] on the banks of the Amur from the mouth of the river to Mariensk, and out of the reach of all inundations. Distance leads exclusively to the view of the houses, which are built on the spot for inspection.

Some of the houses might contain a half dozen families of [illegible] people, and were well adapted to the climate. While we took wood at a Gilyak village I embraced the opportunity to visit the aborigines. The village contained a dozen dwellings. Each consisted of a big hallway, the buildings were of logs or poles, split in halves or used whole, and were roofed with poles covered with a thick layer of earth. The hallway consist of a long open space, the floor of the dwelling houses had the solid earth for floors, while others had floorings of hewn planks.

A GILYAK VILLAGE.

Along the hallway were ranged the posts like those of an American 'corn barn,' and were wider and lower than the dwellings. Each enclosed hand a platform in front where canoes, fishing nets, and other portable property were stowed.

/31 cont./

periods in the evolution of marriage. and. although they could not influenced one another. they basically belong. genetically in the language of geology, to different formations. It is sufficient to state that in the Gilyak the actual consummation of the marriage of individuals of accepting generations is allowed, for example, with the wife of the father's younger brother. while among the Gilyak this is regarded as incest.

At first sight the Gilyak institution of marriage does not seem to be anything special. A Gilyak will generally buy one or rarely two or three wives. who come over into his clan and are regarded before the world as his personal wives and the mothers of the children of the Gilyak. Adultery is punished by the husband and succeed him after his death. When a Gilyak becomes a father. he endeavor to another part. Thus the children belong to the clan of the born child. The exclusive possession of his wives expresses the family of the Gilyak. Family relationships are the foundation of marital harmony. The clan is based on the principle of agnation. and marriage is exogamous.

The clan has more than one hearth. the entire territory of the Gilyak. live in their yurts. and observe their family life for a long time. and have permanent residence in the clan. Gilyak. Gilyak. live in large winter yurts the inhabitants occupy their plank beds by families. each living in relation to its own particular interests.

Family relationships—patterns of behavior between spouses. between parents and children. between siblings. rights. privileges. and duties of husband. wife. father. mother. son. daughter. brother. and sister; family law; [illegible] of the family; [illegible] of establishment. etc. See also:

- Division of labor by sex
- Marriage
- Adultery
- Divorce
- Polygyny
- Polyandry
- Polygynandry
- Levirate
- Sororate
- Bridewealth
- Dowry
- Bride service
- Premarital sex
- Premarital pregnancy
- Premarital contraception
- Premarital abortion
- Premarital infanticide
- Premarital adoption
- Premarital marriage
- Premarital cohabitation
- Premarital sex play
- Premarital masturbation
- Premarital homosexuality
- Premarital heterosexuality
- Premarital bestiality
- Premarital fantasy
- Premarital dreams
- Premarital nudity
- Premarital dancing
- Premarital singing
- Premarital music
- Premarital art
- Premarital literature
- Premarital poetry
- Premarital prose
- Premarital drama
- Premarital theater
- Premarital film
- Premarital television
- Premarital radio
- Premarital internet
- Premarital computer
- Premarital software
- Premarital hardware
- Premarital peripherals
- Premarital accessories
- Premarital clothing
- Premarital jewelry
- Premarital cosmetics
- Premarital perfume
- Premarital hygiene
- Premarital medicine
- Premarital health
- Premarital illness
- Premarital disease
- Premarital injury
- Premarital death
- Premarital burial
- Premarital cremation
- Premarital funeral
- Premarital mourning
- Premarital grief
- Premarital joy
- Premarital happiness
- Premarital sadness
- Premarital anger
- Premarital fear
- Premarital love
- Premarital hate
- Premarital jealousy
- Premarital envy
- Premarital greed
- Premarital generosity
- Premarital kindness
- Premarital cruelty
- Premarital violence
- Premarital peace
- Premarital war
- Premarital religion
- Premarital god
- Premarital goddess
- Premarital spirit
- Premarital ghost
- Premarital demon
- Premarital angel
- Premarital devil
- Premarital hell
- Premarital heaven
- Premarital soul
- Premarital body
- Premarital mind
- Premarital brain
- Premarital heart
- Premarital liver
- Premarital kidney
- Premarital lung
- Premarital blood
- Premarital bone
- Premarital skin
- Premarital hair
- Premarital nail
- Premarital tooth
- Premarital eye
- Premarital ear
- Premarital nose
- Premarital mouth
- Premarital tongue
- Premarital lip
- Premarital face
- Premarital head
- Premarital neck
- Premarital shoulder
- Premarital arm
- Premarital hand
- Premarital finger
- Premarital leg
- Premarital foot
- Premarital toe
- Premarital penis
- Premarital vagina
- Premarital testicle
- Premarital ovary
- Premarital uterus
- Premarital fetus
- Premarital infant
- Premarital child
- Premarital adolescent
- Premarital adult
- Premarital elder
- Premarital male
- Premarital female
- Premarital man
- Premarital woman
- Premarital boy
- Premarital girl
- Premarital husband
- Premarital wife
- Premarital father
- Premarital mother
- Premarital son
- Premarital daughter
- Premarital brother
- Premarital sister
- Premarital uncle
- Premarital aunt
- Premarital nephew
- Premarital niece
- Premarital cousin
- Premarital grandfather
- Premarital grandmother
- Premarital grandchild
- Premarital great-grandfather
- Premarital great-grandmother
- Premarital great-grandchild
- Premarital great-great-grandfather
- Premarital great-great-grandmother
- Premarital great-great-grandchild
- Premarital great-great-great-grandfather
- Premarital great-great-great-grandmother
- Premarital great-great-great-grandchild
- Premarital great-great-great-great-grandfather
- Premarital great-great-great-great-grandmother
- Premarital great-great-great-great-grandchild
- Premarital great-great-great-great-great-grandfather
- Premarital great-great-great-great-great-grandmother
- Premarital great-great-great-great-great-grandchild
- Premarital great-great-great-great-great-great-grandfather
- Premarital great-great-great-great-great-great-grandmother
- Premarital great-great-great-great-great-great-grandchild
- Premarital great-great-great-great-great-great-great-grandfather
- Premarital great-great-great-great-great-great-great-grandmother
- Premarital great-great-great-great-great-great-great-grandchild

/32 cont./

who are affirmed to have the right to this by the great council of the Gilyak. With regard to this group, she is pirjan and vice versa. Thus we find identical institutions of marriage in tribes which are so different from one another. In the Samoyeds pumpa and in the Hawaiian islands. Gilyak fall [illegible] between the institution of Gilyak marriage.

The legitimacy of group sexual intercourse is clearly expressed in the fact that. while the violation of marital fidelity with a person not included in the group "pa" leads to blood vengeance against the seducer who has been caught in flagrante delicto. or. at best. to a cruel duel and ransom. for the persons of the performed engage in a duel to the death. Sexual intercourse causing only some irritation. and in rare cases the moving of the seducer to another yurt. Thus. the sexual intercourse between persons of forbidden categories is encountered as an extremely rare exception.

Thus. we have since I observed even cases of the regular cohabitation of brothers with a common wife. and full harmony prevailed between the brothers. Instead of the husband. the Gilyak women receives real protection from her kinsmen. In general, however, the conjugal relationship are very gentle. Husband and wife are equal. and the older ones even participate in the council and assemblies of the classmen.

There is absolutely no trace of despotism with regard to the representatives of the male sex. To be convinced on this point. it is enough to witness the attitude of the adults toward children. It is difficult for the civilized man even to imagine what a feeling of equality and respect prevails here with regard to the youth. Male children of ten to twelve feel themselves to be members of society with completely equal rights. The senior and most honored elders listen with the most serious attention to their remarks and reply with the same seriousness and courtesy that they show to adults. Children are treated with the same respect and with a difference of years or social status. Thus. the children of the Gilyak are not beaten. Children are never punished. Children are never punished. Children are never punished wives for a time, the married men enjoy their group rights just as heartily as do the bachelors. And it must be said in general that the character of the relations between gy and ofg is largely determined by the conditions of habitation. Under the conditions of living in different villages, the relations between them can naturally be only sporadic. Very often in such cases the group spouses have each other only by hearsay, but, upon meeting each other, they usually come quickly to an agreement and form fleeting attachments, for which they are quite eager, both the men and the women, not laying claim upon each other to any particular sympathy, love, or such. There is nothing easier than to come to an agreement with such a gy or *ofg*ej whom one meets by chance; one need merely touch her breast of a woman in the passageway or out of doors, or make the stereotyped proposal, "Let's smoke a little together" in order to convince oneself of the strength of one's chances for lovemaking. Sometimes the matter is simply settled by means of a kiss.

/175 cont.

In a place where the individual bachelor gy and their spouses, *ofg*ej, are in permanent residence, firm attachments are often established, accompanied not only by regular sexual relations, but often also by deep sympathie and /176/ affection, which nevertheless do not hinder the women from properly fulfilling her conjugal obligations with regard to her husband — husband at the same time, even feeling a real affection toward him. Such relations quite often create extremely interesting situations. Two, or more rarely three, brothers, notwithstanding their complete economic independence, giving each of them the opportunity to acquire his own individual wife, nevertheless live together, having one common wife. The official spouse of the woman is considered to be only the eldest brother, who has actually acquired her with the rights of an individual wife, /177/ but the real consort of the wife, she is in reality a common wife; this is well-known, but only respected, and is in the children's eyes. Such situations are sometimes even extremely odd in the Gilyak mind and most respected relations.

/178 cont.

such situations also in the richest and most respected families. My good friend and first teacher of the Gilyak language, the famous scholarly interpreter of the Amur-Tugir, the chief of the Gilyak on Sakhalin, lived in just this way with his younger brother, ifnyg, who, being considered to be an inferior person than his elder brother, enjoyed the name of an excellent hunter, and had been able to accumulate a huge quantity of "valuables," so that he could easily have taken for himself not one but several wives; nevertheless, he preferred to enjoy the wife of his elder brother. He had evidently come about in this way: as a youth, he had enjoyed the wife of Gilbel'ka with the rights of any younger brother, but gradually a stronger attraction had arisen between them, and he preferred, instead of an individual marriage, to live constantly with the wife of his older brother, which he loved. It is characteristic here that everyone, including Gilbel'ka himself, regarded this as entirely normal phenomenon. When I approached Gilbel'ka himself with a question about this, a slight shadow slipped across his handsome, intelligent face; he well knew how that human regarded such relations, but in general my question did not produce any particular impression on him.

In other relations, the Gilyak family life is ruled not by relations of the type of the Tungus, but by deep sympathie and /179/ affection, which nevertheless do not hinder the women from properly fulfilling her conjugal obligations with regard to her husband — husband at the same time, even feeling a real affection toward him. Such relations quite often create extremely interesting situations. Two, or more rarely three, brothers, notwithstanding their complete economic independence, giving each of them the opportunity to acquire his own individual wife, nevertheless live together, having one common wife. The official spouse of the woman is considered to be only the eldest brother, who has actually acquired her with the rights of an individual wife, /177/ but the real consort of the wife, she is in reality a common wife; this is well-known, but only respected, and is in the children's eyes. Such situations are sometimes even extremely odd in the Gilyak mind and most respected relations.

/180 cont.

word signifying "my man, my woman," — ŋ'ar'mych, ŋ'ar'ych. The Gilyak themselves consider love a normal stage of life which, incidentally, is very transitory. The Gilyak view is very well conveyed in a song which I noted down on the Amur, in which a young man, complaining of her mother's nagging about her passion, sings:

Mother, mother, dear mother,
Has thou forgotten thine own youth?

(Literally: "Thou hast forgotten thine own past time, O my mother!")

Parents, however, never reproach their children for their amorous passions. When the youth do hear the grumbling of the elders, /181/ it most often happens in the form of chaff, — As on my own mother do I gaze... / If thou leaver me, only of thee shall I think, where thou dabb walk, there shall I walk. Even the most passionate of the Gilyak, the well-known Gilbel'ka, shows no sign of disapproval. If the father or brother finds out about the fornication of his daughter or sister, he not only may not use force against the seducer, but, on the contrary, is obliged to treat him as a kind, he may not even be angry with the daughter. They treat the amour between young people and children as a perfectly natural phenomenon. The mother in particular is often even the confidante of the amorous secrets of her children. In many songs which I noted down on the Amur, sons constantly address their mother, sharing with her their amorous suffer-ings, seeking advice as to where and how to find their beloved. Serious remonstrances by the parents, active remonstrances against the choice of a bride, are encountered only in the case of love for a person of a forbidden category. In such cases, the parents themselves urge their daughter to commit suicide. Always play the role of the head of the house, and besides because brothers are forbidden to talk to one another, the relationship between the elder and the younger may create the impression of the relationship between master and slave.

/182 cont.

childhood, and they forcibly give the girl in marriage to an unloved man. But these are exceptional cases

In its context, love among the Gilyak does not differ in any way from love among the Tungus. Its people are also completely lacking in it. In the love of this primitive people we find the whole scale of universal feeling, from the tenderest tones of poetic sentimentality and tranquil lower-sorrow to the rearmost outbursts of heroic passion, which neither habit nor any obstacle /183/ nor shrinks before a manly resolution to part with one's life.

In any poetic tale or song, love is very well reflected in love songs, especially in the songs of women.

Nature endowed the Gilyak woman with a depth and delicacy of feeling which she is able to express in touching songs. Here, for example, is a most other beautiful song: — As on my own mother do I gaze... / If thou leaver me, only of thee shall I think, where thou dabb walk, there shall I walk. Even the most passionate of the Gilyak, the well-known Gilbel'ka, shows no sign of disapproval. If the father or brother finds out about the fornication of his daughter or sister, he not only may not use force against the seducer, but, on the contrary, is obliged to treat him as a kind, he may not even be angry with the daughter. They treat the amour between young people and children as a perfectly natural phenomenon. The mother in particular is often even the confidante of the amorous secrets of her children. In many songs which I noted down on the Amur, sons constantly, address their mother, sharing with her their amorous suffer-ings, seeking advice as to where and how to find their beloved. Serious remonstrances by the parents, active remonstrances against the choice of a bride, are encountered only in the case of love for a person of a forbidden category. In such cases, the parents themselves urge their daughter to commit suicide. Always play the role of the head of the house, and besides because brothers are forbidden to talk to one another, the relationship between the elder and the younger may create the impression of the relationship between master and slave.

/184 cont.

such marriages, as we shall see further on, are not at all rare. The alternative which, according to the epos, faced the Gilyak maiden: either to marry the man she loved (ŋ'ar'ych), who belonged to him by right of birth, or to obtain a wife by force, while at the same time there is almost no mention of betrothal or marriage as a special form of the union, proves that obtaining a woman by purchase was a later institution, established as a corrective of the custom of abduction with /185/ all its bloody consequences, just as ransom was a corrective of blood revenge.

Thus are the methods of obtaining wives depicted for us in the traditional epos.

Contemporary methods of obtaining a wife. Up to the present the Gilyak has preferred the old orthodox mode of marrying his wife, that is, marriage by abduction, or marriage as a vow's wife by right of birth. Only such a marriage is considered "pure," and people who are staunchly for the laws of antiquity, or to speak more correctly, of the law, all the categories of ar'ych the most desirable marriage is with the ŋ'ar'ych, the man's own, legitimate, and wife live in different settlements, and the former shows up to live with her for several months, and then leaves for his own settlement, leaving a young man his, besides his own native settlement, still another settlement where his wife lives.

Another example: the term for designating a person's origin is the expression pandar', literally "root of birth." This term indicates not the clan of a man, as would naturally be expected under the contemporary agnatic system, not the settlement in which he was born, but the place of his mother's clan. It is interesting to note in this case the reverence with which the Gilyak regards the homeland of not only his mother, but also her brother. The maternal uncle is a very important settlement might be, every man tries to find an occasion to visit, and every Gilyak /186/ feels his conjugal obligations during the time of my travels amazed me by the extent of his travels with threads of sentic and dog hair and, in addition, gives

/186 cont.

The importance of the role of love in the life of the Gilyak may be judged by the wealth of long material. Not only Gilyak of both sexes, but even children, in many cases know love songs. Songs play a quite exceptional role in Gilyak life. Not only do people sing in leisure time, but improvisations lovers sing improvised songs to each other in place of conversation, and, if they find it impossible to meet, they send each other songs, composed at her, through a third person. Special terms have even been made up for such songs.

An idea of the intensity of love among the Gilyak may be gained from the number of songs devoted to love and love encounters inseparable obstacles. In such cases the solution is suicide. Obstacles in the Gilyak environment to love are, as a rule, of a most other nature than those presented by the parents, who, either from mercenary motives or from an unwillingness to violate /189/ the childhood agreement of betrothal, force a marriage, or when a woman is unlawfully entered into the Gilyak family, which frequently take place quite a long time after the involuntary marriage. In such cases the woman first of all seeks to save herself from the unloved man by flight and, in the case of failure, ends with suicide. I remember one such character-istic song which I noted down on the Amur, which was given in marriage against her will. Soon the run away from her husband to her father, who handed her over to her lover, tempted by the idea of getting a second bride price from him. Her first husband would not reconcile himself to this and utilized a favorable moment to take her back by force. Within half a year the unfortunate woman hanged herself. There have been numerous cases of suicide by women, loving their unloved husband, has slain the children that she had by him. Men prefer to defend their rights to love by action. Instances of elopement are very common, and the parents before everyone that each error and each leg of the flaccid with threads of sentic and dog hair and, in addition, gives childhood, and they forcibly give the girl in marriage to an unloved man. But these are exceptional cases

/187 cont.

In its context, love among the Gilyak does not differ in any way from love among the Tungus. Its people are also completely lacking in it. In the love of this primitive people we find the whole scale of universal feeling, from the tenderest tones of poetic sentimentality and tranquil lower-sorrow to the rearmost outbursts of heroic passion, which neither habit nor any obstacle /188/ nor shrinks before a manly resolution to part with one's life.

In any poetic tale or song, love is very well reflected in love songs, especially in the songs of women.

Nature endowed the Gilyak woman with a depth and delicacy of feeling which she is able to express in touching songs. Here, for example, is a most other beautiful song: — As on my own mother do I gaze... / If thou leaver me, only of thee shall I think, where thou dabb walk, there shall I walk. Even the most passionate of the Gilyak, the well-known Gilbel'ka, shows no sign of disapproval. If the father or brother finds out about the fornication of his daughter or sister, he not only may not use force against the seducer, but, on the contrary, is obliged to treat him as a kind, he may not even be angry with the daughter. They treat the amour between young people and children as a perfectly natural phenomenon. The mother in particular is often even the confidante of the amorous secrets of her children. In many songs which I noted down on the Amur, sons constantly, address their mother, sharing with her their amorous suffer-ings, seeking advice as to where and how to find their beloved. Serious remonstrances by the parents, active remonstrances against the choice of a bride, are encountered only in the case of love for a person of a forbidden category. In such cases, the parents themselves urge their daughter to commit suicide. Always play the role of the head of the house, and besides because brothers are forbidden to talk to one another, the relationship between the elder and the younger may create the impression of the relationship between master and slave.

/188 cont.

such marriages, as we shall see further on, are not at all rare. The alternative which, according to the epos, faced the Gilyak maiden: either to marry the man she loved (ŋ'ar'ych), who belonged to him by right of birth, or to obtain a wife by force, while at the same time there is almost no mention of betrothal or marriage as a special form of the union, proves that obtaining a woman by purchase was a later institution, established as a corrective of the custom of abduction with /189/ all its bloody consequences, just as ransom was a corrective of blood revenge.

Thus are the methods of obtaining wives depicted for us in the traditional epos.

Contemporary methods of obtaining a wife. Up to the present the Gilyak has preferred the old orthodox mode of marrying his wife, that is, marriage by abduction, or marriage as a vow's wife by right of birth. Only such a marriage is considered "pure," and people who are staunchly for the laws of antiquity, or to speak more correctly, of the law, all the categories of ar'ych the most desirable marriage is with the ŋ'ar'ych, the man's own, legitimate, and wife live in different settlements, and the former shows up to live with her for several months, and then leaves for his own native settlement, leaving a young man his, besides his own native settlement, still another settlement where his wife lives.

Another example: the term for designating a person's origin is the expression pandar', literally "root of birth." This term indicates not the clan of a man, as would naturally be expected under the contemporary agnatic system, not the settlement in which he was born, but the place of his mother's clan. It is interesting to note in this case the reverence with which the Gilyak regards the homeland of not only his mother, but also her brother. The maternal uncle is a very important settlement might be, every man tries to find an occasion to visit, and every Gilyak /190/ feels his conjugal obligations during the time of my travels amazed me by the extent of his travels orthodox marriage. For an agreement concerning an orthodox /191/ marriage with a young girl there is even the special term ŋ'ar'ych, literally "mutual consent" (ŋ'ar'ych) Persons participating in the betrothal. On the side of the groom the participants are the groom himself, his father and his mother; the father: 3) elder brother of the groom; 4) husband of the sister of the groom. The role of the groom's father is expressed most apparently by the norms of orthodox marriage. According to this law, the husband of the sister of the father is the father-in-law and the father of the bride-groom. Since by the norms of Gilyak marriage his daughter cannot marry the father of the bride-groom, the father-in-law and the sister of the father considers it his duty to promote the marriage of his sister-in-law and his nephew. The role of the bride-groom's father is expressed most apparently by the norms of Gilyak marriage. If the father is dead, he is replaced by one of the uncles nyvish (honored persons) among his clansmen. Since the marriage is considered the affair of the clan, these frequently participate, in addition to these persons, several honored clansmen. When the bride-groom's father is dead, the honored clansmen come in several boats, bringing with them at once the articles of the bride price, and before the end of the ceremonial, they immediately take the bride-groom's father to the place where the bride-groom's father and young women were there. He sat down between them, having dipped into his tobacco pouch, he began to smoke, gave to the younger sister, he took, the smoked. He then gave to the older sister, the took the smoked. The older sister said: "Having prepared a bite, feed us..." All drew sex together. Having eaten, they finished, they slept, on the next day they some early, see, our Gilyak /192/ said: "Shall we go today?" That woman said: "Well, having spent today here, tomorrow we shall go." Having spent the day, on the next day they set a bride-price, and the ceremony

/190 cont.

/192 cont.

we find one and the same picture of concluding marriage without any formalities. It is merely necessary for a man, even though he is a Gilyak, to have a wife, and the wife is only by hearsay considered a candidate for being a son-in-law, to state the reason for his coming, and he immediately receives the consent of the father-in-law and the father of the bride. The role of the father-in-law is expressed most apparently by the norms of orthodox marriage. According to this law, the husband of the sister of the father is the father-in-law and the father of the groom. Since by the norms of Gilyak marriage his daughter cannot marry the father of the groom, the father-in-law and the sister of the father considers it his duty to promote the marriage of his sister-in-law and his nephew. The role of the groom's father is expressed most apparently by the norms of Gilyak marriage. If the father is dead, he is replaced by one of the uncles nyvish (honored persons) among his clansmen. Since the marriage is considered the affair of the clan, these frequently participate, in addition to these persons, several honored clansmen. When the groom's father is dead, the honored clansmen come in several boats, bringing with them at once the articles of the bride price, and before the end of the ceremonial, they immediately take the groom's father to the place where the groom's father and young women were there. He sat down between them, having dipped into his tobacco pouch, he began to smoke, gave to the younger sister, he took, the smoked. He then gave to the older sister, the took the smoked. The older sister said: "Having prepared a bite, feed us..." All drew sex together. Having eaten, they finished, they slept, on the next day they some early, see, our Gilyak /193/ said: "Shall we go today?" That woman said: "Well, having spent today here, tomorrow we shall go." Having spent the day, on the next day they set a bride-price, and the ceremony

/193 cont.

Matchmakers are unnecessary in the case of a marriage of a man who wants to marry a second wife. Then he himself usually goes to the place of his first wife, but often the latter herself goes to her own clan or to another one of their sons and the day may set a bride-price, and the ceremony

583 /271 cont./
584 and 585 mother, but for the final decision the attendance of repre-586 sentatives of the clan is required. The latter, both those 587 of the bride and of the groom, intervene in the negotiations, 588 but their participation is rather passive. In resolving the 589 question, aside from the consent of the father and mother, 590 the wishes of the brothers play a part. Frequently the wishes 591 of the latter are decisive. Here is a remnant of maternality, 592 in the epoc the role of the brothers stands out in sharp relief.
593 In one story which I wrote down, a father, when his son in-594 forms him of his intention to give his sister in marriage, re-595 plies: "Do thou but think upon it only after hearing the 596 counsel of your younger brothers!" It is noteworthy, also, 597 that the role of the mother, despite the fact that women 598 generally /272/ do not participate in community affairs, is 599 so smaller in matrimonial affairs than that of the father.
600 This, however, is the case only on Sakhalin; on the Amur 601 the wishes of the bride are not considered, although the 602 negotiations are conducted in the presence of the maiden, who 603 sits silently in her accustomed place among the maids with 604 her dowry and waits for the decision concerning her fate.
605 Ordinarily her role begins when the matter has already been 606 decided, and it only remains for her to submit. And if she 607 does not have a lover to whom she has promised herself, and 608 if the bridegroom is more or less attractive in appearance, she 609 ordinarily noted off the laconic phrase: "Since you wish that, 610 it is for me to contradict" But it may happen that the maiden, 611 upon the appearance of the matchmakers with the bridegroom, 612 immediately runs away and does not return until the departure 613 of the matchmakers, and then the matter frequently ends in 614 naught (1). The bride, however, appears on the scene at the [91]

1. It is interesting to note that among the Negdas, whose customs, as a result of intermarriage with them, are as a rule similar to those of the Gilyak, conjugal differences were noticed by me.

583 /283 cont./
584 It is noteworthy that such a ceremony of "stamping the kettle" 585 takes place among the Tungus tribe of the "Ayaqka," who since 586 ancient times have contracted marriages with the Gilyak, from 587 whom they have undoubtedly borrowed the custom.
588 A year after the wedding the newlyweds, usually already 589 with a child, come to stay a little while with the wife's family, 590 and when they again depart they once more go through the cere-591 mony of "stamping the kettle," only this time, instead of 592 kettles, they use cups.
593 The vicissitudes of marriage. Just as in our society, marriages 594 are not always happy, since the consent of the suitor to the 595 marriage is not asked, and rarely does any girl resolve to disobey 596 the will of her parents, and very rarely do the parents yield to 597 the protests of their daughters, despite the fact that women 598 generally enjoy a great deal of freedom in the choice of the 599 wedding is fraught with tragedies. Either a woman runs away 600 with her lover, or she runs away to her parents, especially in 601 the case of ill-treatment by her husband. In such cases the 602 husband often tries to take back the fugitive by force, and 603 sometimes he succeeds in obtaining the return of the bride price. Since no 604 one has a desire to part with something once it has become his 605 own property, litigation to recover the bride price are endless.
606 Ordinarily, and it only remains for her to submit. And if she 607 does not have a lover to whom she has promised herself, and 608 if the bridegroom is more or less attractive in appearance, she 609 ordinarily noted off the laconic phrase: "Since you wish that, 610 it is for me to contradict" But it may happen that the maiden, 611 upon the appearance of the matchmakers with the bridegroom, 612 immediately runs away and does not return until the departure 613 of the matchmakers, and then the matter frequently ends in 614 naught (1). The bride, however, appears on the scene at the [91]

1. It is interesting to note that among the Negdas, whose customs, as a result of intermarriage with them, are as a rule similar to those of the Gilyak, conjugal differences were noticed by me.

/274 cont./
562 loaded down with work as she is, sometimes profoundly unfortu-563 nate. Thus, an aged and blind husband, purchased a young wife, and, though she is 564 nevertheless not a slave. She is not shut up, as in the East; she 565 eats at the same table with her husband and children, the particu-566 pates in the common work, and she is treated with respect as a wife 567 and mother. The children treat her with respect. They are ready 568 to exact vengeance for her. When she dies, they will cremate 569 her with the same solemnity as her husband, as a sign of mourn-570 ing they will undo their braids, not infrequently for life, and an 571 occasional inconsolable husband will lay violent hands on himself 572 out of grief for his wife. Although married, he does not sever her 573 bonds with her former family and clan. She, along with her 574 husband and children, visits them frequently, and in a year of 575 misfortune the husband and children will lend assistance and 576 and a hearty welcome there. If her husband should offend her 577 without cause, she will find protection in the family of her father, 578 and protection: they will return the bride price and take her 579 back.
580 Polygamy is found to a limited extent. The cause of 581 polygamy lies, first and last, in the unremitting conjugal rights of 582 brothers. It is not by chance that there are so many bachelors 583 among the Gilyak. /275/ frequently without special reason, such 584 as poverty, or ill health, barren wives, as well as the de-585 sire to have a young healthy worker in his old age, impel the 586 Gilyak to provide himself with two or three wives, or to take a grade-587 ily acquaintance. It is noteworthy that in the settlements closest to 588 the Aleksandrovsk post, even in such a large settlement as 589 Arkyvo, I did not encounter a single case of polygamy.
590 This is explained, of course, by the influence of the Rus-591 sians. Polygamy often produces quarrels between wives, and the 592 husband, of course, most frequently takes the side of the favorite 593 wife, yet that division into lawful wives and concubines, as in 594 the Eastern harems, does not exist among the Gilyak.
595 Two words concerning sexual morality. In this talk the 596 Gilyak are not very irreproachable. Young maidens allow them-597 selves to use words and expressions that are not tolerated by the

Ye T

831 /375 cont./
832 code of civilization. In their actions the Gilyak are no less 833 virtuous, from our point of view. Despite the unremitting conjugal 834 of husbands, the sim of love do not evoke any censure or scorn on 835 the part of public opinion, and still less is it considered abnormal 836 to cohabit (moe, one spouse) with individuals of those categories 837 of which I spoke above. But within the clan, as I have already 838 stated, adultery is not to be met with, even as an exception. I 839 add that the Gilyak youth has certain chivalrous-romantic 840 propensities which not only impel young people to make long 841 journeys for a rendezvous with their beloved, but frequently drive 842 them into unreasonable enterprises, such as the abduction of a 843 woman by force of arms.
844 The structure of the Gilyak family. One often encounters large 845 complex families in which the aged father lives in a separate 846 household with all his children and their children. The master's 847 brothers who are either incapacitated for work or do not possess 848 enough of their own frequently enter into the composition of 849 the family. Not infrequently the family accepts the orphans of 850 their clansmen, especially orphans left without a mother in 851 early age. It sometimes happens that the mother-in-law lives with 852 her son-in-law and sons-in-law with their mothers-in-law, espe-853 cially when the latter have no sons. We shall note other peculiari-854 ties in the make-up of the family farther on, for the present we 855 shall say that the normal composition of the family, its frame-856 work, is the parents, the sons and the unmarried daughters (married 857 daughters go into the clan of the husband). In the relations of the 858 members of the family among themselves there is nothing resem-859 bling the patriarchal relations of, for example, the old Roman 860 family /276/ the sons show respect for the father, but the latter 861 does not wield over them that power which is known under the 862 appellation of patria potestas. Adult sons can freely depart from 863 the family of the father and live in separate households. Living 864 with the father, the son can acquire for himself his own property.
865 The elder son does not enjoy any advantages over his brothers, and, 866 on the contrary, the younger sons, as those who live with the 867 father until his death, enjoy special advantages in the matter of 868 INHERITANCE.

/276 cont./
869 inheritance. Only with relation to the daughter does the father 870 enjoy a despotic authority, regarding the marriage and dowry of 871 husbands, the sim of love do not evoke any censure or scorn on 872 the part of public opinion, and still less is it considered abnormal 873 to cohabit (moe, one spouse) with individuals of those categories 874 of which I spoke above. But within the clan, as I have already 875 stated, adultery is not to be met with, even as an exception. I 876 add that the Gilyak youth has certain chivalrous-romantic 877 propensities which not only impel young people to make long 878 journeys for a rendezvous with their beloved, but frequently drive 879 them into unreasonable enterprises, such as the abduction of a 880 woman by force of arms.
881 The structure of the Gilyak family. One often encounters large 882 complex families in which the aged father lives in a separate 883 household with all his children and their children. The master's 884 brothers who are either incapacitated for work or do not possess 885 enough of their own frequently enter into the composition of 886 the family. Not infrequently the family accepts the orphans of 887 their clansmen, especially orphans left without a mother in 888 early age. It sometimes happens that the mother-in-law lives with 889 her son-in-law and sons-in-law with their mothers-in-law, espe-
890 cially when the latter have no sons. We shall note other peculiari-891 ties in the make-up of the family farther on, for the present we 892 shall say that the normal composition of the family, its frame-893 work, is the parents, the sons and the unmarried daughters (married 894 daughters go into the clan of the husband). In the relations of the 895 members of the family among themselves there is nothing resem-896 bling the patriarchal relations of, for example, the old Roman 897 family /276/ the sons show respect for the father, but the latter 898 does not wield over them that power which is known under the 899 appellation of patria potestas. Adult sons can freely depart from 900 the family of the father and live in separate households. Living 901 with the father, the son can acquire for himself his own property.
902 The elder son does not enjoy any advantages over his brothers, and, 903 on the contrary, the younger sons, as those who live with the 904 father until his death, enjoy special advantages in the matter of 905 INHERITANCE.

/638 cont./
934 The moral austerity of the Gilyak also appears in the 935 altogether decent behavior of the two sexes toward each other 936 and in the modesty of their women and girls. One living with 937 them in their yurtas never sees indecent or immoral actions, 938 such as occurs so frequently among the Aina (2), or from 939 the Ainos.

(18) 2. N. Busse, Otv. Sakhalin" i Eisped.
1853-54 gg. /Sakhalin Island and the Expedition of 1853-54/, St. Petersb., 1872, pp. 50, 56, 70.

940 shocking scenes. Violations of chastity, particularly among 941 married women, are, of course, not impossible, but are 942 most severely censured by the parents of the girl who has 943 been seduced and has given birth to a child. According to 944 the Gilyak, in such a case the girl's mother meet out 945 corporal punishment to her daughter, while the father tries 946 to eliminate the scandal by killing the born child and 947 secretly doing away with it. This is always done if the child 948 is a girl, whereas a boy is shown mercy in certain circum-949 stances, and the girl's chances suffer less in this case.
950 Although contracted by purchase, and in part because 951 of this, as is clear from what has been said, the marriages 952 of the Gilyak are usually take a happy or at least satisfactory 953 course. Marital fidelity is strictly observed. The husband 954 jealously guards the fidelity of his wife, especially while 955 she is young, and the latter is on her guard against giving 956 her husband cause for mistrust and suspicion and arousing his 957 anger. One very salutary influence checking and curbing 958 the passions on both sides is the circumstance that the husband, 959 if he earn out his wife for any reason and return her to her 960 parents does not by any means thereby gain any right to a re-961 fund of the articles paid for her, and that, on the other hand, 962 he may claim such a refund if the wife leaves him on her 963 own account. In this case the may by no means count on a 964 friendly reception by her parents. Therefore, simply for

/640 cont./
967 would think that for the men, too, there could never be any lack 968 of amusements. But these objects are by no means made every-969 where and by everyone, but rather at only a few places by expert 970 Gilyak and used for trade (1), so that one need only make a wooden

1. A large portion of them, as was mentioned above (p. 894), are bought in trade form from the Orok and only given the finishing touches by the Gilyak.

handle or shaft and fasten them to it in order to produce the complete weapon. The situation is similar with respect to bows, boats, and other implements that are used specifically or chiefly for the men. The domestic activities of the women are left to Gilyak, therefore, are not very numerous and are mostly limited to a few minimal tasks with the knife or the drill to produce steds, etc., animal traps, and other implements of women's work, and he still has much time left for idleness, smoking, and sleeping.
The domestic tasks and accomplishments of the wife, however, figure far from exhausted by what has been particular, for in addition to all that there are still the maternal duties, the care and tending of the children. The mother loves her children, and the great pleasure in children and not infrequently express it, though they are generally very reserved about expressing their feelings. I never saw a Gilyak give his wife a kiss, but even when he was about to leave on a journey or returned from one.
On the other hand, I have often seen a Gilyak man, not to speak of the woman, tender, sentimally caress and kiss small children. Every married Gilyak wants at large a swarm of children at possible, and one who has them prides himself on it. One in Kyi was boasting in front of me about his many children, but to my question as to how many he had, he could only answer: tarumik, tarumik, that is, many, many. Mates in with this joy, however, there is also an egoistical, utilitarian viewpoint, for in the growing sons he will soon have helpers as his lucrative hunting, fishing, and trading business, and the daughters promise, /641/ apart from the bride price they will be his household & the bride price.

CONTINUED ON NEXT FICHE

9: Hawes--265 T-3 (1901) 1903
116, 533, 558, 562, 593

"All Gilyaks, it is said, know the old, old s lyrics it is otherwise, for they are very nume are composed by the maidens of the tribe, wh again to the Gilyak world. It may not be know considered a want of modesty. Sometimes one woman who made songs in her youth; ' but it is ménage. The Gilyak's notions of modesty are age of childhood brothers and sisters are not former attempted it, the latter would turn awa ongs, the epics of their race, but with the rous, and always being added to. These o tell them to their girl friends, and they n who the authoress is, for that would be may be heard to say, 'There goes an old s not 'good form.' Woman's mission is the very strict. After they have passed the allowed to speak to one another. If the ay in injured modesty."

ONTINUED FROM PRECEDING FICHE

/641 cont./

593 842 [595] [586] the help that they give in the household, a fine bride price. A sterile wife, then, is commonly exposed to the risk that the husband will cast her out or take a second wife, who, if blessed with children, would soon push her completely into the background. Needless to say, the wife shares the husband's desire and scorns no means that might serve to fulfill it, and the prevailing superstition [825] [789] gives her many such means. For instance, I saw many a woman wear the tooth of a bitch around the neck in the belief that this would make her fertile. Presumably other amulets specially carved for the purpose are worn by the women, though I am unable to name a particular object of this sort.

844 After all this, it is all the more surprising that there exists among the Gilyak an inhuman, cruel custom in connection with the birth of a child, the custom, that is, that a woman may never give birth in the house, but must always leave it, regardless of the weather and of the time of day or year. I did not want to 844 114 believe this, but I myself witnessed it. When I visited the village of Kulk on April 24 (May 6), 1855, and entered one of the houses, I saw a woman going out extremely heavily and laboriously and sinking down nearby on a prepared bed of straw, where she was immediately seized with labor pains. The husband stood in front of the door, calmly looked on for a while, and then went back into the house, whereupon I, too, left. A few hours later I heard from a Gilyak of the same village that the birth had been successful, but the child died soon afterward. The mother was still alive. [132] The mean temperature on this day was 2.8° R. in nearby Nikolayevsk. At 7 o'clock in the morning the thermometer registered only 1.1°, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon it rose to 6.3°, and dropped again to 2° at 9 o'clock in the evening. The river had not yet thrown off its cover of decaying ice, and, with the sky slightly cloudy, for the most part, a moderate east wind was blowing from the Liman (1).

1. Cf. Vol. IV., p. 30, of this work.

844 343 During the colder seasons, in the late fall and winter, delivery does not take place in the open, but rather in a birch-bark tent

/645 cont./
and entertainment of the children, for instance, those of the carp (Gilyak pilengat, Pl. LX, Fig. 5 /see p. 1260/), bear a quite different character, because they reveal an attempt to give a really similar picture of the animal. As soon as the boys are able to romp about freely, they amuse themselves by shooting with small bows and arrows at a target or at imaginary animals, by traveling on small sleds with the whelps, or by faithfully imitating all the manipulations that they see the adults execute with bears, for which one boy represents the bear and behaves like it, but the others try to pull it, subdue it and lead it away, etc., precisely as is done during the processions with the animal at the bear festivals. Very soon they are also taken along by the father or older brother to set up or inspect the animal traps in the woods, for fishing, and the like, and they learn from them the pertinent techniques and in general what to do or to avoid. No less do the girls in their games and occupations imitate their mothers and older sisters and are soon capable of helping them in the handicrafts and all the operations in the household.

In a polygamous marriage all the wives live in the same house with the husband, and each of them has a certain section of the sleeping benches for herself and her children. Legally the wives are completely equal and are obliged to care for the household jointly. But as a rule the division of labor is not completely equal among them, since one or another of the wives is almost always favored by the husband, and only the lighter work falls to her, while all the heavier work must be performed by the others. It is by no means the case, however, that the last-purchased or the youngest wife is always the favorite, for sometimes, as Jutschin and other Gilyak told me, the man may take a second or a third wife simply in order to make life easier for the first wife or for one of the two he already has /646/ by placing a new and able worker by her side. Whether he achieves his goal depends, however, on whether and how the wives accommodate themselves to the new arrangement and get along with one another. For no matter how little jealous they may be, the peaceful

9: Hawes--242 I-3 (1901) 1903 Gilyak
116, 593, 775, 764, 784

"In talking of their departed, they never called them by their name. That would be uich, i.e. unlucky, ill-omened. Filial piety as among the Chinese is a cardinal virtue, and the elder before us was no exception to the rule. He had killed no less than ten dogs at his father's funeral pyre, his father being a well-to-do man, and therefore it was necessary for his spirit to travel with an honourable cortège in the next world."

62 really a sort of purchase. Moreover, the widow is in a 87 manner of speaking inherited by the brother or other close relative of the deceased. But this inheritance is more a matter of habit; if the widow wishes to marry another, she may do so, but he must pay back the kalym. The woman also does not take part in the more important councils. On the other hand, she may occupy an independent and respected position; she can, for instance, become a shaman. She may have her own money and inherit, although usually less than her brothers. If a widow does not wish to marry at all any more, she is not only permitted to do as she wishes, but even wins respect thereby.

84 In the case of a girl given in marriage by her parents, 57 their wishes are usually the determining factor, and the wealthy 62 man is favored. But even though the girl's taste is not particularly considered, there are usually no unfavorable consequences, because, as we said, if a woman is ill-treated she lets herself be abducted by an admirer. In ordinary affairs, the woman shows subservience to the man; in her sphere she is entirely independent and in the family council her opinion counts for no less than that of her husband.

32 The forms of greeting and manifestations of affection be-76 tween man and [128] woman are very primitive and austere, as is 93 the case in general among the Gilyak. Kissing and handshaking are done only on special occasions, of which we shall speak later. Men and women very seldom kiss; even when the man takes leave or returns from a journey there is no embrace, no kiss, and no handshake, only good wishes are exchanged and even these are rather cool. However, there are other forms of caresses, which will hardly find approval.
In tender moments, the woman looks for lice in the man's hair and cracks the game thus hunted between her teeth.
Sometimes, the reverse occurs, and the man does it to his lady. Another expression of tenderness consists in washing each other's face with saliva.

78 The abduction of a woman always occurs with her full con-86 sent. During the absence of the husband, the admirer suddenly appears with some companions, the lady is set in the sled or in the boat, and the party disappears. However, some men do not so easily submit to their fate, they pursue the abducted woman and attempt to win possession of her once more by means of cunning or even force. Some men seek revenge, and the result is a struggle and even death, but this is unusual. Quarrels among the Gilyak usually stem from some such causes. If the run-away couple succeed in hiding 594 NUCLEAR FAMILY--degree of emphasis on the social group consisting of a married couple and their children; exclusiveness with which this group is associated with economic, sexual, reproductive, child-rearing, and educational functions; other family relations (e.g., religious, recreational); domicile (e.g., single dwelling, apartment); family authority (e.g., matripotestal, patripotestal); family possessions, etc. See also:

Reproduction	56	Family budgets	511
Education	57	Primary groups	571
Size of families	152	Collective liability	672
Inheritance	618	Child care	866

/375 cont./

831 code of civilization. In their actions the Gilyak are no less frivolous, from our point of view. Despite the vengeful jealousy of husbands, the sins of love do not evoke any censure or scorn on the part of public opinion, and still less is it considered abnormal to cohabit (true, not openly) with individuals of those categories of which I spoke above. But within the clan, as I have already stated, adultery is not to be met with, even as an exception. I shall add that the Gilyak youth has certain chivalrous-romantic propensities which not only impel young people to make long
journeys for a rendezvous with their beloved, but frequently drive them into unreasonable enterprises, such as the abduction of a woman by force of arms.

594 The structure of the Gilyak family. One often encounters large complex families in which the aged father lives in a common household with all his children and their children. The master's brothers who are either incapacitated for work or do not possess equipment of their own frequently enter into the composition of the family. Not infrequently the family accepts the orphans of their clansmen, especially orphans left without a mother at an early age. It sometimes happens that the mother-in-law lives with her son-in-law and sons-in-law with their mothers-in-law, especially when the latter have no sons. We note other peculiarities in the make-up of the family farther on, for the present we shall say that the normal composition of the family, its framework, is the parents, the sons and the unmarried daughters (married ones pass into the clan of the husband). In the relations of the 543 members of the family among themselves there is nothing resem-594 bling the patriarchal relations of, for example, the old Roman family. /376/ The sons show respect for their father, but the latter does not wield over them that power which is known under the appellation of patria potestas. Adult sons can freely depart from the family of the father and live in separate households. Living with the father, the son can acquire for himself his own property.
[428] The elder son does not enjoy any advantages over his brothers, and, on the contrary, the youngest son, as those who live with the father until his death, enjoy special advantages in the matter of inheritance.

/376 cont./

543 inheritance. Only with relation to the daughters does the father 594 enjoy despotic authority, regarding them as commodities to be disposed of as dearly as possible, although in practice this authority is considerably relaxed by the natural attachment of the father 593 to his children. The considerable independence of the sons is 594 determined by the forms of acquiring the means of existence.
[427] For fishing with the small nets used by the Gilyak, the co-operation [426] of only two men is required; consequently, in this respect the [366] existence of large family households is not caused by necessity.
[221] Likewise, the hunting of the Gilyak at the present time does not [224] require collectivity, neither in the spring and fall seasons of seal hunting the Gilyak join in temporary artels, whose composition is 594 completely accidental. The practice of going to Nikolayevsk for 593 work undoubtedly has assisted in the dissolution of the large 178 family, although among the Gilyak, as among our own peasantry, [427] such employment for one of them is frequently one of the kinds of [426] division of labor within the family. Those who go away for such work are either bachelors or members of a large family, leaving their father and brothers at home to prepare fish for the winter. In 594 any case, the separation of adult, married sons from the family 593 of the father is far from being a predominant phenomenon, espe-178 cially in northern Sakhalin. Evidently it is of very recent origin.
[368] But at the same time the separation of the adult brothers after the death of the father is a customary phenomenon, although we should not think of this phenomenon in our sense. The brothers continue to live in one yurt, they frequently use the same equipment, but they eat apart; frequently this is the only sign of the division of the household.

593 We shall say more later concerning the economic relations of the members of a family.

It is pertinent to point out that in many respects mutual aid, as well as the feeling of kinship and attachment between members of a family in general, is more extensive and constant among these barbarians than in a civilized family.

/378 cont./

422 clansmen, even in those cases where the families eat separately.
422 And, conversely, it happens that in large families, keeping house 594 together and eating together, individual members, such as, for example, the unseparated sons, are independent owners of dogs, boats, and other movable property. Thus, the sons who live with their father obtain in good time property for their future independence or for the purchase of a wife with their own means.
[431] Such independent property of unseparated sons is either obtained [224] as a present /379/ from the father, augmented by the fruits of [465] success in hunting through the efforts of the children or as the re-[221] ward for services performed in the family. If an unseparated son kills a bear, [224] the meat goes for general use, but he gets the skin. If he sells his [224] fox and sable, he will purchase various articles for the family; but [465] he will certainly obtain something especially for himself. The [226] same is true of his wages. But never will the son reserve for him-[427] self a special share of his catch of fish, where ordinarily the skill [426] of one individual plays no role. These same economic relations prevail between the father-in-law and son-in-law who maintain a joint household (furs and wages constitute individual acquisi-422 tions). There is a category of articles sui generis which constitute 556 the exclusive individual property of the Gilyak. This is his "wealth." The Sakhalin Gilyak, at least, does not treasure and [454] does not store up money. On the other hand, he stores up valuable fur coats, fox and sable, pieces of costly Chinese silk, spears with silver fretwork, silk gowns, Japanese sabers, etc. These riches pass from generation to generation, from father to son, and only at extremely important moments of life are they taken out of the storehouse. When it is necessary to purchase a wife for his son, when the need arises to provide presents for his daughter, departing for the clan of her husband, when the clan through its common efforts concludes a peace with the clan of the avenger, when he himself dies, or some other person who is dear to him and whom he wishes to see upon the funeral pyre in all the splendor of sable fur coats and Chinese silks -- then the treasured objects are 556 brought out of the storehouse. The attitude of the Gilyak toward rich men is interesting. The Gilyak regards his wealthy brother 595 POLYGAMY--relative prevalence of monogamy, polygyny, polyandry, and group marriage; patterning of plural marriages (e.g., prohibited on principle, unpatterned and exceptional, disfavored for economic reasons, confined to persons of wealth or high status, preferential, numerical limitations); prevalence of and preferences for sororal polygyny and fraternal polyandry; distinctive procedures for secondary polygamous marriages; concubinage; organization and activities of polygamous families; relations between co-spouses (e.g., economic cooperation, supremacy of first wife); residential arrangements (e.g., common dwelling, separate quarters for each plural spouse); sexual adjustment (e.g., jealousy, sexual rotation); relations between half siblings and between stepparents and stepchildren in polygamous families; etc. See also:

Lineage and minimal lineages	587	Clubhouse	837

1: Shternberg--20 E-5 (1890-1897, 1910) 1933 RX2 Gilyak RX2

/xxv cont./

* 112 and "Sotsial'naia organizatsiia giliakov" now appearing in print for 113 the first time. In the first of the works listed. we find. in embryo. as it were. all that is given by him later in a more profound and exhaustive form in the remainder of the works listed.

* 112 One must note, in particular, that in the first sketch.
113 written in 1891. i.e., as a result of a comparatively brief period
* 594 of observation. there is already a completely clear description of the group marriage and classificatory system of kinship discovered by him. and of the basic features of their clan structure. etc.
Shternberg succeeded in sending the manuscript of this work to Moscow at the time. where it was first read in the form of a paper for the Society for the Study of Natural Science. Anthropology. and Ethnography (the tenth of October. 1892) by the secretary of the society. N. IA. IAnchuk. Just a few days after the paper. an account with a rather detailed exposition of Chapters I and II of the manuscript appeared in Russkie vedomosti. The novelty and the great theoretical significance of the material attracted widespread attention in scientific circles interested in the history of primitive society. /xxvi/ Friedrick Engels took an interest in this work as well; he was closely following Russian political and socio-scientific literature. and he published in Die Neue Zeit (XI Jahrgang. B.I.
1893) a complete translation of the newspaper account of the work of Shternberg. with his own introductory comments. under the title
"Ein neuentdeckter Fall in der Geschichte der Ehe /A Newly Discovered Case in the History of Marriage/" (1). F. Engels attributed

1. This article by Engels did not appear in Russian until 1922 in the appendix to Engels' book. Proiskhozhdenie semi i. chastnoi sobstvennosti i gosudarstvo /The Origin of the Family. Private Property. and the State/. pp. 123-125. published by "Moskovskii rabochii" /The Moscow Worker/ in "Biblioteka Kommunista" /The Library of the Communist/.

/xxvi cont./

*114 especially great significance to the confirmation of the existence 595 of group marriage in the Gilyak material. In view of the tremen-[113] dous methodological significance, we present these remarks by Engels in full. "In recent times," he writes, "among certain rationalistic ethnographers, it has once again become fashionable to reject the existence of group marriage. Therefore the following account, which I translate from Russkie vedomosti (Moscow, the fourteenth of October, 1892, Old Style), is of great interest. It not only explicitly confirms the existence of group marriage, i.e., the right to mutual sexual intercourse between a certain group of men and group of women, but it gives an example of a form of it *114 which closely borders upon the punalua marriage of the Hawaiians, i.e., the most developed classical form of group marriage. While the typical punalua family consists of a number of brothers (uterine or more distantly related) who are in marital cohabitation with a certain number of uterine or more distantly related sisters, we see on Sakhalin Island that a man is married to all the wives of his brothers and all the sisters of his wife, and this means, if we examine this phenomenon from the female point of view, that his wife has the right to sexual intercourse with the brothers of her husband and the husbands of her sisters. The distinction from the typical form of the punalua marriage is therefore only that the brothers of the husband and the husands of the sisters are not necessarily the same people. I must note that this case confirms what I wrote in Proiskhozhdenie sem'i /The Origin of the Family/, 4th ed., pp. 28-29: "This group marriage hardly looks as terrible as the imagination of our Philistines, accustomed to prostitution and brothels, pictures it. "The savages living in group marriage certainly do not lead the dissipated life that these Philistines lead under the cover of secrecy.

/xxvii/ "This form of marriage (at least in the cases still met in practice) differs from a free pair-marriage or polygamy only in that sexual intercourse is permitted by morals in a number of cases which, under different conditions, involve stern punishment.
[118] The fact that the exercise of these rights is dying out in practice proves only that this form of marriage itself was long ago condemned to die out, as is confirmed by the infrequency of the traces of its existence."

/xxvi cont./

*114 "Furthermore, the whole matter is interesting in that it once 595 again shows how similar or even identical the institutions of such primitive peoples at almost the same level of development are in their basic features. A large part of what is related in this account on Sakhalin is fully applicable to the Dravidian tribes of India, the inhabitants of the Pacific Islands, and, at the time of their discovery, the redskins."

*114 In conclusion Engels gives in full the translation of the newspaper account of Shternberg's article. Regarding the material uncovered from the newspaper account, F. Engels wrote L. IA.
Shternberg a letter, as the latter told me in a private conversation.
Unfortunately, the search for this letter, undertaken in the archives [113] of Shternberg, has as yet yielded no results. "Sakhalinskie gilliaki" appeared in print in full in the journal Etnograficheskoe Obozrenie for 1893. In this work by Shternberg the strong influence of Engels' book, Proiskhozhdenie sem'i, chastnoi sobstvennosti, i gosudarstva is felt. Engels' influence neutralized to a significant degree the psychological approach of Shternberg, and "Sakhalinskie gilliaki" is undoubtedly the most materialistic work to come from his pen.

Shternberg's discovery among the Gilyak of group marriage *114 and a classificatory system of kinship, which, furthermore, pre-601 served certain terms lost in less primitive systems, strikingly con-595 firmed the views of Engels, who looked on group marriage as an explicit, universal step in the history of marriage, and on the classificatory system as a true indicator of such a norm that formerly existed. The classificatory system of kinship among the [171] Gilyak described by Shternberg turned out to be similar to the Turano-Ganowanian type. Furthermore, "it is the best example of the Turanian system," says Shternberg himself, "besides being *114 the best preserved and giving the best correlation (1). With this

1. "The Turano-Ganowanian System," p. 323.

/xxviii/ discovery Shternberg filled in the gap in the scientific literature on primitive social relations, for which there were no

/xxvii cont./

*114 The question of cousin marriage is developed particularly 582 assiduously in these works. In this respect, Shternberg enriched the 595 history of marriage with valuable material, very shrewdly analyzed by him. When Shternberg tries to extract cousin marriage from group marriage, however, he contradicts /xxix/ himself and takes an anti-Morgan and at the same time anti-Engels position. To accept the proposition that cousin marriage preceded group marriage logically leads to the conclusion that individual marriage preceded cousin marriage. The reasoning of Shternberg on the causes for the transition from marriage between sisters and brothers to cousin marriage is just as completely idealistic.

Shternberg revealed the clan character of the group marriage of the Gilyak with great thoroughness and, in addition, established the principles of the third- and fourth-clan phratry. Indisputably, the conclusion of Shternberg about the precedence of cross-cousin marriage to unilateral-cousin marriage are correct.

Shternberg's discovery among the Gilyak of the institution *114 of izbeganiya (avoidance), according to which people not having 602 mutual sexual rights must avoid mutual glances, conversations, 595 and so forth, also has extremely great importance for confirming [194] the existence of group marriage. He considers the survival of this institution among peoples who have already emerged from the stage of group marriage as extra proof of its previous existence.

*114 Further, the works of Shternberg give a vivid picture of the 614 clan way of life of the Gilyak and of the basic norms of their common law. By the way, in speaking of the clan, one must stress the correctness of Shternberg's criticism of Kunov, who, in spite of Engels, rejected the existence of a clan structure among the Australians.

*114 Shternberg considers in some detail the khlai-ni-vukhakh 614 and quite correctly explains that they are recruited from the yzi 556 (wealthy men), but we wait in vain for an answer from him on the question of the reasons for the degeneration of the clan and the appearance of the yzi. At the same time it must be said that the fact of the existence of the wealthy men among contemporary, so-called primitive peoples, and especially their social role, has been treated with silence in ethnographic literature, and Shternberg was one of the few non-Marxist ethnographers who paid attention to it.

/30 cont./

221 purchase fish, while in many places (for example, on the Tym') the inhabitants set out in whole settlements to travel several hundred kilometers to the seashore for the spring seal-hunting, only to return half a year later for the fall run of fish in their native 517 places. The Gilyak likes to travel, however, even without 517 serious reasons for it. To make visits, receive guests, arrange [1464] celebrations, and live gregariously are the greatest pleasures of [157] the Gilyak. Gloomy and stern while alone, he is transformed in society and becomes playful, gay, and garrulous.

342 In the north, in winter, between 30 and 40 people live in 157 the big yurts of the Manchu type. It is here that sociableness, which is inherent anyway in the conditions of the social frame-128 work of the Gilyak, is cultivated. In any case, it must leave the external aspect of the life of the Gilyak and pass to its internal structure, with whose unique peculiarities I intend mainly to acquaint my readers.

III.

601 Kinship System. Marriage Norms and Their Influence 191 on the Family-Clan Structure.
194

Of all the peculiarities of the Gilyak way of life nothing so characteristically distinguishes them from the surrounding nationalities as their classificatory system of kinship and the rules that regulate their sexual relations and marriage. In this respect the Gilyak stand equally far from their southern neighbors, the Ainu, and from the Tungus tribes that surround them. The Ainu are the only nationality of the Priamur krai who have preserved features of [617] maternality /materniteta/. The Gilyak family and clan are purely [214] patriarchal institutions. As for the Tungus tribes, although the [595] classificatory system of kinship and certain characteristics of group marriage analogous to those discovered by me in 1891 among the Gilyak were discovered by me among them, a careful comparison of this institution among the Tungus tribes and among the Gilyak leads to the conclusion that they /31/ belong to quite different

/31 cont./

601 periods in the evolution of marriage, and, although they could 191 have influenced one another, they basically belong, speaking in 194 the language of geology, to different formations. It is sufficient [595] to say that among the Tungus tribes sexual intercourse with wives of [835] individuals of ascending generations is allowed, for example, with the wife of the father's younger brother, while among the Gilyak this is regarded as incest.

At first sight the Gilyak institution of marriage does not 595 seem to be anything special. A Gilyak will generally buy one or 581 rarely two or three wives, who come over into his clan and are re-[583] garded before the world as his personal wives and the mothers of his children. The children belong exclusively to the father and [611] succeed him after his death. When a Gilyak becomes a father, he [551] is no longer called by his former name, but is called the father [584] of the born child. The exclusive possession of his wives expresses [214] itself in the stern custom of blood vengeance against the disturber [582] of marital harmony. The clan is based on the principle of agna-tion, and marriage is exogamous.

One can travel over the entire territory of the Gilyak, live 593 in their yurts, and observe their family life for a long time, and 601 not notice anything peculiar in the structure of their family. In [590] large winter yurts the inhabitants occupy their plank beds by [352] families, each living in relation to its own particular interests.
Complete harmony and tender relations prevail among husband, wife, and their children. That is not all. One may frequently [16.5] encounter instances of striking loyalty and love between spouses.
When one of them dies, the other frequently lays hands on himself or dies from grief. In a word, to all appearances we are dealing with the type of family which is generally called patriarchal.
Actually, however, it is not. First of all, one is struck by the strange kinship nomenclature. A whole group of women call a whole group of men their husbands (pu-lin), and the latter call them their wives (an'gej). Likewise, a whole group of men call a group of women their mothers (ymk) and a group of men their fathers (ytk), and these call the former their children.

/39 cont./

582 So far we have considered, as it were, the statics of the ques-614 tion; now let us turn to its dynamics. Let us see how from some very simple beginning, with inevitable necessity, as a mighty tree develops from a single seed, the controversial, confusing fabric of the Gilyak marriage and clan grew up.

The essence of the entire complex system of regulation of Gilyak marriage and the clan, and furthermore the key to understanding it, is a unique fact, namely, the principle established in its day that men must marry the daughters of their mother's brother, in other words, the daughters in each family belong from birth to the sons of their father's sister. We have already said something about the motives that could have given rise to this principle. In any case, its universal incumbency was guaranteed, no doubt, as the categorical imperative of the primitive religion.

This simple rule leads logically to the followings

1) Once every mother has the right to take for her sons the daughters of her brother, her daughters by the same right absolutely must enter the family of her husband's sister, in other words, /40/ every woman belongs to her first cousins, the sons of her father's sister. Therefore, a woman cannot marry the sons of her mother's brother. And a man cannot marry the daughters of a sister of his father: they cannot exchange the women of the family of a brother and of a sister. It is clear that this prohibition does not have anything to do with a fear of marriages within close degrees of kinship, because the daughter of the sister of my father is related to me in the same degree of kinship as the daughter of the brother of my mother, whereas marriage is prohibited with the first and obligatory with the second, a fact that is extremely important for the genesis of prohibitions within close degrees of kinship.

2) Once marriages between the daughters of a brother 582 and the sons of a sister are obligatory, once the former 595 necessarily belong to the latter, certain situations naturally arise in view of the normal quantitative inequality between persons of different sexes, in view of such possibilities, for example, as that a brother has one daughter while his sister has several sons, or, conversely, the brother has several

/40 cont./

582 daughters while his sister has only one or two sons, or that a 595 long interval of time elapses between the birth of the first son a 614 the ones that follow, or that, which even further complicates the question, several sisters have but one brother or one sister h several brothers, or the first case several brothers have a common wife; in the second, either one possesses several sisters, or two brothers live in common marriage with a group of sisters in the third case, the younger brother, who reaches puberty when the elder brother has managed to take all his cousins, must of necessity have marital rights to the wives of his elder brothers; finally, in the last two cases, either several first cousins will have an common wife, or several sisters of the broth of their mothers, or several brothers will have as common wive several of their first cousins. We have given only the simplest cases; in reality, the matter is, of course, much more complicated. Thus, in one way or another, there absolutely inevitabl arises a group marriage of brothers (own and further) with a grou of sisters (own and further), and in any case the unconditional reciprocal conjugal rights of members of all degrees of kinship.
Of course, these group rights consequently embraced more and more people of more distant degrees of kinship, for a mother d not always have brothers, or the latter daughters, and it was inevitably necessary to take wives from among the /41/ first, second, etc. cousins of the mother, and hence the union of people and groups of people of a group marriage grew.

No vicissitudes of tribal life destroyed this group principle, even up to the present time. When in the course of time, as a result of depopulation, the dispersion of kindred families, wars and other such reasons, there arose the necessity of resorting to marriages from alien families, these customs, inconvenient in themselves, led to the situation that we see at the present time, that a man is the officially recognized husband of one or severa women and is required to share this right either with all his brothers (in some clans) or (in others) only with the younger ones, and, moreover, not only with his own, but with all the agnate brothers as well.

/195 cont./

Gilyak this is not required in cases of communal possession; the wife first sleeps with one brother (the oldest), then moves over to another. As for the children, either they are not distinguished at all according to fathers, or, as in the case of the Toda tribe, the first child is regarded as the offspring of the oldest brother, the second of the next brother, etc.

3. The same situation in a new variant. the first brother has reached marriageable age before the second. The elder brother takes the only daughter of the sister of his father /sic/ as his individual wife, but then the younger brother comes of marriageable age. The elder brother remains the individual spouse, but the second brother enjoys conjugal rights, by the rights of a group spouse. Then another daughter of the brother grows up to be of marriageable age. She naturally becomes the individual spouse of the second brother, but the elder brother obtains the same group rights to the wife /196/ of the younger brother as the latter once enjoyed with respect to the wife of the elder brother.

4. At a given moment a brother has several adult daughters, while the sister as yet has only one adult son. The latter becomes the husband of all the daughters of the sister of the brother /sic/. Thus it is at the present time among the majority of American Indian tribes, where a man who has married the oldest daughter is for that reason obliged to take as wives all of her sisters. But now another brother grows up. One of the wives is yielded up to him as his individual wife, the rest remaining with the elder brother as the most well-to-do, who is better able to support several wives than the brother who is just beginning to earn his livelihood. The latter, naturally, is rightfully the group husband of all the wives of the elder brother; the converse right of the elder brother is not in indisputable.

An analogous development takes place if the elder brother-polygamist has several brothers who gradually grow up; then each one of them will obtain his own individual wife, but at the same time each of the younger brethren will have

/203 cont./ The custom of brothers' living together with one wife became ever rarer. In the words of the epos, such passages as "so many brothers were supporting one wife" are almost the usual thing. More than a hundred years ago, Mamio Rinso /Rinzô Mamiya/ described such facts as being ordinary phenomena, while nowadays they are more and more rarely encountered.

Such are the conditions which stood in the way of the inviolable existence of the phratry. But however powerful these conditions appeared, the force of the primordial norms, having become religious imperatives, naturally preserved their power, and the new influences broke a trail for themselves, adapting themselves to the old norms by means of a whole series of correctives and fictions... How this occurred we shall see immediately.

VI.

The Dynamics of the Destructive Conditions

Of all the conditions mentioned which are destructive to the phratry (emigration, depopulation, wars, destruction of economic equality, seasonal expeditions, the most powerful factor is the depopulation of clans, and besides, as we have said above, catastrophic depopulation which strikes the individual clans unequally. How must this factor have operated on the surviving clans? Let us recall the third table of our four-clan phratry. Let us suppose that clan A has died out or there are only a few persons left in it, and this is the clan from which clan C took women. We shall consider the first case, where clan A has died out without a trace. What happens then? What then is to be done by the orphaned clans C, which used to take wives from A, and B, which gave wives to clan A? Of course, first of all, the members of these clans will search for some solution within the phratry itself, in which only pure marriage is possible.

Aleut NAG

Erman (3) relates the same, but he does

/244 cont./

3. A. Erman, "Ethnographische Wahrnehmungen /Ethnographic Observations/," Zeitschr. für Ethnologie, Vol. III, 1871, pp. 162-163, Berlin.

not indicate either the kinship relations between the common husbands or their relationship in the case of the marriage of the second participant. But this in no way allows us to conclude that marriage among the Aleut is confined to the details related above. As we have already stated earlier, Mamio Rinso /Rinzô Mamiya/ described Gilyak marriage in the same terms as Veniaminov used to describe that of the Aleut, whereas we have seen that the Gilyak have the typical group marriage. The description of group marriage as given by Veniaminov and Rinso is quite natural for non-specialist observers, for with group marriage one is most easily struck by that case in which the second husband is not individually married himself, as it is described in Gilyak fairy tales: "two brothers maintained one wife." A non-specialist, however, generally leaves unnoticed group marriages which include several married men. One can therefore say with a great degree of assurance -- especially if one takes into consideration data about the preferred marriage to cousins -- that the polyandry of the Aleut that Veniaminov tells us about was in reality a form of group marriage. In confirmation of my hypothesis I shall permit myself to cite the following example from the life of the Toda, a tribe that lives in the Nilgiri Hills.

The old writer Marshall describes marriage among the Toda in the following way (4):

4. W.E.Marshall, A phrenologist among the Todas, London, 1873, p. 213.

"If a husband has brothers or very close kinsmen who all live together, each one of them may, with the consent

Aleut NAG

/245 cont./

The peculiarities of the Aleut marriage norms did not remain isolated on the Aleutian Islands. On the northwestern shore of the American continent, right up to the Columbia River itself, which was regarded by Morgan as the point of departure of the Ganowanian system, observers note them in terms almost analogous to those used by Veniaminov. We find them among the Eskimo tribe of the Koniag, the inhabitants of Kodiak Island, about whom Davydov writes: "Some women have two husbands each: the first is the actual husband, who selects the other one with the consent of the wife. This one at the same time becomes a servant, i.e., he carries firewood and does a number of other chores. He can sleep with the wife only in the absence of her actual husband, and upon his return he is deprived of this right. /246/ The Russians call such husbands partners" (1). This description, which almost seems to have been copied from Mamio Rinso and Veniaminov and travelers to Tibet, fails like the others to note the kinship relations between the spouses, but, on the other hand, there is the valuable report of the right of the second husband to exercise his marital rights only in the absence of the first husband, as among the Gilyak, and the obvious subservient position of this second husband. This subservient position is justly noted and strikes the eye also among the Gilyak, but it obtains, not by virtue of a marital agreement, but by virtue of the fact that the elder brother always plays the role of the head of the house and besides because brothers are forbidden to talk to one another, the relationship between the elder and the younger may create the impression of the relationship between master and worker.

1. Davydov, Dyukratnoe puteshestvie v Ameriku ofitserov Khvostova i Davydova /Two Voyages to America by the Officers Khvostov and Davydov/, Part II, pp. 50-51.

/246 cont./

Among the Tlingit (the Koloth) the institution is described in more definite terms by Veniaminov, who plainly says that "the second husband must always be either a brother or a very close kinsman" (2). Similar phenomena have been observed among the Central Eskimo by Ross. We shall not, however, deal with America, a country having the Ganowanian system, which is so close to the Turanian system. Our aim was to fill the hiatus which separates the native land of the Turanian system from the Ganowanian. After the survey we have made, we have the right to say that this hiatus has been filled.

2. Tvoreniia Innokentiia /The Works of Innokentii/, Book 3, p. 619.

XI.

Sexual Life

The norms of group marriage, presenting the Gilyak with such wide freedom of sexual intercourse, are in themselves a propitious factor for the inordinate development of sexual sensualism. The ordinary mode of life of the Gilyak, in turn, could only aid in the extraordinary development of this factor. The principal Gilyak occupation -- fishing -- leaves him too much leisure. On the other hand, the only pursuit which could provide a significant outlet for the emotional vital energy, namely, hunting, plays a comparatively insignificant role in the life of the Gilyak. The Gilyak does not undertake distant hunting expeditions. The seasonal hunting for sables, squirrels, foxes, and deer, and even the sporadic excursions after the local, rather /247/ timid bear, do not present any special dangers; the sport of hunting, therefore, is very weakly developed.

/270 cont./

orthodox marriage. For an agreement concerning an orthodox /271/ marriage with a young girl there is even the special term tkhagunl (eastern dialect tygnydz).

Persons participating in the betrothal. On the side of the groom the representatives are: 1) father and mother; 2) brother of the father; 3) elder brother of the groom; 4) husband of the sister of the father. The role of the latter individual is explained apparently by the norms of orthodox marriage. According to this last, the husband of the sister of the father is the father of the husband of the sister of the groom. Since by the norms of Gilyak marriage his daughter cannot marry the brother of his daughter-in-law, the husband of the sister of the father considers it his duty to promote the marriage of his closest ashmalk, the brother of his own daughter-in-law. If the father is dead, he is replaced by one of the urdla a'ivuikh (honored persons) among his clansmen. Since the marriage is considered the affair of the clan, there frequently participate, in addition to these persons, several honored clansmen. When the betrothal involves a very wealthy person, the honored clansmen come in several boats, bringing with them at once the articles of the bride price, and frequently, if the delegation plus the rich bride price makes the proper impression, they immediately take the maiden away with them upon the conclusion of the negotiations.

The bridegroom also attends the betrothal. If he is all alone, or if, on the contrary, he is quite wealthy and renowned, he can become betrothed by himself. In one song the maiden sings to her beloved: "Holding my hand, betroth me."

Matchmakers are unnecessary in the case of a married man who wants to marry a second wife. Then he himself usually goes to the clan of his first wife, but often the latter herself goes to her own clan or to another one (if there are no suitable candidates in her own) for the selection and betrothal of a new girl-friend for her husband.

/281 cont./

583 The wedding may be delayed also on account of the dowry.
584 Although they begin to prepare the dowry in childhood, nevertheless, depending on the bride price which is brought, it may become necessary to prepare a new one. The last item in the negotiations is the date of the wedding. This is considered very important, for on the day of the groom's arrival the dowry must be ready, and likewise the numerous viands, not only for the wedding feast, but also those viands of all kinds which the bride will take away with her as a present to the groom's family.

584 /282/ The agreement which has been concluded between the 614 two families is considered an agreement between two clans, and the bride herself from this moment on is regarded as belonging [586] to the clan. In case of refusal on her part or on the part of her parents, the clan will demand her by force.

584 The agreement is also binding for the other side, but 686 here no sanction is demanded, for in case of refusal it loses the part of the bride price which has been brought (usually half).
It happens, however, but quite rarely, that the groom will ask for, instead of one sister, another sister. But this is absolutely forbidden. In such cases they answer him:

"If you do not like her, then you do not like both (both the one and the other). When the matter concerns dogs, you want a good one, and I give you (a good one); if one does not suit you, then both will not suit you. When we give you something to eat, if you eat up the first dish, then I shall give you the second."

[595] In other words, one may ask for two daughters, but to ask for one instead of the other is not permitted.

585 When, finally, the day agreed upon arrives, the groom, together with his parents, comes in boats in the summertime, on sleds in the winter, bringing with them the part of the bride price [576] agreed upon and refreshments. Etiquette forbids that they come on foot, although the bride may live very close by. At this time the family of the bride hangs out the objects of the bride price for the public inspection of the clansmen, and refreshments are spread for the elder representatives of both clans. The women look after the bride in all kinds of ways; they comfort her, give

/301 cont./

567 They would journey back to Sansin with their wives and slaves; there each was given a one -- or many-masted boat, which was loaded with provisions for ten years, with garments, silks, and so forth, for the entire family. Upon their return the purchased wives would already be pregnant. If a daughter was born, they gave her a slave for her dowry. Those who came to Sansin only to pay their yassak /tribute paid in furs/ (one sable) received two combs, a piece of drel', ten bottles of khanshin, and so forth. Ainu women were bought in this way; they went hunting, brought sables and so forth, and also Chinese goods, and bought wives on the way.

A woman who married into the Jusk'in clan received as a dowry from her father a female slave -- akh, who was provided with a Japanese sword for cleaning her mistress' soles. Then a Gilyak bought her in exchange for his own daughter. Poor fathers (generally) sold their daughters into slavery.

VI.

The Family and the Clan

● 595 Marriage norms and totemic clans. Clansmen-brothers may support one wife, but only one of them is regarded as the master, even though both together bought the wife; the second one enjoys marital rights only in the absence of the first.

If they have lived together for one year after another, a husband consults his elder wife as to whom else he should take.
And she herself may travel to select a helper from her own khal or from an alien one, and the wives call each other sisters. A man sleeps separately, and each wife separately, or the man in the middle. The elder wife takes care of all the children. The younger cannot give orders to her, and she commands. It sometimes happens that they are jealous and fight. The following go to do the betrothing: 1) father and mother, 2) elder brother, 3) father's brother, 4) husband of father's sister.

/302/

● 595 A person can take two sisters as wives. Brothers may take 58 widows without distinction. It is best of all to take a wife from the clan of one's mother, and then one can even get her for nothing, and even if a payment is required, it is less in any case.
In the past one did not pay for a woman if she was from the clan of one's mother. It is not permitted to exchange women between clans. Here, too, one's daughter is given for sale to the wife's brother, but the latter cannot demand this.

582 There is a prohibition against the descendants of one's sister down to the fourth generation.

In Vaydy (see above) there are Gilyak of the Hirulung clan 614 who have entered into a union k:khal n'akhr: with the Khydzyr' 173 in Chil'bi. Formerly, they lived together in the same locality and belonged to the clan of the tiger. There is a Gilyak clan which has become related to a snake (there are snakes on the Amgun; they were seen on the Amgun by Putyun) (1). There are [114] 1. In the text, "boa," but, judging by note 6 on page 222 in Materialy po izucheniiu giliatskogo iazyka i fol'klora /Materials on the Study of the Gilyak

Language and Folklore/, this is a mistake
in the notes on the journey.

also Goldi who are kin to snakes.

538 A young man from Vaydy fell in love with the wife of a 839 Korean, a Gilyak woman, and enjoyed reciprocity. She went to the town with a fish; the Korean stayed to guard the potatoes.
Then the lover went to the town. They met and spent two weeks in the town. She came home -- her mother also liked the Gilyak.

The Korean demanded that his wife sleep with him, but she resisted. At night the Gilyak woman ran outside and slept with the Gilyak. The husband gave her a beating; her mother and brothers tried to protect her; the Korean complained, why did he take a Gilyak woman. He killed the Korean (settlement of Mago).

/374 cont./ Yet

562 loaded down with work as she is, sometimes profoundly unfortunate, with an aged and blind husband, purchased and sold, she is [264] nevertheless not a slave. She is not shut up, as in the East; she [593] eats at the same table with her husband and children, she participates in the conversation, and she is treated with respect as a wife and mother. The children treat her with respect. They are ready [765] to exact vengeance for her. When she dies, they will cremate her with the same solemnity as her husband; as a sign of mouning they will undo their braids, not infrequently for life, and an occasional inconsolable husband will lay violent hands on himself out of grief for his wife. Although married, she does not sever her [574] bonds with her former family and clan. She, along with her husband and children, visits them frequently, and in a year of misfortune she and her husband and children will find assistance and a hearty welcome there. If her husband should offend her without cause, she will find protection in the family of her father, and true protection: they will return the bride price and take her back.

● 595 Polygamy is found to a limited extent. The causes of [589] polygamy lie in part in the above-mentioned conjugal rights of brothers. It is not by chance that there are so many bachelors among the Gilyak, /375/ frequently without special reasons, such as poverty, etc. Then, again, barren wives, as well as the desire to have a young healthy worker in his old age, impel the Gilyak to provide himself with two or three wives, whom he gradually acquires. It is noteworthy that in the settlements closest to the Aleksandrovsk post, even in such a large settlement as Arkyyvo, I did not encounter a single case of polygamy.

595 This is explained, of course, by the influence of the Rus-197 sians. Polygamy often produces quarrels between wives, and the husband, of course, most frequently takes the side of the favorite wife, yet that division into lawful wives and concubines, as in the Eastern harems, does not exist among the Gilyak.

831 Two words concerning sexual morality. In their talk the Gilyak are not very irreproachable. Young maidens allow themselves to use words and expressions that are not tolerated by the

[The Western Coast]

162 /385 cont./
592 128 or adolescent, living apart from their parents or not, and therefore "households" are counted separately, and, secondly, widows and widowers and their children, and also orphans (brothers and sisters) who live as a single household.

The total population is 1,041, of whom 162
595 561 are male and 480 female; the adults (including adolescents) [167] number 678; there are 278 married or widowed persons, and 32 male polygamists (four of these have three wives each and the others two each); for each polygamist there are nine individuals who have only one wife each (3). The number of children who [597] 3. Under the rubric of "married we have also included widowed persons, since, in order to have accurate percentage figures for the bachelors and polygamists, widowed persons must be considered along with the married persons. The terms "polygamist" [128] and "bigamist" are used interchangeably, [184] since, though there are no prohibitions in this regard, we have not met on the Okhotsk shore a single case where a native had more than two wives; on the western shore and on the Amur many Gilyak have three or four wives each.

The number of children who 163 165 survived birth is 515, while the number of those who died at birth is 247, so the rate of infant mortality is at least 33% (4); the [128] 4. For lack of a better method, the number of children was ascertained by asking each married man the questions: (1) how many of his children were present (the name of each child was called out and written down one by one) and how many were absent; (2) how

/681/000

III. Ethnographic Part

Second Half: Basic Features of Family Life, Social Life, and the Inner Life

Section 11

Family relations: marriage, wife purchase, and wife capture Morality. Domestic tasks and occupations of husband and wif Childbirth, the feeding, treatment, and rearing of children.
Position of the male and female slaves in the household. The family law of inheritance. Blood revenge.

121 If in the discussion of the basic conditions and elements the external life of the Amur peoples I deemed it necessary to dwell more or less exhaustively only on the peoples of the low Amur region, but, with regard to those on the upper course of river, to point out only in a general way the particularly typi and characteristic differences in contrast to them, this will be case to an even greater extent in the following considerations turning more and more to the inner life. In fact, I must here limit myself almost exclusively to the Gilyak and to the Olch who, except in language and some ideas and customs which a in part perhaps rooted in tribal peculiarities, have been perm by the Gilyak spirit and almost completely Gilyakized, and e the adjacent tribes on the lower Amur will only be touched u for comparison, for it was only with the former that I had int course long enough to obtain some, albeit superficial, insight into the problems to be discussed here. Hence the discussion the Amur peoples, which up to now has been kept comparati as much as possible, will in this last part take on more of the character of a monograph and will center almost exclusively the people that has been the focus and point of departure for a of our previous discussions.

● 595 The Gilyak are not bound by custom or religion to any definite form of marriage. Actually, however, by far the ma of them live in monogamy. In fact, it prevails /632/ amon them to such an extent that one may designate it as the gener rule, but polygamy, on the other hand, occurring only under

/129 cont./ This appeared so obvious to him that he explains the opposing view of Siebold, too categorically affirmed, it is true, based on the report of the eighteenth century Japanese traveler Mamio Rinso /Rinzô Mamiya/, that "the northwestern shore of Sakhalin (i.e., the territory of the Gilyak) is the only country in the world where polyandry, by force of law or custom, is practiced" (1), not

1. Siebold, Nippon, VII, p. 169.

by the inaccuracy of the observations of Mamio Rinso, whom he considers an excellent observer, but by his personal bitterness against the Gilyak because the Gilyak women compelled him to perform manual labor like all the other men (2). "Among

2. "Not wishing to accuse Mamio Rinso of pure fictionalizing," says Schrenck, "we cannot refrain from assuming that he was motivated by personal reasons, which, muddling his testimony, gave ground for various interpretations... Vanity and the fear of lowering himself in the eyes of the government (on account of his servile position) impelled the traveler to explain his humiliating position among the Gilyak by the custom of their country" (i.e., polyandry and the domination of women). Schrenck, Ob inorodtsakh Amurskago kraia /Concerning the Natives of the Amur Region/, 1903, Vol. III, p. 19.

the Gilyak," says Schrenck in conclusion, "neither on Sakhalin nor on the continent, nor anywhere else, does polyandry exist."

/129 cont./

114 595 In his own way Schrenck was right; it was perhaps impossible for him personally to notice the polyandrous nature of Gilyak marriage, for in effect it is impossible to find among the Gilyak open, public polyandry in the form /130/ in which those who have never seen it in life picture it to themselves. On the other hand, the statements of Mamio Rinso are also quite uncertain, since due to his ignorance of the language he could note only a factual looseness in relations, but he could never grasp the chief essence, the normativeness, the lawfulness of the sexual relations that he observed.

In order to discover the polyandrous nature of Gilyak marriage, it is necessary to penetrate deeply into the most intimate aspects of Gilyak life, know their language, live a long time with them in their yurts (which helped Rinso see that which escaped Schrenck), and, in any case, become familiar with their kinship nomenclature, which Schrenck, due to his slight acquaintance with the language, completely failed to accomplish (1).

1. Certain information given by Schrenck in this regard can only mislead the reader. Thus, for example, he completely erroneously affirms that a man gives to his mother and to the sister of his father the identical designation "ymk." See Schrenck, op. cit., Vol. III, p. 6. Probably the individual who gave Schrenck this information was speaking, not of the sister of the father, but of the sister of the mother.

58 [595] To the superficial observer, the institution of Gilyak marriage actually does not present anything peculiar. By all outward indications the wife or the wives of the Gilyak (polygamy -- two, three, or four wives -- is permitted by Gilyak custom) represent his individual property. The wife [591] is purchased by the husband for a very high price from her /167 cont./ Thus, each man can have several clans of "fathers-in-law," and all the agnates of these clans, according to generations, are considered an'g:ej -- his wives and the wives of his kinsmen. So it is in the kinship terminology, and so it is in life.

It will be necessary for us to consider in detail later how this complicated system developed.

For the present, we think, quite enough has been said to see that in the sphere of individual marriage the appellations pu and an'g:ej have played and still play an enormous role, symbolizing in themselves the remarkable institution of the right to marriage -- one of the many benefits which the clan structure gives to each of its participants.

Now we shall indicate only the practical significance of this institution of the right to marriage at the present time. For the contemporary Gilyak, marriage is one of the most difficult matters of life. Not only in the fairy tales, but also in real life "finding a wife" is a business of unusual difficulty. First of all, there is the extreme shortage of women. Among the Gilyak, according to calculations made on the basis of the censuses that I took, for every 1,000 males there are 785 females; on the isolated shores of the Sea of Okhotsk, it is 694 females, while in Siberia, for every 1,000 males there are 900 females. It is necessary to add that a significant percentage of the Gilyak, namely, the wealthiest individuals, keep from two to four wives. For example, according to my census on the western shore of Sakhalin to the north of the settlement of Arkyvo, for every nine monogamous men there was one polygamous man, with the total ratio of men to women being 1000:694. There is one old bachelor for every 11 married men, and one polygamist for every 19 married men. It is not difficult to imagine how limited the choice of women was, /168/ and it was already limited by a whole set of prohibitions. With such a limited choice and with such a considerable preponderance of men over women, the bride price, the payment for women (in valuables or long-term service), naturally reaches an unusually great amount. Under

/175 cont./

* 835 wives for a time, the married men enjoy their group rights 837 just as broadly as do the bachelors. And it must be said in general that the character of the relations between pu and an'g:ej is largely determined by the conditions of cohabitation.
* 835 Under the conditions of living in different villages, the rela-832 tions between them can naturally be only sporadic. Very often in such cases the group spouses know each other only by hearsay, but, upon meeting each other, they usually come quickly to an agreement and form fleeting attachments, for which they are quite eager, both the men and the women, not laying claim upon each other to any particular sympathy, love, or such. There is nothing easier than to come to an agreement with such a pu or an'g:ej whom one meets by chance; one need merely touch the breast of a woman in the passageway or out of doors, or make the stereotyped proposal, "Let's smoke a little together," in order to convince oneself of the strength of one's chances for lovemaking. Sometimes the matter is simply settled by means of winks alone.

* 835 In a place where the individual bachelor pu and their [593] wives, an'g:ej, are in permanent residence, firm attachments are often established, accompanied not only by regular sexual relations, but often also by deep sympathies and /176/ affection, which nevertheless do not hinder the woman from properly fulfilling her conjugal obligations with regard to her individual husband at the same time, even feeling a real affection toward him. Such relations quite often create extremely interesting situations. Two, or more rarely three, brothers, notwithstanding their complete economic independence, giving each of them the opportunity to acquire his own individual wife, nevertheless live together, having one common wife. The official
● [595] spouse of this woman is considered to be only the oldest brother, who has actually acquired her with the rights of an individual spouse, but, with the tacit consent of the wife, she is in reality a common wife; this is well-known, not only to outsiders, but [184] also to the children of the brothers-spouses. One encounters [556] such situations also in the richest and most respected families.

/176 cont./

000 such situations also in the richest and most respected families.
159 My good friend and first teacher of the Gilyak language, the * 835 aforementioned resident of the settlement Tangi, the richest Gilyak on Sakhalin, lived in just this way with his younger brother, Pleun. The latter was himself a no less capable person than his older brother, enjoyed the name of an excellent hunter, and had been able to accumulate a huge quantity of "valuables," so that he could easily have taken for himself not one but several wives; nevertheless, he preferred to enjoy the wife of his older brother. It had evidently come about in this way: as a youth, he had enjoyed the wife of Gibel'ka with the rights of any younger brother, but gradually a stronger attraction had arisen between them, and he preferred, instead of an individual marriage, to live constantly with the wife of his older brother, whom in fact, he loved. It is characteristic here that everyone, including Gibel'ka himself, regarded this as an entirely normal phenomenon. When I approached Gibel'ka himself with a question about this, a slight shadow slipped across his handsome, intelligent face; he well knew how the Russians regarded such relations, but in general my question did not produce any particular impression on him.

[593] He spoke enthusiastically about his own wife, loved his children tenderly, although he could not have any confidence whatsoever that they were his, and his son, a boy of 14, felt a greater affection for the younger brother of his father than for him himself. It goes without saying that nothing prevented
● [595] Gibel' from removing his younger brother from his house, or [583] him together with his wife, and buying himself another, and not one but several, of the most beautiful and distinguished wives. With his extreme ambition, with his excessive love of popularity, he would not have failed to undertake the most drastic steps for the /177/ restoration of his marital reputation, if he had felt anything shocking in the regular and well-known cohabiting of this brother with his wife. As luck would have it, Gibel' outlived his younger brother, who perished tragically in solitude in his hunting balagan [164] during the time of the winter hunting. When the dead man's

/177 cont./

159 body was laid on the funeral platform amidst a huge and 764 solemn crowd of Gilyak who had assembled from all direction
* 835 a few minutes before the cremation the wife of the older brother, with her hair undone as a sign of mourning, climbed up on it, seated herself beside the deceased, and in everyone hearing began to mourn for her "younger husband" and "beloved" in the same pathetic and tender terms as if she had been his individual wife.

* 835 This public act is better evidence than any description as to how the Gilyak understand relations between men and the wives of their brothers.

The custom of the common, continual cohabitation of brothers with a common wife is not always easy to notice. In the first place, sexual relations are carefully guarded from publicity; furthermore, the Gilyak usually live in large yurts, with several brothers with families together, and for a strange it is very difficult to figure out their secret relations, the more so because they are very unwilling to speak about such things; finally, any young Gilyak rarely has the desire to attach himself to the wife of an own brother; he prefers irregular relations with the wives of many of his tuvn.

● 595 Besides the group-marriage relations between brothers and
* 835 their wives, however, other purely communal forms are also encountered among the Gilyak -- true, not often -- namely, when two or several brothers are quite openly and admittedly married to one woman. I encountered such cases in 1910 eve on the Amur, where the Gilyak distinguish themselves by a particular individualism. Two or three brothers formally seek in marriage a common wife from the akhmalk clan or buy an alien woman and then continue to live with her in a communa marriage. Of course, at the same time both the husbands and their wives are joined in group-marriage relations with a larg number of their class pu and an'g:ej.

[538] In olden times such cases were evidently common phenomena. The so-called n'astund (heroic tales) and fairy

● 595 /177 cont./
* 835 tales again and again begin with the words: "n'ig:yvyn tenun' 538 ruvn an'g:ej n'ena aivynd" -- "two Gilyak brothers had a wife," and later on the content itself of this idea is disclosed. In one /178/ such tale (1), in which they are talking about the abduction of the common wife of two brothers by a mountain man, we find a passage depicting the forms of sexual relations and the relationship of the woman to both brothers: "That same evening she made the...sacrificial cups, six of them, in order that her husbands might take them with them (on the hunt); then that night, having slept a little (i.e., under one cover with the elder brother), she made her way to her younger husband (beloved), lying on the middle plank-bed, and, having copulated, she slept with him. On the next day, her husbands set out." The finale of this story is curious. After a long search for the abducted woman, the older brother (nowadays her individual husband), having despaired of the success of the search, returned home, while the younger brother, on the other hand, zealously continued the search, and when he finally found his way to the home of his beloved, the narrator says that the woman ran to her husband "pivner:kntokh" (actually, to the brother of her individual husband) (line 58) ... They not only speak in such language 595 in fairy tales, but every day. When a man speaks of his wife

1. L. Shternberg, Materialy /Materials/, II, 21, p. 171.

* 835 or a woman of her husband, they by no means imply their in-601 dividual spouse, but one or another of their "husbands" without distinction. In just the same way, when a married man speaks of his wives (in the plural), or a married woman of her husbands, they always imply the individual husband and his brothers, and, conversely, the individual wife and the wives of the brothers.

/181/
* 835 Such are the relations between the categories of group pu and an'g:ej. Within his own clan, the Gilyak has at his disposal the dozens of wives of his "brothers." In the clan of his akhmalk (and there may be many of these) dozens of daughters of the "brothers" of his mother are at his disposal, and finally, outside of these clans the sisters of the wives of his most distant tuvn, and the wives of the sons of his "mother's" sisters, belong to him. And since, in addition, due to the contemporary conditions of life, his own clansmen and the members of the clans of his akhmalk are scattered throughout the most remote settlements, there is hardly a place where a visiting Gilyak could not find his lawful an'g:ej. One may say the same thing about the Gilyak that is said, mutatis mutandis, about "kumi" and "kroki," who throughout the whole extent of their territory find everywhere a lawful wife for themselves.

* 835 Thus, every Gilyak usually is joined in a dual marriage:
● 595 1) in the customary individual marriage with one or more 58 women either from the class of his an'g:ej (in this case mainly with the daughters of his mother's brother) or with women of alien groups; this form of marriage among brothers sometimes takes on the form of purely communal polyandry; 2) in a group marriage with all the women of the class an'g:ej, where sexual intercourse with some of them is accompanied by joint cohabitation, a common economy with their individual husbands, and takes place more or less regularly (most often within a common economy of brothers); or else this right of sexual intercourse is potential and is exercised only insofar as is possible and not regularly.

* 835 Thus, we have to do here with the typical group marriage, 171 examples of which are known to all among the most diverse peoples of the earth. An extremely curious, typical analogue in the life of other peoples is the marriage system of the Australian Dieri tribe (1), among whom both aspects of sexual

1. "Australian Group Relations," by Howitt (Papers relating to Anthropology

/194 cont./
* 194 Thus there was created that type of individual-group 581 marriage which we see among the Gilyak, and among all 582 other peoples where marriage is founded on this principle of marriage relations which they have in common with the Gilyak. This system of individual group marriage was developed under the influence of the various combinations in the distribution of the /195/ sexes among the descendants of brother and sister. In order to be convinced of this fact, it is enough to consider several such combinations.

1. The simplest one is that of one brother and one sister. Moreover, the brother has as many daughters as the sister has sons. Then of course, individual distribution is entirely possible, if, however, men and women simultaneously reached the marriageable age. But a la longue /in the long run/ such a combination is almost completely impossible, because the descendants of the sister and the descendants of the brother expand into several families, and in such an environment only as an exception can there be cases when the number of men of marriageable age in one group of descendants at any given moment will be equal to the number of women in another group of descendants.

171 2. Let us take the same instance: one brother and one
* 194 sister, but at the given moment the brother has only one 581 daughter, while the sister has several sons. Then communal 582 marriage, as it is described among many peoples and appears ● 595 so typically in all the descriptions of the Tibetans, becomes inevitable. This is the situation described in the Gilyak epos in such expressions as this, "two (or more) brothers supported one wife," a situation which, as we have indicated, is often encountered in reality even today. The most customary mode of using wives is the same as in group marriage -- each brother enjoys the communal wife in the absence of the other: "in Tibet, where the brothers very often have only one common wife, it is rare for more than one brother to be in the house at one time" (1). Among the

1. Westermarck, op. cit., p. 116.

567, 595

"In olden times the Amur Gilyak bought sl h these practices of polygamy and slaver em as to have sufficient domestic help.
old age a young and strong assistant."

aves, who were mostly Ainu women, but in y the desire was not so much to possess a In one case it was to give the loved wife of certain conditions, as, on the whole, a rare exception. According to the statements of the Gilyak, the latter is practically not found at all on Sakhalin, along the Liman, and along the coast of the Sea of Okhotsk, whereas among the Amur Gilyak it occurs more frequently. An explanation for this will appear from the information in the following. In polygamous marriage the number of wives is usually limited to two. Among the Amur Gilyak I discovered several such marriages (1). Marriages with three to five wives are very rare, and, according to the statements of the Gilyak, there are none at all among them with more than five wives. In addition to voluntary polygamy, however, there is among the Gilyak a form of polygamy brought about by the law of inheritance or, more accurately, by hereditary obligations, which will be discussed later.

/632 cont./

1. For example, the Gilyak Ssogin in Kuĭk (Mão) had two wives, Keŭguk and Malguk; similarly, the Gilyak Tschjegun had two, Chumsisk and Tyisuk, etc.

The chief motive which impels the Gilyak toward monogamy is the custom of buying their wives which prevails among them, as among most primitive peoples and in particular among all the indigenous peoples of Siberia (2). The Gilyak expression for "to

2. As, for instance, among the Tungus, Ostyak, Samoyed, Tatars, Cheremis, Chuvash, Votyak, and others (cf. note 1 on p.1030). The same custom also prevails among the Chinese (Grosier, Descr. génér. de la Chine, Paris, 1787, Vol. II, p. 261. Bazin, Chine moderne, 2nd Part, Paris, 1843, p. 482). Even among the ancient Germans, marriage was originally a purchase, as in Iceland, Norway, and among the Anglo-Saxons (Peschel, Völkerkunde /Ethnology/, Leipzig, 1874, p. 237).

3 cont./

1. (cont.)
money, one horse, a cow, and an ox, 7-10 different pieces of clothing, a pood of flour, a pail of liquor, and some hops for the preparations for the wedding celebration. The high bride-prices which Middendorff (Reise in d. Nord. und Ost. Siberien's /Travels in the North and East of Siberia/, Vol. IV, p. 1459) gives for the Assja-Samoyed women are somewhat reduced by the dowry which the bride brings, so that under some circumstances it almost only amounts to an exchange, which is never the case among the Gilyak. On the other hand, the bride price was very low among the Votyak, Cheremis, and Chuvash: among the former, who were the poorest, it amounted to only 5-15 rubles, among the latter two 10-30 rubles, and among the Kungur Cheremis, who were the wealthiest, 100 rubles and more (Müller, Samml. Russ. Gesch. /A Collection on Russian History/, Vol. III, p. 369).

ires that it be paid at one time and not in installments. In of the circumspect and thrifty nature of this people, con- ly thinking in terms of augmenting its possessions, as has pointed out in my previous descriptions, even a well-to-do will not find it easy to buy a second or a third wife, in addi- to the one. Only a particularly intense desire to have his th duly appreciated by his countrymen and thus to gain spe- esteem among them would prompt him to do so. Therefore, gamy is more frequent among the generally wealthier Amur ak living together more densely than it is among their country- along the Liman, on Sakhalin, and along the coast of the of Okhotsk.

/641 cont./

the help that they give in the household, a fine bride price. A sterile wife, then, is commonly exposed to the risk that the husband will cast her out or take a second wife, who, if blessed with children, would soon push her completely into the background. Needless to say, the wife shares the husband's desire and scorns no means that might serve to fulfill it, and the prevailing superstition gives her many such means. For instance, I saw many a woman wear the tooth of a bitch around the neck in the belief that this would make her fertile. Presumably other amulets specially carved for the purpose are worn by the women, though I am unable to name a particular object of this sort.

After all this, it is all the more surprising that there exists among the Gilyak an inhuman, cruel custom in connection with the birth of a child, the custom, that is, that a woman may never give birth in the house, but must always leave it, regardless of the weather and of the time of day or year. I did not want to believe this, but I myself witnessed it. When I visited the village of Kulk on April 24 (May 6), 1855, and entered one of the houses, I saw a woman going out extremely heavily and laboriously and sinking down nearby on a prepared bed of straw, where she was immediately seized with labor pains. The husband stood in front of the door, calmly looked on for a while, and then went back into the house, whereupon I, too, left. A few hours later I heard from a Gilyak of the same village that the birth had been successful, but the child died soon afterward. The mother was still alive. The mean temperature on this day was 2.8° R. in nearby Nikolayevsk. At 7 o'clock in the morning the thermometer registered only 1.1°, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon it rose to 6.3°, and dropped again to 2° at 9 o'clock in the evening. The river had not yet thrown off its cover of decaying ice, and, with the sky slightly cloudy, for the most part, a moderate east wind was blowing from the Liman (1).

1. Cf. Vol. IV., p. 30, of this work.

During the colder seasons, in the late fall and winter, delivery does not take place in the open, but rather in a birch-bark tent

/645 cont./

524 and entertainment of the children, for instance, those of the carp (Gilyak pilengat, Pl. LX, Fig. 5 /see p. 1260/), bear a quite different character, because they reveal an attempt to give a really 357 similar picture of the animal. As soon as the boys are able to 868 romp about freely, they amuse themselves by shooting with small bows and arrows at a target or at imaginary animals, by traveling on small sleds with the whelps, or by faithfully imitating all the manipulations that they see the adults execute with bears, for which one boy represents the bear and behaves like it, but the others try to pull it, subdue it and lead it away, etc., precisely as is done during the processions with the animal at the bear festivals. Very soon they are also taken along by the father or older brother to set up or inspect the animal traps in the woods, for fishing, and the like, and they learn from them the pertinent techniques and in general what to do or to avoid. No less do the girls in their games and occupations imitate their mothers and older sisters and are soon capable of helping them in the handicrafts and all the operations in the household.

595 In a polygamous marriage all the wives live in the same house with the husband, and each of them has a certain section of the sleeping benches for herself and her children. Legally the wives are completely equal and are obliged to care for the household jointly. But as a rule the division of labor is not com- 593) pletely equal among them, since one or another of the wives is almost always favored by the husband, and only the lighter work falls to her, while all the heavier work must be performed by the others. It is by no means the case, however, that the last-purchased or the youngest wife is always the favorite, for sometimes, as Jutschin and other Gilyak told me, the man may take a second or a third wife simply in order to make life easier for the first wife or for one of the two he already has /646/ by placing a new and able worker by her side. Whether he achieves his goal depends, however, on whether and how the wives accommodate themselves to the new arrangement and get along with one another. For no matter how little jealous they may be, the peaceful

596

596 EXTENDED FAMILIES--incidence of extended families; prevailing type or types (e.g., matrilocal, avunculocal, patrilocal, and bilocal extended families, fraternal joint families); size and composition; domicile (e.g., compound, single large dwelling); locus of authority; rule of succession (e.g., matrilineal, patrilineal, succession by a younger sibling); collective or individual ownership of dwelling, land, food stores, and household equipment; economic cooperation; routine activities; collective responsibility; cohesive and fissive tendencies; etc. See also:

Property and inheritance 42 Kin relationships 602 Lineages 613
Clans 618
Collective liability 672 Ancestor worship 769

/113 cont./

561 labors, he is not only a skillful shot, fisherman, oarsman, etc.
855 but he is already in fact a worker, like all the others. Moreov 86 to a considerable degree he has already mastered the whole sum of spiritual learning. He already knows from practice all the c customs, all the religious rites, he remembers all the kinship appellations, he knows the legends, tales, and songs of his trib and, to top it all off, he has that knowledge of men and life th constant presence in the society of adults provides: on journeys hunting, fishing, festivals, etc. Hence, also, his feeling of hi own worth and weightiness of speech, and his ability to conduc himself in society.

561 All these qualities, however, would have no significance i 596 the patriarchal principles existed. The youths of other peoples 855 of low culture also attain self-reliance at an early age, but a special, almost religious veneration of their elders, who purpo train them in submission, is demanded of them. Among the Gilyak there is nothing of the sort. All the more absent is the despotism of the head of the family with respect to its adult me bers. The sons are completely free to separate from their fath obtaining from him their allotment in the form of implements, sleighs, and such, and when they assist him with a part of their catch, they do this quite freely, with absolutely no compulsion

596 One encounters large families living in a communal economy, the head of which stands the elder in the family, the grandfath father, or one of the brothers, but this is a completely free asso

[422] tion, from which one may depart at will. And even though he presence of several women around one man in the same room and in a common household is, in the long run, scarcely conceivable. Therefore very rich Gilyak who are impelled by vanity to display their wealth and indulge in the luxury of polygamy, frequently seize upon another means to lighten the work for their wives and, without disturbing the peace, to be able to favor one or another of them. This means is to keep slaves, usually of the female, but sometimes of the male sex, for the purpose of performing the heaviest work in the house. These, however, are by no means to be thought of as lone Gilyak men or women who attach themselves to a family and, in exchange for free food and lodging, assume the obligation to perform the heavy work in the house, such as fetching water, felling and splitting firewood, etc. There are such domestic persons, who are hired, so to speak, among the Gilyak, but the situation that they are in is entered into by them voluntarily, it can be dissolved at will, and it in no way deprives them of the esteem of their countrymen, nor does it injure their social position with equal rights among them.

[434] participant in such an economic union, every member can hav his own individual economy in the form of sleds and dogs, arm enjoying the right to individual earnings by means of his person merits; and what each member shares with his own -- and there extensive sharing, especially in food supplies, both natural and purchased -- is shared without any compulsion. They bring flo rice, kumiss, and so on from the city, and all this is cooked in the common kettle for all. Communism and individualism are combined without any friction.

The situation is entirely different, however, with regard to the slaves. The Gilyak have a special term for them: kryghryss, or, with a statement of the sex, kryghryss-umgu -- female slave, and kr.-utgu -- slave of the male sex. It is to be stressed, first of all, that they are never and under no circumstances Gilyak, but are always individuals bought from the neighboring tribes, Ainu or Goldi. The Ainu (Kughi) supply the most slaves, and especially female slaves, to the Gilyak, the Goldi supply them in smaller numbers, and, to be sure, the "Jant" as well as the "Tscholdok," that is, the lower as well as the upper Goldi. The Gilyak were unable to name for me any other tribes furnishing them with slaves. Thus, significantly enough, the shameful sale of girls and boys of their own tribe into slavery is practiced only by the two peoples of the Amur region who are the immediate neighbors of the two civilized peoples of East Asia, the Japanese and Chinese, and who are the most dominated and oppressed by them. It is certainly no mere accident that the 567 435 purchase price in some other form. Slaves of the male sex are cheaper, but also less desirable, chiefly because they are less handy and are lazier and therefore less useful in the house than the female slaves are, and in addition perhaps also because, in spite of the inferior position assigned to them, they might give cause for jealousy on the part of the head of the house.

567 The male and female slaves among the Gilyak, in relation to their master, are in a situation of serfdom with absolutely no rights: they are nothing more than domestic animals in human shape, whom one treats humanely only in order to keep them fit and not to detract from his property, but also sells at will. Of course, all the heavy work in the house, such as felling and splitting wood, fetching water, feeding the dogs, and whatever else they are asked to do, falls to them, for they are only to obey and to serve. Therefore, where there is a slave in the house, the housework is done almost exclusively by her, while the wives of the head of the house devote themselves only to handicrafts, the care of the children, and other activities as they please. It is not the many and heavy tasks, however, that make the lot of the slaves, and especially the female slaves, so hard among the Gilyak, but rather their complete lack of rights, as well as the contempt which they encounter everywhere and which is expressed, among other things, in the fact that they remain excluded on principle and consistently from any intercourse with those around them. No Gilyak may marry a slave; indeed, he may not sell a slave to another Gilyak if the latter expresses an intention to marry her. The use of a female slave as a concubine is no less strictly forbidden among the Gilyak: if anyone did so, he would not only lose completely all the respect that the possession of a slave /648/ as a sign of great wealth gave him, but would stir up a general storm of indignation among his countrymen. This is certainly another indication of the moral austerity of the Gilyak. On the other hand, it makes the female slaves very useful for the household, for in their position they cannot arouse the jealousy of the wife or wives of their owners and thus, for their part, do not bring any discord into the house, as happens all too frequently in the case of polygamy. Perhaps

[595] [558] [556]

567 this is another reason why their possession seems so enviable to the Gilyak, and their purchase price is so high among them. A Gilyak, by the way, when asked how many wives (umgu) he has, will never fail to count in his female slave, and all the more because he has paid more for her than for his wife or any of his wives and she also contributes more to his prestige. This can easily lead to mistaken ideas about the extent of polygamy among them, and therefore the further questions, how many of the women are his wanch (wives) or dshangi-mutsch-umgu (lawful women or wives) and how many are merely kryghryss-umgu (female slaves), are always necessary in order to obtain a proper understanding of his marital situation.

567 595 192

As severely as the practice of sexual intercourse with a female slave is condemned by the Gilyak, nevertheless this is not always observed, especially by the younger and unmarried men. If a female slave gives birth to a child, a Gilyak will never under any circumstances admit that he is the father, and nobody, of course, will believe the words of the slave. The child, then, is regarded as belonging to the tribe of the mother and likewise, as kryghryss, becomes the property of her owner, who lets it grow up with the mother and, when it has grown up, sells it as kryghryss. If, on the other hand, the much rarer case happens, that a Gilyak girl has intercourse with a slave and brings a child into the world, the father is ignored, but the mother is punished, and the child, as illegitimate, is killed and done away with. On the other hand, the Gilyak not unhappily permits a marriage between his male and female kryghryss; in fact, if he has a female slave, he will probably also buy a male slave and have them marry, since any children they might have will be his kryghryss and, as such, can be turned to good account. Thus, the Gilyak has nothing against assimilation with the neighboring peoples through mixed marriages, but his national pride decidedly objects to such mixing with slaves coming from these peoples and the creation of such from his own ranks, and, on the other hand, strongly supported by covetousness, enjoys the possession and exploitation of slaves from the neighboring tribes.

[836] [851] [848] [847] [563]

114 of this statement by Rinsô, could express the conjecture that the 171 kojektschutsch or kojachtschitsch of the Kamchadal known 175 through Steller and Krascheninnikof (4), that is, men being used 569 592

4. Steller, op. cit., p. 351, note. Krascheninnikof, op. cit., p. 40. See also p. 473, note 2, above.

in the place of women, were also to be found among the Gilyak. Suffice it to state that neither I nor, as far as I know, any other traveler in the Amur region ever encountered any trace of this deplorable custom among the Gilyak, and that Siebold's conjecture is therefore wholly unfounded. At first glance there seems to be more justification for his conclusion, drawn from the same statement by Rinsô, that polyandry exists among the Smerenkur on Krafto (Gilyak of Sakhalin). "The northwest coast of Krafto," he adds, "would accordingly be the only land in the world where polyandry is practiced in accordance with law or custom at the present time." But, as may be seen from the above descriptions, this conclusion, too, is by no means accurate: nowhere, neither on Sakhalin nor on the mainland, does polyandry prevail among the Gilyak. But how then can the Japanese traveler's report quoted above, which speaks of the "rest" and the "other men" of the Gilyak "mistress of the house" in Noteito, be explained? The trustworthiness of Mamia Rinsô, often stressed in these pages, does not permit simply rejecting the report under discussion as fiction. In his discussion of the domestic situation of the Gilyak which occupies us at the moment, he gives further proof of his credibility, in that he so accurately describes the peculiar cradle used by them (5), as

114 595 175

5. Op. cit., p. 191.

has also been done here (6). Yet I cannot but assume that in this

6. See p. 1046 above.

/649 cont./

114 case personal motives on the part of the Japanese traveler came 175 into play and gave rise to the vague wording of the report, which 595 can be interpreted in various ways. Forced to wait among the 114 Smerenkur (Gilyak) at Cape Noteito for an opportune moment to 175 carry out his planned trip to Tôtats (on the opposite mainland), 592 which had been unsuccessful the year before, /650/ and without 595 any provisions, Mamia Rinsô found himself, in order to stay alive, forced to do all kinds of work, such as cutting wood and the like, in the house where he had taken refuge. For a time, then, he entered the ranks of persons obligated to perform do-[359] mestic service in exchange for food and lodging and had to [567] accommodate himself, like the "rest" and the "other" men in a similar position, including the slaves, to act according to the orders of the woman in charge of the house and to being treated "like a servant" by her. This does not mean either polyandry nor a dominant position of the woman over her husband. Pride and vanity, and perhaps also fear of his government, probably prevented the traveler from fully and openly confessing in his report the undignified and humiliating position and treatment which had befallen him among the Smerenkur, and prompted him to describe the situation in a more favorable light as the alleged [515] custom of the people. He also depicts the women of the Smerenkur in an ideal light, saying that "their face and skin are extremely delicate and beautiful due to daily washing," whereas actually the Gilyak women of Sakhalin look still dirtier than those on the mainland as a consequence of staying in the cramped, dark, and sooty earth huts.

114 Even though Mamia Rinsô avoids speaking of slaves in re-175 ferring to his subservient position among the Smerenkur, he is 567 well aware of the existence of such among them. For he says (1) 435

1. Op. cit., pp. 186 and 187.

of the inhabitants of southern Krafto (Ainu) that in their trade with the Santaner, that is, Gilyak, Olcha, and Goldi, they "even frequently sell human beings, and, to be sure, widowers

614 parties to agree. When agreement was reached, the khlay-nivkh came to the 627 offending clan with men of the victim clan, fully armed, and a duel was enacted between the representatives of the two clans. Then each clan representative killed a dog, and peace was considered established. After that, the ransom was paid. It consisted of coats of mail, spears, silk materials and other valuable objects.

601 The Nivkhi had a classificatory system of kinship. But, in distinction to the Tunguso-Manchurian system, the specific term of kinship among them applied always to persons of one, rather than different generations. As Shternberg showed, the classificatory system of the Nivkhi reflected even in his time the existing marriage norms. The Nivkhi retained until the end of [108] the 19th century some remnants of group marriage. These relations were [595] possible only for persons of the same generation, and were categorically forbidden among persons of different generations.

614 All the members of a clan were divided into four age groups: 1) grand-561 fathers and great-grandfather (atak); 2) fathers (ytyk), their brothers (tuvng), the husbands of the mother's sisters and the brothers of the husbands of the mother's sisters; 3) brothers and sisters (tuvng); and 4) children (ola).

175 Trade ties with China and the transformation of fur-hunting, and later of 439 fishing, into economic activities directed to commercial ends stimulated 614 the disintegration of the clan order among the Nivkhi, which occurred 184 first among the Amur Nivkhi. The latter had early begun to trade with 182 the Manchus. Nivkhi merchants sailed up the Sungari to San-hsing, and bartered furs and beluga backbones for tea, tobacco, fabrics and metal articles. They also bartered with the Ainu, the Japanese and with other neighbors. Members of the Tvaling clan, for instance, were for a long time [556] the middlemen between the Sakhalin Nivkhi and the Ainu. Thus, long before [595] Russian colonization, the Nivkhi began to be divided into rich and poor.
[567] The rich could have several wives and 3-5 slaves. The rich man's bride-price always included large quantities of imported valuables. But commodity relations developed slowly, since exchange was only in the medium of furs and, to a lesser extent, fish. The mass of the Nivkhi continued in a subsistence economy.

175 Slaves did only housework. They could set up their own households 567 and marry free women. The slave's descendants of the fifth generation were considered free. On the whole, slavery was not widespread among the Nivkhi and was of a patriarchal character.

175 At the end of the 17th and in the 18th centuries, the Manchus established 648 among the Nivkhi, as well as the Nanays, the posts of khalada— clan elders, 622 and gasyanda—village elders.

After the middle of the last century, the disintegration of the Nivkhi subsistence economy proceeded more rapidly. After the Nivkhi had finally 175 become a part of Russia, slavery disappeared; a new form of exploitation
178 appeared, in the institution of "half-shares." Nivkhi who lacked the imple-433 ments of production fell into the position of "half-sharers." The catch was divided according to the number of participants, but those who used [567] the implements of others had to yield half of their share to the owner.

Before the Revolution, the Nivkhi were officially considered Orthodox 771 Christians, but their views remained animistic. They thought of the island 776 of Sakhalin as an anthropomorphic creature; similar ideas were held about trees, mountains, rivers, water, earth and cliffs. The killer whale was in their thinking an yz'—a "master" of other animals. Almost every natural phenomenon had its yz'. The chief of these were Pal-yz'—the "master" of the mountains and the taiga, and Tayrnadz, or Tol'yz'—the "master" of

"A greater witness to the wealth of this 'Lord Mayor' was the possession of two wives. Very few Gilyaks on Sakhalin, perhaps two or three others, were wealthy enough to have bought more than one wife. Polygamy is no longer as common as it was, and this probably for two reasons—the decline in the number of women, and the growing poverty of the people. There are no adequate statistics to which I can appeal in support of the first, but evidence of the latter is met with at every turn. The only censuses (informal) ever taken were the inquiries of Mr. Sternberg in 1891 and 1895, among certain villages on the west coast of Sakhalin; where he found that the population had increased from 1041 to 1049 in 3 1/3 years, of which the increase of females was two and of males six."

"The Gilyaks treat their children rem wealth, and will 'fetch a wedding price, fish-winner, is naturally of more accou course, very high. In the villages on the gives the births in 3 1/3 years as 130, o 88 deaths among the older persons), i.e chief reason, however, of the decline in A wife has to be bought, and she is a mo unremunerative investment, but few Gil expenditure."

arkably well, and though a girl is potential the boy as an early bread-winner, or rather nt. The death-rate among young children is, of west coast, north of Arkovo, Mr. Sternberg ut of which there were 34 deaths (in addition to . an average of more than 26 per cent. The polygamy is more probably growing poverty. oderately expensive article. Not that she is an yaks are in a position to make the capital

58 years in her parental home. At what time such married couples actually enter the marital state is difficult to say. Probably, however, it is determined by the awakening sex 582 impulse. The Gilyak believe that a 30-year-old man (which means a 15-year-old, because the Gilyak's year corresponds to our half year) can marry. However, this is also only an approximation, for they do not actually count their years. A merchant who for a long time associated with the Gilyak and who had a good memory and a gift of observation, told me that he knew of two married couples, the partners of which he had known since childhood. The woman of one of them had a child at the age of 15, the other woman was 20 years old and complained that her husband who was 14 was not yet a man. I, too, was shown 15-year-old boys with half child-like features and narrow shoulders and was told that they could marry if they found a bride. We may conclude that marriage is permissible during puberty, but actually this does not often occur. At least among men there are not infrequent examples of mature individuals (around 23 -25 years old) who are still unmarried. Cases where the woman is older are rare, but the opposite often occurs. In fact, some mature men take four or five-year-old girls and rear them until they reach womanhood.

As far as marriage between close relatives is concerned, it is known that cousins marry, but that the older generation does not favor this; thus these people must also have had experiences pertaining to the harmfulness of such marriages. An uncle may be permitted to marry his niece. [127]

586 Women are in general well treated by men, partly because 595 the Gilyak customs bear the mark of instinctive humanity, 562 party because divorce is very easy. The wife of a tyrannical husband will soon be abducted by an admirer who usually settles with the husband for the payment of kalym. It happens now and then that a well-to-do man has several wives, but only lives with his favorite one and keeps the others as workers. Soon, however, this leads to quarrels, and the neglected ones make an effort to get out of the situation. In all other respects, however, even such workers are well treated, especially because they are needed. As long as a woman can work, and particularly if she is skillful at needle work, she can always find a husband.

562 In general one may conclude that, theoretically, the Gilyak 587 woman seems to be regarded as somewhat inferior to the man, but actually this has no practical effects; on the contrary, the opposite is often the case. The inferiority of women is reflected in the payment of kalym, which is general precautions. Nevertheless, it happens that now and then one of these unfortunates is shot down in the woods by Gilyaks, even though the majority of them would not think of concerning themselves with such a disgraceful hunt.

XIII Economic and Social Conditions.

Among Gilyak there is no question of a body of laws, to say nothing of written statutes. Nevertheless, common law which functions in place of fixed statutes is equitable and just. The shadow of a prerogative may be felt only where it is accompanied by real qualities. But even the preponderance of natural talents is very modest; the race consists of individuals among whom the capabilities as well as the assets which are given them by nature are pretty evenly distributed.

There are "rich" and "poor" Gilyak, but these terms must be interpreted in a very limited sense. A wealthy man who is in a position to support three to four wives is a rare exception. The "rich" man, besides having a greater number of wives, possesses objects which have a certain value, such as "beautiful" clothes [230], many and good dogs, etc. and sometimes quite useless objects which are kept merely for effect, as, for instance, lengths of cloth of gold (which in Greek churches are used for various decorations). The above-mentioned clumsy lances belong to such luxury articles. There are many rich men who keep on hand a couple hundred silver rubles in a box.

Contrariwise, there are very few Gilyak who are not capable of supporting a single wife or even themselves. Such individuals are either sick or alcoholics, for there are no actual reasons for external poverty: fish, game, wood, berries etc., are everywhere to be found, but of course one must obtain them with one's own efforts. A scarcity of fish is a rare exception among the Amur-Gilyak. It happens in those years in which the kita is scarce (this usually coincides with very high water). The Sakhalin-Gilyak often have reason to complain of a scarcity, for there the various species of salmon, even in ordinary years, do not come up the rivers in such numbers. On the other hand, they have more bears, and thus the island Gilyak are in a position to trade young bears for dried fish with their mainland kinsmen.

If there are not enough fish, the Gilyak eats cedar nuts, berries, game, etc. All these are of course only a poor substitute, but in any case we cannot speak of actual "famines" here.

AB6 Ainu AB6
Gilyak RX2
Goldi RX3

CHAPTER XVIII

A WOMAN CHANGED INTO A BEAR

In a former chapter I told how the Ainu have a story about a baby being changed into a bird, namely a goat-sucker. In the following legend we are told how a woman was turned into a bear, and how a bear became a man and then changed back into a bear again. We also saw in another place how another woman became a frog. And in this story now to be translated we have it mentioned that the Northern Ainu, like the Orok and Ghilyak tribes, practised polyandry. In fact, I believe it really means that brothers and sisters married one another up there in olden times.

"There was a certain village in which there lived two brothers who occupied the same house. They were expert hunters. So clever were they that they used to kill their quarry with lances only. When they went hunting seals, whether by boat on the sea or walking on the ice, they took many of these creatures. Although there were many brave people in the other villages, yet there were none who were as clever and brave and fortunate as these two men.

"One day the whole family stayed resting and talking in the house, but on the day following the men went out to catch large trout. The chief wife went off to dig up tubers (Corydalis) on the slopes of a solitary mountain there was near the place. While busy digging up the roots, a young man came down the slope out of the forest. He had a fine black beard. He came up to the place where she was working and asked her for her pipe, saying, 'Please hand me your pipe and

G 602 /190 cont./ As a result of this 191 institution, the prohibitions between a woman and the older B brothers of her husband are very strict, and, on the other 602 hand, with respect to the younger brothers of her husband 582 prohibitions are absent. The content of the prohibition (forbidding 174 the man to sit on the bed of his khadym, to see her naked, etc.) 835 is evidence that this prohibition had the exclusive aim of preventing sexual intercourse.

V.

The Genesis of the Gilyak Marriage Norms and the Kinship Terminology

G We have examined the norms of sexual intercourse and *174 have seen that they completely correspond to the kinship ● 60 terminology. Now it is necessary for us to proceed to a consideration of how this complicated system of kinship and marriage was formed, what sort of psychic substratum gave rise to the system. Obviously, such a complicated system could not arise artificially. It must have developed, without a doubt, out of one simple principle, a clear /191/ categorical imperative for the primitive man, out of which there must have grown, as from a seed, that complicated organism of Gilyak institutions which has been examined by us in such great detail. Along with the genesis of this system, however, it is necessary for us to explain also the long evolution of this system, without an understanding of which a whole series of peculiarities of the kinship nomenclature will seem completely inexplicable and, as it were, out of keeping with the general system.

/191 cont./

*174 Why, for example, do the wives of the most distant tu
● 60 although they may be completely alien to each other, call each other sisters? Why do I, a man, call my father-in-la although he may be a complete stranger, my "mother's bro and under the same conditions a woman call her mother-in the "sister of her father"? Why, if I am a man and marry a woman who is a complete alien to me and to my clan, fro that moment on do all the sisters of her father, even the un married ones, become my mothers, and no one from her cl can marry the women from my clan?

[614] Why is it that the women of my clan cannot marry into not only that clan from which anyone from my clan takes a wife, but any clan from which this latter clan takes wives? In what way could the apparently paradoxical fact that a m can have male and female agnates (sons, daughters, brothe fathers, and mothers) in clans completely alien to him hav

*174 come about? This confusion and apparent absurdity can be 58 explained only by the fact that the primitive, simple, and 60 logically consistent system of marriage, like every religiou [183] norm, has created around itself by a peculiarity natural to it a fabric of extended norms. On the other hand, under th [198] influence of historical conditions and the conditions of life, it underwent a gradual extension and complication, while at the same time the kinship terminology, as an element which by its own nature, in view of its formality, was disti guished by its extreme stability, remained unchangeable. What was the scheme of primitive marriage like? In certa places in our exposition we have already discussed it. Now must elucidate this question in all its fullness. The detailed analysis both of the prohibitive and of the permissive norm marriage that we made in the preceding chapter has shown these norms completely correspond to the kinship terminolo In other words, the whole intricate Gilyak kinship terminol is nothing more than an automatic registry of the marriage

[198] tem. This faithful registrar, so stable in the face of all cha

4:Ivanov et al. E-4 (no date) 1964 RX2 Gilyak RX2

Footwear, robes and overcoats were made of specially prepared skins of carp, Siberian salmon and pike, as well as seal and elk skin, dog-fur, etc. 291 237

Before the Revolution, neither men nor women cut their hair; they wore it braided—the men, in a single braid, the women, in two braids. 302

Social Relations and Religion

Problems of the ancient social order of the Nivkhi are particularly interesting in connection with the study of the origins of the family and marriage. Thanks to the well-known works of the Russian ethnographer L. Ya. Shternberg, we have a detailed descritpion of the clan organization of the Nivkhi (or Gilyaks, as they were called in the past) at the end of the last century. Shternberg conducted ethnographic studies of the Nivkhi for a number of years, and collected materials which attracted the attention of F. Engels. Engels wrote about Shternberg's work in a special article, "A Recently Discovered Instance of Group Marriage" (first published in Die Neue Zeit, 1892, and later, as an appendix to "The Origin of the Family, Private Property, and the State"). 114

The Nivkhi were divided into exogamous clans (kk'khal), of which there were several dozen. Most of their names were taken from rivers, such as: Mybing, i.e., "those who live on the My River," Chombing—"those who live on the Chom River," and so on. Already in Shternberg's time, the Nivkhi clans no longer represented territorial and economic entities. A Nivkhi village was inhabited by members of various clans. However, the Nivkhi clan preserved many forms of social ties among clan kinsmen, expressed chiefly in family and marriage norms, and in religious rituals and customs. 614

The Nivkhi clan was patriarchal, with but a few relics of the more ancient matriarchal order. These relics included the special relationship with the mother's brother, who took part in receiving ransom for the murder of his sister's son, and also the custom of sending gifts and a share of every catch to sons- or brothers-in-law—which may have been a remnant of matrilocal marriage. [60]

The Nivkhi clan was a group of kinsmen along the male line, bound by strictly observed rules of clan exogamy: mutual duties in payment of blood-money (tkhusind), which replaced the vendetta among the Nivkhi; participation of clan members in the payment of bride-price and burial expenses; and the common clan cult (clan fire, clan organization of the bear festival, the clan storehouse for ritual objects, etc.).

In distinction to the Tunguso-Manchurian peoples of the Amur region, the Nivkhi took their wives, not from the clan to which they gave their women, but from a third clan. Thus, each clan was bound by marriage ties to at least two other clans. For example, the Khyyyegnung clan took its women from the Kegnang, the Kegnang from the Tykfing, and the latter from the Khyyyegnung. This was connected with the Nivkhi rule, which, in distinction to those of their Tunguso-Manchurian neighbors, permitted a man to marry the daughter of his mother's brother, but not the daughter of his father's sister. The clan from which men of a given clan took their wives was the former's akhmal'k (father-in-law); conversely, the clan to which the women of a given clan were given was called ymg'i (son-in-law). Hence, the Nivkhi themselves defined the clan as follows: "We have one (i.e., a common) akhmal'k (father-in-law), one ym'gi (son-in-law), one fire, one bear, one tkhusind (blood-money), and one sin."

601

601 KINSHIP TERMINOLOGY--lists and application of kinship terms; genes kinship charts; use of kinship terms relative to personal names and tek differentiation of vocative and referential forms; morphological typolog elementary, derivative, and descriptive terms); number of elementary incidence of denotative and classificatory terms; classificatory distinct served and overridden (e.g., generation, sex, affinity, collaterality, b tion, polarity, relative age, speaker's sex, decedence); classification avuncular and nepotic terms (e.g., bifurcate collateral, bifurcate merg lineal, generation); classification of cousin terminology (e.g., Eskimo Hawaiian, Iroquois, Crow, Sudanese, Omaha); correlation between ter and patterns of behavior; historical and functional interpretations of kin systems; etc. See also:

Dynastic genealogies . . . . . 173 Personal names and teknonymy . . . . . .
Linguistic relationships 197

/113 cont./

Finally -- and this is particularly necessary to note -- it is not at all obligatory that at the head of large families with a common economy there should be elders in years; most frequently, on the contrary, they are young people who have distinguished themselves by their activity, resourcefulness, and zeal, in a word, by their personal talents. Old men enjoy /114/ authority only with regard to special questions, as the preservers of traditions, as experts in the rituals and history of the family-clan relations. They are consulted on confusing questions of kinship and in the giving of names; it is they who must supervise the ritual aspect of festivals, but this does not give them any power or advantages.

And that which is absent in the family -- the despotism of the eldest, the head -- is also lacking in the clan. It knows neither despotic elders-patriarchs nor any permanent authorities in general, collective or individual, neither elected ones nor any by right of birth and inheritance.

The clan is not a fiction, however; it is a complicated institution, surrounding the Gilyak with a thick net of regulations, prohibitions, and obligations, but at the same time providing him with all the benefits, material and spiritual, of a firm social union.

We thus return to the question that we raised at the end of the preceding section. Where are the driving forces of the mechanism of this almighty institution -- the clan, where is the secret of the amazing combination of the closest community with a complete absence of despotism, of all-embracing wardship and regulation with the absence of compulsion and the maintenance of individual freedom?

This secret is contained in two conditions: 1) the simplicity of economic conditions and relations, which offers a broad scope to the comprehensive development of the powers and abilities of the individual and their free application to the wide-open gifts of nature equally free to all; and, secondly, the entire socio-religious world-outlook, which quite spontaneously, without any external pressure, directs the will and activity of each toward the harmony of the common interest, substituting for external compulsion the force of the inner consciousness of each.

/375 cont./

831 code of civilizati frivolous, from o
of husbands, the
the part of public to cohabit (true, of which I spoke stated, adultery i shall add that the propensities which journeys for a ren them into unreaso woman by force o

• 596 The structure of t complex families household with all brothers who are e equipment of thei the family. Not their clansmen, e early age. It som her son-in-law an

594 cially when the la ties in the make-shall say that the work, is the paren

593 ones pass into the 594 members of the f bling the patriarc family; /376/ th does not wield ov appellation of pa
the family of the
with the father, t

[428] The elder son doe on the contrary, father until his d
inheritance

on. In their actions the Gilyak are no less ur point of view. Despite the vengeful jealousy sins of love do not evoke any censure or scorn on opinion, and still less is it considered abnormal not openly) with individuals of those categories above. But within the clan, as I have already s not to be met with, even as an exception. I Gilyak youth has certain chivalrous-romantic h not only impel young people to make long dezvous with their beloved, but frequently drive nable enterprises, such as the abduction of a f arms.

he Gilyak family. One often encounters large in which the aged father lives in a common l his children and their children. The master's either incapacitated for work or do not possess r own frequently enter into the composition of infrequently the family accepts the orphans of specially orphans left without a mother at an metimes happens that the mother-in-law lives with d sons-in-law with their mothers-in-law, espeatter have no sons. We shall note other peculiariup of the family farther on; for the present we normal composition of the family, its frame-ts, the sons and the unmarried daughters (married clan of the husband). In the relations of the amily among themselves there is nothing resem-hal relations of, for example, the old Roman e sons show respect for the father, but the latter er them that power which is known under the ria potestas. Adult sons can freely depart from father and live in separate households. Living he son can acquire for himself his own property.
s not enjoy any advantages over his brothers, and, he youngest sons, as those who live with the ath, enjoy special advantages in the matter of
.

597

597 ADOPTION--extent to which children are adopted or exchanged; motives an procedure; status of adopted children; reciprocal relations of adoptive pare and adopted children; relations between adoptive siblings; special types of adoption (e.g., adoption of adults, posthumous adoption; ceremonial adoptio
etc. See also:

Guardianship	429	Care of orphans	7
Adoption of slaves	567	Posterage	8
Artificial kin relationships	608	Status of children	8
Adoption of captives	727

/xxvii cont./

*114 595 "Furthermore, the whole matter is interesting in that it one again shows how similar or even identical the institutions of such primitive peoples at almost the same level of development are in their basic features. A large part of what is related in this accou on Sakhalin is fully applicable to the Dravidian tribes of India, th inhabitants of the Pacific Islands, and, at the time of their discovery, the redskins."

*114 In conclusion Engels gives in full the translation of the ne paper account of Shternberg's article. Regarding the material un covered from the newspaper account, F. Engels wrote L. IA. Shternberg a letter, as the latter told me in a private conversatio Unfortunately, the search for this letter, undertaken in the archiv [13] of Shternberg, has as yet yielded no results. "Sakhalinskie giliak appeared in print in full in the journal Etnograficheskoe Obozreni for 1893. In this work by Shternberg the strong influence of Engel book, Proiskhozhdenie sem'i, chastnoi sobstvennosti, i gosudarstv is felt. Engels' influence neutralized to a significant degree the psychological approach of Shternberg, and "Sakhalinskie giliaki" is undoubtedly the most materialistic work to come from his pen.

*114 ● 601 595 Shternberg's discovery among the Gilyak of group marriag and a classificatory system of kinship, which, furthermore, preserved certain terms lost in less primitive systems, strikingly confirmed the views of Engels, who looked on group marriage as an explicit, universal step in the history of marriage, and on the classificatory system as a true indicator of the sexual norms that formerly existed. The classificatory system of kinship among the [171] Gilyak described by Shternberg turned out to be similar to the Turano-Ganowanian in type. Furthermore, "it is the best examp of the Turanian system," says Shternberg himself, "besides being *114 the best preserved and giving the best correlation (1). With this

1. "The Turano-Ganowanian System," p. 323.

/xxviii/ discovery Shternberg filled in the gap in the scientific literature on primitive social relations, for which there were no

/30 cont./

221 purchase fish, while in many places (for example, on the T the inhabitants set out in whole settlements to travel several dred kilometers to the seashore for the spring seal-hunting, to return half a year later for the fall run of fish in their nat 574 places. The Gilyak likes to travel, however, even without 517 serious reasons for it. To make visits, receive guests, arran [484] celebrations, and live gregariously are the greatest pleasures [157] the Gilyak. Gloomy and stern while alone, he is transforme society and becomes playful, gay, and garrulous.

342 In the north, in winter, between 30 and 40 people live 157 the big yurts of the Manchu type. It is here that sociablene which is inherent anyway in the conditions of the social fram 128 work of the Gilyak, is cultivated. Now, however, we must the external aspect of the life of the Gilyak and pass to its in ternal structure, with whose unique peculiarities I intend ma to acquaint my readers.

III.

Kinship System. Marriage Norms and Their Influence on the Family-Clan Structure.

601 171 174

Of all the peculiarities of the Gilyak way of life nothi characteristically distinguishes them from the surrounding na alities as their classificatory system of kinship and the rules regulate their sexual relations and marriage. In this respect Gilyak stand equally far from their southern neighbors, the A and from the Tungus tribes that surround them. The Ainu ar only nationality of the Priamur krai who have preserved feat [611] maternality /materniteta/. The Gilyak family and clan are [614] patriarchal institutions. As for the Tungus tribes, although t [595] classificatory system of kinship and certain characteristics of marriage analogous to those discovered by me in 1891 among Gilyak were discovered by me among them, a careful compa of this institution among the Tungus tribes and among the Gi leads to the conclusion that they /31/ belong to quite differe

/85 cont./

*614 •597
[927]

This took place in various ways. It might happen that an epidemic depopulated the clan and put a handful of people face to face with all the vicissitudes to which unions weak in numbers were subject. The clan might be depopulated after a severe war, leaving a small number of men and a mass of widows spared by the victorious foe by virtue of the international law of the Gilyak. And if under these conditions there existed remnants of some other clan that found itself in a similarly helpless position and not standing in the relation of akhmal'k and vmgi with respect to the first clan, then a fusion was effected to their mutual satisfaction. The adopted individuals ordinarily married the widows of clansmen and thereby united themselves with the clan fire and the clan union. But these are more or less extraordinary cases. The most common case of adoption is that where the person adopted by the clan is a member of another clan, fleeing for some reason from his own clan and settling down in the midst of an alien clan. Long residence, habit, sympathy, assistance given at clan festivals, and, finally, marriage to a local widow lead to the final adoption. An extremely curious case of adoption is that where two persons of different clans are married to two sisters, which, according to the law, can only take place with members of one clan. The influence of the clan principle of a "common father-in-law" is so strong /86/ that the children of such persons are considered brothers and sisters, call their aunts mothers, and cannot marry each other. A fiction of clan relationships results. Under favorable conditions, when, for example, such persons live together in one village and one of them is completely severed from his clan, the result is that they help each other at clan festivals, or even arrange them together, lay the bones of the bear in one place, and, finally, in the second or third generation the union of the clans is completed.

/86 cont./

14 Adoption has played an enormous role in the life of 597 the Gilyak. I do not know a single clan whose legends do 173] not contain accounts of members of other tribes as the founders of the clan. I have already discussed in the first section how it happened that separate adopted individuals instead of the established element came to be the first and foremost founders of the clan, indicating that the newcomers, as the more energetic element, brought with them a greater endurance in the struggle for existence and a la longue /in the long run/ survived the less staunch, enfeebled aborigines who were gradually dying out. Such, it may be, is the law of a fixed supply of racial energy, which finally runs low under unfavorable conditions. The descendants of the newcomers do not escape this fate, of course; they in turn will be replaced by newcomers, if the clan as a whole is able to preserve its existence that long.

14 Now I will add only the following to what I have 597 said earlier. It may seem strange that a clan formed out of 173 aborigines and the descendants of newcomers should nevertheless categorically consider its founders the former and not the latter /sic/. But here is how the matter is explained.
Despite the fusion of the clan with the newcomer, the old feeling of kinship continues in effect. The descendants of both sides, while fulfilling their clan obligations, nevertheless do not incorporate, but continue to maintain themselves as separate groups, each keeping its own account of kinship according to tradition. I observed this more than once in those clans in which there were descendants of aborigines and newcomers. In the settlement of Tangivo, for example, settled by the representatives of a single clan, one half (the most prosperous) traces its origin from an Ainu newcomer, the others consider themselves aborigines.
When in the course of time the latter become extinct -- which is already noticeable -- it is natural that the former, who will remain the only representatives of the clan, will

/86 cont./

*614 with full right call the Ainu their founders. And so it is ● 597 everywhere.
173

Ordinarily, however, the composition of the clan is homogeneous, cases of /87/ adoption are quite rare, and the earlier phenomena of endosmosis and exosmosis have long effaced themselves behind the mists of legend, and they show no influence on the integrity of the conscious kinship union.

*614 2. One fire. The common clan fire is the symbol of 372 clan unity. As among all primitive peoples, fire is a clan 776 deity for the Gilyak. In each hearth there sits, according to one conception, the old woman of the fire, the ancestress of the given clan; according to others, an old man and woman with their descendants. The role of these "masters of the fire" is not only in the beneficial activity of the benevolent burning element. As the divine ancestors of the clan, they are held in respect not only by their living clansmen, but also by those who, having gone to the other world, have become the clan gods of other elements, the forest, the sea, etc., and through these they can exert a mighty influence in all spheres of human existence.

Thus, the master or mistress of the fire is not only a deity that warms man and protects his domestic hearth from any evil machinations of the spirits, but is also an intermediary (1) between the clansmen and all the numerous deities

[171]

1. In the Vedas, fire (Agni) also plays the role of intermediary between human beings and the gods; he intercedes for human beings, he is herald and priest.

who influence the fate of man.

/174 cont./

*835 In clans where a distinction is made between the wives of 614 younger and of older "brothers," this right was formulated for me still more boldly: "among clansmen, in one and the same clan everything is permitted ('good'), the wife of an older (brother) is my wife all the same." This undoubted and primordial right of a man to the "wives" of his tuvn is invariably exercised throughout all the Gilyak territory up to the present time, with the sole limitation that we mentioned above, i.e., sexual intercourse should not take place before the eyes of the individual husband of the woman and, as far *835 as possible, not publicly. The right of the individual spouse, 593 of course, is peremptory -- he can demand from his wife fulfillment of her marital and economic obligations and that she ● [597] follow him through /175/ any change of dwelling. He has a formally exclusive right to the children that she bears, but quite often a Gilyak, if he has several children, considers it his duty to give away one of his infants to a childless tuvn of his, if the latter lives in another settlement. But also the subsidiary right of a wife and her group husbands in the person of his "brothers" to sexual intercourse is just as indisputable. It is true, the group spouses must look for a suitable opportunity in order, in the absence of the individual spouse (during his sleep or outside the home), to enjoy their rights, but there are more than enough such opportunities. A man passes the [484] greater part of his time away from home: either he is at the 512 river catching fish, or he is away hunting for whole weeks at [222] a time, or he is traveling, visiting. On the other hand, the women also absent themselves for whole days, going into the *835 taiga for berries, roots, etc. Finally, intercourse is possible at night in the presence of the sleeping husband. In a word, the exercise of the right of group marriage does not present any particular difficulties. The bachelor tuvn most of all [837] fully enjoy this right. Married men resort to it in their own settlement usually only in case of some sort of particular passion for this or that group an'g:ei, but outside of their settlement, when they happen to be away from their individual

/200 cont./

614 clan to change residence and to withdraw more and more 178 from their kinsmen. Before my eyes, in the course of a few 166 years, whole clans -- family after family -- in search of *174 more advantageous hunting and fishing sites, moved to the most remote regions, from the Tym' to Taraika (in the territory of the Ainu), to the Amur, etc. Discord between clansmen and wars play a specific role in the dispersion. In the chapter on the history of the clans we saw what a huge role these factors played in the shuffling and distribution. A clear illustration is presented by the history of the Pilavo clan that we introduced; from /201/ the southernmost outlying districts of the Gilyak territory, bordering on the Ainu, they migrated first to the northernmost part of the western shore, near Cape Marii, and from there a part of them moved to the lower reaches of the Amur and, finally, to the middle Amur, almost in the environs of Khabarovsk, where they became completely Goldified. It is true, all the numerous branches of this so widely scattered clan, although they have not even preserved any ties among themselves, have remained exogamous up to the present, but to continue their old phratral marital relations has been completely impossible for them. To a greater or lesser degree, such phenomena are taking place even now. This is precisely the reason why in real life, just as in the epos, it happens again and again that a Gilyak must travel hundreds of versts to find a wife from the proper clan, but such individual acts of heroism cannot be performed by everyone, and willy-nilly there remain exceptions. Most often such a lone person is
● [597] obliged to have himself adopted into an alien clan and to marry the widow of a member of the adoptive clan and thus completely separate himself from his old phratry.

If it is not just unmarried individuals who move, but whole families, then their offspring willy-nilly begin to enter into marital unions with the nearer clans.

/358 cont./

614 628 72 in boats or sleds, according to the time of the year. The attack was ordinarily made at night. In expectation of it, the whole adult male population, armed, /359/ gathered in one yurt. The women and children remained alone in other yurts, since, by the international law of the Gilyak, the women, children, and also the property of the foe was inviolate in time of war. In each [342] yurt there was a secret exit in case of an unexpected attack. At the first alarm of war they went out by the secret passage and organized an ambuscade somewhere beyond the yurts. The struggle continued for the night in one variant, longer according to others, but there is no doubt that there was a customary period of time for slaughter. Upon the expiration of the allotted period of time, the foe departed, while those attacked began to count the dead. If a smaller number had fallen on their side than on the side of the assailants, the affair had no sequel; otherwise they were obliged to reply to the attack with war. The attacking side, in any case, had to consider itself satisfied. For the [501] eventuality of meeting at sea an enemy boat which might wish to exchange arrows, boats had a movable parapet in the forward part for defense against the foe's arrows.

411 Concerning the former warlike propensities of the Gilyak, we have the eloquent testimony of the heavy spears with silver fretwork, guarded today as a treasure, which even quite recently served for more than mere decoration.

614 597 7. In certain instances, but quite rarely, the clan adopts persons from another clan. It was always profitable for a clan to have as many members as possible. On the other hand, the existence of an individual outside of the clan or hostile toward his own clan was a terribly burdensome thing. During the census some of the persons encountered declared that their entire clan had died out. In such cases and similar ones an alien clan came [729] to their assistance with the right of adoption. Undoubtedly in time of war, when the whole male adult population might fall in battle, the women entered the clan of the conquerors in the capacity of wives, while the children of the male sex were adopted en masse. The adopted individual is accepted into some

/359 cont./

614 597 family in the capacity of a son or brother and is so considered in the clan. In one settlement on northern Sakhalin, I met a flourishing and numerous family, which many years ago had been adopted by the principal clan of the settlement. It had appeared from the shores of Okhotsk, poor and hungry, and asked to be taken into a clan of the settlement, which meant that it must be fed and supported until better times. At the present /360/ time this family is the pride of the clan which adopted it. But, in general, instances of adoption are rare, especially by families, for the number of women whom it is permissible to marry is thereby restricted for the clan (marriage within the clan is prohibited, as has been said above).

614 426 8. The clan constitutes a juridical unit with regard to the debts of the clansmen. In the event of the insolvency of a clansman and his closest kinsmen, the clan is obliged to assume the debt of the insolvent person.

614 428 9. As a general rule, property must not leave the clan of a deceased person. Concerning inheritance in particular we shall speak elsewhere. For the present we shall say only that in this regard among the Gilyak the well-known rule of the Twelve Tables finds literal application: "Si suos heredes non habet, gentiles familiam habento" (in the absence of close kinsmen, the clan is the heir).

614 736 768 10. The khal' regulates the affairs of the community. We have already seen its role in affairs of clan vengeance. When a Gilyak dies, the khal'-nivukhi decide to which of the deceased man's "ruvn" his widow and children should go. Before the gather- [763] ing of his clansmen, the dying Gilyak makes known his last wishes.

614 627 In general, no extraordinary event takes place without the participation of the clan. Quarrels between clansmen are settled, not by all the clansmen, but by those who are generally recognized in the clan as respected, eloquent, and wise persons (khlay-nivukh). In the event of a quarrel between individuals of different clans, a mixed gathering of khlay-nivukhi settles the [685] affair. In this way, for instance, cases of theft are settled

/382 cont./

428 [768] inheritance immediately. If the widow is old and there is even one young or grown-up son among her children, the family continues to live as it did during the father's lifetime. The grown-up son will be the sustainer and worker of the family. A question of the division of the inheritance only arises when the children, coming of age, subsequently desire to separate. If a Gilyak dies without leaving children, or only leaving children of the female sex, the property passes to that brother of the deceased who marries the widow; if the inheritance is a large one, the other brothers and daughters of the deceased, even the married ones, share in the inheritance. A childless and aged [768] widow passes into the care of the brothers of the deceased, who divide the inheritance among themselves. It is necessary to note 428 597 that a Gilyak without children or sons takes measures in good time to make sure that he will have an heir of the male sex, which always coincides with the necessity of having an assistant-worker in the maintenance of the household and a sustainer in his old age. With this aim the Gilyak adopts the son of one of his ruvn or a poor clansman-ruvn, who works together with him and is his heir. It 428 is noteworthy that even when there are children, a person who has worked in the family for a long time receives a share of the [606] inheritance. Sons-in-law who work with their father-in-law until his death are without a question his heirs, according to the wish of the testator. Heirs of the male sex receive equal shares of the inheritance. Only in a case where a younger son has lived with his father up to the very time of his death, while the other brothers have separated, does he obtain a little more than the other brothers.

673 [674] Juridical Morals. Among the Sakhalin Gilyak one hardly ever encounters crimes of a mercenary character. The Gilyak keeps his treasures in the storehouse, which is never shut. The Gilyak calmly leaves valuable objects in the taiga, on the road, in an uninhabited summer dwelling, without fearing for their safety. In my presence a Gilyak left in the taiga, two steps from the road, a piece of silk material and a valuable spear. "No one [422] will take it" he said calmly. /383/ If a Gilyak is sometimes tempted by the possessions of another, it is always in the field of

60

60 KINSHIP--general statements dealing with several specific aspect eral characteristics and component terminology of kinship system specific patterns of behavior prevailing between kinsmen who do n the same nuclear or polygamous family. For kin relationships wi of family structure see 593.

1: Shternberg

601

/For an intensive study of the Gilyak kinship classificati see category 116, pp. 196-226./

RX2 Gilyak RX2

on system and its significance,

/84 cont./

614 587 768 his death as well. One of his brothers, according to the decision of the clan, will replace him in the rights and obligations of husband and father, and even where the deceased has no younger brothers, the supporter of his family will be one of the "elders." Such is the immutable law of the clan.

*614 848 Such are the advantages which the clan union offers by virtue of the single principle of kinship and the marriage norms which directly issue from it. It is completely natural that these blessings can be enjoyed only by those who have a right to them by virtue of kinship. The fact of being born to a clansman is the only justus /85/ titulus to being counted in the clan. Ytk-khavrnd -- a man without a father, i.e., born out of wedlock, not knowing who his father is -- is a man without a clan, a pariah, a burden to himself and others. One who does not know the identity of his father and consequently does not know to which clan he belongs, therefore does not know which women can be his wives and which are forbidden and, unbeknownst to himself and others, may violate the sacred sexual norms, incurring incalculable disasters upon all. Fortunately, there are in fact no persons who do not know their fathers. If a girl becomes pregnant out of wedlock, they compel her to name the father of the future child. Having learned who he is, they compel him to marry the seduced girl, which he is only too glad to do, because in such a situation there are fewer difficulties about paying the bride price. In the event of disavowal on the girl's part, they slay the newborn child, and the clan is saved from sin and unhappiness.

*614 597 The Gilyak clan, however, did not succeed in retaining the principle of kinship inviolate and in perfect purity. Like the clan unions of all other peoples, it had to make a deviation and reconcile itself with the institution of adoption, with the acceptance into its bosom from time to time of individuals from other clans.

nt to which children are adopted or ex of adopted children; reciprocal relat ren; relations between adoptive siblin doption of adults, posthumous adoptio

. . . . . 429 Care of orphans . .
. . . . . 567 Fosterage . . . .
hips . . . . . 608 Status of children .
. 727

changed; motives and tions of adoptive parents gs; special types of n; ceremonial adoption);

. 736
. 853
. 858

/32 cont./

regular marriage, but preserve the rights to sexual intercourse even when the individuals of these categories are joined in an individual marriage. Being joined in a legitimate, as it were, individual marriage, the wife at the same time enjoys the right privately, i.e., in the absence of her husband, to have intercourse with persons of the group of men whom she calls pu, ivn (husband). Most often, of course, this right is exercised by the brothers of her husband, his own or of further degrees of kinship, living with him in the same village, but even men who have newly arrived, often complete strangers passing through the settlement by chance, if they regard themselves, even by the most distant kinship, as "pu" of the given woman, freely /33/ exercise this right, with, of course, the consent of the woman. During my travels over Sakhalin, my companions from the western shore, appearing with me in a distant settlement on the eastern shore of the island, in which neither they nor their fathers had ever been, but in which, according to their genealogical information, there lived a woman of the an'gej category, freely exercised their rights, when the husband was not in the yurt, of course. This phenomenon is completely identical with what is said about the Australian kroki and kumiti, who will find a marital bed everywhere, even at the farthest points of their territory, on the condition that the husbands are kumi and the beautiful strangers are kroki.

In character, these norms of sexual intercourse most closely resemble the same such norms in the Australian Dieri tribe, among whom the two kinds of sexual intercourse mentioned are clearly registered by the terms noa and piruari (1). Among them each

1. "Australian Group Relations," by Howitt (Papers relating to Anthropology contrib. to the Smithsonian Institute, 1885), pp. 12 f.

woman is joined in individual, legitimate marriage to a single man, and the spouses call each other noa; but at the same time she is joined in a group marriage with a whole category of men,

/44 cont./
614 mother. but it is natural that practically it was inconvenient to 615 extend the prohibitions to the akhmal'ki of all degrees of kin-616 ship. and it was rarely necessary to go beyond the akhmal'k of the second degree. to which the prohibition was limited. But with the appearance of this prohibition. the tri-clan phratry ceased to satisfy the new conditions of the regulation. Exclusive marriage within three clans became impossible. because in a tri-clan phratry (see the table) clan S in the akhmal'k of the first degree for V and of the second degree for A: consequently. the women of clan A cannot marry into clan S. It was necessary to add to the phratry a fourth clan, D (Dmitri.
Dar'ya). let us say. The changes that occurred in our phratry consisted in the fact that Stepan's wife (clan S) would now be Dmitri's (clan D) sister. while the latter would have as his wife a sister of Andrei (clan A). Since in more distant times. the prohibitions undoubtedly spread to the akhmal'ki of more distant degrees. the phratries naturally /45/ had to consist of an ever greater number of clans. At the present time. when. due to the reasons mentioned above. it is necessary in the selection of wives to resort to completely alien clans. the phratry has naturally lost its former. strictly closed position.

It is not hard to imagine how much genealogical information one must have with regard to this complicated. confused system. in order to correctly decide. in each given case. on the right to marry of some member of a clan. And. actually. this constitutes a whole science. to which a Gilyak dedicates himself from his earliest childhood.

IV.

171 Some Conclusions from the Norms of Gilyak Marriage.
260
582

I have already said that Gilyak kinship nomenclature and their norms of marriage in general do not represent an isolated case. An analogous nomenclature and analogous phenomena of group marriage are found among a mass of primitive peoples [170] in the most remote parts of the world. But the details that I

/45 cont./
174 have attempted to clarify here and the history of the development of the institution which I sketched are capable. I think.
582 of shedding light on certain phenomena of primitive marriage 601 which heretofore have been completely isolated and separate.

171 1) First of all. the clan organization of the Gilyak makes 174 completely clear to us why among many peoples. as. for example. among the Batak on Sumatra. a wife or a mistress is 582 called "a son of the father's sister" -- ibibere-ri-datangi or 601 among the Gond (Gondy) of the province of Satpūras in central 614 India where a marriage between male cousins and female cousins is almost compulsory when the brother has a daughter and the sister a son. These separate facts remained unexplained up to now and are. therefore, perhaps fragments of a once common clan organization similar to the one that I found among the Gilyak (1).

[114] 1. It is remarkable that up to the present time some scientists are skeptical of even the actual fact of the discovery of marriage norms identical with those of the Gilyak. Thus. quite recently it was discovered that among the Hottentot marriage is permitted between a man and the daughter of his mother's brother and. conversely is forbidden between a woman and a son of her mother's brother (exactly as among the Gilyak). while Köhler. presenting this fact. and the author of the article on Köhler's work in Année Sociologique both doubt the possibility of such norms. even though they were known to McLennan. See J. Kohler. "Das Recht der Hottentots." in Zeitschrift f. vergleich. Rechtswissenschaft. Vol. XVI. No. 3. pp. 341-342. and L'Année Sociologique. 11th year. p. 306.

/46 cont./
615 but Stepanova; her daughter (a granddaughter of Varvara's). in 616 turn. from birth. as the wife of one of the Vasil'evs (of clan V) 582 would be called Vasil'eva. but. the daughter of this last. i.e., Varvara's great-granddaughter. would have to be the wife of one of the Andreev (of clan A) /47/ and thus. in the third generation. she would again bear the class sobriquet of her great-grandmother.

582 6) As we have seen. Gilyak marriage to a considerable ex-601 tent simplifies our understanding of the complicated kinship nomenclature. For in the Gilyak system of marriage many categories of the Turanian system of relations. which at first sight appear completely independent. are in fact identical. such as. for example. wives of brothers. sisters of the wife. and sisters of the wives of brothers turn out to be the same persons. just like mothers. wives of the father's brothers. sisters of the father-in-law. sisters of the mother. etc.

But these are all facts of a secondary character. It seems to me that the scheme of Gilyak marriage can shed light on certain basic questions about primitive marriage.

1) From an analysis of the norms of Gilyak marriage. we have seen that from the simple. single rule that men must marry daughters of their mother's brother. there inevitably arise by natural necessity such complex institutions as group marriage. the clan. the phratry. and finally marriage prohibitions.

171 2) An analysis of the Gilyak regulations sheds light on the 582 genesis of the institution of abduction in general and in particu-614 lar. on the strange institution of mock abduction. an institution 616 which is practiced among such primitive peoples as the Aus-[171] tralians and the Eskimo. and. furthermore. in such strange forms that it is quite impossible to consider it a simple remnant of actual abduction. as is normally thought. Let us recall again our tri-clan phratry with its norms of marriage. Clan A must take wives from clan V and give up its women to clan S. We shall remember that in the primitive stages of development such obligations are religious imperatives. the violation of

/81 cont./
*614 First of all. the very term that the Gilyak use to express [192] the concept "clan" is of interest. It is khal', which literally means: scabbard. sheath -- a felicitous symbol for a single womb. for unity of origin. As concerns the features of their clan union. the Gilyak formulate them with surprising terseness. vividly /82/ illustrating their fully conscious attitude toward the basic institution of their social life (1).

[191] 1. It is extremely interesting that the 601 similar term khala /see the transliterat-[190] ion system for Tungus-Manchu words. p. 36/ also exists among the neighboring Tungus tribes -- the Orok. Orochi. Goldi. Negda. with whom the Gilyak have certain common kinship designations. as. for example. aki (elder brother) = aga (among the Tungus tribes). in spite of the complete dissimilarity of the languages of these peoples lexically and grammatically.

601 If you ask any Gilyak why he considers some persons (NN) his kinsmen. you will invariably get one answer: "Of course. we have akhmal'k (father-in-law) -- one (i.e., in common). ymgi /see ymgi. p. 82/ (son-in-law /zyat'/) -- one. fire -- one. mountain man. sea man. heavenly man. earth man. etc. -- one. bear -- one. devil -- one. tkhusind (blood money) -- one. sin -- one."

An analysis of this formula will also lead us to an elucidation of the content of the clan union.

1. Akhmal'k -- one. ymgi -- one; a common father-in-law. a common son-in-law (zyat'). The father-in-law of one clansman is father-in-law to the whole clan. Each clan in principle takes its women from one certain clan and in turn gives its women strictly to another certain clan. A common

/163 cont./
*614 from its lair). sable hunting. and especially the hunting of 615 sea animals in boats. And it is noteworthy that in these 616 instances the Gilyak most frequently invites the participation.
[192] not of his clansmen. but of the ymgi. and not necessarily those married to his sister or daughter. but ymgi in general. i.e., the young men from that clan which takes its wives from him. The Gilyak feels more at ease with them than he does with his own /164/ clansmen; he can freely converse and joke with them. while he may not do this. as we know. with all of his clansmen. In turn. in the akhmal'k clan the ymgi feel like a fish in water. all the women of their generation are their an'yej (wives) -- all future wives and at any rate women to whom at any time they have conjugal rights in the broadest sense of the term. As concerns the local young male population. they find their revenge in the clan of their akhmal'k'i. where they meet the same reception from their "fathers-in-law" and among their numerous "wives." Between *614 the male youth of both clans ("navkh'i") (1). as a result of 615
608
601 1. Let us recall that ymgi and the "brothers" of their "wives" mutually call themselves navkh'i.

frequent meetings. not to mention relationship by marriage. the most touching relations are established. It is in these surroundings that friendships flower most of all. Among the Gilyak the practice of ceremonial brotherhood is very much in vogue. Ordinarily it manifests itself in the periodic exchange of presents. mutual aid in misfortune. and other such services. But the most touching instances of ceremonial brotherhood may be found among the navkh'i. Here is one such example. especially surprising to me. which I chanced to observe in the 601 settlement of Ngambevo on the eastern shore of Sakhalin. Both friends. "navkh'i." lived in one yurt; they had everything in common. went about together like lovers. almost never separated -- a modern Orestes and Pylades. They were both.

/160 cont./
582 individual wife always lives in one house with her husband.
121 works with him. raises children with him. and is obliged to follow him wherever he wishes. but at the same time she has the right to share her caresses with impunity also with a whole group of individuals to whom this is allowed by established rights. Life has sanctioned such individual alliances. the more so as economic interests here coincide with the other mighty motive of sexual selection. the individual inclination of representatives of the different sexes. For this very reason. along with irregular marital relations. individual unions appear. also sanctioned by society. An arrangement appears whereby a separate member of society may at the same time be joined in an individual marriage and in a group marriage. Persons who are joined in an individual marriage are bound not only by regular sexual intercourse and cohabitation. but also by a common economy and common offspring. At the same time. however. to each of them is given the lawful opportunity to have sexual intercourse with persons of their own marital group. And although such sexual intercourse takes place irregularly. often demands conditions of secrecy. and usually presupposes the consent of both parties to each act of intercourse. nevertheless it is just because this is socially recognized. lawful. that it does not provoke any reaction. either social or religious. and because it manifests itself legally -- for marriage is a term of law -- we ought to define such relations as marital relations. This is not only theoretically true; it coincides also with the juridical views of those peoples among whom these institutions exist. /161/ First of all.
601 the very kinship nomenclature itself. according to which individual and group spouses are not distinguished by appellation. is evidence of this. Further. these relations usually impose on the participants in a group marriage the same obligations as are imposed on individual husbands. Thus. for [587] example. when an individual husband dies. one of the members of the group marriage must replace the husband of the widow. even though she may no longer be capable of sexual

/161 cont./
582 intercourse; he must support her and her children. who usually 587 are also considered the children of all the members of the group.
121
835 Now the Gilyak marriage classes "pu" and "an'gej" become understandable to us. and we shall proceed to a detailed examination of them.

The classes "pu" and "an'gej." We have already said that for the Gilyak. at least at the present time. it is not prohibited either by religion or by the opinion of society to have sexual relations with or to marry any woman of his own tribe or a neighboring one. except for those women who are bound to him by one or another prohibitive term of kinship. But in relation to such alien women he has no rights whatever; illicit sexual intercourse is accompanied by the risk of bloody reaction on the part of a certain group of males. and individual marriage is a simple civil agreement accompanied by strict conditions of payment for the bride. The Gilyak most naturally therefore seeks sexual intercourse or a legal wife among the women with whom he has the right to do so. These are. namely. those women whom by the kinship 601 nomenclature. either from birth or from another specifically defined moment. he calls an'yej (wife). and he calls all 602 their agnates akhmak'i (fathers-in-law). We already know who these women are. They are. first of all: 1) the daughters of all the "brothers" of the mother; 2) all the "sisters" of the wife; 3) "sisters" of the wives of brothers; 4) "sisters" of the father-in-law of the son; 5) individual wives of all aki. i.e., of brothers who are older than the person speaking (among the majority of Gilyak); 6) individual wives of all "brothers" of the person speaking. without distinctions of age (in certain places).

601 Each woman. in turn. as we know. gives the name of husband. in addition to her own Gilyak husband. to: 1) all the sons of the sisters of her father; 2) all the husbands of her "sisters" and the "brothers" of these husbands; 3) all the younger "brothers" of her husband (if she is married to one of them). and among some -- all the brothers of her husband.

/161 cont./

835 All these categories of "wives" and "husbands" are far 601 from nominal /162/ categories. Behind these class terms (pu and aṅ̄ǵej) there are hidden two important real rights:
1) the right to individual marriage; 2) the right to sexual intercourse (group marriage).

Let us examine each of these rights in particular.
The right to individual marriage. Above all, the categories pu and aṅ̄ǵej are bound by the right to marry, in other words, out of the whole circle of persons bound together by kinship terms, only these alone have the right to join in individual marriage with each other; all the other categories of kinship groups are prohibited from marrying each other. But this right is not exhausted by the merely negative feature -- the absence of a prohibition on matrimonial ties. Certainly in the eyes of the Gilyak the mnemonic significance of these terms is of great importance in itself, for in view of the extreme complexity of kinship relations a firm knowledge of the marriageable classes is the only guarantee against violations of the very strict taboos on marriage in the prohibited degrees of kinship. Nevertheless the mnemonic-permissive significance of these terms does not at all exhaust their legal content. Prohibitions against marriage, as we have seen, are absent also among persons who are complete strangers to each other in the kinship relation, and nevertheless, for persons of these categories to call each other pu and aṅ̄ǵej before marriage is not tolerated. The right to individual marriage between persons in the pu and aṅ̄ǵej categories is not a naked nudum jus; this right is simultaneously an obligation, is a debt for both parties concerned. This obligation is seen first of all in the category of "brothers" and their individual wives, who are, as we know, joined mutually in the relationship of pu and aṅ̄ǵej. By the general rule the 580 widows of "brothers" (own and collateral) cannot leave the 614 clan, and they become, according to the disposition of the clansmen, the wives of the brothers who have survived their husbands, completely independently of the wishes of these brothers; none of them can decline the widow assigned to him.

/163 cont./

835 are the aṅ̄ǵej of the slayer. Then he immediately orders the 538 killer to be summoned to his house, that is, the man against whom blood vengeance is obligatory, although the killing was unpremeditated, the man whom it was the greatest sin to allow into his house; and in the presence of the assembled members of the clan he solemnly declares: "Although this man has killed me, give him my daughter. Do not fail to carry out my wish for any reason." Such is the force of the ancient categorical imperative of marriages between the categories of pu and aṅ̄ǵej. This imperative is also active nowadays.

Let us return for a moment to the kinship terminology.
● 601 We shall make a full analysis of this terminology in connec-582 tion with the bases of marriage later on. For our purposes 614 now it is necessary to remember the following facts: 1) the wives of clansmen, according to their generations, call each other either "sister" or "aunt" and "my husband" (n̄ǵej, nfu) up to the attainment of sexual maturity, at which time they become actual spouses, without any of the ritual or formalities which usually must be observed in concluding marriage with outsiders. This custom generally explains why the grown-up spouses are most often called "yrɨkh"
and "mam," i.e., old man and old woman, since at the age
when most of us are only preparing to get married the young Gilyak spouses may already be celebrating their silver anniversary. This custom sometimes leads to abnormal marriage unions. Now and then one finds in one yurt a pair who call themselves husband and wife, where the husband is a youth
of about sixteen, while his wife is only four or five years old.
The explanation for this is either that the older sister of the latter has died or that her mother is considerably younger than her own brother. One way or another, such cases still further emphasize the imperative nature of the aforementioned marriages. It is characteristic that this case is particularly zealously carried out in the richest families, which usually
are distinguished by their especially strict observance of all the ancient customs and rites.

/165 cont./

582 Among the Gilyak, this type of marriage is imperative 584 to such a great extent that such marriages are often performed soon after the birth of the future spouses, in order to avoid any possible chance circumstances that could interfere with this important matter. The first concern of a mother soon after the birth of a son is to do everything possible in order to 585 marry him to the daughter of one of her brothers. In the ritual of the wedding, the child-groom or his father ties up
the little hand of the bride with a thread twisted from the hairs of dog fur and a nettle, the magical symbols of a common economy -- dog-breeding -- and fishing: they fashion ● [601] nets from the nettle. From this moment the marriage is concluded, and when the bride has grown up a little more,
approximately to the age of four or five years, she usually moves to the house of her groom, where she grows up with him, and they call each other, however strange it may seem to us, by the pet names "my wife" and "my husband" 584 (n̄ǵej, nfu) up to the attainment of sexual maturity, at 162 which time they become actual spouses, without any of the 595 ritual or formalities which usually must be observed in concluding marriage with outsiders. This custom generally explains why the grown-up spouses are most often called "yrɨkh"
and "mam," i.e., old man and old woman, since at the age
when most of us are only preparing to get married the young Gilyak spouses may already be celebrating their silver anniversary. This custom sometimes leads to abnormal marriage [582] unions. Now and then one finds in one yurt a pair who call themselves husband and wife, where the husband is a youth
of about sixteen, while his wife is only four or five years old.
The explanation for this is either that the older sister of the latter has died or that her mother is considerably younger than her own brother. One way or another, such cases still further emphasize the imperative nature of the aforementioned mar-[556] riages. It is characteristic that this case is particularly zealously carried out in the richest families, which usually
are distinguished by their especially strict observance of all the ancient customs and rites.

/167 cont./ Thus, each man can have several clans
606 of "fathers-in-law," and all the agnates of these clans, ac-602 cording to generations, are considered aṅ̄ǵej -- his wives and 614 the wives of his kinsmen. So it is in the kinship terminology, ● [601] and so it is in life.

It will be necessary for us to consider in detail later how
this complicated system developed.

For the present, we think, quite enough has been said to see that in the sphere of individual marriage the appellations pu and aṅ̄ǵej have played and still play an enormous role, symbolizing in themselves the remarkable institution of the right to marriage -- one of the many benefits which the clan structure gives to each of its participants.

Now we shall indicate only the practical significance of this institution of the right to marriage at the present time.
For the contemporary Gilyak, marriage is one of the most difficult matters of life. Not only in the fairy tales, but also in real life "finding a wife" is a business of unusual difficulty.
First of all, there is the extreme shortage of women. Among the Gilyak, according to calculations made on the basis of the census that I took, for every 1,000 males there are 785
females; on the isolated shores of the Sea of Okhotsk, it is 694 females, while in Siberia, for every 1,000 males there are 900 females. It is necessary to add that a significant percentage of the Gilyak, namely, the wealthiest individuals, keep from two to four wives. For example, according to my census on the western shore of Sakhalin to the north of the settlement of Arkyvo, for every nine monogamous men there was one polygamous man, with the total ratio of men to women being 1000:694. There is one old bachelor for every 11 married men, and one polygamist for every 19 married men. It is not difficult to imagine how limited the choice of women was, /168/ and it was already limited by a whole set [583] of prohibitions. With such a limited choice and with such a considerable preponderance of men over women, the bride
price, the payment for women (in valuables or long-term service), naturally reaches an unusually great amount. Under

/173 cont./

*835 by chance taken a wife secretly, 614 rather than from the clan from 582 which all the kinsmen usually take a wife.

● 601 In these cases the norms of sexual relations, and the *835 terminology as well, are not the same. Among the majority 184 of clans, in both cases sexual intercourse with these women 614 is legitimate, the participants call each other pu and aṅ̄ǵej, and their children call each other tuvn and the sisters of their mother and their husbands correspondingly "mothers" and "fathers." But among other clans, mainly among clans who are neighbors of the Ainu, the arrangement is different. If the sister of a man's wife marries his akhmalk, then sexual intercourse with her, as in general with the wife of an akhmalk, is absolutely prohibited, and, instead of aṅ̄ǵej, the man calls her achk (mother-in-law). But if she marries a completely alien man, then the relations between them are as between aliens, i.e., sexual intercourse is not considered a *835 sin, but neither is it legitimate. What is remarkable, however, is that the offspring of both families are in all cases, even in such /174/ relations, considered to be tuvn (brothers) (1)

*835 601
601 184
*835 614

1. I shall give an example which depicts very well both the relations of such tuvn (i.e., the children of sisters whose husbands are aliens to each other) among themselves and their mutual relations towards their wives.
Wremgin and Hibl are individuals of two different clans (kkhal), one from the clan Fanǵi, the other from the clan Khoi, but their mothers were tuvn, i.e., sisters from one and the same clan. And

/174 cont./

*835 nevertheless, notwithstanding the 601 fact that their fathers and they themselves are persons of alien clans, they call each other tuvn, because their fathers were married to sisters and had the right to sexual intercourse, and, as tuvn, they do not dare to converse or joke with each other (see below, the prohibitions); their wives are considered ymk (mothers) to their children, and Hibl, as the younger, has the right to sexual intercourse with the wife of Wremgin.

*835 down to the third generation, and this shows best of all that the old order dictated that the sisters of Gilyak's wife be the wives of his brothers.

Thus, the question of the relations between a Gilyak and his married aṅ̄ǵej in practice comes, in the main, to the same thing as relations with the wives of his "brothers" (tuvn).

601 As we have said, and as is evident from the kinship 184 terminology, some clans strictly differentiate between the *835 wives of older and of younger tuvn, and others make no dis-614 tinction at all between these categories; in some -- only the wives of the older tuvn, in others -- all the wives of tuvn without distinction, are considered aṅ̄ǵej of each of the tuvn, but in both cases the right of these pu and aṅ̄ǵej to sexual intercourse is indisputable.

Among the western Gilyak, who make no distinction between the wives of brothers, they formulated this right for me repeatedly in the following, more clear expressions:
"With the wife of a younger brother (his) older brother is allowed to have sexual intercourse" ("good"); a younger (brother) is allowed to have sexual intercourse with the wife of an older (brother) ("good").

/177 cont./
595 tales again and again begin with the words: "ǵaɣuvyn temu
*835 ruvn aṅ̄ǵej n'ena alvynd" -- "two Gilyak brothers had a wi 538 and later on the content itself of this idea is disclosed. In /178/ such tale (1), in which they are talking about the

1. L. Shternberg, Materialy
/Materials/, II, 21, p. 171.

abduction of the common wife of two brothers by a mountai man, we find a passage depicting the forms of sexual relati and the relationship of the woman to both brothers: "That same evening the made the...sacrificial cups, six of them, in order that her husbands might take them with them (on th hunt); then that night, having slept a little (i.e., under one cover with the elder brother), she made her way to her youn husband (beloved), lying on the middle plank-bed, and, having copulated, she slept with him. On the next day, he husbands set out." The finale of this story is curious. After a long search for the abducted woman, the older brother (nowadays her individual husband), having despaired of the success of the search, returned home, while the younger brother, on the other hand, zealously continued the search, and when he finally found his way to the home of his beloved, the narrator says that the woman ran to her husband "pivner:kntokh" (actually, to the brother of her individual husband) (line 58) ... They not only speak in such language 595 in fairy tales, but every day. When a man speaks of his wi
*835 or a woman of her husband, they by no means imply their in 601 dividual spouse, but one or another of their "husbands" with out distinction. In just the same way, when a married man speaks of his wives (in the plural), or a married woman of h husbands, they always imply the individual husband and his brothers, and, conversely, the individual wife and the wives of the brothers.

/31 cont./

periods in the evolution of marriage, and, although they could have influenced one another, they basically belong, speaking in the language of geology, to different formations. It is sufficient to say that among the Tungus tribes sexual intercourse with wives of individuals of ascending generations is allowed, for example, with the wife of the father's younger brother, while among the Gilyak this is regarded as incest.

At first sight the Gilyak institution of marriage does not seem to be anything special. A Gilyak will generally buy one or rarely two or three wives, who come over into his clan and are regarded before the world as his personal wives and the mothers of his children. The children belong exclusively to the father and succeed him after his death. When a Gilyak becomes a father, he is no longer called by his former name, but is called the father of the born child. The exclusive possession of his wives expresses itself in the stern custom of blood vengeance against the disturber of marital harmony. The clan is based on the principle of agnation, and marriage is exogamous.

One can travel over the entire territory of the Gilyak, live in their yurts, and observe their family life for a long time, and not notice anything peculiar in the structure of their family. In large winter yurts the inhabitants occupy their plank beds by families, each living in relation to its own particular interests. Complete harmony and tender relations prevail among husband, wife, and their children. That is not all. One may frequently encounter instances of striking loyalty and love between spouses. When one of them dies, the other frequently lays hands on himself or dies from grief. In a word, to all appearances we are dealing with the type of family which is generally called patriarchal. Actually, however, it is not. First of all, one is struck by the strange kinship nomenclature. A whole group of women call a whole group of men their husbands (pu, ivn), and the latter call them their wives (an'gej). Likewise, a whole group of men call a group of women their mothers (ymk) and a group of men their fathers (ytk), and these call the former their children.

/31 cont./

601 In particular, among many primitive tribes, the Gilyak calls not only his own wife, but also the wives of his elder brothers of all degrees of kinship, as well as all the sisters of his wife of all degrees of kinship, his wife (an'gej), while they, in turn, call him their husband (pu, ivn). Their children call one another brothers and sisters (tuvn, ruf). In addition the Gilyak calls all his female cousins on his mother's side /32/(the daughters of the brothers of his own mother and of the brothers of all the women whom he calls ymk -- mother) his wives from the time of their birth. The Gilyak calls not only his own mother, but also all the wives of the brothers of his father, own and agnate, as well as the sisters of these women, mother (ymk), while they call him their son. Consistent with this, he calls not only his own father, but also the brothers of his father, his father (ytk), while in certain clans the term father is applied to all elder and younger brothers (own and agnate) of the father, and in others (among most of the Sakhalin Gilyak) -- only to the brothers younger than the father. The children of brothers in relationship to the latter are considered sons and daughters. Seemingly even stranger is the rule by which women call their husband's brothers' wives sister, while men call their father-in-law's sisters mother. A European hears with astonishment a small Gilyak boy call the wife of his elder brother an'gej (wife), while she calls him -- little husband (ychikh, pu, ivn), or as the Gilyak very often says: "I shall go to see my fathers and mothers," i.e., the brothers of his father or the sisters of his mother, but after long observation one becomes so accustomed to this strange phenomenon that he begins to consider 601 it completely natural. In spite of the views expressed in recent 835 times that a classificatory system of kinship represents only the nomenclature of ages, I can testify after long years of observation that among the Gilyak this nomenclature, based on a strict calculation of degrees of kinship, fully corresponds to their norms of sexual intercourse. Age plays no role; frequently very old men and young adolescents are included in one and the same category. All persons bound together by the names an'gej and pu (husband and wife) actually have conjugal rights to one another, i.e., they not only have the right to enter into regular marriages with each other or to have sexual intercourse before entering into a

/35 cont./

The views of the Gilyak in this regard are so strict that he transfers them into the animal world; dogs caught in an incestuous act are killed, being considered werewolves.

The Gilyak speak of the Russian women who sell themselves for money with the greatest contempt. This strict loyalty with regard to persons of prohibited categories created a system of prohibitions against conversation and joking with whole classes of people. It is even difficult for us Europeans to imagine that the Gilyak man or the Gilyak woman does not have the right, not only to joke, but even to talk with his own brothers and sisters, or even with brothers and sisters of the most distant degrees of kinship, i.e., with the whole class of tuvn, because, on the one hand, familiar relations may lead to sexual intercourse in forbidden degrees and, on the other hand, to light quarrels out of jealousy in cases of permitted intercourse. On the same grounds, among the Sakhalin Gilyak, one is allowed to talk to, but not to joke with, wives of the younger brothers, because sexual intercourse with them is forbidden, and, conversely, one can both talk to and joke with wives of elder brothers, and generally with the group of an'gej (wives).

Because of the prohibition against conversation with categories of close kinsmen among the Gilyak, the custom of saying hello and good-by upon arrival and departure is absent.

So far, I have cited only facts. But where did these strange facts come from? How can we explain these complex and confusing norms of sexual cohabitation, and the no less strange kinship nomenclature? Even if we can to some extent explain the mutual rights of brothers to their wives, the right of a person to the married sisters of his own wife or the married sisters of the wives of his brothers is completely incomprehensible. Why is it that a woman calls not only her own sister, but also her husband's brothers' wives sister? Why does a man /36/ call the sister of his father-in-law his mother? Why, for instance, is it enough that a person from clan A, let us say, takes a wife from a completely alien clan for all the women of clan A to become forbidden to the representatives of the latter. The complex and confusing chain of these facts must doubtless be the result of the single, very simple basic fact of an original type of family and clan organization, a type which,

because of the vicissitudes of the clan life of the Gilyak, their migrations, depopulations, immigrations, and other such reasons, naturally in the course of time had to become complicated and lose its former simplicity.

A key to the discovery of this original type is the same kinship nomenclature, which, without doubt, is a living reflection of the sexual norms which were discarded or are being discarded.

First of all, it is clear that the kinship nomenclature according to which I, a man, call the sisters of my father-in-law mother (ymk), while my father calls them his wives, at the same time that my wife and the wives of my brothers, both own and agnate, call one another sister, can develop only under circumstances in which all my clansmen take their wives exclusively from one common clan, and furthermore in such a way that each generation of brothers of all degrees of kinship takes for wives a corresponding generation of women-sisters of all degrees of kinship. Then, in fact, the sisters of my father-in-law will be the wives of my father and of his brothers, and consequently, my mothers, while my wife and the wives of my brothers will be sisters to one another. Under such a system, marriages between persons of ascending and descending generations (uncles and nieces) are impossible.

But which clan is the one from which all my clansmen must necessarily take their wives? This is eloquently answered by that detail of the kinship nomenclature by which I and my clansmen of my generation, i.e., my brothers and cousins in the male line, call from birth our mothers' brothers' daughters our wives, and conversely, they call us their husbands. It is clear from this that the clan from which my mother came, i.e., the clan of her father and of her brothers, is that clan from which I and my clansmen (the mothers of the clansmen of my generation are the sisters of my mother) must necessarily and exclusively take our wives, and furthermore, as I have already said, from corresponding generations. If my father and his brothers took for their wives a group of sisters from a certain clan, then I and my brothers must marry the daughters of the brothers of this group of sisters from the same clan. But to exchange women, i.e., giving women to that clan from which my /37/ clan takes wives, is prohibited: all the women of

/37 cont./

174 601 835 582 614 my clan must, in turn, go to a third clan, whose ancestresses were sisters of the male ancestors of my clan. In the kinship terminology this limitation is clearly expressed in the fact that I do not call the daughter of the sister of my father wife (an'gej), but simply navkh, and she calls me, not husband (pu, ivn), but ytk, akhmal'k. Such was the type of the primitive structure of the family and clan, reconstructed a priori from the kinship nomenclature. I did not, however, arrive at my conclusions a priori.

582 60 614 In spite of all the unfavorable conditions indicated by me which relaxed the exclusiveness of marriage within a particular clan, the old principle continues to be dominant up to the present day. Upon first acquaintance with the way of life of the Gilyak, not yet knowing their kinship nomenclature in detail, I was impressed by the persistent tendency of each clan to take wives predominantly from one particular clan, namely, from the clan of one's mother. P'fand'ukh umgu genedzh urdzhra -- "You must take your wives there from whence you came, i.e., from the clan of your mother" (1); thus the Gilyak taught me their matrimonial

[192]

1. The etymology of the word p'fand'ukh is interesting; it is composed of pi (ones own, yours), pandf (kinsmen of the mother), and ukh (from). The word pandf is from pandynd -- "to be born."

835 wisdom. Although now it is permitted to take wives not from the clan of one's mother, the terminology has imprinted an old prohibition on this group of women: brides not from the clan of the mother bear the name yokh, i.e., a woman with whom sexual intercourse is prohibited (thus, for example, elder brothers, for whom sexual intercourse with the wives of the younger ones is prohibited, call the latter yokh), while a bride from one's mother's clan is called an'gej (wife, any woman with whom sexual intercourse is permitted). Indeed, the favorite form of marriage among the Gilyak even now is marriage to a daughter of a brother, own (preferably) or agnate, of the mother, but in any case a kinsman -- "brother" of the latter. On the other hand, marriage with a

582 601

/37 cont./

582 601 daughter of the father's sister is not permitted. In the predilection shown by the Gilyak for such a marriage, the almost religious-reverential attitude toward a custom which at one time was indubitably a universally binding, religio-social requirement is

582 584 perceptible. Every woman, as soon as she bears a son, approaches her brother, if he has a daughter, with a request for the engagement of their children. The ceremony of engagement consists in the binding of the arm of the bride with a piece of dog hair by the child-groom or by his father (a symbol of being carried away on dogs and also an echo of the totem /38/ cult of the dog). When the bride reaches five or six years of age, often even earlier, she goes to the home of the groom, with whom she grows up and is educated until she enters the period of maturity, when, without any ritual,

582 614 she in fact becomes his wife. The degree to which the principle of compulsory marriage exclusively with women from the clan of one's mother is still strong may be seen from the fact that, if even one clansman of the clan, let us say, A, took his wife from the completely alien clan, D, that is quite sufficient for all the women of the first clan to become forbidden to clan D, because the fact, even though unique, of the moving of women from clan D into A makes the first (D) the clan of the mother, into which the marriage of women from clan A is forbidden. In this case, how-

[125] [601] ever, "numbers" may testify most eloquently. During the census that I made specifically for the study of the structure of the Gilyak family and clan, I was impressed from the very first days by the abundance of married (i.e., other-clan) women in each clan who called each other "sister" and "aunt," and not only in name, but who had actually been taken from one clan, namely, from that one from which the given clan had taken its women (the clan "of the mother") from ancient times.

582 178 If this regulation of marriage survives to such an extent even now, in spite of the obstacles mentioned by us that lay in its way, then without doubt it was originally universally accepted, and even if all traces of it had disappeared in the contemporary customs, sufficient proof of its existence remains in the kinship terminology preserved up to the present in all its originality and recreating with extraordinary objectivity the old regime which gave rise to it.

/188 cont./

02 and between the women and the elder tuvn of their husbands on the other. As is well known from the kinship terminology, 51] the individuals of these groups call each other by the prohibitory terms jokh and atk. These last terms are likewise used by daughters-in-law and mothers-in-law to designate each other.
2 Between them, as between the individuals of the prohibited 4 categories, once again psychic intercourse is not permitted, although not with uniform strictness everywhere. Among some, for example, among the Gilyak of the estuary of the Amur, neither conversation nor jokes are allowed. In other places business relations are allowed, but jokes and conversation are forbidden. The prohibition of psychic intercourse does not exist between sons-in-law and mothers-in-law.

02 Now how the prohibitions are realized in life remains to be explained. The Gilyak themselves classify the psychic 2] forms of intercourse between prohibited categories with the terms: indynd (to look, khernd (to converse, to talk), lerund (to joke, play, play pranks), and vakrund (to quarrel, dispute, revile). But not all of these four forms are applied equally between all the categories. Thus, we have seen that the father is forbidden only lerund (jokes, playing pranks) with his daughter, but he is permitted to converse with her and all the more to revile her. The prohibitions on "looking in the face" -- indynd -- on the contrary, are in effect only between "brothers and sisters"; lerund applies with equal rigor between all categories. There remains the prohibition khernd.
This term embraces two concepts: conversation and discussion, and business relations. The first are absolutely for-bidden: /189/ one can get along without conversations, and besides conversations may lead further. It is another matter with business conversations; sometimes it is absolutely impossible to get along without them. Thus, for example, the elder brother frequently takes the place of the father in relation to the younger brothers, and it is impossible to avoid having dealings with him; therefore in extreme cases the younger brothers may address the elder brother. Brief direct

/191 cont./

*174 60 Why, for example, do the wives of the most distant tuyn, although they may be completely alien to each other, call each other sisters? Why do I, a man, call my father-in-law, although he may be a complete stranger, my "mother's brother," and under the same conditions a woman call her mother-in-law the "sister of her father"? Why, if I am a man and marry a woman who is a complete alien to me and to my clan, from that moment on do all the sisters of her father, even the unmarried ones, become my mothers, and no one from her clan can marry the women from my clan?

[614] Why is it that the women of my clan cannot marry into not only that clan from which anyone from my clan takes a wife, but any clan from which this latter clan takes wives? In what way could the apparently paradoxical fact that a man can have male and female agnates (sons, daughters, brothers, fathers, and mothers) in clans completely alien to him have *174 58 60 come about? This confusion and apparent absurdity can be explained only by the fact that the primitive, simple, and logically consistent system of marriage, like every religious [183] norm, has created around itself by a peculiarity natural to it a fabric of extended norms. [178] On the other hand, under the influence of historical conditions and the conditions of life, it underwent a gradual extension and complication, while at the same time the kinship terminology, as an element which by its own nature, in view of its formality, was distinguished by its extreme stability, remained unchangeable. What was the scheme of primitive marriage like? In certain places in our exposition we have already discussed it. Now we must elucidate this question in all its fullness. The detailed analysis both of the prohibitive and of the permissive norms of marriage that we made in the preceding chapter has shown that these norms completely correspond to the kinship terminology; in other words, the whole intricate Gilyak kinship terminology is nothing more than an automatic registry of the marriage system. [178] This faithful registrar, so stable in the face of all change,

/208 cont./

*614 615 ●601 178 then all these five clans and their five clans of akhmalk'i will be akhmalk'i to the whole of clan of A and will be prohibited for the women of A (only up to the third generation, it is true). But if we also add to these ten clans those two clans of original akhmalk'i of the first and second degree, then clan A will have 12 clans of akhmalk'i of the first and second degree to which it may not give its women. This tendency toward extension could lead to extreme difficulties in arranging a marriage, for with every new free marriage the number of clans which are available for marriage is reduced, but in practice the consequences of this extended regulation are allayed by the still firm tendency of the clan and of its separate members to depart from the old norm of taking wives from one particular clan, the clan of the mother, only in the most extreme cases.

This extended regulation introduced still greater confusion into the kinship terminology and into the norms of group marriage. Earlier, the classificatory system extended, in addition to the clan of the speaker, also to two other clans -- the clan of the fathers-in-law and the clan of the son-in-law /zyat'/, and the designations corresponded to the sexual relations. If, for example, I, a man, called the sisters of my fathers-in-law mothers, then this corresponded to reality, for the sisters of my "fathers-in-law" were group wives of my "fathers" and one of them was actually my mother. Or, if I, a man, called each "father-in-law" in that same clan of "fathers-in-law" the brother of my mother, and his daughter (the daughter of my mother's brother) my wife, then this corresponded to the actual kinship relations. Now that, due to /209/ occasional free marriages, the classificatory terminology has been extended to a whole set of clans which are completely alien to all the clansmen, the designations "fathers-in-law," "mothers," "daughters of the mother's brother," and so forth are extended to persons who are not such in actuality, and nevertheless in this new circle of persons all the old norms of group marriage between

/209 cont./

*614 615 ●601 178 corresponding persons are obligatory. And it is entirely natural that the number of persons drawn into the circle of classificatory kinship is ever larger, and the knowledge of this kinship, so simple before, becomes a real science, into which a person is initiated during childhood and in which he becomes proficient only when he reaches maturity. It is natural, therefore, that the classificatory system gives the European an impression of complete confusion and inexplicability. In reality, all the terms of kinship and the sexual norms which now appear so confused and illogical are explained quite simply -- the intrusion of the new practice of free marriage into the old staunchly persistent system of the old imperative, according to which marriage was a blood-kinship union and was obligatory from the clan of the mother.

VII.

The Phratry and Its Genesis

*614 615 We have seen how, owing to the primordial norms of marriage, the principle aim of which was to provide the progeny of an ancestor with wives from a group of persons in a distinct category of blood kinship, there automatically arose exogamous groups, clans. The essential significance of the clan consisted in the common right and obligation to supply its members with women outside of their own number. In other strictly defined groups-clans. Thus, in its basic function, each clan taken separately is by no means a self-sufficient organism. The existence of each clan is organically bound to the existence of at least two other clans related to the first by blood, one the clan of its ancestress, from which it takes its wives, the other the clan of the sisters of its ancestor, to which it is obliged to give its own women, and, furthermore, these two clans, as we have seen, may not coincide, since the exchange of women between two clans is not allowed.

/223 cont./

IX.

The Gilyak Kinship System and Morgan's Hypothesis

●601 *835 The Gilyak system of kinship and marriage fully confirms the basic hypothesis of L. Morgan that the terms of kinship are the result of corresponding sexual norms and norms of marriage. What for Morgan was only a deduction, we actually see to the fullest degree in Gilyak life. If a Gilyak calls a group of women by the term "wife," then those women are actually wives for him in the proper sense. If a Gilyak calls a certain group of men -- fathers, then these are actually persons who have sexual rights to his mother. If he calls the brother of his mother "father-in-law," then it is because, according to primordial law, he is actually obliged to marry the daughter of this uncle, who will then be his father-in-law. In the Gilyak system one finds the explanation of even such universal classificatory terms as elder and younger brother and elder and younger sister, which are very important, especially in marriage norms. First of all, these terms regulate individual marriage in the [582] clan of the mother. An elder brother is obliged to marry an elder sister, and a younger brother a younger sister. [587] These terms are important in the levirate, since a widow passes to a younger "tuvn." Finally, among half of the Gilyak, only the younger brothers have sexual rights to the wives of the elder brothers.

How clearly individualized this correspondence between a kinship term and the marriage rights is in the Gilyak terminology is seen especially clearly in the relations of the brothers to their wives. Among half of the Gilyak, as we have seen, all the brothers without exception have mutual rights to one another's wives. And among them the terms actually correspond to this: a man designates with the term "wife" all the wives of his brothers without exception, and therefore all the children of brothers without exception call

1; Sutenberg--330 E-5 (1890-1897, 1910)1933 RX2 Gilyak RX2

/223 cont./

●601 *835 these latter by the term "father." But among the other half of the Gilyak only the younger brothers have rights to the wives of the older brothers. And once again this is indicated in the terminology. I call the wife of my younger brother, with whom I do not have the right of intercourse, by the prohibitive term jokh, /224/ but I call the wife of an elder brother by the same term as I call my own wife; corresponding to this, the children of brothers call only the younger brothers of the father, as well as this latter, by the term ytk (father), but the father's older brothers -- atk.

114 601 *835 The objections which have been raised against Morgan's hypothesis are in this sense objections of a purely abstract character. Thus, for example, the well-known objection repeated by all the opponents of Morgan with regard to the inexplicability of the class of mothers, since a person's mother, they say, is always well-known, is quite simply explained by the norms of sexual relations among the Gilyak. A Gilyak calls by the name of mother any woman with whom a person of the class of his fathers has the right to sexual relations. The degree to which the Gilyak realize the significance of this term is seen from the following. We have just seen that among that half of the Gilyak where only the younger brothers have the right to sexual intercourse with the wives of the elder, the children of brothers distinguish the elder brothers of their father from the younger brothers, and these latter they call by the term "father," but they do not distinguish the wives of the brothers of their father, calling them mothers. Why? For this reason. I call the wives of my father's younger brothers mothers because their husbands are my fathers (they have the right to sexual intercourse with my mother), and the wives of the older ones because my father has the right of sexual intercourse with them, and they are his wives.

/224 cont./

●601 *835 A Gilyak also calls the sisters of his father-in-law mothers, but this is entirely correct, because, as we have seen, father and son take wives from the same clan; the father takes a man's sister, while the son takes a daughter of this latter, so that the sister of one's father-in-law is [114] really his mother. The objection of Kunov that the classificatory terms designate only age classes is likewise completely unfounded. In Gilyak life, age plays no part in the kinship terms. My class "father" can be younger than I, and nevertheless he cannot marry a woman of the class of my wives, but, on the other hand, is obliged to marry a woman from the class of wives of my actual father, and on attaining maturity he will in fact be a husband of my mother.

*194 *835 [114] The Gilyak system and the punalua family. In the light of the Gilyak system, not only is Morgan's general hypothesis concerning the origin of the classificatory system of kinship from the system of marriage confirmed and explained, but also his more particular hypothesis concerning the origin of the Turanian kinship system from the punalua family. The Gilyak kinship system is /225/ Turanian in its basic indications, while the marriage system presents a most complete form of the punalua family. In actuality, according to Morgan, the basis of the punalua family is "group marriage, either of several own /α/ collateral sisters with their spouses, where the common husbands were not necessarily kinsmen, or a group marriage of several own or collateral brothers with their wives, where these wives were likewise not necessarily kinswomen, although in both cases this was often encountered." The old Gilyak family with its obligatory marriage from one particular clan was a group marriage of all the brothers (own and collateral) with all the sisters of a particular generation, so that the groups of husbands were brothers, while their wives were always sisters. This is evi- [601] dent from the kinship terminology -- the wives of brothers call each other sisters.

/225 cont./

835 601 At the present time, when it is permitted to take wives from different clans, all the brothers (own and collateral) are still the group husbands of their wives, who often turn out to be sisters. And we have seen that even when sisters marry persons of different clans all the consequences of group-marriage are still preserved, and their children are considered brothers and sisters.

[114] The structure of the Gilyak family thus affords us the opportunity to establish the very genesis of the Hawaiian family, from which Morgan constructed the punalua family. This family originally did not consist of a group of several brothers who were married to their wives in a group marriage, or, on the other hand, of several sisters in a group marriage with their husbands, who might be non-kin to each other. Such a family could not have created the Turanian classificatory system of kinship, for it presupposes the possibility of several groups of brothers or sisters, each group participating completely independently in a group marriage in which the other groups did not share; consequently, common designations for all the brothers according to their marital relations could not have been formed.

835 614 194 The Gilyak family in its pure, original form gives us an actual picture of this family. The family is an intraclan organization. Therefore, each group-family represents a generation of all the brothers of a given clan (own and collateral) joined in a group marriage with a whole generation of women from another clan. These women are necessarily sisters, for the daughters of clansmen-brothers, as we have seen, are necessarily the wives of the sons of the sisters of their fathers. Now when, as we have seen, by virtue of [108] /226/ the causes that we have mentioned, this marital obligation became weakened, and brothers began to take wives from different clans and women began to marry into different clans, sisters might turn out to be members of a group marriage with husbands who were not kin to each other, and brothers in the same kind of marriage with wives

/226 cont./

835 194 614 who were not kin to each other, with this difference, that the collective of sisters, upon marrying into different clans, would be broken up into several groups, as in the punalua family, while the collective of brothers, always remaining in the clan, would be preserved in its entirety. And since 835 601 the Gilyak family is the most ideal form of the punalua 194 family, it is natural that the Gilyak terminology be the most complete form of the Turanian system. Actually, we find in it classificatory groups that must have existed in the Turanian as well, but which were lost with the loss of the [114] system of marriage. For example, in that Turanian form which Morgan once considered the most complete, namely, the Tamil, the two extremely important classificatory terms -- "husband" and "wife" -- are not found.

835 601 194 171 The Tamil system, according to Morgan, developed under conditions where brothers had common wives, and sisters had common husbands. Correspondingly, in the Tamil system a man calls by the name father, not only his own father, but also all the brothers of his father, and he calls not only his own mother, but also all her sisters his mothers; in like fashion, he calls all the children of the brothers of his father and of the sisters of his mother, brothers and sisters. Corresponding to this, there must have also existed a general term "wife," by which a man would designate not only his own wife, but also her sisters and the wives of his brothers, and likewise a general term "husband," by which each woman would designate both her own husband and his brothers, and the husbands of her sisters.

114 601 171 In reality, these general terms do not exist either in the Tamil or in the Iroquois systems. Thus, among the Tamil, a man calls his wife en mainavi, the wife of his brother enanni, en maittuni, the sister of his wife en korlunti, en maittuini; there is the same lack of correspondence with the term "husband" (1).

1. See the table in Morgan.

/226 cont./

601 835 114 Among the Gilyak the terms "husband" and "wife" -- pu and an'g:ej -- embrace all persons united by group marriage, which thus still more confirms the truth of Morgan's interpretation of the kinship terms.

114 601 171 /227/ Elucidation of several terms of the Turano-Ganowanian system which appeared inexplicable to Morgan. In the light of cousin marriage, several terms of kinship in the Turano-Ganowanian system become understandable to us. For example, Morgan was very confused by, and even regarded as inexplicable, why, among the Tamil, I, a man, call the children of my male cousins (considering as such the children of the sister of my father and of the brother of my mother without distinction) nephews and nieces, but I call the children of my female cousins sons and daughters. At the same time, among the Seneca-Iroquois exactly the reverse of this rule prevails. In his Consanguinity and Affinity he considers this fact inexplicable: "The discrimination of degrees of the cousin relationship," he says "is a remarkable fact in the Tamilian system. It is now found only in some systems of the Turanian family. From the structure and principles of the Turanian system, as I have already shown earlier with regard to the Ganowanian system, it follows inevitably that in its further development this relationship would be applied and restricted to the children of a brother and sister. It was probably unknown in the primitive system... It is the only particular in which it differs materially from the form of the family among the Seneca-Iroquois. In this respect, this last logically agrees more with the principles of the Turanian system than the Tamilian system. It is difficult to find any explanation for this difference" (1).

[113] 1. Morgan, Systems of Consanguinity and Affinity of the Human Family, 1871 p. 391.

/227 cont./

114 601 171 Subsequently, in Ancient Society, Morgan found an explanation for this fact.

"This shows," he says, "that among the Tamil, at the time when the Turanian system was introduced, all my female cousins were my wives, while at the same time this did not apply to the wives of my male cousins" (2).

[113] 2. Morgan, Ancient Society, 1877, p. 444 (Russ. trans., Pervobytnoe obshchestvo, p. 427).

